a manner not quite so harsh and hostile as that in which they now proposed to deal with those of the English bishops, because they had left them in possession and management of the episcopal order; but they now distinctly proposed to abolish Church-rates, and to provide an equivalent for them from the Church lands. Formerly, ministers maintained that it was an essential element in the constitution of the Established Church, that the State should contribute to the repair of its fabric; and though they announced their intention to abolish Church-rates, they never led the House to believe that they would lay the burthen of the equivalent on the revenues of the Church. Up to a late period, therefore, their opinion must have been clearly in favour of Lord Althorp's proposition. They had but the other day asserted the principle, that the Church must have a contribution from the State to preserve its edifices, and that the fund should not be taken from its own property; and now they turned round and charged those who sat on the opposition side of the House, with delusive apprehensions for the safety of the Church, when they adhered to the principles on which ministers had all along acted, and quoted the doctrines which they propounded. The hon. and learned member for Tipperary had asked, what had passed since 1834, to excite such unfounded fears in the mind of the hon. baronet near him (Sir F. Burdett)? What better answer could he give to the hon. and learned gentleman's question, than that the administration was now proposing measures directly contrary to those which they had lately brought forward, abjuring the principles they held in 1834, and which they then told the House were essential to the existence of the Establishment? In 1834, the case of religious destitution was not fully made out; ministers had not yet affixed their signatures to a report declaring that there were no funds at the disposal of the Church for providing increased accommodation, and that the necessity for it was so crying as to demand an immediate remedy; yet they now proposed to take from the Church, property which they then consented to allow her to retain—property which formed the only means she possessed of supplying existing deficiencies, and to apply it to the relief of the land. The right hon. gentleman, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, might disclaim it as loudly as he pleased; but ministers were allied for the passing of this measure with those whose designs were hostile to the principle of an Establishment. The hon. member for Middlesex manfully stated his opinion on the subject in 1830. That hon. member then combated the principle of supplying an equivalent for Church-rates from the public funds; he left ministers no means of blinking or evading the question, for he rested his objections to the measure on the ground, that he was not then satisfied that an equivalent could not be provided from the ecclesiastical property. What was the answer of the noble lord opposite? The noble lord declared that he adhered to the principles laid down by Lord Althorp, and repudiated the doctrine of the hon. member for Middlesex. The noble lord said this: "He and his colleagues had, of course, little reason to expect the support, on this occasion, of the hon. member for Middlesex, and others whose object was to destroy; but they did hope to have the support of those who, with themselves, wished to see the Church maintained, at the same time that they entertained a desire to see its abuses reformed, and all the practical grievances of the dissenters redressed." The proposition now made by the noble lord was directly at variance with that which the noble lord then invited the friends of the Church to entertain. It was identical in principle with that which the hon. member for Middlesex proposed, and for which the noble lord denounced him as a destroyer of the church. Now, without inquiring as to the extent of the conformity or inconsistency of the present ministerial policy with the past, or as to the adoption by them of other people's opinions, the noble lord would allow him to observe, that if in 1834 the noble lord, with the precedent of the bishop's lands in Ireland before him, denounced a proposition similar to that which he now brought forward as having a tendency to destroy the Church, the noble lord could not be surprised if the opposition occupied the ground which he held in 1834, but which he now abandoned, to ally himself with a destroyer. One word, and he came to the concluding observation which he should make. The hon. member for Weymouth had asked, what vote he meant to give on the proposition brought forward by the hon. member for St. Andrew's? The hon. gentleman had no doubt been forced to put the question by his strong apprehension that the government would sustain a defeat, and the circumstance of their agreement in the vote which they should give, might render it advisable to put the hon. gentleman in possession of the views with which he should record it. It was also right, as there were so many new members in the House, all fortunately sitting on his side, that he should take the liberty of setting before them, in a form divested of all technicality, the mode of acting which he should adopt. Unfortunately, they should not be enabled to give, at first, a direct vote upon this question; he deeply regretted it, for he wished to negative the proposition of government on its own grounds. He did not, therefore, mean to imply any predilection for the present system of Church-rates, or the least reluctance to support a proposition similar to that made by Lord Althorp, or to consider any mode by which the admitted objections to the present system could be obviated; but he felt an objection to the proposition of the right hon. gentleman, who would divest the bishops of all concern in their own lands, and find an equivalent for Church-rates in the ecclesiastical revenues. The hon. member for St Andrew's, in a speech which exhibited equal good temper and ability, and which did him great credit, proposed, as an amendment, that they should leave out all the words after "that" for the purpose of inserting these words: "It is the opinion of this House, that funds may be derived from an improved mode of management of church-lands, and that these funds should be applied to religious instruction within the Established Church, when the same may be found deficient, in proportion to the existing population." The hon. member for Weymouth told him that he was bound to vote for that amendment. The right hon. gentleman, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, said, it was impossible he could vote for it. It was not necessary, in point of form, that he should explain what course he meant to take when the question was put from the chair; but he should be sorry on any occasion to leave his intentions equivocal, or subject to doubt, when he had the opportunity of fairly stating them. He, then, would fairly say what course he intended to pursue. He could not vote for the hon. gentleman's amended resolution; and, on this ground, the hon. gentleman expressed it as the opinion of the House, that funds might be derived from an improved management of the church-lands, and that those funds should be applied to the religious instruction of members of the Established Church. In the first place, he had a great objection to vote for abstract propositions on any subject, unless they were to be the foundation of a measure. The resolution of the government was to be followed up by a practical measure; but the hon. gentleman had proposed an abstract proposition, without stating what his intentions were, if it were adopted. He, for one, then, would not consent to affirm an abstract proposition, unless it were to be followed up by a practical measure. But he thought that great doubt might arise, if the proposition of the right hon. gentleman were permitted to pass unexplained; and, besides, it might be inferred that funds might be derived from this source by the appointment of commissioners. He objected to the appointment of commissioners—he objected to the doing of that which might divest the bishops of all interest in the lands. He was opposed then to that proposition; and, again, as to the interests of the lessees, he was not prepared to establish a proposition which might affect the interests of those persons without being in full possession of the subject, and exactly understanding how far the proposition was to go. He knew that the lessees were not in possession of a legal right; but then they had a very long tenure of the property; besides, too, it was to be considered that the commonwealth had failed in attacking this property—that it was regarded and treated as property which could not be disturbed nor tampered with. Knowing this, he would not consent from that property to give an increase to the funds of the church without very mature consideration, and the closest regard to the circumstances in individual cases, in order that he might, in attempting to improve those funds in the manner that was proposed, do so consistently with perfect equity. That it was possible to introduce such an improvement as that which had been suggested, he did not deny. He believed that it was possible, consistently with the independent character of the bishops, which ought to be maintained, and of the interest of the lessee, which ought not to be injured. And he at once admitted, that if, consistently with principle, consistently with a liberal construction and an equitable consideration of the rights and interests of the lessees, he could improve the Church property, then he was ready to maintain that the surplus ought to be applied to the purposes to which the hon. gentleman intended to appropriate them. He was content with the arrangement of last year as to the emoluments of the bishops; and if he thought that an improvement in the tenure of the property under them could be increased, consistently with their station and their character, and with justice to the lessees, then he should give to the hon. gentleman his most cordial support in devoting the surplus to the great object to which he sought to apply it. And he hoped that the hon. gentleman would understand the grounds upon which he, at that moment, hesitated to vote in support of his proposition: first, because he regarded it as the proposition of an abstract measure; and, secondly, that he feared that the hon. gentleman assumed a mode for raising an extra revenue which was identified with that of the government. But, if they could realise a surplus, then he should say, that with his consent the funds ought to be applied to giving church accommodation; and if they could do so, then, he said, let them be appropriated exclusively for the benefit of the poorer classes. He was pleased with the origin of the proposition which they had been discussing. So far from joining in the sarcasm directed against the hon. gentleman, that this resolution relating to the Church of England was made by a Secoto-Calvinistic member, he cordially rejoiced that the community of interests between the established churches of the empire was demonstrated by the proposal. The time had passed when narrow jealousies between the two establishments could be permitted to exist; their cause was the same, and for the protection of that cause, they ought cordially to unite. The question at issue between many was this—whether establishments were to be abolished, or whether they were to trust to the voluntary principle for the due and proper maintenance of religion? That was the question directly involved in the proposition before the House; it was so considered by the hon. gentleman opposite—it was so considered by many dissenters; and the main ground of discussion was, not the sum that was to be dealt with, but the principle that was involved. It was against that principle that he and his friends declared themselves—it was in favour of the Establishment, not for the miserable purpose of maintaining its emoluments for individual interests, that it was intended by them to give the plan their strenuous opposition. It was because they believed that the maintenance of the Established Church was so interwoven with the civil institutions of this country, that to preserve it was necessary for the purposes of social concord and internal peace; and also, because they believed it to be necessary for the infinitely higher purpose of protecting religion from the assaults of infidelity or of lukewarm indifference, and providing, as the hon. gentleman had said, for that which was the inalienable right of every member of the community—the means of deriving spiritual instruction and religious consolation from an Established Church, founded in our civil policy, preserved by the State, and deserving of respect from the people.

After a long discussion, the resolutions were carried by a majority of 7.

PUBLICATION OF PRIVILEGED PAPERS.

MAY 30. 1837.

Viscount Howick moved the adoption of certain Resolutions, founded on the Report of the Committee on the publication of printed papers. The Committee had been appointed to take into consideration the proceedings, at Nisi Prius, in the case of Stockdale v Hansard and others, and, since the presentation of the Report of that Committee, a second action had been brought by the same parties in the Court of King's Bench; in order to set the matter at rest, the noble lord called on the House to affirm the Resolutions.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, that he should be sorry to come to a decision without shortly expressing the ground on which he should vote in favour of the resolutions proposed by his Majesty's ministers. The first impression of every man, and particularly of those who had not paid much attention to this subject, would unquestionably be adverse to the principle upon which the report of the committee was founded; for it must appear manifestly unjust that any public authority should have the power of authorising the publication and the sale of libels upon the characters of individuals. At the same time, however, he was convinced, that upon mature reflection, those who had given way to this first impression, would ultimately acquiesce in the absolute necessity, if the House of Commons were to continue in the discharge of its constitutional powers, of maintaining this privilege of publication, and in maintaining for itself the exclusive right of judging of the extent and nature of that privilege. Was it, he would ask, the duty of the House of Commons to institute free inquiries into alleged abuses of public trusts? If that were its duty, if it were one of the public functions of the House to institute those inquiries, what was the limit which was to be placed, or the discretion to be exercised, in conducting those inquiries? Was it not manifest, if the House did not possess a free and unfettered power of compelling the appearance of witnesses, and of instituting a free and unfettered inquiry, that their privilege, or their duty rather, as the grand inquest of the nation, must be at once paralysed? But, if the House of Commons possessed the power of compelling the attendance of witnesses, and of compelling those witnesses to make a disclosure of the truth, ought they not, having so done, and having given publicity to such evidence, to protect those witnesses from the consequences of that disclosure? And as to the publication of the evidence, might not that publication be essential in order to satisfy the public mind with respect to the grounds of their legislation, and to make the constituency of the country aware of the principles upon which their representatives acted? He would say, therefore, that from the dictates of reason, and from what common sense suggested, the House of Commons ought to have the power, subject to no extrinsic control, of exercising their inquiries freely, without being exposed to any legal results. But it was not upon reason and common sense alone that he founded this principle—he founded it upon the uniform practice of parliament. There was a series of cases showing that for the last 120 years parliament had been in the practice of instituting these inquiries. It had instituted inquiries with respect to allegations of abuses in the East Indies; with respect to allegations of abuses in the election of members of parliament; with respect to allegations of abuses as to the slave trade in the West Indies; and as to the management of the cotton manufactories in this country. The question, then, briefly was, whether the House were to continue in possession of the power of instituting inquiries into alleged abuses or not? If they were to inquire, then did it not of necessity follow that they must have the power to summon and examine witnesses? If, indeed, they were private individuals, they would have no right to publish the truth to which those witnesses might bear testimony; but neither would they have the right to make the inquiries. It was because, as a public body, they had authority to make these inquiries, and to submit the result to the public, that they were to be privileged. This privilege, it would appear, had been exercised for 120 or 130 years, and during that time Mr. Warren Hastings had been attacked, and many other persons of the highest eminence had been attacked, by its exercise, or he ought rather to say, would have been attacked, if the inquiries respecting them had been instituted by an unauthorized body, or by individuals. Up to the present time, however, it had been the doctrine, that parliament had the right to institute inquiries of this nature. But on an allegation being made by a report of a committee, that a Mr. Stockdale had published an obscene pamphlet, an action was brought against an officer of the House of Commons for that publication. What said the authorities? He would take the authority of Lord Tenterden, who stated, that he doubted whether there existed the privilege to sell a libel. Lord Denman said, that if this publication had been written or printed merely for the use of the members of the House, it would have been a different thing. They had, then, this admission, that there was little doubt of the authority of Parliament to institute these inquiries, and that there was also little doubt of their right to print for the use of their own members a fair statement of that which was disclosed. Now, he would ask for no further concession in favour of the principle for which he was contending, which was, that the House had the power of protecting parties from the consequences of giving evidence, which the House had compelled them to give. The only remaining question was, whether there was a legal distinction between printing for the use of members and the subsequent sale. He imagined that there was not; and if so, the doctrine that the sale of publications printed for the members, subjected the officers who printed them to question by the Court of King's Bench, must be abandoned. Had a man a right to give away a libel? He who circulated a libel merely for a mischievous purpose, was equally liable to legal question as the individual who sold it for profit. In the eye of the law there was no distinction between publication and sale. But if this were so, how happened it that a different view would have been taken of this case if the publication had been only for the use of the members? Let them look at the absurd consequence which would result from the adoption of such a principle. It had been the practice, before that of sale commenced, to print more documents than were required for circulation among the members, and to distribute them freely; but if the principle which had been laid down could be sustained, should the Speaker give a single copy he would be subject to prosecution. Though members were entitled to their copies, if, having obtained them, they lent them, or if they ceased to be members, were they to be subject to legal question? Suppose a member went to his constituents, and referred to the documents which as a member he was entitled to use—suppose, in explaining his conduct to his constituents, he found it necessary to advert to some statement in the documents, and that such statement threw severe aspersions on certain proprietors in the West Indies, was he not to be permitted to state the details of those transactions by which his conduct had been determined? Then, would the newspaper that published a report of his speech be liable? He referred to these things merely to show the absurdity of the distinction between publications for the use of members, and the subsequent sale.* It was impossible to maintain such a distinction. If they admitted the right to publish for the use of members, and the right of the member to publish, in vindication to his constituents of the course he had pursued, then they must allow that there was no legal distinction of such a nature as that which he had described. If it could be shown that this privilege were necessary for the protection of the functions of members, and that for a long series of years there were precedents for the sale of the papers, he could not conceive on what grounds they could refuse to assert their privilege, because now for the first time it was questioned by Mr. Stockdale. A committee which sat on this case would not even be able to make a report without being liable to question, for they thought it necessary, to enable the House and the country to judge of the matter at issue, to print a copy of the declaration filed in the King's Bench on the 7th of November, 1836, and in the course of that document it was stated that John Joseph Stockdale had published a book of a most disgusting nature, and indecent in the extreme. If the King's Bench could interfere in this way with the privileges of the House, it might as well at once close its doors as a court of inquiry. The hon. member for Ripon had suggested, that the better course might be to trust to a declaratory bill. The objection to that was, that the House of Lords might not agree to it, and then they would have thrown a doubt upon the extent of their privileges, without having succeeded in obtaining a law to secure them. He admitted that the power claimed by the House was arbitrary, and that therefore it became them to use it with the greatest possible caution and discretion. When he called it arbitrary, he meant that it was an exclusive jurisdiction, admitting no co-ordinate authority; but when he compared the disadvantages likely to arise from the exercise of the power, with the inconvenience which must result from the House being deprived of it, he found that there was the strongest reason for the House continuing it in its possession.

Resolutions agreed to.

JUNE 8, 1837.

The Attorney-general rose, to bring the case of Messrs. Nicholls and the Messrs. Hansard under the notice of the House. The hon. and learned gentleman concluded a brief statement of the facts, by moving, "That it is the opinion of this House, that the petitioners be allowed to appear and plead to the said action."

SIR ROBERT PEEL:—Mr. Speaker, I have not heard without great regret the opinion of the Attorney-general, that it is advisable, on account of the technical and legal difficulties which would accompany any other course of proceeding, to direct the servants of this House to plead to the actions that have been brought against them. I had hoped that this House possessed sufficient power to vindicate by its own exclusive authority, without the aid or recognition of any extrinsic jurisdiction, those privileges which are absolutely essential to the performance of its proper functions, and even to its existence as an independent branch of the legislature. I was aware of the precedent for pleading furnished by the case of Burdett v. Abbott; but as the result of the proceedings in that case was a distinct confirmation, by the highest judicial authority, of the exclusive right of the House of Commons to judge and decide in matters of privilege, I had hoped that that precedent rather supplied a reason for the assumption by the House of Commons of the jurisdiction which it admitted to exist, than a rule for a repetition of the course which was then followed.

The Attorney-general has reviewed the several proceedings to which this House might have recourse in consequence of the actions of which notice has been given, and the difficulties which would arise were any one of them preferred as an alternative to that of pleading. Of these difficulties an unprofessional man is scarcely a competent judge. I only wish they had been foreseen, and carefully considered by those members of the select committee who belong to the profession, and are so eminent for their legal acquirements, because they ought to have been pointed out in the report of that committee as important elements in the consideration of any practical measure to be adopted for the maintenance of our privileges; and if pointed out, and traced in their several bearings and consequences, might have induced the House to modify at least the resolutions which have been voted in regard to the practical assertion of the privilege in question.

These, however, are matters of subordinate concern. Upon the main point at issue,—the existence of this privilege, and the right, the exclusive right, of the House of Commons to decide with regard to the exercise of it,—I have a decided opinion, the grounds of which I shall take this opportunity of stating. Having been deputed by the House, in conjunction with other members of the select committee, to apply myself to this question, I entered upon it with no previous prepossession or prejudice. I have examined the foundations on which the privilege rests, and the authorities in favour of or opposed to its maintenance; and the result is, a firm conviction that the House of Commons has the right to institute free inquiry upon every matter of public concern,—to elicit every fact connected with the subject of inquiry,—and to publish the evidence taken, and the conclusions drawn from that evidence, either for the use of its members, or, if it shall so think fit, for the use and information of the community at large. My conviction is, that for such publication the House of Commons is not responsible to any other tribunal; and that, therefore, the officers and agents of the House of Commons, acting by its express authority, are not liable to question in a court of law, for acts done in pursuance of that authority.

I found the claim to this right, first, upon the deductions of reason and common sense, from a review of the constitutional character, functions, and duties of a representative assembly, forming one branch of the legislature, being, as they are called by Lord Coke, “the general inquisitors of the realm, coming out of all the parts thereof,” and summoned to advise the king: “De communi consilio super negotiis quibusdam arduis et urgentibus, regem statum et defensionem Regni Angliæ, et Ecclesiæ Anglicanæ, concernentibus”

I found this claim, secondly, upon the recorded declarations on great constitutional principles by the highest constitutional authorities; and lastly, upon the decisions of the courts of law.

This is the outline and general scope of my argument, and I shall proceed to establish the privilege to which I lay claim, upon each of the several foundations on which I consider it to rest. First, it is a privilege essentially necessary to the proper discharge of our legislative and inquisitorial functions; and, if necessary, deriving its origin and validity from that necessity. The principle contended for on the opposite side is,—that though we may publish for the use of our own members, without liability to question; yet that we cannot, without incurring such liability, publish for the information of the community; above all, we cannot authorise the publication by way of sale. If this distinction be well founded in point of theory, what practical security does it afford against the supposed abuse for which a remedy is sought? We may print, it seems, 658 copies of our proceedings, and distribute them among the members of the House of Commons. That will be a privileged communication. May the members who thus receive the papers printed for their instruction, make any use of them? May they, if questioned by their constituents as to any particular vote, defend that vote by reference to the printed proceedings which caused the vote, and may possibly constitute its only justification? Will the disclosure to constituents of such cause and justification be also a privileged communication? If it will, where is the limit to the publicity? If it will not, this consequence must follow,—that a member cannot safely explain to his constituents the reason for the course he may have pursued, although he may have, in common with all other members, an ample vindication of that course in a document printed by the authority of this House.

Can it be maintained in argument, that the privilege of free publication is limited by the House of Commons to publication for the use of its members? Suppose we should be called upon, as we have frequently been called upon, in our legislative capacity, to adopt measures affecting the liberties of the people, or measures demanded by great necessities, and at variance with the established usages and principles of the constitution; suppose the vindication of these measures should mainly rest upon the acts and proceedings of individuals, the public developement of which might be essential to a correct understanding of the measure to be adopted, and of the exigency that required it: is it the constitutional law of this country, that we can give no information to the public on such matters, without liability to question in Westminster Hall?—that we must limit to our own body the knowledge which demands and justifies a new law?—that in the case of enactments, like the bill of exclusion, breaking through the established order of hereditary succession; or, like the suspension of the Habeas Corpus, depriving the subject of his security against arbitrary imprisonment; or, like the Regency bill, transferring the exercise of royal authority from the hands of the monarch;—is it the true constitutional doctrine, that we must require blind submission on the part of the community to our own will and authority; and that we have not the power, however inclined, without liability to question for reflecting on individual character, to enlighten the public mind, and to impress it with the justice and reasonableness of our proceedings? That power we do not possess, unless we can exercise it freely, and without the risk of punishment to those who act by our commands. Better, far better, to relinquish it altogether, than to hold it at the discretion of an extrinsic authority. If a court of law may determine what shall be the degree of public necessity which shall justify our comments upon the acts of individuals,—may limit by its own discretion the exercise of our privileges, absolving our servants in one case, and punishing them in another; then, not only does the privilege itself lose its character and value, but the independence and authority of the House of Commons are virtually extinguished. We have functions to perform, partaking of a judicial character. We have the unquestionable power to suspend the issue of writs of election. We are occasionally called upon to pass bills for the entire forfeiture of the elective franchise,—for the annihilation of the right of constituent bodies to send members to parliament. In each case we act upon the evidence of corruption and abuse. That evidence cannot be taken without imputations and reflections on the conduct of private parties. Must that evidence, from the fear of giving offence, be a sealed book excepting to our own members? Must the town or city whose ancient right is forfeited, remain ignorant of the grounds on which penalty and disgrace are inflicted? Or, if we make public the evidence on which we have acted, for the express purpose of justifying our decision, may those whose misconduct is exposed,—to whom, individually, gross acts of corruption are brought home in our report,—may they construe our publication into a private libel, and seek for redress against our officers in a court of law?

It is occasionally our duty to make inquiry into the alleged misconduct of public functionaries. An accusation is preferred of the violation of public trust, or the abuse of authority committed to a public servant. Must the evidence affecting his character be confined to ourselves? Must the copy of the report which condemns him be reserved for the use of members of parliament? It is surely impossible to draw distinctions between public and private capacities which a court of law can recognise. If our publications generally are not privileged, they are not privileged in the special case of inquiry into the misconduct of a public officer. The public officer, as well as the private individual, may appeal for redress to the courts of law for an alleged libel. He may take the criminatory evidence and the offensive report, and demand redress from the printer of the House of Commons. Surely the decision must turn upon the abstract question, whether the matter complained of be or be not a libel. The public character of the plaintiff will not enter into the consideration of the court. The court will not draw the distinction which we recognise, between the public servant and the private individual—will not admit that comments may be made more freely upon one than upon the other. The court will overlook every relation of the public functionary save that of a subject of the King requiring redress for a libel.

Now, is it possible to contend that a public servant charged with an abuse of his trust can thus sustain an action for libel? Take a case that has actually occurred. When the present Lord Chief-Justice of the King's Bench was a member of the House of Commons, he felt it to be his duty to move for an inquiry into the conduct of Mr. Kenrick, a magistrate of the county of Surrey, and a judge of the principality of Wales. He charged Mr. Kenrick "with having dishonoured his magisterial functions," and with the "guilt of partiality, violence, and malignity, in imprisoning an individual in some degree under his protection." Evidence was taken at the bar in support of these allegations: evidence painful, no doubt, to the feelings of Mr. Kenrick. That evidence, and the petition preferring the complaint, were printed, upon the motion of Mr. Denman, and became matter of public notoriety throughout the whole country. Now, supposing a member of parliament, having received his copy of these printed papers, had lent it to a friend, or to a constituent, for the purpose of justifying to that constituent his vote.—had thus given to it a publicity beyond that which was required for the use of members; will any one contend that it was competent to Mr. Kenrick to maintain an action for libel against the printer of the House of Commons? If Mr. Kenrick could not, who can? The charges against him implied conduct highly criminal; the evidence ex parte was very injurious to his character, and the result was tantamount to his acquittal, for no vote of censure was passed, still less any proceeding adopted for his removal either from the judicial station or the commission of the peace. Why was he debarred from redress? Because in his case, as in others, the privilege of parliament protected the presentation of the petition, the printing of that petition, of all the documents connected with it, of the accusatory evidence given at the bar; and it would have been thought preposterous, if Mr. Kenrick, holding a public trust, and charged with the abuse of it, had sought redress from the Court of King's Bench against acts done or authorised by the House of Commons, in whatever manner they might acquire publicity.

I have thus attempted to prove, that the House of Commons may, if it so think fit, direct a publication of its proceedings more extensive than that which is requisite for the use of its own members. I found the proof of this upon reasonings derived from the duties and functions of the House of Commons, and from the necessity of satisfying the public mind as to the grounds of its proceeding in cases of grave importance, such as the suspension of the public liberties, or the forfeiture of legal rights and franchises, or the inquiry into the misconduct of public functionaries. I found it, also, upon long and uninterrupted, and (until Mr. Stockdale questioned it) unquestioned usage. The sale of the proceedings and votes of the House has continued without interruption from its first commencement. For nearly two hundred years papers have been printed by order of the House, and have received a publicity (in many cases by sale) far greater than that which was required for the personal use of members. From a remote period the invariable practice has been to print and distribute a greater number than was necessary for such a purpose.

It is contended, however, that we cannot authorise the sale of libels. Certainly not. But this use of the word libel is a begging of the whole question. My argument is, that a publication made by the authority of the House of Commons is not a libel, and cannot be questioned as such in a court of law. But under any circumstances, would the fact of sale make any distinction in the character of the publication? If the House of Commons may authorise a gratuitous distribution of a certain paper, may it not authorise the sale of it? Can it, in the eye of the law, make the slightest difference, in determining its legal character as libel or not libel, whether a parliamentary report be printed at the public cost, and given away, or vended at a certain price, covering part of the expense of publication? Surely, the protection depends upon a higher principle than any that is involved in these narrow distinctions between printing for the use of members, or distribution without sale, or distribution by means of sale. It depends upon that great principle which, in a narrower application of it, justifies the publication of proceedings in courts of justice, provided the report be an impartial and accurate report. Those proceedings may be detailed by unauthorised parties, may be sold for individual profit, in term reports and in public newspapers. The consideration of public advantage in the publicity of judicial proceedings overruled the regard for private feelings and private interests. Can it be maintained, that the House of Commons is so much more restricted in its powers, that it cannot protect its own servants in the authorised publications of its own proceedings, for the necessary information and satisfaction of the community?

I contend then, that this privilege is maintainable on the plain deductions of reason, from a consideration of the functions of the House of Commons, of the necessity of the privilege in question to the satisfactory discharge of those functions, and of established precedent and long-continued usage.

I proceed to support the proofs derived from such considerations by the express declarations of the highest constitutional authorities, specially applicable to the very point at issue, and made under circumstances entitling them to peculiar weight. One example will suffice; for that example is so emphatic, and so conclusive, that it is needless to produce others.

In the reign of Charles II., an information was brought by the Attorney-general against Sir William Williams, who, when Speaker of the House of Commons, had printed, by order of the House, a certain paper, called the Information against Thomas Dangerfield. Judgment passed against Sir William Williams on this information, in the second year of the reign of James II. This proceeding the convention parliament deemed so great a grievance, and so high an infringement of the rights of parliament, that it appears to be the principal, if not the sole object of one of the heads of accusation, against James II. in the bill of rights.

The 8th head in that bill was to this effect;—"By causing information to be brought and prosecuted in the Court of King's Bench for matters and causes cognisable only in parliament, and by divers other arbitrary and illegal courses."

To this article the Lords at first disagreed; and gave for a reason, "because they do not fully apprehend what is meant by it, nor what instances there have been of it; which, therefore, they desire may be explained, if the House shall think fit to insist further on it."

The House of Commons disagreed with the Lords in their proposal of leaving out the 8th article. But, in respect of the liberty given by the Lords in explaining that matter, resolved that the words do stand in this manner:—"By prosecutions in the Court of King's Bench, for matters and causes cognisable only in parliament, and by divers other arbitrary and illegal courses."

By this amendment, the House adapted the article more correctly to the case they had in view; for the information against Sir William Williams was filed in King Charles the Second's time; but the prosecution was carried on, and judgment obtained, in the second year of King James.

That the meaning of the House should be made more evident to the Lords, the House ordered, "That Sir Wm. Williams be added to the managers of the conference;" and Sir William the same day reports the conference with the lords; and "that their lordships had adopted the article in the words as amended in the Commons." And, corresponding to this article of grievance, is the assertion of the right of the subject, in the 9th article of the declaratory part of the bill of rights—videlicet, "That the freedom of speech, and debates or proceedings in parliament, ought not to be impeached or questioned in any court or place out of parliament." The occasion on which this declaration was made, was the constitutional settlement at the period of the revolution; the parties to it were the Lords and Commons forming the Convention Parliament, which declared the rights and liberties of the subject. It was no vague assertion of parliamentary privilege generally. It was pointed at as a specific grievance: that grievance was the filing of an information against the Speaker of the House of Commons for printing and publishing for the use and information of the public, by order of the House of Commons, a certain document, libellous no doubt, if not protected by privilege. There can be no ambiguity in the expressions made use of in the 9th article of the declaratory part of the bill of rights. They claimed for debates or proceedings in parliament, perfect freedom from impeachment or question in any court or place out of parliament; and they are without effect and without meaning, if lord Denman's decision can be sustained—namely, "that the fact of the House of Commons having directed Messrs. Hansard to publish their parliamentary reports, is no justification for them to publish a parliamentary report containing a libel against any man."

I will now consider the remaining ground on which I rest this assertion of privilege, namely, the decisions of the courts of law. They appear to me to confirm the conclusions drawn from general reasoning, and the declaration of the bill of rights. They establish two positions—that that which the House of Commons publishes is a publication protected by privilege; and that of the limits of that privilege, and of the exercise of it, the House of Commons is the exclusive judge.

The first case I will refer to, is the case of the King v. Wright. The decision in that case places the privilege on higher grounds than those for which I contend, and extends impunity beyond the limits within which I confine the present argument. I refer to that case mainly on account of the principles laid down by the highest judicial authorities, which appear to me to be conclusive in favour of the position that I am maintaining.

I will briefly advert to the particulars of that case. A committee of secrecy was appointed at a period of great public excitement, to consider and report upon certain documents laid before them for that purpose by the government. A bookseller, of the name of Wright, reprinted fully and accurately, but without any sanction or authority from the House of Commons, the report of the committee. It contained allegations against several persons, three of whom, Messrs. Hardy, Thelwall, and Horne Tooke, had been charged with high treason, and had been acquitted by a jury. Now, the presumption of the law clearly was, that they were entirely innocent of the charge, and had a right to all the benefit of acquittal. And yet the report of the committee of secrecy thus speaks of the parties:—"Some of the persons so arrested were prosecuted for high treason. Three of the persons so indicted were tried, and on their trials were acquitted of the charge in the indictment. But the evidence given on those trials established in the clearest manner that the views of those persons and their confederates were completely hostile to the existing government and constitution of this country, and went directly to the subversion of every established and legitimate authority."

Now, it is difficult to conceive a more aggravated case of libel, if the character of the publication were to be judged of upon ordinary grounds, and without any reference to the authority under which it was made. A rule was granted against Wright, the bookseller, at the instance of Mr. Horne Tooke. It was argued by Erskine and Warren, in support of the rule, "That the House of Commons themselves were not justified in directing or giving a sanction to the publication of this libel on Mr. Tooke; or, at all events, they have no legal authority to direct or sanction the publication of matter that amounts to a libel on any individual, beyond an entry on its own journals, or for the use of the members of the House." But Lord Kenyon observed:—"It is impossible for us to admit that the proceedings of either of the Houses of Parliament is a libel, and yet that is to be taken as the foundation of this application. This is a proceeding by one branch of the legislature, and therefore we cannot inquire into it." Mr. Justice Grose said:—"This is a motion for leave to file a criminal information for publishing a supposed libel, but, in truth, for publishing a proceeding of one branch of the legislature, when they were acting for the safety of the State. Now, on looking into the judicial proceedings of this court, I find no instance of such an information as the present." Mr. Justice Lawrence observed, that—"A true account of what passed in a court of justice could not be a libel, though the publication of such proceedings might be to the disadvantage of the particular individual concerned; for it is of vast importance to the public that the proceedings of courts of justice should be universally known. The same reasons also apply to the proceedings in parliament. It is of advantage to the public, and even to the legislative bodies, that true accounts of their proceedings should be generally circulated; and they would be deprived of that advantage, if no person could publish their proceedings without being punished as a libeller. Though, therefore, the defendant was not authorised by the House of Commons to publish the report in question, yet, as he only published a true copy of it, I am of opinion that the rule ought to be discharged."

Mr. Justice Lawrence, it will be seen, rested the claim to protection on higher and more extensive ground than that of the usage or any special privilege of parliament. He contended for the doctrine, that true accounts of proceedings in parliament and in courts of law, were for the public advantage, and therefore entitled to universal protection. He contended for the impunity of unauthorised parties who might, with a view to individual gain, publish the proceedings of courts of justice. If Mr. Justice Lawrence were right, a fortiori the authorised servant of the House of Commons must be entitled to protection. If in the case of Wright he carried too far the claim for impunity, the objection that might apply to the extended claim, will have no necessary application to the more limited claim of privilege which the present question involves.

Against that privilege, the privilege of unfettered inquiry and free publication, either for the use of the House of Commons, or the information of the community, no argument has been advanced which has the sanction either of reason or authority. It is contended, that it may be abused; and cases of wilful tyranny and extreme oppression are brought forward hypothetically, for the purpose of showing that there ought to be the means of redress, and, therefore, that a court of law ought to have jurisdiction. The argument from the possibility of abuse, if valid in this case, is equally valid against every other privilege of parliament. It is valid also against the right of courts of justice to commit for contempt, without liability to question by co-ordinate tribunals; it is valid against judgment in the last resort,—against the supreme authority of parliament,—against the grant of any power to a human, and therefore imperfect tribunal, from which there is not a right to appeal.

If the right of publication be a privilege necessary for the performance of the functions of the House of Commons, then, like other privileges, it is not liable to question in a court of law. The House of Commons is the exclusive judge of the exercise of it. The judgments, not of the House of Commons, but of the courts of Westminster, are decisive on this point. I speak not of the case of the King v. Wright, but of other cases, of every case in which an application on a question of privilege, like this application of Stockdale, has been made to the courts of law. The arguments now urged in favour of the jurisdiction of these courts were urged in the cases to which I refer. The objections from the possible abuse of privileges, of which the possessor was to be the exclusive judge, were distinctly brought forward; but they were overruled by the tribunals whose authority would have been extended by admitting the force of them. The courts of law repudiated the jurisdiction with which it was proposed to invest them.

The decisions of the court in the case of Crosby, the lord mayor of London, and in the case of Burdett v. Abbott, are conclusive on this point. In the first case, a person of the name of Miller was delivered from the custody of the messenger of the House of Commons, by the lord mayor, who denied the authority of the Speaker's warrant within the city. The lord mayor, was adjudged by the House of Commons to have been guilty of a breach of privilege, and was committed to the Tower. Application was made to the Court of Common Pleas for the discharge of the lord mayor from custody, on the ground that the House had exceeded its jurisdiction in committing for what, on the face of the warrant, did not appear to be a breach of privilege.

In refusing the application, Chief Justice De Grey said,—“When the House of Commons adjudge any thing to be a contempt or a breach of privilege, their adjudication is a conviction, and their warrant is an execution; and no court does or can bail a person in execution.” The Chief Justice asked what were the objections to the power of the House of Commons? “It is objected,” said he, “first, that the House of Commons are mistaken, for that they have not this power, this authority; secondly, that, supposing they have, yet in this case they have not used it rightly and properly; and, thirdly, that the execution of their orders was irregular. In order to judge, I will consider the practice of the courts in common and ordinary cases. I do not find any case where the courts have taken cognizance of such execution, or of commitments of this kind: there is no precedent of Westminster Hall interfering in such a case. In Sir John Paston's case, 13 Rep., there is a case tried from the ‘Year Book,’ where it is held, that any court shall determine of the privilege of that court; besides, the rule is, that the court of remedy must judge by the same as the court which commits: now, this court cannot take cognizance of a commitment by the House of Commons, because it cannot judge by the same law; for the law by which the Commons judge of their privileges is unknown to us.” Again, he says:—“The House of Commons only knows how to act within their own limits. We are not a court of appeal. We do not know certainly the jurisdiction of the House of Commons. We cannot judge of the law and privileges of the House, because we have no knowledge of those laws and privileges." Observe how the Chief Justice disposes of the objection from possible abuse. He says;—"Another objection has been made, which likewise holds out to us, if pursued in all its possible cases, some dreadful consequences; and that is, the abuses which may be made by jurisdictions from which there is no appeal, and for which abuses there is no remedy: but this is unavoidable." "In the case of a commitment by this court or the Court of King's Bench, there is no appeal. Suppose the Court of King's Bench sets an excessive fine upon a man for a misdemeanour, there is no remedy, no appeal to any other court. We must depend upon the discretion of some courts."

Mr. Justice Gould said:—"I entirely concur in opinion with my Lord Chief-Justice, that this court has no cognizance of contempts or breach of privilege of the House of Commons: they are the only judges of their own privileges; and that they may be properly called judges appears in 4 Inst. 47, where my Lord Coke says, an alien cannot be elected of the parliament, because such a person can hold no place of judicature." "This court cannot know the nature and power of the proceedings of the House of Commons. It is founded on a different law. The 'Lex et Consuetudo Parliamenti' is known to parliament men only."

What said Mr. Justice Blackstone, an authority whom my hon. friend (Sir Robert Inglis) will, with myself, from our connection with the University of Oxford, regard with common respect? "I concur," said he, "in opinion, that we cannot discharge the lord mayor. The present case is of great importance, because the liberty of the subject is materially concerned. The House of Commons is a supreme court, and they are judges of their own privileges and contempts, more especially with respect to their own members; here is a member committed in execution by the judgment of his own House. All courts, by which I mean to include the two Houses of Parliament and the courts of Westminster Hall, can have no control in matters of contempt. The sole adjudication of contempts, and the punishment thereof in any manner, belong exclusively, and without interfering, to each respective court. Infinite confusion and disorder would follow, if courts could, by writ, of habeas corpus, examine and determine the contempts of others. This power to commit, results from the first principles of justice; for, if they have power to decide, they ought to have power to punish: no other court shall scan the judgment of a superior court, or the principle seat of justice; as I said before, it would occasion the utmost confusion, if every court of this hall should have power to examine the commitments of the other courts of the hall for contempt, so that the judgment and commitment of each respective court, as to contempts, must be final and without control." "I know, and am sure, that the House of Commons is both able and well inclined to do justice. But there is a great fallacy in my brother Glynn's whole argument, when he makes the question to be whether the House have acted according to their rights or not? Can any good man think of involving the judges in a contest with either House of Parliament, or with one another? and yet this manner of putting the question would produce such a contest. The House of Commons is the only judge of its own proceedings. Holt differed from the other judges on this point; but we must be governed by the eleven, and not by the single one. It is a right inherent in all supreme courts; the House of Commons have always exercised it. Little nice objections of particular words and forms, and ceremonies of execution, are not to be regarded in the acts of the House of Commons; it is our duty to presume the orders of that House, and their execution, are according to law. The habeas corpus in Murray's case, was at common law. I concur entirely with my Lord Chief-Justice." Mr. Justice Blackstone also considered the objection derived from the possible abuse of power, and the absence of a sufficient remedy. He remarked:—"The objections which are brought of abusive consequence prove too much, because they are applicable to all courts of dernier ressort. 'Et ab abusu ad usum non valet consequentia,' is a maxim of law as well as of logic. General convenience must always outweigh partial inconvenience; even supposing (which I am far from supposing) that in this present case the House has abused its power."

In the case of Burdett v. Abbott, in the year 1820, where an action of trespass was brought by Sir Francis Burdett against the Speaker for arresting and imprisoning him, the decision of the Court of King's Bench adopted the principle which had governed former judicial decisions. The defendant, in his plea, relied on the order of the House as his justification. The court considered that plea to contain a legal justification; and Lord Ellenborough in the course of his judgment, observed,—“Independently of any precedent or recognised practice on this subject, the House of Commons must, à priori, be armed with a competent authority to enforce the free and independent exercise of its own proper functions.”

Upon this ground, and supported by these high judicial authorities, — by the sanction of such names as De Grey, Gould, Blackstone, Kenyon, Grose, Lawrence, and Ellenborough, I claim for the House of Commons “a competent authority to enforce the free and independent exercise of its own proper functions:” the great functions of instituting inquiry into matters of public concern; of enlightening and satisfying the public mind; of reconciling the public feeling to acts which, without explanation, might have the appearance of intolerable harshness and severity. I ask for no extension of the privileges of the House of Commons, and will consent to none; I contend for those privileges only which are recognised by the bill of rights, by long-continued usage, and by the courts of law. To some it may appear desirable, on account of recent changes in the constitution of the House of Commons, and the increase of popular influence upon its proceedings, to curtail, as far as possible, even its legitimate authority. I cannot concur in the policy of this course. I think it more wise, more conformable with true conservative principles, to stand upon the ancient ways of the law and constitution; to maintain the just and ancient privileges of each of the great constituent branches of the legislature.

I wish to speak with the highest respect for the person as well as for the station of the Lord Chief-Justice. To his decision, as a judge, in all ordinary cases of the construction of the law, and the administration of justice, I bow with deference; but when his decisions impugn the privileges of parliament, I have not only a right, but am bound by duty, to take cognizance of them. I do not believe that his judgment in the case of Stockdale v. Hansard, is maintainable. His direction to the jury, — “That the fact of the House of Commons having directed their printer to publish their parliamentary reports, is no justification for the publication, by them, of a report containing a libel, upon any man.” — I believe to be erroneous. I trust the sanguine anticipations of the Attorney-general, that upon fuller and more deliberate argument the court will reverse this decision, will be confirmed. Still I cannot view, without serious apprehension, the possibility of their disappointment. By the course recommended by the Attorney-general, that is, by the instruction to our officers to plead, we virtually submit a decision upon our privileges to a court, the head of which has already given an adverse decision with regard to them. If that decision be confirmed, our next step will be an appeal to the House of Lords, and thus the transfer to a co-ordinate branch of the legislature of that exclusive jurisdiction to which we lay claim for ourselves in matter of privilege. I have every confidence that justice will be done according to the law and constitution of the country; but, believing that the privilege of free publication is as unquestionable as it is vital and essential to the proper discharge of our functions, I cannot without anxiety see it made the subject of litigation.

The motion was agreed to. The Attorney-general was also instructed to defend the actions.

CHURCH LEASES.

JUNE 12, 1837.

In the debate on Lord John Russell's motion for the appointment of a Select Committee to inquire as to the present management, and to the probable amount of benefit that might be derived from an improved management, of property connected with the Church.

SIR ROBERT PEEL observed, that he was in no way surprised at the impatience exhibited by the House, considering that the subject had already been debated for five nights. In the few observations he begged to be allowed to make, he should strictly confine himself to the immediate point before them, namely, whether it was fitting that a select committee should be appointed to consider this question. He well knew how plausible a proposition the appointment of a select committee was. He knew well, that if he had merely some political object in view, it would be much better to acquiesce in the proposal. He was aware that many persons, seeing how their property was situated, in consequence of the ministerial proposition on Church-rates, whatever their original objections to the appointment of a committee, were now almost ready to assent to it, as offering them a means of putting an end to their embarrassments. But he considered the proposition so objectionable—as involving so had a precedent—that, whatever the decision might be, he for one was determined not to acquiesce in the proposal to appoint a select committee to perform the duties of the executive government. This would be a precedent which government might be very glad to avail itself of, whenever it became desirable to escape out of a political dilemma. The subject had undergone a more close discussion than any other this session; greater numbers had divided on it; in the second instance, the division was entirely on the principle of the measure, it was a division on no question of detail, but turned simply on this point, whether or no, assuming that there was any available surplus, that surplus should be applied as a substitute for Church-rates, or to purposes immediately connected with the diffusion of religious instruction. On this great principle ministers had a majority of five. Why, then, did not ministers proceed with the measure; But no? they would neither do this, nor let it alone for this session, but now, for the first time, suggested the reference of this important question to a select committee of its own nomination. This was a precedent, which at any time, and under any circumstances, might be adopted, if it were allowed to become a precedent at all. It would always be a very easy thing for government, when it despaired of carrying a measure in the usual way, and when it had not the manliness either to persevere in it, in the ordinary mode, or give it up at once, to get out of the dilemma for the time by a proposition like this. The proposal was, in fact, neither more nor less than the appointment of an ecclesiastical cabinet, not by the country, but by the House of Commons, for the purpose of relieving the executive government from all further responsibility and trouble. He hoped they would take care not to have too numerous a cabinet. An hon. gentleman had desired to have the names of the new cabinet stated to the House. He would not go so far as that, but he thought it would be desirable to have the name of its chairman mentioned. The simple course then would be, for the new premier to appoint his colleagues himself; for it was of great importance to secure unanimity of opinion in the new cabinet. A conflict of opinions among its members would obviously destroy all the good effects anticipated. Of course the question would not, like the ballot, be left an open one, and yet no other course was practicable, if a conflict of opinions was admitted into this new cabinet, by the selection of its members from the opposing sides of the House. The noble lord said, he did not want the committee to decide on any great principle, but such was, notwithstanding, the case. By the express terms of the reference proposed to be made to it, it was called on to consider a great principle. The committee was called on to decide on the amount of any increased value which might be obtained from this property by an improved management, and with a due consideration of the interests of the Established Church, and of the present lessees of the property. The consideration of these interests was the proper subject for government alone to take up, but these two great questions were committed to the proposed committee. The noble lord might talk of government retaining its responsibility; but the clear fact was, not only that it devolved on this committee a duty properly its own, but that it precluded itself from offering any advice to the Crown on church affairs so long as the committee existed; and what limit was put to the duration of this committee? The committee had not to inquire into the existing mode of granting and renewing leases. On this point there was already ample information, but it would have to determine what instances of abuse existed under private bills, and when this part of its duty was discharged, it would have to consider the other and much more important matter, namely, what was the probable amount of the increased value of this property under improved management, and with a due consideration of the interests of the Established Church and of existing lessees. To ascertain this point, it would be essential to institute local inquiries all over the country, and for the committee to perform their duty honestly and fully, this part of their labours must necessarily be greatly protracted. Assuming, for the sake of argument, that further inquiries were necessary, these inquiries, in his opinion, might be conducted with infinitely greater effect by the executive government, which had the means of commanding better information than any committee of that House. In the case of the municipal corporation inquiry, the inquiry was first intrusted to a select committee of the House; but the delays and difficulties which took place, in consequence of the local nature of the whole of the investigation, very speedily convinced the committee of its insufficiency to fulfil the object; and on the recommendation of the committee its duties were transferred to a commission. He remembered, too, that when the right hon. member for Bute, about this period of the year, made a proposition that a committee should be appointed to inquire into the state of religious instruction in Scotland, he was told by government that no progress could be made in such an inquiry by a committee; that the inquiry, being necessarily local, could be conducted with much greater effect by a commission; and so a committee was refused. If the committee now proposed were granted, the only thing would be that after sitting some time, the executive government would find it necessary to appoint a commission, and, until the report of this commission, every thing in connection with Church-rates must be kept in suspense. How, therefore, those gentlemen who considered the speedy settlement of this question indispensable could, on this 12th of June, consent to the appointment of this committee he was quite at a loss to understand. Had ministers openly stated that on account of the smallness of their majority on this question, they would not persevere in it this session, but, adhering to its principle, sought further information on points not considered sufficiently clear, with a view of reviving the bill next year, such a course would have been perfectly intelligible. He further objected to the appointment of this committee, because he considered that, after what had passed in reference to the ecclesiastical commission, such a proceeding would be tantamount to a breach of faith. He did not think that commission ought to have been renewed, without government having distinctly apprised them that it contemplated the finding a substitute for Church-rates in an improved management of church property. That commission was appointed by his recommendation, and on Lord Melbourne's accession to office was renewed, the original members of it who held office then resigning their situations, and persons holding office under the new government were appointed in their stead. The ecclesiastical members of that commission had subjected themselves to much misconception and obloquy from the church for at all acquiescing in the commission, but an overwhelming sense of duty, and a sense that the real interests of the church were involved, induced them to lend their aid to the work. They proposed the division of the country into new episcopal districts. This measure reduced the incomes of some bishops, and transferred the property annexed to some sees to supply the deficiency of others. The noble lord, when he introduced the bill for affecting that object, said, that no measure of church reform would be satisfactory unless it was previously approved of by the heads of the church. The noble lord on that occasion dwelt with evident satisfaction on the friendly agreement of the bishops in his plan. The noble lord had stated that if they disapproved of the present plan, they ought never to have agreed to the slightest innovation. The noble lord came forward and declared that, after assenting to the bill of last year, they must consent to this measure, divesting the church of its property. The noble lord said, if they remained as before, and resisted all reform, the bishops might have retained possession of all their property, and he could understand the principle on which they resisted; but having consented to the measure of last year, they must consent to the present plan, involving a total alienation of their property. What motive was this to them to go on with the reform in the church which they had commenced. The bishops were told, that if they consented to assist in the work of reform, a virtual obligation would be contracted with them that they should be protected from other measures; but the year afterwards the noble lord proposed a measure which was dangerous to the interest of the church; and he said they must consent to this plan because they had agreed to the reforms which he proposed last year, and which he said he now wished to extend by making the bishops stipendiaries. The noble lord then said, "With respect to an archbishop or bishop, he was placed, according to the constitution of the church—and that constitution he did not wish to alter—among persons having a large revenue derived from the property of the country. He was placed in a certain house, which required a certain establishment to be maintained, and that there should be observed certain duties of hospitality; he was placed in a situation in which even more was required from him than from men of the highest rank and great landed property, on account of charity, a large expense being incurred. In all these respects his situation was totally different from that of a Chief Justice of the King's Bench, or a First Lord of the Treasury, who received an official salary, out of which he paid the expenses consequent on the performance of the duties of his office, and nothing else." This was avowed by the noble lord when he brought forward his measure of church reform last year, which he stated he considered a most useful measure of practical reform, and pre-eminently so, because it had the sanction of the bishops. In 1837, however, the noble lord proposed a plan not only at variance with their opinions and wishes, but which would, in operation, make the bishops merely stipendiaries. On these grounds, namely, by the appointment of the ecclesiastical commission, by the course of proceedings adopted by the commissioners, by the obligations which the government had contracted towards that commission, he objected to transferring the consideration of this question from the executive government to a committee of the House of Commons. If the noble lord had told the bishops that the consequence of their consenting to the commission and the bills of last year would be that he would plead their acquiescence as an argument for the measure on Church-rates, which they considered destructive to their order, and to the interests and stability of the church, he never could have extorted from them the first step to reform the church. If the noble lord had told the bishops that he intended to propose that a committee of the House of Commons should be nominated for the revision of the mode of granting leases of church property, and for the revision of the whole mode of management, with a view of obtaining a surplus to be directed to other than strictly ecclesiastical purposes, he would never have obtained their consent to the measures he had introduced. It was possible that some hon. members—but he did not believe that there were many, seeing the dangerous position in which church property was placed—might be led to agree to the motion, in the belief that a better distribution and management of that property might be effected. He could not, however, yield up his strong objections to the nomination of this committee; he would rather, after what had passed, that the ecclesiastical commissioners had not been appointed, foreseeing the effect that their objections to this plan must have in obstructing the course of reform in the church. He would rather be in a minority of ten on this question, than agree to any course of proceeding like the present; but he trusted that by the vote of the House that night they would escape the inconvenience which would arise from adopting the motion. To agree to this motion, it was evident that gentlemen must have more confidence in the committee of that House than in his Majesty's government, supposing that the House should agree to the appointment of the committee. He hoped some gentlemen in favour of the appointment of the committee would state their views in favour of the appointment with clearness and distinctness. He hoped that the lessees would see the advantage which were likely to result to them from the appointment of this committee; if they went into the committee, however, the noble lord would do so with the view of supporting a foregone conclusion. It was absolutely necessary that they should find that there was a surplus of £250,000. If they could not supply this £250,000 by this means, then there was an end of their present measure of Church-rates. If there was only a surplus of £100,000, they must obtain the remainder from some other source—they must trespass on some other fund, and thus they must touch the principle which the noble lord said he could not agree to. If they obtained only an indefinite surplus, for instance £10,000, or £100,000, or £150,000, or other sum, the question would still be left open for further consideration. After having occupied the House at such length, he would not enter into the discussion of the principle of the plan, for that had already occupied the attention of the House for five nights; he repeated, however, he opposed the appointment of the committee, because it would lead to unnecessary delay, because the duties which were to be referred to the select committee of that House, proposed to be appointed, belonged to the executive government, and, above all, since the ecclesiastical commission had been appointed, there was no ground for the appointment of this committee.

Motion agreed to; the committee, which was not nominated, to consist of twenty-one members.

MESSAGE FROM THE QUEEN.

JUNE 22, 1837.

Lord John Russell appeared at the bar, and said that he was charged with a Message from her Majesty.

The Speaker having read the Message to the House,—Lord John Russell moved the adoption of an address, in reply to the Queen's Message.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, although my attendance here to-day is not unaccompanied by pain, yet the pain I should feel would be far more acute and more lasting if I were unable to join in the mournful ceremony which we are this evening called upon to go through. Only seven short years have elapsed since I, standing then in the situation which the noble lord who has just sat down at present fills, had to perform the duty of proposing to the House of Commons that it should offer to his late Majesty, an assurance of our condolence on the death of his lamented predecessor, and at the same time to express their anxious hope that the reign upon which he was then about to enter might be long and prosperous. If that prosperity could have been insured alone by the devotion of a Monarch to the best interests of the country, the latter wish would have been completely accomplished, for never did any sovereign obtain more entirely than did William IV., the gratitude and affection of his people. I need hardly remind the House that one of those wishes was disappointed. The hope which we expressed of a long reign has unfortunately not been fulfilled; but when we expressed another hope—namely, that his Majesty might enjoy the respect and affections of his people—the House of Commons conveyed a wish which has been more than realised. To me it is now a melancholy consolation to be permitted to second this motion, and to unite with the noble lord opposite in proposing to this House that we should offer to the memory of the late king a sincere tribute of national respect. The becoming reserve which secludes a sovereign from the ordinary intercourse of society, had not the effect of concealing the real nature and disposition of the King, and I do believe that there never existed a more universal feeling than that now prevailing in this country, that the reins of government never were intrusted to one who bore himself more fairly in every relation—who bore the honours of his rank more meekly or with more true dignity—who evinced more compassion towards all who suffered, or who manifested on every occasion a nature more entirely free from selfishness. There was no rank, however exalted, no station, however humble, in which persons were not to be found who had opportunities of seeing how anxiously the late King did all in his power to promote individual and general happiness. It must, I am sure, be amongst the greatest consolations of his illustrious and now widowed Queen, that the House of Commons—the heart of this great nation, should entertain such sentiments as I am satisfied they do feel towards her lamented husband, and that we are, at the same time, profoundly sensible that she has, during the whole course of his reign, shed a lustre on it by the discharge of every domestic virtue, and the performance of all the duties of domestic life. In the last and closing scene of mortal agony, it is well known that she made unexampled efforts to mitigate the sufferings of him whose life was of so much value to her, and to that people who were proud to acknowledge her as their Queen. I have had the good fortune to occupy the situation under the late King which the noble lord opposite now fills, and I am enabled with the most perfect sincerity to confirm all that he has stated with respect to his late Majesty's devoted attention to business, to the feelings and convenience of those with whom that business was to be transacted; and I may add, that that application to business was carried the length of an utter forgetfulness of all amusements, and even of all private considerations, that could for a moment interfere with the most efficient discharge of his public duties. Never had public servants a more kind and indulgent master; never did a man act with more perfect fidelity. Never was there a man who, whatever might be his own political opinions, or with whatever frankness they might be stated, who acted with more entire good faith than his Majesty did, towards those who were responsible for the advice they tendered. There was not only an absence of all indirect means by which their free action could be impeded, there was not only a total absence of intrigue, but there was that sincere confidence and support, which was perfectly compatible with the maintenance of even opposite opinions. In those cases in which it did happen to that much lamented Sovereign to entertain sentiments different from his responsible advisers, they were, I can undertake to say, never pressed beyond the proper limits. It is, Sir, with heartfelt sincerity that I join in the cordial good wishes expressed in the address moved by the noble lord, that health, happiness, and a long reign of prosperity and glory may be enjoyed by the infant—the young Queen; and I can only wish that that success may respond to her own natural inclinations, and to her own natural powers—that it may respond to the affectionate care and unremitting attention which have been devoted by an illustrious princess and an affectionate mother to her education. If that success correspond to those natural expectations and to that unremitting zeal, it will be as complete as human success can be. It is difficult, however unphilosophical it may be, to avoid forming a judgment from slight indications; but I will venture to say that there is no man who was present when her Majesty, at the age of eighteen years, first stepped from the privacy of domestic life to the discharge of the high functions which on Tuesday last she was first called on to perform, without entertaining a confident expectation that she who could so demean herself was destined to a reign of happiness for her people and glory for herself. There is something which art cannot imitate and lessons cannot teach—and there was something in that demeanour which could only have been suggested by a high and generous nature. There was an expression of deep regret at the domestic calamity with which she had been visited, and of a deep and awful sense of the duties she was called upon to fulfil—there was a becoming and dignified modesty in all her actions, which could, as I have already observed, only have been dictated by a high and generous nature, brought up no doubt under the guidance of one to whose affection, care, and solicitude, she is, and ought to be, deeply grateful. I shall not weaken the effect of the noble lord's speech by entering into further details; they are totally unnecessary. I trust I have said enough to convince the House that all persons, without reference to party distinctions, and in the oblivion on this day of all party differences, join in the expression of cordial condolence with her Majesty on the loss which she and the country have sustained, and in the most heartfelt wish that we are now at the commencement of a long, a prosperous, and a happy reign.

The address was unanimously agreed to, and ordered to be presented by such members of that House as were members of her Majesty's most honourable Privy Council.

Parliament was dissolved by proclamation on the 17th of June, and a new one summoned, which was finally ordered to assemble on November 15, 1837.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO THE SPEECH.

NOVEMBER 20, 1837.

Her Majesty's Speech having been read, Lord Leveson moved the Address, in reply.

SIR ROBERT PEEL: Sir, I have frequently, on an opportunity like the present, taken an occasion to express my opinion, both when in office and when in opposition to the government, that it was not convenient on the first day of session to call upon parliament to give pledges upon any subject. I have expressed that opinion because I think it unfair, government being naturally and necessarily in possession of the measures which they mean to propose to invite parliament, which had not the same cognizance of those measures, after, probably, only a debate of two or three hours, to express an opinion upon subjects of the deepest public interest. The opinion thus expressed on former occasions, I still retain. Had the Throne been filled by our late Sovereign, a Sovereign advanced in years, I should have maintained the same opinion. Had it been thought desirable to call upon parliament for pledges on any particular question, I should have urged the absolute necessity, in point of justice, of reverting to the ancient practice, and of giving to the House, so called upon to express an opinion, at least an opportunity of deliberating for forty-eight hours. But I think, considering the multiplicity of measures necessarily alluded to in the Speech from the Throne, that it is infinitely better for the Crown to content itself with indicating the general measures which it means to propose, and so to word the Address that we should be enabled on the first day of the session to concur in the Address without any compromise of opinion. If I should have felt the force of this opinion under ordinary circumstances, I do feel, considering the circumstances of the present time, considering that this is the first occasion on which a Queen of so early an age has addressed her parliament, that the opinion to which I have referred acquires extraordinary and peculiar force. I cannot refer to the concluding paragraph of that Speech, in which her Majesty states that the early age at which her Majesty is called to the sovereignty of this kingdom renders it a more imperative duty that, under Divine Providence, her Majesty should place her reliance upon our cordial co-operation—I cannot hear those expressions fall from the lips of the Queen of this great empire, addressing parliament for the first time, without anxiously availing myself of the means of concurring in the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, and of tendering to her Majesty an assurance of loyalty, and of my desire to afford the co-operation which she asks. I give to that Address, therefore, my acquiescence, my entire and unqualified acquiescence, because I must say, independently of my desire on this occasion, to avoid the appearance of a contentions debate, and still less the necessity of dissent, certainly the Address itself is so worded, that he must be very critical and captious indeed who could find occasion to object to it. But at the same time it is right to say, that I reserve my opinion on every measure to which the Address makes allusion. I cautiously abstain from expressing or implying any pledge upon any measure noticed in the Speech from the Throne. I disclaim any acquiescence in the facts there stated, and I disclaim any necessary implication that because I concur in the Address I concur in the opinions which it may be presumed to express. I shall, therefore, acting upon the principles I have avowed, and looking at the terms in which the Address is proposed, feel the greatest satisfaction in giving my acquiescence, an acquiescence which but for the speech of the hon. member for Finsbury would probably be unanimous. Apart from the considerations to which I have referred, it would clearly be quite impossible, with any beneficial effect, to enter upon a discussion of the various measures which are noticed in the Speech from the Throne. The affairs of Canada, the question of the Civil List, the state of Ireland, and the questions connected with it, are so different, that it would be ill-advised and ineffectual to attempt to include in one discussion those various and important measures. As far as the Civil List is concerned, and I will refer to no other subjects than those to which the noble lord referred, I do not feel called upon to express any positive opinion; but I do not hesitate to say that I have heard with satisfaction that it is not meant to abandon the revenues derived from the Duchies of Cornwall and Lancaster. The noble lord classed these two Duchies together; but I apprehend that in point of law there is a material distinction. The revenues and privileges of the Duchy of Cornwall are held by the Crown, as trustee, whereas over those of the Duchy of Lancaster, there is a more direct and immediate control. I do not notice this distinction for the purpose of establishing any separation, because it is unnecessary, and I will only add, that I rejoice that all those ancient titles should be preserved. Upon the particular matters of detail to which the noble lord has referred, with respect to the administration and management of the revenues of these Duchies, I shall reserve my opinion upon those points until I hear further explanations and reasons for the course proposed to be pursued. I am, then, under these circumstances, called upon to decide whether I shall vote for the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Finsbury. That amendment appears to have been proposed under the impression that her Majesty's government was composed of what the hon. gentleman calls "squeezable materials," and I have not the slightest doubt that this is the object of the amendment. The hon. member did not hope that the House would be induced to acquiesce in that amendment, but he did hope that by the pressure of the conjoint trio by whom the amendment was supported, the noble lord, who was the immediate representative of the squeezable materials, might be induced to give some satisfaction on the points on which the hon. member for Finsbury was particularly anxious. I certainly rejoice that the noble lord has defeated the expectations of his hon. supporters; for, with respect to the Reform Bill, which the hon. member for Finsbury considered of such vital importance, the noble lord has not shewn himself to be composed of such squeezable materials as the hon. gentleman anticipated. The noble lord objected to take any one of the powders which the hon. member for Finsbury had prepared for him. Indeed, the noble lord had altogether rejected what had been so kindly offered to him, and the hon. member for Finsbury, as far as the noble lord was concerned, had entirely failed in producing what he might naturally infer would be the result of his powders. But the hon. member for Finsbury will, I apprehend, persist in his amendment, and take the sense of the House. I know perfectly well that the hon. member for Finsbury considers that the country ought to be aware of the opinions of their representatives. The hon. member, therefore, acting in consistency with his own opinions, will of course compel the House to declare, whether it concurs with him or not. I am certainly surprised, at the same time, that the amendment falls so far short of the hon. member's intention. It is an incomplete amendment, because the hon. member says, the country is gasping with impatience to hear of an alteration in the corn-laws, and of the amendment of the law of primogeniture. And yet the hon. gentleman disappoints the country of these reasonable expectations; for though he has three separate amendments, in no one of them does he touch these two important points, with respect to which he tells us that the country is gasping with impatience. How the hon. member for Kilkenny could advise the withdrawal of those amendments I cannot conceive; for he states, that in the whole course of his experience, he never heard of any good measure being brought forward, unless it were included in the Speech from the Throne. There was, indeed, one exception, and that was in the year 1822, when we had an unreformed parliament. The hon. member for Kilkenny stated, that, with this single exception, he did not recollect another instance in which, unless it were expressed in the Address, a good measure was proposed. The hon. member for Kilkenny will, therefore, see the necessity for pressing on his hon. friend, the member for Finsbury, who had already shown himself, with respect to the law of primogeniture and the corn-laws, to be backward in coming forward; and now the hon. member for Kilkenny, whose words I have borrowed, is putting himself forward to keep the hon. member for Finsbury backward. The hon. member for Finsbury looked round him, and asked how it could be accounted for that the reform majority had dwindled from 150 to 30? I will tell him how I account for it. Do not believe that intimidation or corruption has done it. Do not believe that intimidation and corruption, in the present constituent body can produce any such effect. What! is that the opinion you entertain of the Reform Bill? Do I hear, in 1837, after all the predictions with respect to the satisfaction the Reform Bill was to produce, and the public confidence it was to create and maintain—do I hear now declarations that of all the grievances under which this country labours, the representative system is the worst? Do I hear it gravely asserted that the country is groaning?—for that was the expression that was used. No less expressive a term would satisfy the hon. gentleman to express the degree of dissatisfaction which the country felt. This is the language which has changed the public mind. The public is alarmed with the menaces of a new revolution. What was the expression of the noble lord (Lord J. Russell)—the author of the Reform Bill?—He said, that the country could “not afford to have a revolution once a-year.” What then must the people think? What must an intelligent people think of these changes and alarms of change which amount almost to a revolution once a-year? They see an enormous change in the representative system, which they have reason to believe, from the declarations of the parties themselves, would be accepted, not as a final measure, because no measure can be said to be final and irrevocable; but that it was to be considered, as far as the declarations of public men of all parties could make it, a settlement of the question of reform. We heard it said, that that experiment was made on an extensive scale, in order that it might be final. These were the arguments addressed to our anxieties and apprehensions. When we said that the change was too extensive, it was said, "We make the change extensive, in order to prevent new demands and changes." Five years only have elapsed, and you tell us that the people are not merely not satisfied, but that the great curse under which they labour is the present representative system. This is the language which has caused anxiety and alarm in the public mind—which, more than the acts of despotic sovereigns, has a tendency to prevent the development of free principles. Thus the people argue: "If England consented to part with that ancient system of representation, which had at least the advantage of long prescription and established order; if England consented to part with this, and the chief advantage from it is, that within five years of the birth of the new system, it is seen to be an absolute failure—that it is declared to be a just cause of complaint and indignation, and the source of injustice; shall we again run the risk of making an alteration in the established order of things?" These are the inferences which the people draw from declarations of this kind with respect to the failure of this measure, which it was anticipated would be pregnant with satisfaction to the constituency, and of advantage to the country. It is this language—the threat one day to destroy the integrity and independence of the House of Lords, another, to put down the Established Church, which has alarmed the people, and produced the effects of which you complain. It was the assumption, which is the foundation of all persecution, "I am right, you are wrong;" the assumption that because I do not agree with the hon. member for Kilkenny, therefore I am to be denounced as unfit to be a representative; it is the fear that we are undermining the foundations of all other institutions in Church and State; it is not corruption and intimidation, but it is that rational, manly feeling of the people, that knows how to draw a just distinction between the sober correction of proved abuses, and the constant tampering with the institutions of the country—it is the resolution not to live in a constant state of political agitation, not to be made the tools of those who are dissatisfied with the result of their own measures, eliciting different expressions of opinion from their own supporters—these are the circumstances, since you apply to me for information, which have caused this change in public opinion, and which have made the majority of 150 dwindle down to an uncertain one of thirty or forty. I feel confident, not permitting the hon. gentleman to put his construction on the reasons on which rests that confidence—I feel confident, notwithstanding the menaces of the hon. gentleman, that we may trust to the sound deliberate judgment of the people of England to assist the most powerful minority which now sits ranged on the benches behind me, in resisting the further progress of democratic change,—not the progress of rational, well considered, improvement, but the progress of democratic change, which is avowed as having for its object the altering the ratio of political power, and enabling one class of political opinions to acquire an overwhelming predominance. Was there ever such a reason given for change? "We find (says the hon. gentleman, the member for Finsbury,) we have failed; the constituent body has deserted us; we fear, that another election or two will render that desertion complete; and, therefore, we call upon you, in order to recover and maintain our predominance, to cut and carve the constituent body to answer our purposes." I, for one, after the changes which were effected in the principle of representation in 1832, will not give my consent to any further change of the kind; but I feel perfectly satisfied, that if I were to give the hon. mover a carte blanche to cut and carve the constituency as he pleased, my confidence in the good sense of the people of England is such, that, with whatever constituency he may form, he would still be in a minority. They may widen the constituency, or shorten it—they may increase it as they please, but they will never be able to modify it so as to render it more in unison with their opinions. This is my opinion. I may be right, or I may be wrong; but, be that as it may, I am not prepared again to incur all those evils which must inevitably arise from the constant agitation of constitutional principles. I shall, therefore, feel it to be absolutely necessary to oppose the proposition of the hon. gentleman opposite; and whenever any particular measure may be brought forward, whether of ballot or for the extension of the suffrage, I shall be prepared to discuss it in detail, and assign my reasons for not acquiescing in it. I entertain a perfect confidence, a confidence increased by the declaration of the noble lord, that reason will prevail, and, particularly with the experience of the last election in my recollection—that the institutions of the country are perfectly safe in the hands of the intelligent and enlightened people of this country, in whose hearts they are rooted, not more on account of their venerable antiquity, than their intrinsic merit.

Address agreed to.

CONTROVERTED ELECTIONS.

NOVEMBER 27, 1837.

In the debate on the second reading of the Controverted Elections Bill,—

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, that the question was not whether they would consent to any improvement of the present system by which election committees were constituted; the question was not whether they would consent to the principle of this bill; but the simple question was, whether on that day the House of Commons was sufficiently prepared, by mature deliberation on the subject, to affirm the important principle involved in the bill. Were they, he would ask, a new parliament, with 150 new members, to be called upon, a few days after the opening of parliament, and only two days after the printing of the bill, to enter into the consideration of that bill, and the very important question to which it related? Of the 150 new members, he would venture to say, that not one had yet had an opportunity of considering—nay, even of reading the bill through. Why, the bill was printed only on Saturday, and probably many members did not get their copy until that (Monday) morning. He owned he had not read the bill, until he came down to the House that evening. How many of the 150 new members had read it? But he would not ask the question, for the bill was so full of blunders, that even if it had been read, it was exceedingly difficult to be understood. He would take, as an instance, the proviso to the 16th clause of the bill. It was there stated that, “if after reading the order of the day for taking any such petition into consideration, it shall be found that there are not 100 members present, or that the number of thirty-three members, not set aside or excused, cannot be completed, it shall and may be lawful for the House, if they think fit, to direct that the order shall be adjourned for any number of days,” &c. Now, what had they to do with the thirty-three members? [Mr. C. Buller: That is a blunder in the bill.] Clearly so; but there were other parts of it equally confused. Here then, was a bill printed on Saturday, delivered on Monday, which was perfectly unintelligible, on account of the great hurry with which it was printed, which was admitted to be unintelligible by its mover (Mr. C. Buller), as far as the number thirty-three is concerned. Let it be so; but under these circumstances, they were called upon to affirm the principle of the bill. Whatever they might do in this respect, let it be done after mature deliberation. They might depend upon it, that a contrary system would not be satisfactory to the people; and if the people entertained the impression that they had adopted this plan lightly, and without mature consideration, the consequences would be, that they would view it in the same light in which they were supposed to view the present system; and if they found that with this bill, which was admitted to be incorrect, which had been printed only two days, and with 150 new members in the House, they dared to affirm summarily the principle on the second reading, he would venture to affirm that the people would be disposed to view the future decisions of election committees with little confidence, and still less would they have confidence in the fitness of that House to legislate on the subject. But the real question—a question which had not been referred to—was this, did they mean to apply the new tribunal to existing election petitions? This was the real question which was involved in this measure. He found the following sentence introduced into the face of the bill, and he should like to know whether it was another blunder? It was this:—“And be it enacted, that this act shall commence and take effect from and after the last day of the present Session of Parliament.” Here was a distinct manifestation of the intention of the author of the bill, that the bill should not take effect until after the present election committees should be disposed of. If this were the case, where was the necessity of such precipitation? If it were really intended that all existing election committees should be appointed under the existing laws, unless for some extraordinary and special contingency, in respect of which the noble lord opposite had reserved himself—if it were intended, that all election petitions now pending should be tried by pre-existing tribunals, where was the necessity of calling upon the House of Commons to assert that the present mode was so inconvenient that they must affirm the principle of a new tribunal within two days after the bill had been printed and put into their hands? If, indeed, it was intended to supersede the existing tribunals, and to refer election petitions to some tribunal to be constituted—if that were the case, he could understand the reason for this precipitation and haste: but that motive was distinctly disclaimed by the mover of the bill, and believing that disclaimer to be sincere, he called upon the House to ask for some little time before they committed themselves to the principle of this measure. He gave credit to the hon. mover of the bill for good intentions; he believed, that the hon. gentleman sincerely meant what the last clause of the bill contained, viz., that the bill should not take effect until after the present session of parliament, and that it should not, with respect to existing petitions, supersede the existing tribunals; but he begged to remind that hon. gentleman, that if a majority of the House were so inclined, there was nothing so easy as, in passing through committee on the bill, to strike out the two lines at the end of it, and thus leave the election petitions to be tried by the tribunals constituted by the present bill, and thereby to give it an ex post facto operation. They would, doubtless, have the assistance of the hon. mover of the bill in resisting such a proposition—a proposition fraught, as he considered it, with the grossest injustice. They might depend upon it, that whatever objections there might be to the existing tribunals, yet if the country understood that that House of Commons meant to postpone what had hitherto been considered their first and most positive duty on the assembling of a new parliament, namely, to determine who of the sitting members were duly elected, and who of the sitting members retained their seats against the intention of the law in that House, the country would not approve of the House of Commons in thus giving the act of parliament an ex post facto operation. The main question, therefore, was, whether or not the new tribunal was, in point of fact, to supersede the existing law, and to have the election petitions referred to it? On Wednesday, the 6th of December, the noble lord opposite promised to deliver an opinion decisively upon this point. The noble lord had given notice, that on Wednesday, the 6th of December, he would name the day in February, on which he would propose to take into consideration the election petitions. He admitted, that the noble lord reserved himself in certain cases, neither the magnitude or occurrence of which he could foresee. They would know the opinion of government on the 6th of December, and he, for one, would not consent to the second reading of this bill until that declaration was made on the part of government. Upon these two grounds, he was in favour of postponing the consideration of this bill, until the noble lord declared what course the government proposed to pursue with respect to the election petitions, and also on the grounds, that the bill required some additional consideration beyond the mere Sabbath-day. If he wanted any other reason, the speech of the hon. and learned member for Dublin was, he thought, decisive against proceeding with the bill. The noble lord opposite said, that the hon. and learned member for Dublin had cut away from his noble friend (Lord Stanley) the whole ground upon which he objected to this bill. As far as the hon. and learned member for Dublin was personally concerned, as far as concerned his personal wishes and feelings in the matter, there could be no doubt but that that hon. and learned member, greatly to his surprise, did waive his personal wishes and feelings; but, as far as the arguments and reasoning of the hon. and learned member were concerned, they remained with undiminished force. That hon. and learned gentleman had told the House, that he intended to bring under discussion the great question whether the persons directly interested, and who were, in fact, the parties, should be the judges or not? The hon. and learned gentleman said, that it was a scandalous thing that summonses should be issued to procure attendance in that House, that it tended to degrade them in the public estimation, that it lowered the character of individual members of the House, and that in their collective capacity the object was for party purposes to insure a large attendance. Now, if this objection had any weight, it would apply with just as much force to the present bill as to the existing law. The hon. and learned member for Dublin said, that the present system induced political parties to attend in order that the benches might be well filled when the names were drawn from the balloting box. If the hon. and learned member felt the force of this objection, he ought to resist the second reading of this bill, unless, indeed, he was making his consent to the second reading of the bill a mere matter of form. If they consented to the second reading of the bill, it would imply that the House of Commons ought to retain the jurisdiction in election matters in their own hands. Now he would not hesitate to say, that if he thought that the House of Commons deserved the character which he had heard given to it by those who were the most anxious for a reform, he should have desired that the jurisdiction might be transferred from the House of Commons, and he would have concurred in the principle laid down by the hon. and learned member for Dublin. If the members of that House were so influenced by party feeling, that they were not fit to decide, questions that arose upon election committees under the tribunals as they were at present constituted, they surely would not be fit to decide them under the tribunal proposed by the hon. and learned member for Liskeard. That hon. and learned member said, that this was a bit by bit reform, that he was proceeding very gradually, that he wanted to have as little reform as possible. The hon. and learned member for Dublin, on the other hand, denied that the House of Commons was a fit tribunal, or of a character sufficiently impartial to fit it for the consideration of these questions, and therefore he wished to have them transferred to another tribunal. He was surprised, after the position thus laid down by the hon. and learned member for Dublin, respecting the character of the House of Commons, and the inferences thus drawn by him, that he should consent to the second reading of this bill. The objections which applied to the existing tribunals would apply equally to the tribunals constituted by the present bill. He, for one, would not go quite the length of some hon. gentlemen as to the great danger of parting with the constitutional right of deciding upon election petitions. If they could get an impartial tribunal of five or seven persons, not directly interested in the election petitions, he was convinced that the House of Commons would lose nothing by the transference of the power of deciding in such cases to a body so constituted. The great difficulty was, as to the mode of selection. It must be admitted that they must be selected by some body. If it were left to the government, it would be open to strong objections, the great objection being the difficulty of constituting an impartial and a satisfactory tribunal. To the appointment of assessors by the Speaker he would decidedly object. He could not conceive any proposition tending more to destroy the impartial character of the chair. The Speaker of the House of Commons, whose election for his new duty would doubtless depend upon party, would, on the first meeting of parliament, have to propose to the House the names of three members, with a salary of £2,000, and these persons were to act in respect of political matters of the utmost importance to parties. He was afraid that it would be impossible for any Speaker, with the best intentions, to make a selection which would be satisfactory to all parties. It would be placing a Speaker of a new parliament in a most unpleasant situation. There would, in the election of a speaker, be either a complete acquiescence or a contest. If there was a contest, what a situation would it place the Speaker in? It could not be expected that the government, who selected the Speaker, would not labour under the impression that they were bound to support the nominations of their own Speaker. It might be easily foreseen that it was probable that a government might say to itself "These men bear a most excellent character, the Speaker has named them as men eminently qualified for the office, and it will be degrading to them unless we support their nomination." The other party would say, "That may be all right; but we should have the appointment, if not of two out of the three, at least of one of them." Would this be a fit situation to place the Speaker in? Was it proper that on taking the chair on the first meeting of parliament he was to have the nomination of parties possessing a character the most important, not merely as respected political, but party questions? He could not affirm this principle of the bill. It appeared to him to be a very grave question, and he would much rather not give his opinion decisively upon these points. He would also much rather reserve to himself a fair opportunity for a full consideration relative to his views of the challenges proposed to be allowed. It was possible that the right of challenge, where five challenges were made, would be to insure the knocking out the brains of the committee. Now he was not sure that it would not lead to a directly opposite result. Opposing parties, on hearing a certain number of names called, might be in doubt whether or not they should exhaust their challenges by objecting to the names called, or whether they should not wait for a better challenge. This would at once be the introduction of the element of chance into the new tribunal. The objection to the present system was, that it was influenced by party motives, and that the members were selected by chance; but it was evident that the same objection applied to the new tribunal. Parties would, as they did now, assemble in great strength on each side, and chance would determine the tribunal as it did now; and he was not at all certain whether it would give a greater degree of satisfaction. It appeared to him that chance would exercise as much influence over the new tribunal as over the old. He would be very sorry, however, to give a decisive opinion upon this point. He should wish to satisfy himself on these points. He had never read the bill till he came into the House. The noble lord opposite (Lord John Russell) said, that the bill had passed through the second reading last session. Was that quite fair? He admitted that it did pass the second reading, but it was distinctly understood that the bill should not pass into a law. [No, no!] He was sure that was the general impression. ["No, no!" from Lord Howick.] He thought that an objection was taken by the Attorney-general to proceeding further with the bill. ["No!" from the Attorney-general.] He could not refer to the speech of the hon. and learned gentleman—he trusted to memory, and that was his impression. If, then, there was a general feeling on the part of the House that the present tribunal was so unsatisfactory that it required amendment, but that those amendments should be applied after mature consideration—if the hon. and learned member for Liskeard really desired that they should not look upon this question as a party measure, but that it should be gravely and deliberately discussed; above all, if hon. gentlemen wished that this question should receive a calm consideration, if they wished maturely to consider the transferring of their power, as far as their jurisdiction was concerned, to somebody impartially selected, with the consent of the House of Commons, he hoped they would all concur in deferring the second reading of this bill. He asked the hon. and learned member for Liskeard, himself, to postpone the bill until the House had an opportunity of giving it further consideration. Above all, he hoped those members of the House of Commons who were now called upon to exercise their functions for the first time, would refuse to pledge themselves to affirm the principle of this bill on that night, and that, on the contrary, they would support the proposition of his noble friend, which was, not that the present system should not be amended, not that the bill should be rejected, but merely that there should be a delay of two months interposed, in order that, public attention having been drawn to the subject during the recess, old members and new members might be enabled to apply themselves to the subject with more caution and deliberation, thus affording a better prospect of their arriving at a conclusion, upon principles satisfactory to themselves and the country.

The bill was read a second time.

DECEMBER 6, 1837.

Lord John Russell gave notice of the days when the various election petitions before the House would be considered, and moved, "That the petition on the election for the county of Roxburgh be taken into consideration on Tuesday the 6th of February."

SIR ROBERT PEELE rejoiced at the course which the noble lord had taken, and which entirely precluded the necessity for his making the motion of which he had given notice, in the event that the noble lord's motion had not been made. He rejoiced, because he thought that the noble lord had strictly adhered to the uniform course pursued in respect to election petitions, and had thus asserted the undoubted principle, that it was the first duty of parliament to determine who were the representatives of the people. By the course now adopted by the noble lord, it was declared to the country that the House would proceed, immediately after the recess, to try the election petitions before the known constitutional authority of parliament, and therefore all parties concerned in them would hold themselves in readiness to give their attendance, and do all that might be required of them in respect of them at that time. The 6th of February was the day named for the first petition, and the rest on the list must shortly follow in their order, at which time the parties to them must be aware that they would be required to have their witnesses in attendance, to submit their cases before the known tribunal appointed to decide upon them. He knew enough of the noble lord to feel assured that he would not depart, on the present occasion, from the accustomed course of parliament in these matters. The number of election petitions in 1831 was fifty-seven, and in the present year they were sixty-seven in number; and the noble lord had justly stated, that in the relative numerical proportion of these petitions there was no ground to impeach the bonâ fide origin and intention of the latter. With respect to the parties from whom these petitions emanated, he believed that, of the sixty-seven hitherto presented, twenty-seven or twenty-eight came from parties on his side of the House, and thirty-six from parties interested in the opposite side of the question, which, with the fortunate intervention of three from neutral parties, completed the number. The noble lord had stated that there was no appearance upon the face of the petitions themselves of their having been concerted by any combination of parties for sinister purposes. He had looked into the petitions emanating from parties on his side of the House, and, as far as they were concerned, he could fully bear testimony to the truth of the noble lord's observations; but if the noble lord were to look into those proceeding from his own side, he thought the noble lord might possibly find some grounds to shake his confidence in this matter. The number of petitions naturally bore some relation to the number of contests, and where these contests were nearly balanced, more petitions might be expected than when the elections were carried by more numerous majorities; and he believed that in the late election there had been more contests, and the returns obtained by smaller majorities, than usually was the case. He heartily rejoiced, therefore, that the contingency which had been impending over their heads, and which was the more awful, because it had been kept in complete obscurity, had not fallen upon them. He certainly did regret that the noble lord, as leader of the House of Commons, could ever have supposed that there would have been sufficient grounds to suspend the ordinary course of parliament in respect of these petitions. Now, whether there were sixty-seven petitions or one hundred and fifty petitions, provided they had not proceeded from improper motives, the House should not, he thought, be prevented from pursuing the proper and ordinary course in respect to them; and nothing should be said or done to deter parties from coming before that House with a sincere desire of seeking redress of supposed grievances. For his part, he had never seen the declaration which so much alarmed the noble lord, that it was the intention of certain parties to question the elections of Ireland on the mere ground that the parties returned differed from the majority of the English representatives. He could only add, that this would have been a most preposterous and unjust ground of opposition; and he could hardly believe it had ever been seriously entertained by any rational man. With respect to the other ground for alarm stated by the noble lord, he certainly had seen statements calculated to excite an alarm that some of these petitions were presented with a view to prevent certain members from taking part in the decision upon election petitions. Of course the noble lord referred to the correspondence which had recently taken place between two persons, calling themselves "An Elector," and a "Non-electer," in The Morning Chronicle. It was, doubtless, this correspondence, which excited the noble lord's apprehensions of the fatal result of "a cluster of petitions," to use the noble lord's expression; and the declaration upon which the noble lord had built his well-founded alarm was viewed with the more apprehension, and accepted the more implicitly, because it proceeded from an organ which advocated the noble lord's own politics. As to the other declaration, he had never seen it; and he heartily rejoiced in the hope that the apprehension of it was ill founded. He regretted, however, that the noble lord had suffered himself to be disturbed by vain apprehensions of this kind, and to be induced even to hold out a threat that he would suffer himself to depart from the ordinary course of parliament in respect to its privileges, and to delay to bring on the consideration of its disputed seats beyond the usual period named for so doing. He hoped the result would operate as a caution to the noble lord not to give faith to vague communications in newspapers; and that he would not again throw impediments or objections in the way of bonâ fide petitioners to the House of Commons. There was one subject in connection with this topic to which he wished to advert before he sat down. He referred to the bill brought in by the hon. member for Liskeard relating to the trial of controverted elections, and which had now passed its second reading. He hoped that the course this evening pursued by the noble lord in reference to these election petitions might be understood as a promise that they would not proceed hastily with that bill. Why, if the present mode of trying election petitions was considered so far satisfactory that the election petitions now before the House were to be tried by it, he could see no occasion for bringing on that bill. He believed that it was understood that no business of importance would be done after the present week until they re-assembled after the recess. So general, he thought, was this understanding, that the hon. member for Bridport positively refused to defer his motion respecting the Danish claims to any day after Friday, so impressed was he with the notion that immediately after that day there would be a general flood of members out of town. If this were the case, the hon. member for Liskeard could not hope to obtain that attention to his bill which the subject of it demanded, and, therefore he hoped that the hon. gentleman would consent to defer the future stages of it till after the recess. If, however, the hon. and learned gentleman did not think proper to accede to this suggestion, he would give notice that he would, on Friday next, without at all entering upon the merits of the bill, but merely because the House would not after that day be in a state to do it justice, move that it be postponed till an early day after the recess, and divide the House on his motion.

Motion agreed to.

IRISH ELECTION PETITIONS.

DECEMBER 7, 1837.

Mr. Smith O'Brien moved, "That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the allegations contained in the petitions presented by William Smith O'Brien, complaining of the subscriptions which had been raised to encourage the prosecution of petitions against Irish members, and of the conduct of a member of that House in having contributed to such subscriptions."

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, that he felt particularly called upon to offer a few observations to the House, in consequence of the direct appeal made to him by the hon. member on a subject so much adverted to by him; namely, a new tribunal for the trying election petitions. The hon. member asked him why he urged objections to the improvement of the existing tribunal of that House for the determination of contested elections? He denied that he was opposed to any such improvement. For his own part he was quite willing to take into his consideration any measure for the improvement of the tribunal. He objected to the proposal made that when they had a tribunal constituted by parliament, that was found existing at the beginning of a new parliament, they should at once proceed to set it aside and form another. He objected on various grounds to the postponement of the consideration of the petitions until that House and the House of Lords had agreed to the bill of the hon. member for Liskeard, or to some other bill, for the purpose of improving the tribunal. He objected on these grounds,—in the first place, that it was the particular duty of that House to decide who were the legitimate representatives of the people, and nothing could be so unjust as to postpone the determination of this important matter until they had agreed as to the tribunal which should be substituted for the present one. Secondly, he objected to the proposition because it would furnish a most dangerous precedent in a new parliament for a majority to force a decision on a minority as to what should be the nature of the new tribunal by which the great question which he had just referred to should be decided. The hon. and learned member for Dublin had taunted him with an unwillingness to recede from the present system by which the decision of a contested election petition was left to a committee of the House. He, in reply, would ask, who had dwelt on the impropriety of leaving the jurisdiction of this subject in the House of Commons? who had said that it was most unfit and unbecoming to assemble in great numbers when the tribunals were to be appointed?

who had said that, being connected with party, they would act as party men? and who withdrew a bill he wished to introduce, having for its object the transferring the jurisdiction to an entirely new tribunal, and voted for a bill of a very different nature? The only bill which was now before the House, proposed to leave the jurisdiction in the House of Commons as it at present was, the persons on the tribunal to be determined by ballot; if then, this bill passed, there would be the same attendance at the ballot as there was at present. There would be the same attention to the canvass which the hon. and learned gentleman so much condemned, and to any party object to which the present system was liable. He found, also, that the bill which had been adopted by the hon. and learned gentleman contained proposals which were directly at variance with the recommendations of the committee. The noble lord had also said that he so much disapproved of the bill, that he had some important alterations to propose in various parts of it. He (Sir Robert Peel) objected, however, that at the beginning of the new parliament they should not have time to give such an important subject due consideration, if it were to be immediately adopted, and which, if hastily proceeded with, would most probably be liable to the strongest objections. Another great objection of his was, the referring the sixty-seven election petitions to a new and untried tribunal. He would say, improve the election tribunal after this session; divest it as much as possible of any suspicion of being influenced by party feeling. By this means, and after ample consideration, a satisfactory measure might be framed, which should be gradually brought into operation by referring to it the petitions for contested elections that might arise during the continuance of the parliament, and, if they found defects in the working of the measure, they would at once make such alterations in the new tribunal as might be deemed necessary; but if they passed a measure at once, and determined that the sixty-seven petitions should be referred to it, they would then provoke complaints, and if any inconvenience should arise, they could not apply a remedy if they did not again postpone the consideration of the election petitions until that House and the House of Lords could agree to another tribunal. He begged that it might not be supposed that he objected to any change in the constitution of the tribunal which was likely to be an improvement: it was as much the interest of that, as of the opposite side, to adopt an improvement which was calculated to insure the impartiality of the tribunal. He might be asked, if there was nothing of party feeling in the present tribunal; and he would ask, in reply, if that were the case, what advantage could the minority possibly have over the majority? He was, however, willing to adopt a new tribunal, after due consideration, which should not be liable to the objection of being an ex post facto law. If, at a proper time, a measure having that object in view were introduced, he would apply his mind to the details of it with a view to its adoption. An analogy had been drawn between this subject and a change in the law respecting jurors; but the analogy did not hold good. There could not, he thought, be any doubt, that persons of all parties would willingly lend themselves to the improvement of the jury laws. With reference, however, to the proposed bill, the first thing that must be done was for the majority to elect an assessor, by whose legal opinion the decision of the tribunal would rest on many points. The person proposed might, in the first instance, be defeated by a party, and would not that excite objections and suspicions against the tribunal; and he begged the House to recollect that it had been called together at an unusually early period, and before Christmas, to consider, to use the old terms, de quibusdam arduis rebus de statu et ecclesia Angliæ consultandum. With respect to the motion before the House, the author of it apparently shrunk from the charge of it, although last night they were assured that it should be submitted to its attention; but nothing prevented their immediate decision on the subject but the ill-timed and inconsiderate proposition of the hon. member for Southwark. That hon. member stated that on one occasion his return was sent to the decision of a committee on which he had only one friend, and he (Sir R. Peel) had thought that on that occasion the hon. member would not have met with a single supporter. The proposition of the hon. member had no immediate connection with his own proposal. In justice to his own proposal the hon. gentleman ought to give a distinct notice upon the subject; he ought, too, to press for a decision upon the main question, for otherwise he must think that his own proposal could only lead to a further waste of time. This he ought to do, if he believed that the present question was brought forward in the mere spirit of party warfare, and if he really believed, as he (Sir R. Peel) had no doubt he did so believe, that it was an ungenerous motion directed against the hon. baronet, the member for North Wilts. Then the hon. member must see that there was a triple ground for his taking that course which was now suggested to him—first, for the purpose of marking his dissatisfaction with what he must regard as a useless consumption of the public time; next, for the purpose of discouraging the attempt to draw away their attention to party politics; and, thirdly, for the purpose of recording his disapproval of an ungenerous attack upon a member of that House. Upon all these accounts that hon. member ought to be prepared to divide upon the main question. Let there not be any pretext afforded for withdrawing from a decision upon the question; for after the amendment had been negatived, and the main proposition put, as far as he was concerned, there should be no previous question—there should be no appeal to the order of the day. The simple and the intelligible ground of the motion was, that an unwise and an unjust act had been done, and that he proposed to meet with a positive and direct negative. As the hon. member for Monmouth had proposed five or six cumbersome resolutions, entering into details, and involving what might be partly truth, it might on that account have been difficult to have met them with a distinct negative, and the previous question then could have been resorted to; but when the question was, whether or not a committee should, upon a simple statement of facts, be appointed—and let it be remembered that if not appointed that night, it could not be appointed for many weeks following—when such was the proposition, there was no pretence for taking any other course than that of saying “aye,” or “no,” to the appointment of the committee. He intended to say “no;” and this, therefore, was the course which he meant to pursue. If the hon. gentleman, the member for Southwark, persisted in moving his amendment, the question put from the chair would be, that “the words proposed to be left out stand part of the question; then, in that case, he must have the infinite satisfaction of voting with the hon. member, the mover of the proposition, and of course with the noble lord. The hon. gentleman must be anxious to come to the decision upon his own proposition. He must think that any impediment that should be thrown in his way to attain that desirable end must be exceedingly disagreeable, if not unfair; and of course the hon. gentleman must move that his words stand part of the question. If, then, that were carried in the affirmative, and he thought he could promise the hon. gentleman that they on that side of the House would aid him in carrying it so far, then they would come to decide upon the main question, whether the committee ought to be appointed? As he had said before, he should meet that proposition with a direct and unqualified negative. Either the proceeding which had been so much adverted to that night was an illegal and an unconstitutional proceeding, or it was one permitted by law. If the noble lord thought that it was of doubtful legality, and yet dangerous, he had the remedy within his hands; it was not even necessary for him to have recourse to the Attorney-general on the subject; but the noble lord could bring in a declaratory bill. If it were unconstitutional and a breach of the privileges of that House, why did not hon. gentlemen meet it with a direct resolution? But, if hon. gentlemen opposite felt this transaction to be one which they considered to be imprudent and unwise, and yet which they felt to be tolerated by law, then he had to protest against the course of proceeding which they seemed determined upon adopting. Hon. gentlemen said that the argument which had been used in this debate was a tu quoque argument—of course it was. His hon. and learned friend, in his admirable speech, had showed that not only was it a transaction tolerated by all parties at all times, but that those opposite had sanctioned and practised it the most. On the opposite side they said tu quoque, but he replied to them, tu quoque, tu prior, tu quasi. They had taught, and they had practised, and they now complained. Oh! but his noble friend brought forward the Dorchester case. Now, if he had brought forward that case at the time—if he had read the names of the contributors, and the fanciful designations they assumed—what a miserable waste of time it would have been thought! And this would be the result if the House of Commons condemned an act without the power of enforcing the condemnation—that not only would the parties escape punishment, but the House of Commons would render itself contemptible; because this would be practical tyranny, that a majority, not daring to amend an old or enforce a new law, and unable to pronounce a certain action a breach of privilege, would still attempt, by a vote of a majority, to degrade those who did it. Let them once take that course, and they would find such an arbitrary exercise of power would provoke opposition, and induce men to glory in that which they denounced, and persons would challenge them to exercise their power by enforcing the very principles which they condemned. There was nothing that he should lament more than this: and this he must say, that if he found the act of a mere majority of that House was to be at any one time substituted for the vengeance of the law, then there was no measure that he would not have recourse to, to resist that illegal exercise of power, and he should defy the House of Commons. They had avoided as yet any act of that kind; but he feared from the tone that had been assumed in the course of the debate, and the attacks made on the contributors, that some course like that he apprehended might be attempted, while, in the end, they did not appear to be in a hurry to get the committee. The hon. gentleman (Mr. S. O'Brien) appeared to have brought forward a very extraordinary proposition. He considered that he had a right, as an individual, to complain upon this subject; he said that it was intended to displace Roman Catholic members; and yet that hon. member himself, who was the only petitioner against the subscriptions, happened to be a Protestant. If he was not right in this statement the hon. gentleman could correct him. Now, he said, notwithstanding the attack that had been made upon the hon. baronet, he had derived nothing but credit—nothing but credit—nothing, he repeated it, but credit, from the manly course of his proceeding. Hon. gentlemen opposite had taunted the hon. baronet with inconsistency; could that inconsistency proceed from any dishonourable or dishonest cause? What reward could the hon. baronet hope for? The position of the hon. baronet enabled him to look down upon the imputation of unworthy motives. He did not admit of the charge of inconsistency as being applicable to the hon. baronet. He had long been opposed to the hon. baronet; but the position of the hon. baronet at that moment was that of many other individuals of the highest character, respectability, and intelligence, in this country. The hon. baronet had struggled for Parliamentary Reform—he had assailed in violent language the usurpation of the Peers and the boroughmongering system; but he had never heard of the hon. baronet, even at the most inflamed periods of party politics—he never heard of him saying that, when reform was granted, that he wanted to see the privileges of the monarchy, or of the House of Peers, in the slightest degree invaded. The hon. baronet's had been a perfectly honest and consistent course; he it was who mainly by his efforts had substituted for the former representation that which now prevailed. It was perfectly consistent in the hon. baronet, when he had attained that which he had sought for, that he should rest satisfied, and that when an encroachment was made upon other constituent bodies of the legislature, he, having the acuteness to perceive, had the manliness to face, the attacks that might be made upon him, when he stood up to oppose the attacks that might be made upon the privileges of the monarchy and the peerage. The hon. baronet did struggle for Roman Catholic Emancipation, as it was called. He was amongst the most powerful and the most successful advocates of that measure. The Roman Catholics of Ireland entertained a different opinion of the hon. baronet from that which the hon. and learned gentleman, the member for Dublin, now expressed, when upon two occasions they intrusted the hon. baronet with the office of bringing forward the Roman Catholic petitions; and when he read those expressions of gratitude for the hon. baronet's services which had flowed from the Roman Catholics of Ireland, he scarcely expected that one of the chief amongst the Roman Catholics of Ireland would denounce the hon. baronet, not only for the present opinions which he entertained, but on account of his past political conduct, asserting that in his youth and throughout his manhood he had done no good whatever to the popular cause, the cause of which the hon. and learned gentleman was so strenuous an advocate. They knew that the hon. baronet had contended for the complete relief of the Roman Catholics from their disabilities, and the annihilation of all distinctions on account of differences in religion; but they never yet had heard the hon. baronet maintain it as a necessary consequence of the removal of the Roman Catholic disabilities, that the securities of the Protestant Church should be endangered. And again, having succeeded in removing these disabilities, and placing the Roman Catholics on a footing of perfect equality, so far from being inconsistent it was real consistency; it was real conformity with every principle which the hon. baronet had ever avowed, to say, "Now those disabilities are removed, I shall not, if I can prevent it, endanger the security of the Protestant institutions." And here again, seeing the injustice and the danger, and having the manliness to perceive it, the hon. baronet said, he would stand there, as he had done, with respect to the peerage and the Crown; he would stand his ground there in defence of the Protestant establishments of the country.

On a division the numbers were—Ayes, 121; Noes, 331; majority, 210.

PENSIONS ON THE CIVIL LIST.

DECEMBER 8, 1837.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer moved, for "A Select Committee, to inquire how far pensions granted in virtue of 1 William IV., c. 24, charged on the Civil List, and in virtue of 2 and 3 William IV., c. 116, charged on the Consolidated Fund, ought to be continued, having due regard to the just rights of the parties, and to economy in the public expenditure."

SIR ROBERT PEEL: Sir, if this proposal of the right hon. gentleman, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, involved merely some consideration of temporary policy or expediency, I might have felt myself at liberty to advert to some of the considerations to which he has referred for the purpose of enabling me to decide upon the course which I should pursue. I might possibly have occupied myself, as he has done, in ransacking the past votes of members upon this side of the House—I might have referred to pledges given to constituents; I might have contented myself with a vehement protest and violent declamation against the proposed inquiry; and, having done so, I might have imitated the recent example of others, and tried to evade a vote upon this question. But, if the proposal does not merely involve considerations of prudence and policy—if it violates, as I will show it does violate, the principles of equity and justice—then I care not how the votes of my friends may have been given upon former occasions; I care not whether this be a favourable opportunity for bringing, or not, parties into collision; I am determined, in satisfaction of my own feelings, and in vindication of the eternal interests of justice, by my vote, at least, upon the division, of which the right hon. gentleman shall not be disappointed, whatever bearing it may have upon party interests, to shew the sincerity of my own conviction. It is said the pension list is unpopular; that it will be a popular measure to consent to its revision. Yes; but if that revision be unjust, the popularity of it is no argument in its favour. It is, no doubt, prudent, it is right, in respect to measures involving merely considerations of expediency, I will not say, to defer, servilely, to popular feeling, but to permit it to enter largely into the elements of your decision. A measure may be abstractedly wise, and highly beneficial in its ultimate results; but if the public mind be not ripe for its reception, if it be revolting to the feelings, the prejudices, the passions, of the present generation, there may be more evil in provoking opposition and in disturbing public harmony, than in abandoning or postponing a wise but unpalatable measure. Even the interests of the measure itself may require its temporary abandonment. But this is not true where justice is concerned. Resistance to a measure which inflicts wrong may be very unpopular; but, on that very account, the duty of resistance may be the more imperative. Then is injustice the most dangerous, when its deformity is covered under the veil of plausible pretences of economy, or recommended by the supposed sanction of the public voice, or when it is called for by the vindictiveness of party feeling, disguising itself under the semblance of superior purity. It is because I am deeply impressed with these truths, that I shall proceed to consider the proposal now made under two aspects. First, as it would present itself, independently of the transactions of 1831; that is, independently of all that occurred on the settlement of the civil list of King William. Secondly, as it does actually present itself, changed in its features and colours, by the events of 1831.

Let us place ourselves, then, in the position in which parliament and the government stood, in 1831. We find that the invariable preceding usage had been, on the accession of a sovereign, to respect the grants of his predecessors. There is not a solitary instance, since William III. succeeded to King James, in which the pensions granted by one king have been discontinued by his successor. We wish to establish new regulations in regard to the grant of pensions, to confine the future grant to the reward of acknowledged merit, to exclude the operation of mere personal partialities and favour, to make all future pensions liable, on the demise of the Crown, to revision; and, if we think fit, to discontinuance. Nothing can be more unquestionable than our right to do so. But what course shall we take with respect to pensions actually existing? to the pensions granted in conformity with the uniform preceding usage, and on the presumption of the continuance of that usage, believed by the grantor and the grantee to be renewable on a fresh accession? We may doubt the policy of such grants in some instances; we may think there has been, occasionally, too lavish a distribution of royal favour; but if it have not exceeded the bounds prescribed by parliament, are we called upon, by justice or policy, to apply a new rule of retrospective severity? What is the probable profit we shall derive from it? [Cheers.] Oh! do not suppose I give your sordid construction to the word profit! I do not mean the mere lucre—the amount in pounds, shillings, and pence, that a great nation can screw out of a few pensioners. I take profit in its comprehensive sense. I include, in my meaning of national profit, abuses detected, corruption brought to light, prodigality checked;—I include, all the influences of exposure, of punishment, of example.

But what is your prospect of profit, of combined profit, pecuniary and moral? Let us take the English pension list as it stood in 1830, on the demise of George IV. Upon that list there are 383 pensions. Out of that number there are only fifty-eight which have been granted by any minister now surviving. Nineteen of these were granted by Lord Sidmouth, more than thirty-three years since. Out of the total number of 383 pensions, there are only thirty-nine granted within the last thirty years, of which the ministers who granted them are living to give an account. The pensions granted for considerations of charity, you will probably not seek to disturb; those granted as the reward of acknowledged service, will probably be respected; those of a very remote date,—those, in respect to the motives for granting which no responsible minister can be summoned to answer, can hardly be withdrawn in the absence of all satisfactory evidence, unless there be very strong presumption of corrupt motives for the grant. The report of 1831 expressly states, that many of the pensions, in reliance on their permanence during the lives of the parties, have been made the “subject of family settlements and pecuniary arrangements of various kinds,” which it would be harshness and injustice now to disturb. In respect to pensions granted from mere considerations of charity, the following is the testimony of Lord Althorp, who did not propose the arrangement of 1831 blindly and inconsiderately, but after a minute review of the pension list, and a reference to individual grants upon it. In speaking, on the 4th of February, 1831, when the question was entirely open to the consideration of parliament, when the house was much more at liberty, as I will presently show, than it now is, to enter upon an inquiry into the pension list, when Lord Althorp was as much unfettered as the youngest member of the House of Commons now present, he gave this account of the general circumstances under which pensions had been granted. His Lordship said:—“I shall now proceed to state the grounds which induce me not to take away from their owners any pensions that now exist. It is certainly true, and no man is more ready to admit it than I am, that many of the pensions on that list are such that ought never to have existed: but, on the best examination that I have been enabled to give them, it appears that a large majority of these pensions are purely pensions of charity, and therefore to take them away now, after they have been so long enjoyed, will be to inflict great distress on many individuals. I admit that the House has a legal right.....but I doubt whether it has an equitable right, to discontinue them.”

Adverting, then, to the fact, that a large majority of these pensions were granted from mere charity—that many of them, though the propriety of the original grant might be questioned, have been made, as stated in the report of 1831, the subject of domestic settlements and pecuniary arrangements of long standing—considering that only fifty-eight pensions out of the 383 on the civil list of England have been granted by any surviving minister—I ask the House, without reference to what passed in 1831, what they can hope to gain in point of economy, from the most rigid scrutiny into the pension list?

You may answer, that economy, that pecuniary gain, is not your object; that you have higher ends in view; that you want to scrutinize the acts of ministers, to trace the motives for the grant of suspected pensions, to expose the grounds on which the public money has been lavishly wasted on unworthy objects. But how many of these ministers survive? Where will you find the evidence by which you can ascertain the grounds on which they advised a particular pension? And do you, who refused to inquire in 1831—do you, who have let seven years, and a whole reign elapse; who have thereby confirmed the impression that you were averse to inquiry; who have, by your own acts, justified the destruction even of such evidence as might have been accessible in 1831—do you think it a just or a decorous course now to arraign the memory of those who are in their grave, and have not the means of justification or defence? From the date of the earliest pension to the accession of King William IV., there have been eleven ministers holding the office of First Lord of the Treasury, and responsible for the grant of pensions. The Duke of Grafton, Lord North, Lord Shelbourne, Mr. Pitt, Lord Sidmouth, Lord Grenville, Mr. Perceval, Lord Liverpool, Mr. Canning, Lord Ripon, and the Duke of Wellington, have successively held this appointment. Three only of the eleven are now surviving; namely, Lord Sidmouth, Lord Ripon, and the Duke of Wellington: Lord Sidmouth is accountable only for pensions granted before the year 1805. I ask, then, what is your prospect that you can now make an effectual inquiry, consistently with the principles of justice, for the purpose of passing judgment upon the acts and the intentions of those ministers of the Crown by whom pensions have been heretofore granted?

Suppose they were all alive, and able, in person, to explain their acts, would it be just to try their conduct by the test of newly assumed principles?—to apply to their conduct a standard of which they were wholly unconscious?—to subject them to a rule to which neither parliament nor public opinion invited them to conform? The right hon. gentleman quotes Mr. Burke, and cites Mr. Burke as an authority for the inquiry he is about to institute. But in the first place, when Mr. Burke delivered his speech on the reform of the civil list in the year 1780, the circumstances were wholly different. The civil list was in debt, the Crown applied to parliament for the discharge of that debt; and thus gave parliament the clear right of investigating every item of expenditure (the pension list included) before it consented to an extraordinary advance of money, for the purpose of relieving the civil list from debts not sanctioned by parliament. In the second place, notwithstanding this altered position of the civil list, which would have prevented Mr. Burke's opinion, had it been in favour of inquiry, from being an authority to which the right hon. gentleman could appeal, Mr. Burke's opinion was directly against inquiry; and, so far from affording a sanction, supplies a striking and peculiar condemnation of the right hon. gentleman's conduct. That opinion is of the more importance, because it indicates the prevailing feeling of the House of Commons of that day; of that part of the House of Commons which was most jealous of the influence of the Crown, and which was demanding measures of practical reform with respect to the civil list expenditure. Surely, the minister who conformed to that opinion, must have thought himself safe from any subsequent impeachment of his acts. Mr. Burke said:—“The King, Sir, has been, by the constitution, appointed sole judge of the merit for which a pension is to be given. We have a right, undoubtedly, to canvass this, as we have to canvass every act of government. But there is a material difference between an office to be reformed and a pension to be taken away for demerit. In the former case, no charge is implied against the holder; in the latter, his character is altered, as well as his lawful emolument affected. The former process is against the thing, the second against the person. The pensioner certainly, if he pleases, has a right to stand on his own defence, to plead his possession, and to bottom his title in the competency of the Crown to give him what he holds. Possessed, and on the defensive as he is, he will not be obliged to prove his special merit in order to justify the act of legal discretion. The very act, he will contend, is a legal presumption, and an implication of his merit. If this be so, (from the natural force of all legal presumption) he would put us to the difficult proof that he has no merit at all. But other questions would arise in the course of such an inquiry; that is, questions of the merit, when weighed against the proportion of the reward; then the difficulty will be much greater. The difficulty will not, Sir, I am afraid, be much less, if we pass to the person really guilty, in the question of an unmerited pension—the minister himself. I admit, that when called to account for the execution of a trust, he might fairly be obliged to prove the affirmative, and to state the merit for which the pension is given; though, on the pensioner himself, such a process would be hard. If in this examination we proceed methodically, and so as to avoid all suspicion of impartiality and prejudice, we must take the pensions in order of time, or merely alphabetically. The very first pension to which we come, in either of these ways, may appear the most grossly unmerited of any. But the minister may very possibly show—that he knows nothing of the granting of this pension—that it was prior to his time—to his administration—that the minister who laid it on is dead; and then we are thrown back upon the pensioner himself, and plunged into all our former difficulties. Abuses, and gross ones I doubt not, would appear, and to the correction of which I would readily give my hand; but, when I consider that pensions have not generally been affected by the revolutions of ministry, and as I know not where such inquiries would stop, and as an absence of merit is a negative and loose thing, one might be led to derange the order of families, founded on the probable continuance of their kind of income. I might hurt children: I might injure creditors. I really think it the more prudent course not to follow the letter of the petitions. If we fix this mode of inquiry as a basis, we shall, I fear, end as parliament has often ended under similar circumstances. There will be great delay, much confusion, much inequality in our proceedings. But what presses me most of all is this, that though we should strike off all the unmerited pensions, while the power of the Crown remains unlimited, the very same undeserving persons might afterwards return to the very same list; or if they do not, other persons, meriting as little as they do, might be put upon it to an undefinable amount. This, I think, is the pinch of the grievance. For these reasons, Sir, I am obliged to waive this mode of proceeding as any part of my plan. In a plan of reformation, it would be one of my maxims that, when I know of an establishment which may be subservient to useful purposes, and which at the same time, from its discretionary nature, is liable to a very great perversion from those purposes, I would limit the quantity of power that might be so abused."

The security against abuse which Mr. Burke proposed, was the limitation of the power to be abused; that is, the appropriation of a specific sum from which pensions might be granted, and which must on no account be exceeded. He did not seek to define the proper objects of royal favour; he laid down no regulations controlling the distribution of it; and of course, therefore, he left it to be inferred, that the Crown had the discretionary power to grant pensions, not merely for the reward of official service, but for the support of decayed rank, or for the gratification of the private feelings of the sovereign, or for any of the various motives which influence an opulent and liberal nobleman, in private life, in bestowing marks of grace and favour, or rewarding the fidelity and attachment of humble friends. No doubt, if there were abuse,—if the pension fund were prostituted to the purposes of corruption,—the abuse would not be protected from inquiry, on showing sufficient grounds of strong suspicion; nor from punishment, if proof of corruption could be established. But there has been no concealment of the names of those now in the receipt of pensions; every name has been repeatedly published; and yet there has been no allegation of corruption in the grant of pensions; there has been merely the assertion that the ministers of other times did not conform to doctrines, with regard to the favour of the Crown, which they never heard of, and did not anticipate—regulations, in respect to pensions, which were established after their death. What a mockery of justice will it now be, either to deprive the grantee of his pension, or to impeach the grantor for his misconduct!

So much for the considerations which would appear to me to call for the maintenance of all pensions existing previously to the accession of the late King, quite independently of the transactions of 1831. I now approach the discussion of that part of this question which rests upon the transactions of 1831, and my object will be to show that it is nothing short of absolute and flagrant injustice, after what then took place, now to revise that pension list.

What are the circumstances of the case? George IV. died in 1830. It was necessary, in the course of the year 1830, for the government of the day to propose a new arrangement of the civil list. They did propose it; and, on their responsibility, submitted it to the consideration of parliament. A motion was made, by the opponents of the government, for referring the civil list to a select committee. The government thought it their duty to resist that motion. The motion was, however, carried by a majority of 29; and, in consequence of that majority, the members of the government retired from office. A new government was appointed, owing its accession to power to this very question of the consideration of the civil list by a committee; and, of course, every person was alive as to the course which the new government would pursue. Lord Grey came into office as First Lord of the Treasury, and Lord Althorp as Chancellor of the Exchequer. Lord Althorp moved for a select committee on the civil list, and that select committee made a full and detailed report upon the subject of pensions. That committee was appointed by Lord Althorp, as Chancellor of the Exchequer; was presided over by him as chairman; the report was indited by Lord Althorp, and was assented to by the committee. In the report of the committee, so appointed by the government which succeeded the government of the Duke of Wellington, it is stated, distinctly:—"It is more than probable, therefore, that parties relying on an adherence to an invariable custom, have made family settlements, and pecuniary arrangements of various kinds, with all of which his Majesty must necessarily interfere, should the continuance of these pensions, for the first time, on his accession to the throne be refused. Adverting to all the circumstances of the case,—considering that no material relief to the finances of the country could be derived from the most rigid measures of retrenchment applied to the pension list; that in many cases, severe distress, in some, actual injustice, would arise to individuals from the general discontinuance of pensions; that such discontinuance on the occasion of his Majesty's accession, would be a departure from an usage invariably observed on the accession of his Majesty's predecessor,—your committee do not think it advisable to withdraw from the Crown those funds which may enable the Crown, if it shall so think fit, to continue the pensions on the civil list of his late Majesty."

How could the right hon. gentleman refer to this report, and assert that it was an authority for the course he is now pursuing? I shall be disappointed, indeed, if I do not convince the House that whatever else the right hon. gentleman may have shown, he has at least manifested a degree of intrepidity which is without parallel. He says, that he finds in the report of the select committee—that select committee which had Lord Althorp at its head—that they contended for the right and equity of revising pensions. Why, no doubt they did, of revising pensions of a certain and particular description; but, if this report means anything, it means this,—that with respect to pensions granted before the accession of the late king, in respect of which an invariable usage had been observed, those pensions ought to continue, and ought to be exempted from revision. What says the report?—"These observations, however, do not apply to the grant of future pensions on the civil list: if granted with a distinct notice to the individuals receiving them, that they are not only legally terminable on the demise of the sovereign by whom they have been granted, but that they are liable to be revised or discontinued on the settlement of a new civil list, there can be no obstacle to the reconsideration at that time of the then existing pension list."

And yet the hon. gentleman, conceding the distinctions so plainly and unequivocally drawn by the report, between pensions granted without notice of revision, and pensions granted with such notice, appeals to an authority for the revision, indiscriminately, of all pensions whatever! The right hon. gentleman then appeals to Lord Althorp as an authority in his favour. He says, "Would the ingenuous Lord Althorp have countenanced the impression that pensions could not be revised on the demise of the Crown?" Why, what was the whole purport of the language of Lord Althorp, and the whole tenor of his proceedings, on this very question? It was a decided maintenance of the principles of the report of the committee; a decided maintenance of the distinction between pre-existing pensions, and pensions to be granted in future. And what was the position of Lord Althorp and of Lord Grey? They had no interest in maintaining the old pension list. If they had been influenced by grovelling motives of party hostility, or of vindictive feeling against ministers whom they had opposed, they would have called for inquiry into the pension list. But they were influenced by higher motives; they thought it was indecorous towards the Crown, unjust towards those who had been the objects of the royal favour, that a committee of the House of Commons should scrutinise the motives, in each individual case, which had prompted the liberality of the Crown. They refused to institute an inquiry; and parliament sanctioned their refusal.

It is necessary that I should refer to the precise expressions used by Lord Althorp,—not in 1834, when he opposed the inquiry then proposed into the pension list, on an additional and distinct ground,—but in 1831, when the question was entirely open to parliament, and when Lord Althorp was as free, nay, infinitely more free, than we now are, in consequence of what then took place. Lord Althorp said:—"I admit that the House has a legal right to take away all these pensions if it pleases. They certainly expire with the demise of the Crown; but though the House has a legal right to discontinue them, I doubt whether it has an equitable right, for they have hitherto always been granted on the supposition that, when once obtained, they were to be held, not merely for the life of the Sovereign who granted, but also for the lives of the parties who held them."

This was the language which Lord Althorp used, dissatisfying many of those who had hitherto supported him. Mr. Portman, the member for Dorsetshire, came down to the House before the question for the settlement approached, and, remonstrating with the noble lord, said, "Beware, lest you should be overruled by a hostile majority of the House, and lose the confidence of those who have hitherto supported you." What was the language employed by his lordship in answer to this,—by a minister who knew that the pension list was unpopular; to whom it was signified that the abandonment of his opinion on that question must be the condition on which he would retain the support of his friends? What was the answer which he gave to the warning, "Beware, lest you provoke a hostile feeling amongst your former supporters, and be overruled in the House?" It was this,—and so noble, so high-minded, was it, that Lord Althorp and his friends may for ever refer to it with proud feelings of satisfaction, heightened by the contrast with the present proceedings,—the following was the reply of Lord Althorp to the caution and menace of Mr. Portman:—"On the subject of the pensions I beg to say a few words. I can never conceive it is my duty, as a minister of this country, or of the House, as a part of the legislature, to take advantage of a technical point of law, in order to do what in my conscience I believe to be unjust. The pensions in question, as I stated on Friday, were considered, and always have been considered, as granted for life. It is undoubtedly true, that by taking advantage of a technical point of law, those pensions might be made to expire on the demise of the Crown. There would be a strict legal justification for making them so expire; but I put it to the House—I put it to the country, whether it would be a worthy cause for government to take advantage of such a circumstance, and whether the relief which would be thereby obtained could be put in competition with the discredit of such a proceeding? Having said this, I have only to add that I await the decision of the committee and of the House with the deference and respect to which it is entitled; and that it is my most earnest wish that I may be able to comply with any alterations or modifications which may be suggested. At the same time I must observe, that I can never consider myself as bound to submit to the decision of any committee, or of the House itself, or of any other power whatever, if that decision should involve in it what I deem to be an act of injustice."

Now, let me ask, what was the legitimate inference which parties entitled to pensions must have drawn from this? They did not look to technicalities, or ponder over nice verbal distinctions. They saw a great revolution in the government,—one party dispossessed of power, the other succeeding to it. They saw that the question of the civil list was the instrument by which the mighty change was effected. They saw the new ministers adopting the principles of the old, with respect to inquiry into the pension list; and the legislature approving the principle thus held in common by the great parties of the state, and advisedly and deliberately sanctioning, at the very time that departure from it was within their competence, an adherence to that which had been the invariable preceding usage. Could they entertain a doubt that, so far as the past was concerned, the question was settled for ever? and that their pensions were guaranteed to them for their lives, not, perhaps, by the letter of an act of parliament, but by the higher sanctions of the public faith, and the honour of the Crown and parliament?

But, supposing it had been foretold to them that the proposal for inquiry would be made on the accession of a future sovereign, the last man in the House from whom they could have expected such a proposal is the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He was the colleague of Lord Althorp at the treasury, the confidential secretary of the department over which Lord Grey and Lord Althorp presided. He is the man on whom they would have relied for protection. That reliance would not be founded on the mere fact of official connection with others; it would be justified by all the acts and declarations of the right hon. gentleman himself. I am not about to taunt him with inconsistency in respect to a political course. If he has changed his opinion in a question of policy, let him manfully avow it. Policy may change its aspect, varying its channel hues according to the vicissitudes of human affairs. But, surely, justice cannot. That which was expedient in 1830 may, possibly, be the reverse in 1837; but that which was injustice in 1830, cannot be justice in 1837. I will take some of the declarations of the right hon. gentleman, and I will leave the House to judge whether the parties, to whose interests they referred, had not a right to expect that they should find in him their most strenuous defender. While I am reading these extracts, I must ask you not to confound my speech with his. The sentiments are identical, the quotations are so appropriate, so exactly becoming my present position, that you will hardly believe that the speech which I am reading is any other than my own. The right hon. gentleman said:—"You passed those acts with your eyes open, and why should the House of Commons now be called upon, at the suggestion of the hon. member for Colchester, to go into the most fruitless, the most painful, and I will say, into the most disgusting inquiry?"

Now if that inquiry would have been painful in 1834, would it not be equally so now? If it were disgusting then, shall we be betrayed into it now? I proceed with the quotation:—"I do not quite understand that cheer from hon. gentlemen opposite, Undoubtedly such an inquiry must necessarily be painful and disgusting to the good feeling of all mankind."

After this declaration, I ask, would not the parties whose cases are thus spoken of have a right to calculate, whoever might propose such an inquiry, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, at least, would not be the man? If one of them were told that such an inquiry were threatened, he would say, "I have looked to the speech of Lord Althorp, and to that of the then Secretary for the Treasury, who is now the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and I find that both of them have declared themselves against such a proceeding—that the latter has even characterized it as fruitless and disgusting; and, looking at these declarations, I have a perfect security—as perfect a security as can be grounded upon the characters and pledges of public men—that the family settlements and pecuniary arrangements into which I have entered, depending upon the continuance of my pension, will not be disturbed." Suppose the case of a military officer of limited means, the holder of a small pension, casting about to see what provision he can make for those dependent upon him for support. His attorney says, "This pension is only given for the life of the Crown, and therefore it is not such a security as is good for a settlement, or for the advance of money." To this the military officer replies, "I have perfect confidence that my pension is safe; the declarations of public men on both sides unite to assure it to me. You (the attorney) are the slave of technicalities; you do not understand that species of security which is above the words of a deed or the letter of the law. Read the speech of Lord Althorp, read that of the hon. Secretary of the Treasury, who succeeded him in the exchequer, and then say whether I am not safe—whether the provident foresight of Mr. Rice has not guaranteed my pension?" The military man would then read with exultation, to the astonished attorney, the following speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer:—"Let me suppose the case of a meritorious military officer; suppose such officer to have received a pension for years; is this House disposed to call upon him either to forfeit the grants to which he has now a legal right, or to come before a committee to recite his services, proclaim his own merits, to make out a case, and substantiate his claim to what his sovereign has granted? Why, sir, I say that this is a species of inquiry which must necessarily be painful to every well-regulated mind."

"There," says the military officer, "There is my security. While this man remains in office I shall never have to loiter about the lobbies of the House of Commons, inquiring for the Committee-room, No. 13, where I am to recite my case, and proclaim my merits, and justify the suspected bounty of my sovereign."

Mr. Rice said further:—"I should like to know what it is that hon. gentlemen propose to themselves if they go into committee. I only beg to state to the House, as among my objections to this inquiry—I only ask them, as practical men, what they expect to extract from it, unless, indeed (this was addressed to the hon. member for Southwark)—unless, indeed, they proceed upon motives which I will not attribute to any hon. member—motives of undue curiosity, and a desire to investigate the private circumstances of individuals? But we are told by hon. gentlemen opposite, that they seek to trace the origin of these grants. Now, the hon. member for Bath stated, that most of those who were the responsible advisers of these grants are no more—their evidence and their responsibility are therefore alike excluded. Are we, then, to call all the parties who are themselves in receipt of these pensions before us, and the responsible ministers who advised them not being in office or in existence—are we to go into an examination of the private case of each of these parties? If so, what is to be the course of your inquiry, and how are you to conduct it? I cannot imagine an inquiry that could by possibility be of so disagreeable a character; I cannot imagine an inquiry so painful, not only to the feelings of those who are the subjects of it, but to those who have to conduct it. I only ask the gentleman, whoever he may be, who is a candidate for the honour of the future chair of this committee, whether he anticipates any very useful or agreeable duty."

I repeat this question of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I ask the gentleman, whoever he may be (it cannot be the Chancellor of the Exchequer,) who is a candidate for the honour of the future chair of this committee, whether he anticipates any very useful or agreeable duty? I ask you, the House of Commons, whether you will sanction this "fruitless and disgusting inquiry," which, seven years since, your predecessors refused to enter into? Remember that your position is different from theirs; that seven more years have elapsed—that a whole reign has intervened—that evidence which might have been had in 1831 is no longer attainable in 1837—that expectations entertained in 1831, founded upon the uniform preceding usage, have been converted into certainty by the deliberate re-adoption of that usage. Remember that, of the whole list of the pensions, there is but a fraction for which any living minister can answer; that those ministers who, fretted by premature decay by the restless agitation of political life, are now in their graves, entertained, and were justified in entertaining, different views from yours with regard to the grant of pensions. They little dreamed, after rewarding with a moderate pension the faithful services of some confidential servant, the depository of all their secrets, the sharer of all their labours, that years after their death, in the absence, possibly, of all evidence, the motives of the grant would be scrutinised with unsparing severity, and tried by inapplicable tests, and new and unheard-of principles.

Consider the life—the life of intolerable labour and care—the briefness of the career—the causes of the death of many of those who have reached the summit of precarious power in this country! Look back upon the history of this country from 1804 to 1830, a period of twenty-six years, and you will find that death has swept away all the ministers, with two exceptions, who had successively presided over the destinies of this country during that eventful period, and that the united tenure of office by these two embraces only three out of twenty-six years. Call to mind the fate of Castlereagh, of Canning, of Liverpool, whose deaths were hastened by their devotedness to the service of their country. I shall never forget the words addressed to myself by Lord Liverpool but a few days before that fatal blow which ended in his decease, when I remarked to him, with satisfaction, that I thought him looking better than I had seen him for some time previously. "Ah!" was Lord Liverpool's reply, "no man knows what it is to have been the Prime Minister of England for seventeen years, and never, during that period, to have received his letters by the post in the morning without a feeling of anxiety and apprehension." The ministers are in their graves. These pensions were granted by their advice. They are unable to give an account of them, or of the grounds upon which they were given. Do you think it just, do you think it decorous towards their memories, to ransack with severity their advice to their sovereign, with respect to the distribution of the royal favour? Would it have been fitting to do so in 1830? Is it tolerable in 1837?

William IV. has descended into the tomb of his ancestors. He has been succeeded by a sovereign in the bloom of youth and promise. That painful and revolting inquiry which we would sanction when a king of mature age ascended the throne, shall we insist upon it now? Shall we take advantage of the tender age and unsuspecting confidence of a youthful Queen, to demand those scrutinies into acts of royal favour, which were characterised at a previous accession, not merely as fruitless, but disgusting? There is not a pension on the list which was not granted as the reward of service, or the mark of favour, by the grandfather of the present Queen, George III., or the succeeding sovereigns, her uncles. Shall her first act be to question the exercise of their discretionary favour, and put upon their trial the objects of their bounty? Shall she, who is the fountain of honour, of grace, of privilege, of favour, be forced to this act of unusual severity and harshness? You have offered to her the respectful assurance, that the Commons of England will make ample provision for all that can contribute to her personal comfort, or enable her to maintain the high dignity of her exalted station. Let not the kind and grateful feelings which this assurance must excite in her mind be embittered by the sad reflection, that she, of all sovereigns, is the first who has been called upon to depart from the liberal and generous usages of her ancestors—the first upon whom has been imposed the harsh and painful necessity of rudely invading those family settlements and domestic arrangements which were made in just reliance upon the permanence of royal protection. I will now conclude, by moving the following resolution as an amendment; to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the question, in order to add the words:—"That, upon the occasion of the accession of his late Majesty, King William IV., a select committee was appointed in 1831, on the motion of Lord Althorp, then Chancellor of the Exchequer, to take into consideration the accounts presented by order of his Majesty relating to the civil list.

"That the committee so appointed took into consideration, together with other classes of the civil list, that of the pensions, and, after stating that they felt it to be their duty to explain to the House fully the ease in respect to pensions, made in their report the following, among other observations:—"At the same time, it would be a harsh measure to overlook, on this present occasion, that which has been the uniform usage on all former settlements of the civil list. Pensions on the civil list have always hitherto been considered to be granted for life: and, in fact, no instance has occurred wherein a pension on the civil list, granted by one sovereign, has been discontinued on the accession of his successor. It is more than probable, therefore, that parties relying on an adherence to an invariable custom, have made family settlements and pecuniary arrangements of various kinds, with all of which his Majesty must necessarily interfere, should the continuance of these pensions, for the first time, on his accession to the throne be refused. Adverting to all the circumstances of the case, considering that no material relief to the finances of the country could be derived from the most rigid measures of retrenchment applied to the pension list—that in many cases severe distress, in some actual injustice, would arise to individuals from the general discontinuance of pensions—that such discontinuance, on the occasion of his Majesty's accession, would be a departure from an usage invariably observed on the accession of his Majesty's predecessors, your committee do not think it advisable to withdraw from the Crown those funds which may enable the Crown, if it shall so think fit, to continue the pensions on the civil list of his late Majesty. These observations, however, do not apply to the grant of future pensions on the civil list, if granted with a distinct notice to the individuals receiving them, that they are not only legally terminable on the demise of the sovereign by whom they have been granted, but that they are liable to be revised or discontinued on the settlement of a new civil list, there can be no obstacle to the re-consideration at that time of the then existing pension list.'

"The committee proceeded to recommend that the pension-lists of England, Scotland, and Ireland should be consolidated into one alphabetical list; that pensions to the amount of £75,000, on the first part of the list, should be placed on the civil list, and the remainder charged to the consolidated fund.

"That his Majesty's government proposed, and parliament sanctioned, measures in respect to the civil list pensions, founded upon the recommendations of the committee, and in precise conformity with them, making provision to enable the Crown, if it should so think fit, to continue the whole of the pensions on the civil list of King George IV.

"That, at a subsequent period, the House of Commons passed resolutions in respect to the grant of all future pensions by the Crown, expressing an opinion that they ought to be confined to such persons as had just claims on the royal beneficence, or who, by their personal service to the Crown, by the performance of duties to the public, or by their useful discoveries in science, and attainments in literature and the arts, have merited the gracious consideration of their sovereign, and the gratitude of their country.

"That it appears to this House, that the course advisedly taken on the accession of his late Majesty, by the Crown and Parliament, was calculated to justify increased confidence in the continuance of the then existing pensions, and in the permanence of 'family settlements and arrangements of various kinds,' made by parties 'relying on the adherence to invariable custom,' and that whatever harshness or injustice there might have been, on the accession of his late Majesty, in overlooking on that occasion the uniform preceding usage, would, on the present occasion, be greatly aggravated, not only by the lapse of time, and the intervention of a whole reign, but by the direct sanction given in 1831, by the Crown and Parliament, to an expectation that the principles then acted on, so far as applicable to the then existing pensions, would be thereafter adhered to.

"That, under these circumstances, it is the opinion of this House, that regulations having been established in respect to the grant of future pensions, and precautions having been taken in respect to the revival or discontinuance of them on new settlements of the civil list, it is advisable now to make such provision as shall enable the Crown, if it shall so think fit, to continue those pensions which were continued by the Crown on the accession of his late Majesty, or which were granted by his Majesty."

The House divided on the original motion :—Ayes, 295; Noes, 233; majority, 62.

CIVIL LIST BILL.

DECEMBER 19, 1837.

This Bill having been read a third time, Mr. Grote proposed to remove the entire sum allotted to pensions from the Civil List.

SIR ROBERT PEEL should vote against the motion of the hon. member, because he conceived its object to be to deprive the Crown of the power which it at present possessed of rewarding merit and honourable personal distinction. At the same time he would not say that the proposal of the Chancellor of the Exchequer was altogether satisfactory. The first objection which he entertained to the right hon. gentleman's proposal was, that the sum of £1,200 a year, which it was proposed to grant to the Crown for this purpose, was too scanty. This was his opinion at the outset; and when the right hon. gentleman went on to inform him that at the end of twelve years a saving of £30,000 would be effected, by the dropping in of lives in the present pension list, that opinion, that the proposed sum was too small, became confirmed. At the same time he admitted that the principle of granting a fixed sum was a good one, provided the grant was a liberal one. The granting of a pension depended in a great measure upon the means in the hands of the Crown to pay it, and where the means of so doing were, as in the reign of William IV., contingent upon the falling-in of existing pensions, it would often happen that at the time when there were the most calls for grants of this kind there were no means of making it, whilst at other times the Crown would have more abundant means at its disposal than the occasion of the day required. He thought, therefore, that a fixed sum, provided it was of such an amount as to be a fair equivalent for the means already at the disposal of the Crown, would be an improvement. But he must say again, that he considered the sum of £1,200 a-year too small, when it was considered that out of it were to be provided all the pensions for the three great divisions of the kingdom. There was another feature also in the plan of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, of which he disapproved, namely, that in any year, if the Crown did not grant pensions to the full extent of the £1,200, it was not to have at its disposal the residue for the ensuing year; but that in no year the Crown was to grant more pensions than to the amount of £1,200. He must say, that he thought it would be better not to limit the discretion of the Crown in this way, as it must naturally occur that in some years there should be more proper occasions for the bounty than in others; and the object of parliament in affixing a limit at all would be fully answered by providing that the grants of the Crown in pensions should not exceed an average of £1,200 a-year, taking one year with another. He trusted, therefore, that this part of the bill would be reconsidered, and altered in a way, as he thought, tending manifestly to the public advantage. The next objection which he had to the plan of the Chancellor of the Exchequer was, the proposal to call upon the Crown to lay upon the table of this House every year a list of the pensions granted by virtue of this bill. There were some hon. gentlemen in the House who really did not seem to be at all disposed to be satisfied with any arrangement whatever on this subject. They first made a regulation to govern the Crown in the distribution of all future pensions, a resolution to which the Crown had shown every disposition to adhere, and which it had hitherto acted up to most implicitly. Yet with this regulation the very hon. members who assisted in passing it were now finding fault. When the Chancellor of the Exchequer spoke of their bounden duty to preserve the monarchical prerogative in the distribution of these bounties, he wondered that he did not premise that the very arguments which he used bore directly against his own proposition. The fact was, that the right hon. gentleman, in his anxiety to conciliate both sides of the House to his scheme, had necessarily been betrayed into inconsistencies which would hardly escape observation. When the right hon. gentleman, addressing his own friends behind him, said, that the House of Commons ought to exact a yearly statement from the Crown of the manner in which it had disposed of the sum of money granted to it by this act of parliament, he wondered that the right hon. gentleman did not perceive that such an exercise of authority would almost amount to a veto upon, if not actually to a directional power over, these bounties. The right hon. gentleman declared that the Crown was the fountain of honour and favour; and that being the case, he could not see that the prerogative of the Crown applied more directly to one than to the other, yet what would the right hon. gentleman say if it were proposed to make the Crown give in a return to this House of all the titles and honorary distinctions which it had conferred from year to year? Would not this be objected to as a pretence on the part of this House to exercise an inquisitory authority over the exercise of the royal prerogative? He was aware that returns of pensions in existence had been given from time to time; but this was at particular periods, and upon a requisition made, either when they were about to legislate upon the subject of the civil list, or when a strong feeling of jealousy or misgiving existed as to the application of these funds. But he thought there was a very clear distinction to be drawn between an occasional return of this kind, and a yearly legal presentation for the purpose of challenging inquiry into the acts of the Crown. He must confess that when he heard the speech of the right hon. gentleman he was very much surprised at hearing him make use of observations so very contrary to what he had been accustomed to hear come from that side of the House. It only showed what rapid changes they had to expect from that quarter; and they ought not to be at all surprised if, seven years hence, they were to see a proposition emanate from the right hon. gentleman's party to take away all power to grant pensions from the Crown, and to vest it entirely in the House of Commons. He had already said that he considered the grant of £1,200 far too limited for the proper exercise of the royal prerogative in the rewarding literary and civil merit. This was his opinion, and he predicted that the country would participate in it before very long. What would be the consequence? The feelings of the country would revolt at seeing men who had devoted their talents and their energies to the prosecution of literary and scientific pursuits, for the practical benefit of the community, languishing in distress and want. The Crown would be applied to for succour, but applied to in vain; for, with every disposition, it would not have the means to grant a pension so loudly demanded by all the dictates of humanity, of gratitude, and of sound policy. What would be the case, then? The House of Commons would have to step in and avert the consequences of an error of which it had been guilty, but at the same time take to itself the merit of the grant, to the obvious disparagement of the Crown. All this might not be the consequence of a premeditated step towards republican principles; the desire might not perhaps now exist to establish the power of the House of Commons on the ruin of that of the Crown; but as the power to grant bounties must be exercised, and must rest somewhere, so if this grant in the hands of the Crown be now so restricted, that power must eventually be taken out of the hands of the Crown altogether by the House of Commons. Having expressed his opinion that the proposition of the right hon. gentleman, limited as it was, was fraught with dangerous consequence to the monarchical principle, he should proceed to another branch of the subject. He must say that it was rather extraordinary to find hon. gentlemen who formerly required that all bounties should be confined to rewarding literary or scientific merit, and who caused a resolution to be passed to that effect, should now be quarrelling with their own regulation. The hon. gentleman opposite said, that giving a reward to a meritorious individual was a very invidious proceeding, and calculated rather to give offence than otherwise to the other members of the same class. Now, this he must be allowed to say was a most extraordinary argument. Why, what used to be said of this country in comparing it with surrounding nations? Was it not said that despotic nations rewarded science, and selected eminent scientific and literary men, anxious to pay them a just compliment, whilst they also afforded them a substantial reward? See what despotic governments did—they rewarded science—they selected eminent men—and were anxious to pay a compliment to them by conferring upon them some substantial reward. The argument of the hon. member was conclusive against Sir Walter Scott being made a baronet, because it applied equally to granting a dignity as a pension. Doubtless the hon. gentleman would say that the honorary distinction cost nothing, while the pension would put the country to the expense of £300 a-year. It was the argumentum ad pecuniam which seemed altogether to influence the hon. member's views. He always thought that when a literary man of eminence was selected for royal favour that the whole class was elevated and complimented in that act. He well recollected what was said over and over again on the former debates on this subject, that by granting pensions too exclusively to persons connected with the military profession or with politics, those two classes of public characters were elevated into undue importance, to the disparagement of meritorious conduct in other useful pursuits. It was then that a resolution was passed for rewarding literary merit and scientific acquirement; and now that this resolution was being faithfully acted upon, the hon. gentleman complained that by rewarding members of the literary profession with pensions, literature itself was degraded, and some members of it have cause to complain of an invidious selection having been made for the royal bounty. Then it appeared that the real ground of complaint now was, not what it was formerly, that literary merit was not rewarded. In other words, hon. members quarrelled with their own resolution. In his opinion it was proper that literary and scientific men of merit should receive the occasional aids which they required, and be honoured with the conventional distinctions which were established in a monarchy—he thought that these rewards should be conferred only by the Crown; and that unless there was suspicion of abuse in the exercise of the power of the Crown, it should not be questioned by that House; still less should those rewards and distinctions be conferred by the majority of that House. On those grounds he should, as he had before said, oppose the motion of the hon. member for London.

Motion negatived.

Sir Robert Peel then rose to move an amendment. It had been argued in the committee that the pensions should be regulated by a fixed annual sum, and not by a varying amount up to £75,000, and a resolution had been moved to that effect. He adhered to the principles which were laid down by Lord Althorp in the year 1830, and had given his vote accordingly. He had, however, been overruled, and it was decided that the Crown should be enabled to grant an annual sum of £1,200. He wished to move an amendment to that part of the bill, providing that if the whole sum were not granted in any one year, the remainder might be carried over to the next year and then granted in addition to the £1,200 allowed for that year. He might perhaps make his meaning more clear, by supposing that the amount of pensions granted in one year was only £800, which would be less by £400 than the amount allowed by the bill. He would, in such a case, carry that sum over to the next year to the advantage of the Crown, and empower the Crown to grant pensions in the following year to the amount of £1,600. The intentions of the House would not be defeated by such an arrangement, because upon an average of years the annual sum granted would not exceed £1,200.

Motion carried, and the bill passed.

AFFAIRS OF CANADA.

JANUARY 16, 1838.

Lord John Russell moved the adoption of an address to her Majesty, relative to the recent acts of violence that had taken place in Canada; to thank her Majesty for her gracious communication of papers on the subject; and to express the determination of that House to support the efforts of her Majesty for the suppression of revolt and the restoration of tranquillity.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, that the noble lord, the secretary for the home department, in the course of the speech with which he had commenced this discussion, had brought under the consideration of the House two most important questions—one, an address to the Crown, pledging the House of Commons to support the Crown in the efforts which it might make for the suppression of actual revolt; the other, a legislative measure for the suspension of the constitution of Lower Canada, and investing the individual who was to proceed to that colony for the purpose of taking upon himself the administration of its affairs, as governor, with dictatorial power. He was called on to-night, he apprehended, to give his opinion with respect to the first of these propositions, and while, as a member of that House, he should pledge his support to the Crown in its endeavours to put down rebellion on the part of a portion of her Majesty's subjects, he must say, that he was glad that the question of supporting the authority of the Crown against open insurrection, and the legislative measure which the noble lord proposed to bring forward, had been kept perfectly distinct and separate. He considered that the first question was one of sufficient importance to justify a separate discussion. When it became necessary, he should freely express his opinion with regard to the policy of the measure which the noble lord had stated it was his intention to propose; but at present he should confine his observations to the question of the address to the Crown. He lamented that so much time had been permitted to elapse before this subject was brought before them. If he had been in the House when the noble lord proposed a three weeks' adjournment, he should have voted for the proposition which was then made, that the House should meet without delay for the purpose of considering an address to the Crown, and of assuring the Crown of the support of the House of Commons. They had at that time the information that an attack had been made on her Majesty's troops by her Majesty's subjects—that a portion of her Majesty's subjects were in open insurrection against her government, and no time ought to have been permitted to elapse without assembling the House of Commons, for the purpose of intimidating the disaffected, and of encouraging the loyal and well disposed. No doubt the members of the House had separated, because it was understood that no business of importance would be brought forward till after the holidays; but when the fact was made known that a portion of her Majesty's dominions was in open revolt against her government, there could have been no reason whatever why an adjournment for three days should not have taken place, and the House have immediately re-assembled for the purpose of giving that assurance to the Crown which was now so tardily, and as far as Canada was concerned, so unimpressively conveyed, that in the suppression of the revolt, the Crown might rely on the support of the House of Commons. He was surprised, also, that no direct and formal communication had been made to both Houses of Parliament by a message from the Crown on this subject. Surely when they knew that the Queen's troops had been actually called on to repress open insurrection—when they knew that the attack of a British force had been repulsed by the insurgents—when they saw martial law proclaimed—when they saw the most pressing instances addressed by the governor to other colonies for troops—surely these were facts which justified a direct communication to parliament from the throne; but the House of Commons had not, till five o'clock that evening, received even an indirect intimation that the Queen's troops had been in collision with the people. It appeared that before the adjournment of the House of Commons no accounts whatever had reached them of the result of the expedition under Colonel Gore, and it was not until to-night that the House of Commons were informed of the result of the engagement which had taken place between those troops and the persons who, acting in open violation of the laws, had opposed the forces of her Majesty. It was no answer to say, that the dispatches had not arrived, and that there had been no opportunity to communicate their contents before. But it was not of this that he was complaining especially, but he complained that the Crown had not sent any message to the House, stating the circumstances attending the revolt, and soliciting the aid and support of the House of Commons in endeavouring to put it down; and he would venture to say, that in the history of this country no event of so much importance as the insurrection in Canada had taken place without its having been deemed necessary to communicate the fact specifically to the House of Commons, not by means of the publication of papers alone, but by means of a message from the Crown, in which a solicitation for support was included. He would begin with the events of the American war, and all the unfortunate transactions which took place with reference to that struggle for independence. In 1774 the disturbance took place in Massachusetts, and the riots also broke out in Boston. Parliament was aware of the unfortunate differences existing between that colony and this country from the reports which had reached them; but the notoriety of the matter was not considered a sufficient reason to relieve the Crown of the necessity of making a formal communication of the facts to both Houses of Parliament, and a message was accordingly delivered, setting forth the circumstances, and soliciting the aid of Parliament in suppressing the disturbances which prevailed. The occurrences in Boston also took place in 1774; but they formed the ground of a distinct message from the Crown, and of a distinct application for the support of Parliament. The case of the mutiny at the Nore, in 1797, was another, the facts of which were perfectly notorious, and had even been the subject of discussion in the House before they were introduced to its notice on the 1st of June, having been brought forward by Mr. Sheridan; but still, on the first of June, the Houses had a notification conveyed to them by a message that the mutiny had broken out, and their support was prayed. Take, also, the whole case of the Irish rebellion before the year 1798. In the year 1797, when Lord Camden was Lord-lieutenant of Ireland, before the rebellion had broken out, when disturbances however prevailed in Ulster, and when assemblages of armed people had taken place, the government did not then leave the Irish Parliament to collect the circumstances from the papers which were published, and the rumours which were afloat, but by a message it informed the Parliament of the whole of the facts, and prayed their support. In 1797, when the apprehension of two committees of the United Irishmen, in Belfast, had taken place, the same course was pursued: and in 1798, on the 22nd of May, before the rebellion actually broke out, a communication was conveyed from the Crown to both Houses, through the medium of the Lord-lieutenant. Then, again, in 1803, when there were no separate Houses of Parliament in Ireland, the Crown made a distinct communication to the Imperial Parliament, by a message. The substance of the message on the subject of the rebellion was, that his Majesty felt the deepest regret in acquainting the House of Commons that treasonable and rebellious opinions had been shown to exist in Ireland, and that his Majesty relied with the most perfect confidence on the wisdom of the steps which the House would take to afford protection to his Majesty's Irish subjects, and to restore and secure the general tranquillity of the country. Why, he would ask, had this uniform course been adopted? and why was it, that when a revolt, such as had broken out in Canada, came before them—a revolt, calling for the proclamation of martial law to put it down—why was it, that in such a case, the Crown had not thought it becoming to make a communication in accordance with the stream of all analogous cases in our history? There was not a single instance in our history in which the Crown had left it to Parliament to gather from the despatches, facts, which should be communicated by a message from itself. He was quite aware that, in the Queen's speech, there was a reference to Canada; but that reference did not relate to the revolt; for, at the period when that speech was delivered, the revolt was not known, and the passage in the speech altogether referred to the events of last session, and in no way relieved the ministers of the Crown from the onus of making a formal communication to the House. He had just heard an hon. gentleman say, that this was only an objection as to form, and he was quite aware that it was an objection as to form only, and not as to substance; but he would ask the hon. gentleman, who appeared so much to undervalue form, if, when a revolt took place, and martial law was proclaimed in a colony, it was to be deemed of no importance that the uniform usage in such cases had not been adopted, and that thus the importance of the matter should be altogether underrated? The main question before the House, however, was, if it was fitting that the House of Commons should assure her Majesty of its cordial support in putting down this revolt; and he must say, that he never felt more sincerely that he was right than when, without passion, and after great deliberation, and not without a cautious forecast of all the probable consequences, he came to the conclusion of offering to the Crown his assurances of cordial support in attempting, at any hazard, to suppress this revolt. The hon. gentleman who had last spoken, had suggested considerations which he admitted to be of great importance. He said, that the majority of the people of Canada were disaffected to the British government, and he contended that therefore they ought to be released from their allegiance. The hon. gentleman stated, that the more conciliatory the intentions of the colonial government had been, the greater had been their failure, and the greater were the apprehensions that it would be impossible to establish mutual goodwill and harmony in the relations between the colony and the parent state. He admitted the importance of these suggestions, but at the same time he must be permitted to ask, whether the principles which the hon. gentleman had laid down, were to be applied to the whole empire. Let not the House forget, that we had an extended colonial empire, including India, including Europe. Let them not forget the extent to which this principle, if admitted, might be applied. Let it be laid down, then, as a principle, that the first expression of dissatisfaction with our government, and the first instance of resistance to our authority, was to be a signal for abandoning our claim to superiority. To put the strongest case, suppose Canada were an island; could we say, that after possession of the colony for seventy years, gained by a series of brilliant conquests, and after we had at least intended to do justice, that we ought to relinquish our sovereignty, because it was dissatisfied with our government? If we laid down that principle, could it be limited to colonies? Could it not be applied to integral parts of the empire? Why might it not be extended to a part of England, if that part expressed itself dissatisfied with the rule of England? The fact of dissatisfaction with our government, as the hon. gentleman contended, showed that the colony had been misgoverned; and then, he asked, what was the good of ruling over discontented subjects. Why, if we were to act on such a rule of public conduct, the glory of England would, in ten years, be utterly annihilated. The great influence which we possessed, owing to our vast colonial establishments, and the great power which we derived from our navy, which, as the noble lord had observed, was supported by our commercial marine, would soon pass away; and England, from the foremost rank among the nations of the earth, would descend to the situation of a subordinate and a fifth-rate power. Suppose that doctrine to be applied to an island not connected with the British empire, would it even then be applicable to Canada? He thought not; for there appeared no reason for believing, that the dissatisfaction of Canada was so fixed, so deeply rooted, as to despair of effecting an ultimate arrangement. He had to-night, and for the hundredth time, heard some gentlemen opposite deploring, that the conservatives had been excluded from the government, not on account of financial matters only, but from many other causes; and they had said, that if the conservatives had remained in office, the interests of the country would have been much better managed. To-night had the hon. member for Kilkenny declared, that he had no doubt if Lord Aberdeen had continued in office, there would have been no insurrection in Canada. There was a corollary which might be deduced from this, which was, that nothing could have been more factious and unprincipled than the opposition which had effected his being thrown out. "See," says the hon. gentleman, "the enclosure in Lord Aberdeen's despatch; that will show that there was every disposition on the part of the government to make any concessions that might be consistent with the integrity and honour of the British empire." If, then, Lord Aberdeen had remained in office, this question would never have been brought forward. Was it not wrong, therefore, that his lordship should have been excluded from office, and would it not be just, since his policy had been approved of, to give him another trial? It was unwise to apply the principle of separation with respect to the Canadas, because there had been at Richelieu and St. Denis some slight insurrection. The hon. member for Kilkenny (Mr. Hume) said at once, "Shake them off, for their connection henceforth will be grievous and burdensome;" but he said, "No! try first the counsels, which you admitted might, if they had been carried out, have prevented these disturbances." The hon. gentleman could not deny this admission, for he had read an extract from Lord Aberdeen's minute, in which his lordship had referred to the grievances complained of in Canada, and had pointed out means which he thought might redress them; and the hon. gentleman's conclusion was, that had such principles predominated over this question it might have been settled, not indeed by a hostile course, but by one that would have conciliated and satisfied the Canadians. There might be some who said that the hon. member for Kilkenny had been indiscreet—that he did not see the force of his own admissions; but the hon. member for London also shared in his condolence. He had also one bright example—one great exception—to adduce, for he lamented that Sir George Murray had not remained in office; and, moreover, that Sir James Kempt had not continued governor. "If," said the hon. gentleman, "Sir George Murray had remained in the colonial department, and if the principles he had expressed had been allowed to predominate, the financial question in respect to these colonies would have been settled." But what was the question to-day? Was it not one of finance? It was one of feeling, but it was also one of finance. The hon. member for Kilkenny, then, deplored the exclusion of Lord Aberdeen from office, because the course he proposed would have conciliated the Canadians, and the hon. member for London deplored the exclusion of Sir G. Murray, because the policy he adopted would have removed all their financial grievances. This, said the right hon. baronet, surely afforded collateral proof, first, of a most factious combination to drive honest and well-intentioned ministers, as we were, from power,—and, secondly, although unwise men may have succeeded us, whose policy has increased those disturbances, that there had been legitimate hope of settling this question by mild and conciliatory measures. But even supposing the principle of the hon. gentleman to be applied to a separate dependence, such as Jamaica, he must, nevertheless, deny its application. Was this great country prepared to say, on the first manifestation of any rebellious feeling, "Separate from us, and establish a government for yourselves," instead of re-calling them to their duty? He thought not; and that the application of this principle was perfectly inadmissible. But if it applied to so distant an island as Jamaica, it would apply also to any one that was nearer, even to those that were most contiguous to the country. Suppose, for instance, the people of the Isle of Wight should fall out, and say that they had a right to be independent; that the rules of this philosophic argument were made for small as well as large communities; and that they desired to try the system, in order that they might be relieved from the heavy taxes at present imposed on them; and they might say, that they could show many equally small Italian states which were well governed, and were prosperous, and that the channel being between them and the mother country, there was no reason why they should not be equally so, or should not constitute themselves, like the Canadians, a small republic, with laws and institutions of their own. What would the hon. member say to that? His argument would apply there if it applied at all. But then, the hon. gentleman, seeing that the Isle of Wight might become attached to France, might find it convenient to say, "No, you are essential to our security, from your being contiguous to Portsmouth, and we cannot permit you to be separate;" but if the principle was good in one case, it would apply to all. In considering the case of Canada, however, it must be inquired, what would be the effect on the interests of those colonies in its immediate neighbourhood? If it could be foreseen, that on the Canadas becoming independent they would be unable to stand against the United States, and on the first bond fide quarrel with them might fall to them, and be annexed to their other territories, and our own British American colonies should thus be separated from each other, we should still be bound by the obligation owed, not only to them, but to other parts of the British empire, to consult their interests. Suppose, now, that Lower Canada was declared independent, what would become of the navigation of the river St. Lawrence, that great outlet of the commerce of Upper Canada? Or, again, suppose the inhabitants of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, or Prince Edward's Island, were to say, "We made a settlement here on the faith of Canada's remaining connected with the British empire. You gained it by brilliant conquest, and a treaty of peace was signed, that has now existed upwards of seventy years, and you instituted a form of government there with the best intentions for the advancement of the country; but, although that government has not been successful, we must object to the sacrifice of our own interests by your permitting the independence of a state in the North American provinces, and thus stopping up our medium of intercourse with Upper Canada." Surely these complaints would be reasonable, and surely these colonies were entitled to have a voice in the matter. Unless, by the strongest circumstances, England was compelled to give up Canada, it ought never to permit that country to establish itself as an independent state; and if they should permit that to be done, what answer could be made to the complaints of the other colonies, which would be placed in a subordinate position by the very act of the government by which they should be protected. He therefore said, that the case of Canada was not a simple abstract question; it was one which could not be considered separately from the question regarding the other colonies of North America. The situation of Canada, and the physical condition of the other colonies of this country, in North America, must be considered together. That House and the government must only look at Canada as an independent state, when the situation of the other colonies in America could be regarded as independent states. These were prepared, however, to perform all their duties to this country, as colonies, and therefore it would be the grossest folly on the part of England to allow the connection to be lightly broken. He repeated, then, that the question of the separation or independence of Lower Canada could only be considered at the same time with the navigation of the St. Lawrence, the peculiar circumstances of the other colonies in America, and their neighbourhood to the United States. Therefore, as regarded the honour of the British Crown, the interests of the other British colonies, the well-being of the British settlers in the upper province, and the interest of Great Britain elsewhere, they ought not to let this revolt be triumphant, or suffer the flag of Great Britain to be lowered to the partisans of Mr. Papineau. At the same time that he should give his cordial consent to the address proposed by the noble lord, he did not mean thereby to apply any thing like approbation of the course pursued by her Majesty's government. He should give unhesitatingly his cordial support to the address in the first place, and it was for the essential reason, because this country had acted liberally and justly towards Canada. It was impossible to look at the correspondence on the table—he meant the whole series of correspondence—without coming to the conclusion that Canada had occasionally just grounds of complaint. But he would ask, how could this country maintain its authority and dominion, even at home, if at the first suggestion of a grievance revolt was to take place, and the people were to resort to arms? He did not deny that when this country was engaged in war with foreign powers, that domestic affairs were neglected, and that the Canadians had just grounds of complaint; but of late years the affairs of Canada had been regarded as matters of essential importance, and he had never known an instance in which a mother country had manifested a greater desire to do justice to a colony, than was exhibited in the course that had been pursued towards Canada. In a passage of the address of the assembly of Lower Canada, which was referred to by the noble lord, it was stated, that the report of the committee of that House, of the year 1828, and the recommendations embodied in it, furnished imperishable evidence of the liberality of this country. But he begged the House to recollect, that Lord Aberdeen not only acted upon the recommendations of the committee of 1828, but went beyond those recommendations in the course he pursued; and in every case in which the recommendations of the committee were not acted upon, the delay arose, not from the government at home, but from the Canadians themselves. There was an end, then, to the assertion, that they were not disposed to attend to the affairs of Canada. At the same time he was prepared to admit, that the habits of the people of that country, and their feelings and prejudices, were not the same that existed at home, and that, therefore, allowances should be made for their conduct. While he admitted this, he repeated, he was convinced of the justice of the course pursued, and of the folly of proceeding, on any allegations of grievance which could at least be found in these papers, to such an extent as to revolt against the authority of the Crown, and to organize an armed force against the civil and military authorities in the colony. He was convinced, that if the authority of the Crown was to be maintained in Canada, or at home, this revolt must be suppressed; and he should, therefore, give his cordial support to the address, and he should support measures at any hazard to carry it into effect. But he did not by this mean the House to imply that he placed confidence in the Queen's government, or that he meant to approve of their conduct, or was satisfied at the course which they had pursued. But for what the noble lord had said, he should have been content to pass over this part of the subject; but the noble lord, in the course of his speech, had challenged a reference to these documents for approbation of the conduct of the government. He was bound to say, on reading them, that measures of precaution had been neglected previously to the revolt. But before he did so, he might be recommended to look at the papers on the table, and see whether the authorities in Canada complained of any want of military force there. He did not know with whom the blame rested; but after passing the resolutions last year having reference to Canada, and after the excitement which might naturally be expected to follow on their adoption, surely somebody in authority at home, or in Canada, might have suspected that some such result would have followed as the revolt. Could any thing have been more delusive than the hope, that a feeling of satisfaction and quiet could arise from the passing these resolutions? Did the government imagine that it could pass these resolutions, declaring that the British legislature could not trust the House of Assembly of Lower Canada with the management of the funds of that colony, although they did not follow up their resolutions by passing a bill, without producing angry and excited feelings? For his own part, he firmly believed that a bill on this subject might have been passed last year. Any delay was prejudicial; for the result, as might have been expected, was, that the Canadians felt assured that the government at home was afraid to enforce them. There was not the slightest prospect that any delay in passing the bill, founded on these resolutions, would conciliate the Canadians to us. On the contrary, immediately after passing the resolutions, the government might have expected some such result as an insurrection. The same course was pursued when the resolutions respecting imposing a stamp duty in our former American colonies passed that House. It was then said, that an objectionable mode of proceeding would be avoided, by passing the resolutions, and postponing the bill to carry them into effect to the following session. The same result then followed as now; for by calling in question the authority of the local assembly, an insurrection was excited against the mother country. He contended that the government ought to have been fully prepared to expect, that the feeling of dissatisfaction that prevailed in Canada would be greatly increased by passing these resolutions. In addition to this, to whom did they look for support? Why, to another party, who were also dissatisfied with the treatment they had experienced. He knew this, from the picture of the country drawn by one of the friends of her Majesty's Government. This picture was drawn so lately as the 12th of October, and the writer stated—"Some of the immediate fruits of the system now in operation, which, if not put down, must lead to the worst consequences, are to be seen in the apathy and inaction of such of the magistracy and persons of property who had not joined the revolutionary party—in the extreme difficulty of obtaining accurate and available information of what is passing; and, judging from recent events, in the little probability, even if evidence of sufficient weight could be procured to arraign the offenders, of a jury taken from the district of Montreal finding bills and convicting on them."

Again, in another part of this document it is stated: "It is proper that I should represent to you the inadequacy of the powers at the disposal of the local government, for meeting the difficulties that surround it. The law fails to afford its support; the civil authorities become therefore impotent; the habeas corpus act cannot be suspended. The clergy, though well-disposed and loyal, are reluctant to come forward; any further appeal to the present parliament would not only be inexpedient and useless, but positively injurious; and a dissolution offers no prospect of a more reasonable House of Assembly, nor any hope that the new House, which would be composed of a majority of the old members, would recede in any particular from the demands so pertinaciously insisted on by the present body. Indeed, a dissolution, if decided on at all, should not at any rate be resorted to, before the whole of the measures and arrangements you now have in contemplation respecting this province, shall have passed into law and be perfected. In such circumstances, and seeing that the imperial parliament has solemnly and unequivocally stated that it will not accede to the assembly's demands, I am forced, however reluctantly, to come to the conclusion, that the only practical course now open for conducting the affairs of this province, with any benefit to the inhabitants generally, is at once formally to suspend the present constitution, which both parties unite in confessing cannot now be worked, and which has in fact for the last twelve months been virtually suspended; to increase the military force, and to strengthen the hands of the executive, now almost impotent for any good or useful purpose."

Such was the lamentable state of this colony, in which for a period the loyal inhabitants had been discouraged by the authorities. They now, however, passed for and were recognized as loyal men; but at one time they were taunted with being Orangemen and Tories, and were called upon to come forward and supply the place of the troops which ought to have been, but which had not been, sent out to Canada. He should refer once more to the document before him, to show the treatment to which the loyal inhabitants of Canada had been exposed:—"The mode of proceeding adopted for keeping up and increasing this feeling is, by parading nightly, in the town of Montreal, large and organized bands of men, who, however, have as yet proceeded to no acts of violence or breaches of the peace; by inflammatory speeches at meetings; by seditious publications and resolutions of the central committees; by placing (in the most disturbed of the rural parishes) those who are loyal, and hold opposite political opinions, under a species of excommunication, and keeping them in dread of nocturnal injuries to their property; by burning in effigy those in higher stations, and by subjecting them to a kind of annoyance called a charivari, which is the assembling of a crowd before their doors, for the purpose of alarming them and their families at night, with uncouth noises, hisses, threats, and other manifestations of popular displeasure. Sir John Colborne, the Hon. Mr. Debartzch, and others, have been exposed to this kind of outrage, which in a recent instance, at St. Denis, in the county of Richelieu, was unhappily attended with loss of life and property."

This, then, was the way in which the loyal inhabitants of Canada had been discouraged, and who ought not to have been left, after the resolutions had passed, without powerful military support and co-operation. The noble lord might ask whether a military force had been required by the authorities in the colony. On that subject Lord Glenelg, in a dispatch sent out to Lord Gosford, in reply to the request of the noble lord that two regiments should be dispatched to Canada, said, that the doing so would be attended with greater inconvenience than any advantage that could arise from their presence. It was evident, however, that this was not Lord Gosford's opinion; for he said, so far from the presence of an additional military force there being attended with inconvenience, that the arrival of a regiment in Canada from New Brunswick had been attended with the greatest possible advantage. It was not the opinion of Sir John Colborne; for in one of the papers laid on the table that night, that gallant officer stated that the troops which he had sent for had not arrived, in consequence of the late period of the year, although three expresses had been sent to hasten their march. It was also generally understood that the militia could not be called upon to act, unless in case of war with the United States. It appeared, then, that there had been a complete want of foresight, either on the part of the home or the colonial authorities, to pass resolutions influencing, as those of last year did, the state of Canada, and thus defying the power of the House of Assembly, and leaving the loyal inhabitants without adequate military support, and thus leaving to the machinations of the disaffected, an innocent and rural population, who were not of themselves disposed to revolt. Some might assert that they took a more enlarged view of the subject, and that no great evil would result from the revolt. He did not agree in this, although he believed that the insurrection had arisen from certain disaffected persons acting upon a naturally unsuspecting and quiet population: and he trusted that an end would soon be put to this insurrection; but it was the duty of the government to have prepared such a military force in the colony as to have discouraged the leaders from exciting the people to revolt. The information, however, as to the extent of the insurrection, as communicated by Lord Gosford, was by no means satisfactory or conclusive; for in one dispatch he stated, that the feelings of disaffection extended to so few that no alarm need be entertained; and yet, in one dated only in the next week, he said, that the communications with the troops called upon to act in the disturbed districts, and to put down this sudden and extensively-combined revolt, had been completely interrupted by the armed peasantry assembled on the line of march, and that the Queen's troops could not march without having an enemy on their flank and rear. After such evidence, would any one presume to tell him that blame did not rest somewhere? He agreed with an observation that fell from the hon. member for Kilkenny, who stated that blame rested with those who had drawn an innocent and harmless people into that which he believed to be a hopeless insurrection. Some palliation might by possibility be offered in a case where there was a reasonable prospect of success; but when those who excited the present insurrection saw what were the feelings of the British inhabitants of Canada, how great was the loyal attachment of the British race in that country, and how general was the feeling of loyalty in Upper Canada, which the hon. gentleman, however, had repeatedly said was disaffected—when the attempt at insurrection had been at once suppressed without the presence of any soldiers, all of whom had been sent to Lower Canada—what could they plead who, he must say, had manifested such ignorance of their prospects of success, when they involved an innocent population in such an insurrection as that of Canada? When he heard the hon. gentleman make such observations as had fallen from him, he happened to have his eye on the following passage from the report of the committee of the House of Assembly in Upper Canada:—"It appears, from letters of Mr. Hume, addressed to some of the ministers of the Crown, that he is desirous of representing himself as the agent, or, at all events, as being authorised to express the sentiments of the people of Upper Canada on the subject of their political feelings, and the public affairs of the province. Your committee are of opinion, that the honour and character of his Majesty's loyal subjects in this province require, that it should be promptly and emphatically declared by their representatives, that Mr. Hume is among the last men they would select to advocate their cause, or represent their feelings or wishes, to the British nation. The people of Upper Canada recollect that, in the year 1834, Mr. Joseph Hume addressed a letter to a correspondent of his, in this country, which, referring to his correspondent's recent expulsion from, and re-election to, the Assembly, contained the following treasonable language and advice:—"Your triumphant election of the 16th, and ejection from the Assembly of the 17th, must hasten that crisis which is fast approaching in the affairs of the Canadas, and which will terminate in independence and freedom from the baneful domination of the mother country, and the tyrannical conduct of a small and despicable faction in the colony. The proceedings between 1772 and 1782, in America, ought not to be forgotten; and to the honour of the Americans, and for the interest of the civilised world, let their conduct and result be ever in view."

This was the language which, in 1834, the hon. member addressed to the people of Upper Canada; but how grossly the hon. gentleman miscalculated the feelings of loyalty of the inhabitants of the upper province, was manifested in the following passage from the same document:—"And when it is remembered with what indignation and disgust the publication of this detestable communication was received throughout the province, his Majesty's loyal subjects cannot but regard with abhorrence the idea, that the person who had thus insulted them should be supposed by their sovereign and their fellow-subjects in the United Kingdom to be their accredited agent, that they held any communication with him, or that he was in any way clothed with authority to speak their sentiments or represent their views on any subject, public or private."

But, supposing that the British legislature were to apply to Lower Canada the principle laid down by the hon. member for the city of London—supposing it right that the connection between this country and Lower Canada should be dissolved—still the indignity in the address of the hon. member for Kilkenny would place it in the power of the colonists justly to have reproached this country with desertion and pusillanimity. And who was the correspondent of the hon. gentleman, to whom he uttered and addressed this inflammatory language, advising him ever to bear in mind—ever to keep in his view—the struggles of the provinces of the United States? Why, it was that Mr. Mackenzie, who had made an ineffectual attempt upon the loyalty of the province of Upper Canada during the absence of the troops! Mr. Mackenzie might now say to the British legislature:—"I acted on the authority of the hon. member for Kilkenny; visit not, therefore, this delusion and its consequences upon me, the mere agent and instrument of the hon. gentleman, but rather visit it upon your own member, to whom I gave credit as being then a member for a metropolitan county, and, therefore, necessarily intimately acquainted with British feelings and views. I have been acting upon the advice received from the representative of Middlesex; and in apportioning the punishment to which I am subject for my misdeeds, remember his own emphatic declaration, that the real responsibility for the revolt rests not on the humble deluded agent, but on those who gave advice and uttered suggestions disparaging to the authority of their own country, and destructive of the integrity of the British empire."

Address agreed to.

In the debate on Lord John Russell's motion for leave to bring in a bill, to provide for the temporary government of Canada—

SIR ROBERT PEEL observed, that as the hon. member for Kilkenny (Mr. Hume) intended to divide the House on the principle of the bill, he should at once state that he should vote for its introduction; but by voting for leave to bring in the bill, he did not thereby mean to imply that he gave his unqualified approval to the measure, the details of which had that night been explained to them by the noble lord. As the constitution of Lower Canada was at present practically suspended, it might be necessary to have some measure similar to a portion of the bill then proposed. Therefore, to so much of the bill as suspended the constitution of Lower Canada, and made provision for the temporary administration of the government of that province, he should not object; but he confessed he did not understand the other provisions of the bill as they were explained by the noble lord. He hoped that hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House, whatever might be their opinions on the subject, would consider well the provisions of that part of the measure which called together the assembly, which the noble lord described as a convention of estates of Upper and Lower Canada, for the purpose of providing for the future government of those provinces. He doubted the policy of the course involved in this proceeding, above all in the lower province, where men's minds were inflamed by what had so recently passed before them. He doubted the policy of discussing the provisions of a future constitution for the colony, when great excitement might naturally be expected to prevail. If they were anxious to bring about a union between the two provinces, he doubted whether it would be expedient or practicable to frame a satisfactory measure for the purpose at the present moment; he doubted whether the feelings of the different parties in both provinces were not in such a state of exasperation, that it would be inexpedient and almost impossible at present to bring about such a result. The noble lord, as a part of his plan for effecting this purpose, appeared to propose a convention of estates, having legislative authority, and being elected in a certain manner. As he understood this body, it was to be composed of three members of the legislative council of Upper Canada, and three members of the legislative council of Lower Canada; these were to meet together, and they were to be aided by a certain number of persons having a representative character. They had a representative assembly in the upper province, and there might be no great difficulty in getting proper persons chosen there. He would not then say whether such a course was wise or expedient; but, while they suspended the existing constitution of Lower Canada, how could they get representatives from the assembly of that province to attend the convention? Did the noble lord mean to give to the governor of the province for the time being, the power of nominating persons to attend in that capacity? Then how were they to be nominated when the constitution was suspended? The noble lord proposed to suspend the constitution, and therefore representation, both legal and actual, would be put an end to; how then could the representatives be convened at the moment to choose persons to attend the convention, when they were about to suspend the constitution of Lower Canada? He confessed he did not understand from the noble lord what course was to be pursued; but any measure giving a form of representation, while the constitution was suspended and the province was under martial law, must be of a very anomalous character. Many parts of the measure proposed by the government would require much consideration on the part of the House; and he hoped that hon. gentleman of all parties would devote their serious attention to the subject. They should remember that this measure was nothing more nor less than an act of despotism, justifiable, in his opinion, from the steps that had been taken by parties in Lower Canada, but still an act of despotism, and it was useless and unwise to conceal the character of the measure. What he objected to in it was, that at the present moment they pretended to conciliate, by saying that a certain form of representation should exist for the purpose of forming a body to frame the future constitution. He thought that it would be much better to confine themselves to the necessity of the case, and suspend the constitution for a time, and not at present take steps to frame a new constitution. The proper course would have been, that the representatives of England should declare that they would make every inquiry, or direct inquiry to be made, so as to obtain adequate information for future legislation on the subject. He trusted that hon. gentlemen would not be led to mistake the nature of the measure. The noble lord, in introducing the bill, said that there should be an assembly chosen, which he would call the convention of estates, and that it should be composed of persons representing both provinces, and that this body should thus speak the sentiments and give expression to the feelings of the people of both colonies, and that they should assemble to draw up certain measures for the future government of those countries. The question was, when they were about to suspend the representative constitution of Canada, how these representatives to this assembly were to be chosen? Did the noble lord mean that the governor of the province should name the districts and the class of persons who were to choose these representatives? Did the noble lord mean to name the persons who were qualified to be chosen as representatives, or those whom he could accept if they were elected? Or did the noble lord mean that the governor of the province should at once name the persons who were to represent the province? If it was in any of these classes it was a mockery of representation. It would be infinitely better to guard against such a dangerous act as a precedent, clothed as it was in a character of liberality which it did not possess. If the bill contained provisions of this nature, he could not help feeling that they were called upon to come to a premature consideration of matters of this nature. He was most anxious to take steps to make provision for the future good government, and for granting a free and adequate constitution to Lower Canada, when the proper time came; but he believed that nothing could be more impolitic, or give rise to greater disasters, than the premature consideration of matters of this nature. He objected to this part of the measure on this ground, and also on the other ground, that the bill proposed that which was a mockery of representation, when the constitution was suspended and the representative bodies in the colony were no longer in existence. As the noble lord intended to move that the House should adjourn from that night until Monday, he would take that opportunity of asking the noble lord, the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, whether it was his intention to make any communication to Parliament as to the negotiations respecting the line between the state of Maine and the province of New Brunswick? Very ample communications on the subject had been made by the government of the United States to the American Congress, and he thought that similar information should be furnished to the House of Commons as to the state of this important question.

Bill brought in, and read a first time.

JANUARY 22, 1838.

The Order of the Day for the second reading of the Lower Canada Government Bill was read, and the Bill read a second time. On the question that the Bill be committed, Mr. Hume moved that the Bill be committed that day six months.

A long discussion ensued, and the House adjourned.

JANUARY 23, 1838.

The Order of the Day for resuming the adjourned debate on this Bill having been read,—

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, he gave on a former night his cordial and unhesitating support to the address brought in by the government, pledging the House to the support of her Majesty, in her attempt (he hoped a successful one) to put an end to the revolt in the colony of Canada. He was now called upon by her Majesty's government to take into consideration a measure of totally a different nature—a measure for the suspension of the constitution and privileges of the people of an important province. It was his intention also, after mature reflection, but yet with great reluctance, to give his support to the proposition then under the consideration of the House. He gave his support to that proposition, because he found no safe alternative to which he could resort. If he had any doubt of the justifiableness of the proceeding—if he saw any other practicable mode of arranging the differences which had unhappily arisen between this country and her colonies—he should be induced to withhold his assent from the present bill. But he considered that it was justified, in point of equity, by the conduct of the House of Assembly of Lower Canada, and he saw in point of prudence no other course, which, under the circumstances, could be pursued. He should deeply regret if their justification before the House and the world rested on a minute inquiry into the acts and proceedings of the Canadian House of Assembly. It rested on the simple, plain, and intelligible ground on which he had given his support to the resolutions of last year. Five years had now elapsed since the popular Assembly of Lower Canada had wholly refused to make any provision for the carrying on of the civil government of the colony. Five years had now elapsed since the judges, the civil officers, and public functionaries, had been left without that provision, for the affording of which the faith and honour of the government was pledged. What course, then, was to be pursued? It was impossible to leave the public servants of the state, the judges of the land, and the other civil officers of the colony, without those salaries and provisions, the payment of which was required, not for English purposes, but for the due administration of the colony itself, upon which its success and prosperity depended. It was impossible that they could be left destitute for an indefinite period of time. Were the people of this country to undertake the charge of their support? Or upon whom was it to be thrown? The duty could only rest upon those who were interested in the performance of the local administrative functions. If the stopping of the supplies had been a fair and ordinary exercise of a legitimate and undoubted power, and was intended only to assert a principle, instead of being attended with such mischievous and fatal results, he would not, on that ground, support a bill for the annihilation of the constitution. The express ground, however, upon which they put it was this—"We will not pay the public officers. We will suspend the machinery of government unless you consent to bear the charge of your civil administration, and to make fundamental changes in the constitution." It appeared to him (Sir Robert Peel) to be an unjust and unfair condition to attach to the payment of the public functionaries. To refuse to bear the expense of its own administration unless the mother country would consent to make fundamental changes in the constitution, was a condition which would seem to justify the mother country, as the supreme arbiter of such rights and demands, to resort to violent measures for their repression. That is the simple intelligible ground on which to justify our interference. In point of public policy, was there any other course? The law recognized the assembly and its powers; but a revolt had taken place. He did not think that a revolt justified a suspension of the constitution; that was not the necessary punishment of a revolt. We should have recourse to the execution of the laws, the employment of a military force, the apprehension and trial of the persons guilty of the revolt, and their punishment, if convicted. These were the legitimate steps to be taken for the punishment of a revolt; the suspension of a constitution was not the necessary legal punishment. But if the revolt had been aggravated by the assembly—if it had grown out of the assembly—that might create a necessity for suspending the constitution. There was only one of four courses to be pursued—there could be no other. They might call together the colonial assembly, and ask the counsel of that body. Would any one advise that? In the present state of public feeling in the colony, would any one advise that the present assembly should be called together, considering that a number of the members of the assembly were implicated in the affair (he did not say whether they were guilty or not); in these circumstances, would any one advise that the present assembly should be called? Would they, having called that assembly, bona fide abide by its recommendation? Would they merely call it for the purpose of offering an impediment to public affairs, and then dismiss it with contumely? Would they, then, and that was the next course, advise a dissolution of the assembly in the present state of the colony? He thought no prudent man could advise such a course. Would they, then, advise the course of leaving the present assembly in the possession of all its powers—of all the authority which it possesses, but suspend its functions, and not call it together, taking away by law the power that renders it necessary to be called together once a year? In such a case it would be necessary to obtain a power to carry on the local affairs of the colony, and also to give a power to the executive government to control the disposal of the public money, which would otherwise have to be voted by the House of Assembly. Now, it appeared to him that this was the most objectionable course that the House could pursue. It would be the greatest insult that could be cast upon the representative principle. It would be, in effect, to leave the assembly emasculated—possessing the mere shadow of its representative authority, whilst they annihilated its representative functions, and gave to a public officer the power to put his hand into the public purse, and to direct the expenditure of the public money. On consideration of these different courses which it would be competent to pursue, he had come to a conclusion adverse to the adoption of any of them. It appeared to him that, great as is the difficulty that might arise from the proceedings they were about to pursue, yet, upon the whole, considering the present state of public feeling in Canada—considering the present agitated state of the public mind in that province—considering the disposition which had been manifested on the part of the assembly, that it was not prepared to co-operate with the parliament of England in carrying on the local government of the colony, unless upon conditions to which the parliament declared it could not submit, he had reluctantly come to the conclusion that there was no other course which they could safely pursue, unless suspending the constitution of Lower Canada for a limited time, and making a temporary provision for such period for carrying on the government of that country. On this ground he gave his consent to the main and principal object of the bill, namely, the suspension of the constitution for a limited period, and the devolution of sufficient powers to the governor appointed by the Crown for the purpose of carrying on the affairs of Lower Canada. He omitted altogether from his consideration the person appointed by the Crown. He treated any one appointed by the Crown with that respect which he was bound to yield to the choice of the Crown, and with that respect which was due to the situation which the individual held. He would not allow any other than great public considerations to influence his opinion. He would withhold no power from the individual so appointed on account of any difference of political opinion; but whilst he was prepared to concede all just and necessary power, he would never consent to confer one iota of power beyond what appeared to be required by the nature and the exigency of the case. It would not become them, in the discussion of these important concerns, to be led away, by any consideration of the personal character of any individual, from the calm and deliberate view of the case, or to allow any such consideration to reconcile them to the extension of powers the most important that ever were confided by parliament. Such considerations would ill befit the grave nature of such an occasion. In a matter of great emergency, personal character and the liberal opinions of a chief governor sunk into insignificance, compared to the great constitutional question at issue. Whatever powers were necessary for the effectual execution of the bill, he willingly conceded to the governor whom the crown appointed to execute its functions. He would enable Lord Durham, by the advice of certain councillors, to make such orders as were necessary for the local government of the country; but then he would not consent that Lord Durham should, with the advice of councillors so appointed by him, have any powers beyond what the temporary exigency of the case required. To that part of the bill which gave any such powers he should offer his most decided opposition. He objected to the giving any such powers to Lord Durham on the ground that it was an unnecessary and gratuitous violation of the constitution. If they asked him to violate a constitutional principle, and showed him a great necessity for it, then he might consent to it; for he had a safeguard, in the necessity, that it could not be drawn into a precedent; but where, under the pretence of mitigating the severity of the act, they, either in the preamble or the provisions, proposed other regulations which no necessity called for, and which touched upon constitutional principles, for which there was not a necessity, and which were therefore unjustifiable, then, he for one, was determined to expose the fallacy on which they rested their aggressions, and to lay bare the delusion on which the argument was grounded, and he was resolved to show that what they called a liberal measure, was, in reality, despotic and unconstitutional. He claimed from the House of Commons, he claimed from men of all parties who adhered to constitutional principles, support in opposing this portion of the bill, as not being justified by any paramount necessity, or by the exigency of the case. He should propose to omit from this bill that part of it which might be called a recognition by that House, that a certain assembly to be called by Lord Durham should have a representative character and capacity. He hoped that members would not allow themselves to be led away by plausible and specious arguments, grounded on a false assumption that he was endeavouring to render more despotic the powers given to Lord Durham. He hoped they would not be deluded by assertions of this nature until they had ascertained the intrinsic weight that belonged to them. Here was a bill suspending the constitution in Lower Canada. It annihilated the House of Assembly in that province, which represented the feelings of the people. Should he then call indirectly, as it was done in the preamble of this bill, any assembly summoned by the governor—an assembly representing the interests and opinions of her Majesty's subjects? Were hon. gentlemen thus to give, by their enactment, representatives to Canada? While they suspended the constitution, were they to have persons, so collected, assume the character of representatives of the interests and opinions of her Majesty's subjects? After suspending the assembly, and also after suspending every part of the act which gave a constituency to that assembly, were they to delegate to the governor of the province the return of members to that assembly? Were they to do this after they had suspended every constitutional right? Did they mean that the governor should call any such assembly which they could be disposed to acknowledge as representatives? Were they, the representatives of the people of England, to acknowledge any such assembly, disconnected as it must be from the people, representing the interests and feelings of any class of her Majesty's subjects? Oh! if the King of the Low Countries had done this—if he had declared that he felt it necessary to abolish representation in Belgium; that he meant to suspend the representative system there for two years; that all parts of it were in revolt; that in Belgium the constitution should be suspended; and then said that, in the exercise of his prerogative, he was determined upon carving Belgium into certain divisions, so that he must be sure of having those who were distinguished for their fidelity to him; and having established tranquillity, that he would call certain persons to advise him as to the interests of Belgium and Holland, and that they must be regarded in the nature of representatives for Belgium! If the King of the Netherlands had done this, their indignation would have overflowed! But what should we think of that hypocrite who, whilst he took away the representatives which the country already possessed, pretended that he would find better ones in their stead? But if all this was true as respected Lower Canada, what should be said of Upper Canada? Had the inhabitants of the upper province done any thing to entitle them to be deprived of their constitutional rights? Was there any thing in Upper Canada which rendered the existence of a legislative assembly dangerous;—Upper Canada, of whose loyalty Sir Francis Head was so assured, that he ventured upon that, as he thought rash experiment, of removing every soldier from within its limits? That experiment had succeeded, however, and the upper province of Canada had, indeed, proved itself to be loyal and faithful in its allegiance to its sovereign. And was it to be said that a mere exercise of the prerogative of the Crown was to suspend the legislative assembly of Upper Canada? He entreated the House of Commons not to allow its estimation of the high character of the noble lord to whom these high matters were to be intrusted, to reconcile it to an unconstitutional principle, which, applied to the province of Upper Canada, was as indefensible as any thing ever propounded by any despot in Europe. Last year he had been called upon to agree to certain resolutions, proposed by the noble lord opposite, in reference to the Canadas, and had agreed to them. The last of those resolutions was as follows:—"That great inconvenience has been sustained by his Majesty's subjects inhabiting the provinces of Lower Canada and Upper Canada, from the want of some adequate means for regulating and adjusting questions respecting the trade and commerce of the said provinces, and divers other questions wherein the said provinces have a common interest; and it is expedient, that the legislature of the said provinces respectively, be authorised to make provision for the just regulation and adjustment of such their common interests." At the instigation of the ministers he had voted that resolution, declaring that the persons best calculated to discuss not only the local interests of the respective provinces, but their mutual relations, were their own legislative assemblies; and, if he stood alone, he would never recognise any act giving the Crown a prerogative to suspend the constitutional rights and functions of the Canadians. He objected to it as a most dangerous precedent thus to call upon parliament to recognise such a prerogative, not by any direct enactments, but by a mere allusion in a preamble, and thus creating a confusion of prerogative and parliamentary enactments, to which no limits could be with precision set. What necessity, also, was there for it on the present occasion? If the government of her Majesty required new and extraordinary powers, let them be asked from Parliament, and, if necessary, they would be granted; if, on the other hand, the prerogative of the Crown was already sufficient for what they proposed to do, let them at once advise the Crown to exercise that prerogative in such a manner as the case required. But in the existence of any doubt upon this point, let them not, by any tortuous implication in the preamble to a bill, seek to obtain a parliamentary sanction for their proceedings. Let them consider to what such a course would lead. The existence of a prerogative in the Crown, for the exercise of which the ministers of the Crown were responsible, was assumed. Let her Majesty's ministers take upon themselves the responsibility of exercising it, and advise the Crown accordingly. Let them do this if they pleased; but he, for one, in the absence of all information on the point, and with the doubts upon his mind which he really entertained upon the subject, would not consent to be dragged into a participation in that responsibility which properly belonged only to the ministers of the Crown. He was prepared to have his motives misconstrued even upon this head. He knew it would probably be said of him that he wanted to prevent the Canadians from obtaining the advantages of a free constitution. He wanted no such thing. He believed that the subject was one which required mature consideration; but he did not believe that it would be possible to govern the Canadian provinces successfully, either with regard to their own interests or those of the mother country, or to the permanent connection between the two, without the establishment of a free constitution. Then, again, there was another point in this bill to which he must give his most decided opposition, namely, the power proposed to be vested in the Crown to repeal the Act by advice of the Privy Council. Of all the events which had taken place within his memory, embracing as it did a period of history in which constitutional principles had been more discussed than in any other of similar duration, he never recollected a proposition more unconstitutional and unjustifiable than this. If her Majesty's ministers called upon him to-day to pass this bill into a law, he would never recognise a power in the Crown to repeal that enactment. If a constitutional principle of such magnitude and importance were to be admitted, that an act passed by Parliament could be repealed at pleasure by the Crown, there was no knowing to what it might lead hereafter. Besides, the very clumsy manner in which the whole bill was drawn up, but remarkably so in this clause, showed that the framers of the measure themselves did not very thoroughly understand to what extent they wished the principle to be carried. The marginal abstract professed to give this power to her Majesty in council, "when Parliament was not sitting," but the enacting part of the text omitted this restriction, and gave her Majesty the absolute power to repeal the act at all times, and under all circumstances. For his own part, however, he cared not for the distinction as to whether Parliament were sitting or not, he would never allow the Crown a power to suspend, not merely a few matters of detail in an Act of Parliament, but absolutely and entirely to annihilate that very enactment which had been passed by the three estates of the legislature. No: if Parliament were to be called upon to pass this act, suspending the constitutional rights of the provinces of Canada, at least let it also have the graceful task of restoring those high privileges when the happy occasion for so doing presented itself. Let it not be said that those privileges were forfeited by law and restored by prerogative. To have that said would be an advance in unconstitutional principles, the contemplation of which should make the House pause before they gave their sanction to the first step which might lead to it. There was another point also to which he could not but allude. It was proposed to be enacted that when the governor-general had called together the council, which was to assist him in passing the measures which might be necessary for the adjustment of the affairs of the two provinces, no one in that council but himself, who had just arrived from England, should be allowed the privilege of proposing any such measures for adoption. Now he could not see upon what pretence such a restriction upon the powers of the councillors should be passed. The council was to have the power of making laws, but no one but the governor-general was to propose any. No one could open his lips with the suggestion of any; for if he did so, the measure he suggested would become invalid, if passed. The only man, in short, who was to propose any thing on the subject upon which they had all met to deliberate, was the very one amongst them who, having but just landed from England, might be supposed to be least informed of any on the practical details of these great interests. Now, it appeared to him that if the governor-general had been invested with the power to elect this council and to dismiss it at pleasure, there could be no possible necessity for tying up the hands of the councillors in the way proposed. He would not enter further into these details at present. He had thought it right to give this full notice to the House of the amendments which he intended to propose in this measure, in order respectfully to beg hon. members not to pledge their opinions in favour of these propositions, merely upon the consideration of the feelings of confidence and respect which they might entertain for the noble lord into whose hands these high and peculiar powers were to be reposed. This bill was limited in its application for two years, and he should readily assent to any suggestion which might be adopted for giving the Canadians a restoration of their constitutional rights. All that he objected to was, that the Crown should have the power of suspending absolutely and without limitation the provisions of the most solemn and important act passed in his time. Sir, (continued the right hon. baronet), in the course of the debate, express reference has been made to me by the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Bulwer), in reference to that part of the subject which has occupied a portion of the speech of the right hon. gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer. And I must say, that, giving that right hon. gentleman credit for the acuteness and ability which he is known to possess, and being perfectly satisfied that he introduced to the notice of the House every paper which could support his case, and being aware that he filled the office of Secretary of the Colonies, and must be well versed in its affairs—if the statement which he made be intended as a defence of the government against the charge preferred by my hon. friend, the member for Newark, it was a lamentable failure. The right hon. gentleman says, "We have at least this satisfaction, that the charge preferred against us is not that of precipitation and harshness, of tyranny and severity—the whole charge against us is, that we have pushed to excess the principles of lenity and conciliation." Sir, the hon. gentleman is not at liberty to prefer an indictment against himself. The charge is not, that he and his colleagues have pushed the principles of

ficting in opinion, in one of which it was stated that there was no danger of commotion, and in the other, that the suspension of the constitution might be necessary, and that this discrepancy was met by the right hon. gentleman's argument, that the statements were consistent and distinct, inasmuch as there might be a suspension of the constitution and no apprehension of commotion, what will the right hon. gentleman say, if I be more successful than my hon. friend, and find two contradictory opinions in one sentence which I shall read? Here it is: "As I stated in my former letters, I do not expect any serious commotion; at the same time, when I see so many clever unprincipled engines in action, yielding implicit obedience to the mandates of such a man as Mr. Papineau, it is impossible to set limits to the extent of mischief they construct." Thus it is stated that the noble lord (Gosford) saw no reason to apprehend the suspension of the constitution, or any chance of any commotion, and yet he adds that it is "impossible to set limits to the extent of the mischief they may construct." It appears to me, that there were special and peculiar reasons connected with that province which made the event which has taken place not at all improbable, and called for an energetic course of proceeding in preventing it. What says Lord Gosford? "The jealousy that exists between the two origins is also a powerful instrument in the hands of a convention, or central committee, as before alluded to, and corresponding, as no doubt they do, with various parts of the province. The two extremes are doing incalculable mischief, and must disgust every friend to liberal measures." This being the impression of Lord Gosford, why was not an attempt made to send such a military force as would have prevented the necessity of making blood the boundary line which was to divide the inhabitants of French and English origin. But what has been the consequence? You have been obliged to call out volunteers. Was there ever an instance in which it was so essential that the enforcement of the civil authority should be intrusted to the military force, and in which the government should have abstained until the last moment, and when it became absolutely indispensable, from relying on the suppression of this revolt by the aid of one party so inflamed as it was against the other? The right hon. baronet went on to state, that they had sent out last year resolutions which it was evident would aggravate the excitement in a tenfold degree. Therefore he said, with respect to a military force, they had neutralised their vigour by the proceedings which they took to sustain it; and he must also say, that their conciliation lost much of its grace by the tardiness and delay with which it was displayed. Now, to give a proof under that head. They invited the House to be parties to certain resolutions, ten in number, the most important of which was the eighth; but they did not accompany this demonstration of vigour without some compensation in the shape of promises. The House was invited to accede to two resolutions, one of which stated, that it was inexpedient to make the legislative council elective, but that it was advisable that measures should be adopted for securing to that branch of the legislature a greater degree of confidence; and the other resolution stated that, while it was extremely desirable to improve the composition of the executive council, it would be unwise to submit it to the responsibility demanded by the House of Assembly. Now, would it not have been advisable, when they communicated to the House of Assembly the measures of violence, that they should also have communicated to the House of Assembly the perfection of those measures of grace with which they were to be accompanied? If they were not ready with those measures for the improvement of the council, why not suspend the meeting of the House of Assembly until they were ready? Why leave it to the governor, after he had apprised the House of Assembly that the House of Commons had determined to take their money—why leave it to the governor to make the unsatisfactory communication, that he was sorry to say that he had nothing positive to communicate about the improvement of the legislative or the executive council, but that measures of improvement were under consideration? Would it not have been rational to have postponed making this communication until the governor could lay before the House of Assembly the series of measures of improvement which he had to propose? It would have shown them that the House of Commons, when they consented to measures of necessary violence, was not so irritated as to refuse at the same time measures of redress. When ministers communicated their intention to take the money, they should have also taken into consideration the improvement of the executive council, and they should have made known the names of the men whom they meant to propose. Could they state any valid excuse for not having done so? He had looked through the despatches of Lord Glenelg on this subject, and he found them the worthy echoes of those of Lord Gosford. He found in the series of despatches many declarations, that there was now no time for vacillation, that they must now be vigorous, that there must be no further delay; there were endless demonstrations of this sort, but the only real demonstration of promptitude and vigour was, the acceptance of the resignation of the governor. Talking of resignations, was it true that Sir F. Head had been recalled? Canada was conspicuous for the recall of its governors. Sir J. Colborne had been recalled from Upper Canada, Sir F. Head had been recalled from Upper Canada, Colonel Arthur, who had been recalled from Van Diemen's Land, was to proceed to Canada, and Lord Gosford had been recalled from Lower Canada. It had been said, and certainly with truth, that one of the greatest evils in the administration of the affairs of the colony consisted in the succession of its governors; for the moment they were becoming acquainted with the local interests of the colony they were removed. If this was an objection at all, it applied with quadruple force in the case of our North American provinces. With respect to the executive and legislative councils, they had sent out three commissioners to Canada to make inquiry. They had made their report with reference to the executive council, and they stated the principles upon which various improvements might be made in the council. This was in 1836, and on the 14th of July, 1837, Lord Glenelg stated, that no delay should occur in acting on the report, and that he had no serious doubts respecting the wisdom of the suggestions of the commissioners. If there was no doubt, why not call upon the House of Commons to pledge itself to the improvements last year? Eighteen months had now elapsed since the subject had been brought under consideration, although in July, 1837, Lord Glenelg had no doubt respecting the wisdom of the suggestions contained in the report. And what was the cause assigned? It was the difficulty of getting men to fill the office. For eighteen months there was no doubt about the propriety of the thing; the whole doubt and difficulty was in getting the men. Lord Glenelg, however, said, that it was impossible to acquiesce in any further delay, and what did he do? To prevent mistakes he sent out to the commissioners an extract from their own report. He sent out to Lord Gosford, who was one of the commissioners, an extract from his own report; he told him to act upon the principles therein contained, to seize the first nine men he should meet, and to swear them in as councillors. It seemed to him, that if they wanted to afford a plausible justification for disaffection, the course pursued respecting these councils was well calculated to afford it to men who were not looking for real grievances, but for plausible grounds to make out a case of oppression. Eighteen months they had been in possession of the principle—there was no doubt entertained of the wisdom of the suggestions in the report—they asked the House to concur in measures of severity; but when measures of improvement were mentioned, the answer was, that they intended to propose them, but they were not yet ready. There was repeated mention in the course of the despatches of Lord Glenelg of the great importance of some definitive measures; but this was another instance in which conciliatory measures had been spoiled and prejudiced by delay. He therefore thought that this established his charge, that the government had not acted with lenity and forbearance; but that, in point of fact, a demonstration of timely vigour would have been true lenity and forbearance. He did not complain of the concessions that had been made. He believed, that they afforded an ample proof that in the course they had adopted they had met the justice of the case. He believed that the feeling of the United States, of Europe, and of the world, was, that they had done justice. He believed that the general impression was, as was said by an hon. gentleman, that in no other country in Europe, whether free or despotic, had greater moderation or forbearance been shown than by Great Britain during the continuance of this contest. But this forbearance was neutralised, as far as the conduct of the government could neutralise it, by neglect, delay, and by the want of vigour and precaution; and he must say, that he did think, looking at the papers before the House, that for this outbreak in Canada, and for the state of mind in Canada which had led to this outbreak, for the false reliance that had been placed upon the support from this country, he did think that her Majesty's government were morally and deeply responsible.

The House divided on the motion for going into committee:—Ayes, 262; Noes, 16; Majority 246.

JANUARY 25, 1838.

Lord John Russell proposed that the House should go into committee pro formâ on this Bill.

On the question that the Speaker leave the chair,—

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, that it was his intention, notwithstanding what he had just heard, steadily to adhere to the course which he had on a previous occasion stated his intention to pursue, because he was satisfied of the justice and the reasonableness of the propositions he had made. If he had entertained a doubt upon the subject (which he did not) before the declaration of the right hon. gentleman opposite, (Mr. Ellice), who from personal and local knowledge was well qualified to form an opinion of the interests of Canada and of the real nature of the Canadian question, and who, this night, had made a speech confirming in every respect the impressions which he (Sir R. Peel) had formed of the right hon. gentleman's competence to judge in the matter, that doubt was removed, for the right hon. gentleman had (he would not say it was extracted from him) borne a willing testimony to the reasonableness and justice of his (Sir R. Peel's) propositions. Confirmed, therefore, by the sentiments and opinions expressed by the right hon. gentleman—not that he hesitated or wavered before—it was his intention to adhere to the course he had already stated: he should neither, on the one hand, be tempted to depart from that course which in the present great emergency he believed to be just, for the purpose of conciliating the support of those who entertained political opinions to which he was opposed, nor should he weaken the support promised to the Crown, in order to suppress revolt, by selecting out some point on which men of different opinions might concur; but he would not permit the vague intimation of the noble lord as to the consequences of the success of his views and opinions to prevail on him to depart from his course. On the first night of the present session he had given his support to the address to the Crown, pledging the House to support the Crown in the suppression of revolt and insurrection; that address had been carried by an immense majority, none of those with whom he had the satisfaction to act, refusing their support to that address. Another proposition had since been made by her Majesty's government, requiring the consent of Parliament to a bill, vesting in the hands of the governor-general of Canada great arbitrary authority. The government intimated the name of the governor-general whom they had selected, and his declaration had been, that he should pay all respect to the position of the person chosen by the Crown to administer those functions; that he forgot all political differences with Lord Durham; that he would give to that noble lord every authority necessary for the execution of the trust, that he would give to any man whose political opinions were in close alliance with his own. He had further said, that he would consent to a suspension of the Canadian constitution, but that he did so with great reluctance. Now, nothing could have been easier than for him to have found some reason to withhold his assent to that suspension. Nothing could have been easier than for him to have agreed with hon. members opposite to try the House of Assembly once more for a short time longer; but no. Believing it to be right not to run the risk of calling together the present assembly, he had given his cordial support, and those with whom he acted gave their support (some certainly with doubt and hesitation,) to the great object of this bill, namely, the suspension of the Canadian constitution, and the devolution of sufficient power to the governor-general appointed by her Majesty's ministers for administering the functions of the government and legislation of that colony. Such was the course he and those with whom he acted had pursued. But he would go further and say, without caring for himself, or caring for consequences, he would go into the details of that measure in committee, and he would there propose such amendments as he thought would make the bill more conformable to justice. If he found that the bill gave to the governor-general powers that were unnecessary for the full, proper, and efficient discharge of his duty, he would in that case recommend an entailment of those powers: if, having consented to an act of extreme rigour—namely, the suspension of the free constitution of a populous province—he found in other clauses of the bill an unnecessary violation of constitutional principles, he should withhold his assent, and do his best to induce the House not to sanction it. The principle to which he adhered, and upon which he should act, would be to discourage revolt, to enable the Crown to suppress insurrection, and to make ample provision for the conduct of the government after the constitution was suspended; but he could not agree with the right hon. gentleman opposite (Mr. Ellice), that any public object could be gained by any understanding or compromise between parties, in order to avoid a division. Let those on his side of the House suggest and propose their amendments, and let those amendments be adopted or rejected, according to their justice or reasonableness; but it would not answer either the views of the right hon. gentleman or of himself, that the general assent of the House should be purchased by any compromise, or that he and those who acted with him should have the appearance of acquiescing in that which they believed to be unjust and impolitic, for the purpose of encouraging an impression in Canada, that the House of Commons were united in opinion, when the fact was otherwise. He would tell the noble lord fairly, that his objection to the preamble of the bill was not a mere objection in point of form; he thought it certainly to be most unwise to mix up in the preamble of a bill a recognition by Parliament of any act done under the prerogative of the Crown. He thought it was quite right that the Crown, being satisfied as to the necessity of exercising certain powers, should do so, and then apply to Parliament for its justification. If the law were defective, and that it was impossible to act without the intervention of Parliament, then let application be made in that respect, and if aid was withheld, then let the Crown either retain or relinquish the government under whose advice that application was made; but he certainly did object to the confusion between the prerogative of the Crown and the functions of Parliament, which was implied by the recognition beforehand of a certain act to be done by the Crown. It was a precedent, not only dangerous, but one which might be perverted to the worst purposes, and which might relieve the Crown and its advisers from the responsibility which they ought to take, and thereby lead to confusion between the different branches of the legislature. On that ground he objected to the preamble. He had not proposed to move the simple omission of the words in question, but he should propose the substitution of others, by which he intended to imply, that Canada was not to be governed by despotic authority, and that the only hope to govern the North American provinces was by the intervention of a constitution founded on free representation. But, independent of the objection in point of form, he avowed that he entertained great doubts as to the policy at present proposed; he objected beforehand, and without further information, to give his sanction to the measure as it stood. He had already distinctly said, that he would impose no restriction on the prerogative of the Crown, but, in the absence of information, and in the state of feeling which existed, he did claim for himself and others, that they should not be called upon to sanction any particular instructions which in the exercise of the royal prerogative had been given to the governor-general. If he did give his sanction to those instructions, he should be placed in the situation of a responsible minister of the Crown, and be a participator in the responsibility of the ministry. Did he doubt that it might be right that Lord Durham should collect information from all quarters—did he doubt that it might be advantageous that the state of feeling in both the Canadas should be ascertained? Not at all; but he was not prepared to say, that it was fit and proper for the House of Commons to prescribe to Lord Durham the mode in which he should take that information—he was not prepared to say that a certain assembly should be called together now, or in the next year, or that, in the state of exasperated feeling which existed in that province, the assembling of constitutional bodies in great numbers, and that the two Canadas should be brought, if not into a collision, at all events into contact, was a wise measure; neither was he prepared to say, that, having suspended the whole representative principle in Lower Canada, (and these were sentiments in which those hon. members who were opposed to him in politics, must concur and affirm,) ten men, selected from five districts in Canada, would be a full, fair, and free representation of the people of that colony. He knew nothing whatever of any representative system in Canada, except that which was by law established, and which they were now about to suspend. The House of Representatives consisted of eighty individuals at this moment, who were the only recognised organs of the sentiments entertained by the inhabitants of Lower Canada. The propriety of suspending that assembly in the exercise of its legislative functions, was the question now proposed to the consideration of the House; but he certainly could not consent to the declaration, that ten persons, selected from five districts by the ordinance of the new governor, in pursuance of a new mode of election established by him, and with a newly-constituted tribunal for settling those disputes, which would probably arise as to the eligibility of the individuals returned, and the legality of their election—he never could be brought to allirm, in the words of the preamble of the bill, that the persons so selected would constitute a fair and a fitting representation of the sentiments of the Canadian people. He never could believe that the members of the British House of Commons, who, in a constitutional point of view, were the guardians of the representative principle, could consent, through the agency of this bill, to the abolition of that representative system, which the constitution of both Canadas had established, and at the same time give their sanction to the declaration, that ten persons selected in the proposed manner would form a fair and fitting representation. This was a point with reference to which he relied with much confidence upon the support of the House. Upon this ground, therefore, he objected to the principle of the measure. When Lord Durham arrived in Canada, he might possibly find it practicable to carry the proposed arrangement into effect; but if he (Sir R. Peel) were asked beforehand, whether, in a province in which martial law was established in many districts—in which rebellion had been only just suppressed—if he were asked whether it would facilitate the adjustment of the important interests—the settlement of the vital questions at issue—to take twenty-six gentlemen, six of them chosen by the governor from the members of both legislative councils, ten of them elected by the inhabitants of Upper Canada, whose feelings and interests were directly opposed to those of the people of Lower Canada, and to give them a majority of sixteen to ten, composed of individuals known to be opposed in feeling to the inhabitants of the lower province—he would at once declare that he was not prepared to answer in the affirmative. He was not disposed to place any restriction on the authority of the Crown, neither was he actuated by any unworthy desire to embarrass those with whom the responsibility rested; but he must protest against an independent member of the House of Commons, like himself, owing no relations but those of a faithful representative of his constituents' opinions, and an eager solicitude for the preservation of the constitution in its integrity, being called on to become a party to the establishment of such a representative principle. Might he not contemplate this result, that the people of Upper Canada would refuse to comply with the proposed regulation—a result which did not appear at all improbable, considering that the inhabitants of that province had at the present moment a Legislative Council and a House of Assembly in full activity and numbers, sitting and discharging legislative functions, under the sanction of an act of Parliament? Suppose that the people of Upper Canada were to say, "We won't agree to the proposed arrangement—we can't consent to part with our legislature, which holds its sittings upon the faith of an act of Parliament, and exchange it for a representation composed of three persons selected from one legislative council, and ten individuals named by the people—we will not run the risk of parting with our legislature even for a time." Assuredly, when he saw by the instructions contained in the dispatch of the noble lord, the secretary for the colonies, that the committee which it was proposed to appoint, would be not only empowered to take into consideration matters involving the interests of both provinces, but that to the thirteen members furnished by the province of Upper Canada would be intrusted, conjointly with the other members, the power of regulating the domestic concerns and the future political institutions of the province of Lower Canada, he could not refrain from entertaining strong doubts as to whether the suggestions which they might be disposed to offer would be acceptable to the inhabitants of the lower province. If the government desired it, they might press the arrangement, but they must take upon themselves all the responsibility, and he must refuse to be a party to it. In this, therefore, as well as in other matters connected with the subject of that night's debate, he would propose such amendments as might suggest themselves to his mind as just and desirable. Notwithstanding the observations of the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Ellice), he must persist in the expression of his opinion, that the power which it was proposed to concede to Lord Durham, of appointing to the committee the six members of the legislative council, was a power which it was neither judicious nor proper to extend. If, however, the hon. gentleman could convince him that it was right to concede this power, he would not insist upon pressing his amendment which referred to that point. He had not the slightest disposition to propose any amendment tending to deprive Lord Durham of any powers which were necessary for the proper discharge of his functions. But he would steadily pursue that course of which his judgment approved, in submitting to the House such amendments as appeared to him to be conformable to reason and justice—such amendments as would prevent this bill from establishing a dangerous precedent, or introducing any principle which was at variance with the spirit of the constitution—such amendments as would preclude the devolution upon an individual of any powers which were not necessary for the settlement of the disputed questions, and the reconciliation of the conflicting interests. He should press his amendments, and it was for the noble lord to consider well the course which it was most proper for him to pursue.

On the motion of Lord John Russell, the House went into committee on the Lower Canada Government Bill.

SIR ROBERT PEEL: Sir, when I first became possessed of the bill of the noble lord for making a temporary provision for the government of Lower Canada, I availed myself of the earliest possible opportunity of giving public notice, that there were two provisions in that bill to which I entertained insuperable objections; and that it was my intention to move amendments to those provisions, and to take the sense of the House for the purpose of having the deliberate decision of parliament on the subject. I took the course—rather an unusual one—of giving notice of the amendments which it was my intention to propose, for the express purpose of disclaiming any advantage from concealment, and of enabling the noble lord to take the measures which are usually taken on important questions, to secure such an assemblage of members as should clothe the decision of this House with the important character of numbers. From the first, I never entertained the slightest doubt that I should succeed. I felt so satisfied that the amendments which I intended to propose were founded on reason and common sense, that I paid the House of Commons the compliment of believing that they could not resist the adoption of them. And when I heard hon. gentlemen on the other side say, that the very words in the preamble to which I objected, constituted in their eyes the chief, if not the sole recommendation of the measure, and when I read in the organs of government, denunciations of my motives and feelings, my confidence in ultimate success was not in the slightest degree diminished. Nay, when I heard the noble lord last night say, in speaking of my objections, that if they were objections of form he would withdraw his opposition to them; but that if they were objections of substance, he should feel some difficulty on the subject: and when I thereupon declared that my objections were not objections of form, but objections of substance, still my confidence in the reasonableness of my proposition was not in the least abated; and I felt perfectly satisfied that either by the vote of a majority, or by the voluntary adoption of my amendments on the part of the government, reason would prevail, and the objectionable clauses would be struck out of this bill. Sir, my conscience has been justified by the result; for I understand the noble lord to declare, that he is prepared to adopt, without qualification, the propositions I have made. It is, therefore, wholly unnecessary for me now to declare what my own views and intentions are. To preclude misconception, however, I will add, that I did not propose to move for the simple omission of the preamble of the bill, but I expressly stated what was the substitute I proposed, that in lieu of the preamble of the noble lord, there should be inserted words to this effect:—"That temporary provision should be made for the government of Canada, in order that parliament might be enabled, after mature deliberation, to make permanent provision for the constitution and government of Canada." I did not say, for the government merely; and I inserted the word "constitution," expressly to imply that the government should be a constitutional one. I added, "that the basis should be a permanent one," and also, "that the basis should be one which would secure the rights and liberties, and promote the interests of all classes of her Majesty's subjects." By using the words "interests of all classes of her Majesty's subjects," I did mean to claim for parliament the right of taking a comprehensive view of the whole subject, of considering the claims of British subjects, and of providing, by the establishment of a representative system, for the protection of British property and feelings. By the words "rights and liberties," I expressly meant to imply that every right which the French Canadians now possess, either by capitulation or by treaty, should be strictly preserved to them—that those rights in respect to religion, and in respect to every peculiar privilege derived from capitulation or treaty, should be preserved to them. I also intended to imply, that the French Canadians and the British Canadians by birth should be secured in the enjoyment of a free constitutional government, founded on this basis; that while it was a government established on free and constitutional principles, it should also be a government possessed of the means of defence in any case of emergency, and of providing in every respect for the good government of Canada. There can be no common interest between all parties, unless such a government be established. It cannot be expected that we should undertake a charge of defending the colony in time of war, unless we are assured that there is a disposition existing in it to cultivate our connection; and, if our interests are endangered, to sacrifice all minor considerations to their support. I do not now think it necessary to refer to the amendment which I proposed, and which was framed expressly for the purpose of comprehending the views which I have just explained. The noble lord has entered (in my opinion, somewhat unnecessarily,) into his views of the principles of policy upon which Canada ought to be governed. In some respects I entirely agree with the noble lord. It appears to me to be most important that the British government should appear in Canada in an amiable light; that it should appear in the light of an arbiter between the contending parties. I am not disposed to leave the arrangements which it will be necessary to make, to persons who are in a state of exasperation; exasperation, to a certain extent perhaps, just and excusable, but still exasperation. Sir, it is because this is my opinion, that I think the British government in Canada ought to have been placed in such a position as to have been enabled to enforce its own policy, and to have maintained a due respect for the dignity of the law, and for the honour of the Crown, not by the voluntary exertions of the inhabitants, however laudable, but by a British military force, disclaiming all participation in the feelings or views of either party, and solicitous only to maintain the legal and constitutional authorities. Sir, it is because I agree in the noble lord's present policy that I am disposed to condemn his former policy with reference to this subject, and to express my surprise that the noble lord did not foresee the great probability that the resolutions to which we agreed last spring, might, on their reaching Canada, occasion an outbreak of party feeling, and produce an excitement and violence, the only way to allay which would be a temperate exhibition of strength on the part of the government. The noble lord says—taking a different view of the subject from that which he took yesterday—that as no inconvenience will arise from the omission of the words which it is now proposed to leave out of the bill, no reflection can be cast on her Majesty's government for the course which they have pursued. "But," adds the noble lord, "if you object to our policy, it is your duty to propose a vote of censure upon us." Now, my principle is, that we have nothing whatever to do with the policy of her Majesty's government on this subject. I am not to call in question the exercise of the royal prerogative in the appointment by the Crown of the Earl of Durham as Governor-general of Canada. That noble earl has been selected by the Crown for that situation; and, Sir, I know too well the importance of maintaining the prerogatives of the Crown, not to check the first attempt to call in question, without a very grave necessity indeed, the exercise of such a prerogative. I shall act consistently with the same principle with reference to the instructions which have been given to Lord Durham by her Majesty's government. I will not notice those instructions. I will not recognise them. I will propose no vote of censure upon them. For, were I to do so, and were I to select the parts in which, in my opinion, we ought to concur, and parts which, in my opinion, we ought to condemn, I should place myself, a mere member of parliament, in the situation of an adviser of the Crown. If I exercise the right of unqualified censure and condemnation, I ought to exercise the right of qualified censure and condemnation; and in detailed instructions it is in-

possible that every part should be equally open to remark. Now, what would be the consequence of that? That I should claim for the House of Commons a participation in the exercise of the prerogative of the Crown; and a most dangerous precedent it would be, if we were thus to pronounce à priori an opinion on the policy of government. So I tell the noble lord that he need not expect that any vote of condemnation will proceed from me. I abstain from that vote on the same principle with reference to the instructions which have been given to Lord Durham, as that on which I abstain from it with reference to the bill under our consideration. As to the instructions themselves, I do not think we ought ever to have seen them. I will in no shape by any public proceeding contract any responsibility on the subject; but it may save time, if I tell the noble lord that I hold her Majesty's government entirely responsible with reference to it, and that my being in possession of the instructions in question, and yet maintaining silence upon them, in no way renders me responsible. I retain the right of questioning the policy of those instructions as if I had never seen them; and still more, I declare, as far as my private opinion is concerned, although I do not mean to record that opinion by any vote, that of all the public documents I ever met with, I think that these instructions to Lord Durham are the most eminently absurd. In the first place, let me ask hon. members if they do not think it would have been more consistent with common sense, to have waited until the last moment of the noble earl's remaining in England before communicating to him those instructions. If, Sir, I had determined on adopting a different course, I should have proposed a kind of contre-projet to the instructions, commencing with some such terms as these:—"My lord, I have postponed until the latest moment giving your lordship any instructions with respect to the course and policy of your proceedings in Canada. I have waited for the latest arrivals from that colony, in order to ascertain by them what is the existing condition of Canada, what are the opinions of various persons with reference to that condition, and what are the best means which offer themselves for securing the object of your lordship's mission." But even now, if I were to address the noble earl officially on the subject, I should say, "As parliament has thought fit to intrust to your lordship immense powers, à fortiori I think it is incumbent on me to leave your lordship at liberty as to the mode of exercising your powers on your arrival in the colony. So far from fettering your lordship, who will not sail until the 1st of April, with instructions dated on the 20th of January, instructions implying a total want of confidence in your own means of obtaining information in the country, and dictating to you how many advisers you shall collect from this council, and how many from that; how many from Upper Canada, and how many from Lower Canada, I content myself with stating to you generally the object which her Majesty's government have in view, having full confidence that when your lordship arrives on the spot where your operations are to be carried on, you will soon be much better qualified to give effect to our intentions than we can be qualified at present to instruct you." Would it not be more consistent with common sense thus to leave Lord Durham to act according to the dictates of his own judgment when he arrives in Canada, and when he is put in full possession of the existing state of affairs in that colony, of which it ought to be presumed that he will be a competent judge, than to embarrass him with these previous instructions? When the noble lord opposite, therefore, challenges me to give my opinion of these instructions, although I will not put that opinion in a formal shape and place it on record, I am perfectly ready to declare it, and to offer it to the noble lord as the index of the course which I may hereafter pursue with reference to this subject. By those instructions her Majesty's government leave the noble lord no option. He must either have no meeting of councillors at all, or exactly such a meeting as they prescribe to him. He is either to have no committee of advice, or he is to have such a committee of advice as her Majesty's government have dictated to him. Now, suppose the noble lord on his arrival in the colony should find that a great change has taken place in the disposition of the members of the legislative assembly; suppose they say to him, "We find that we have been deceived, and we are now ready to conform to the wishes of the British legislature," is the noble lord then to call together all the constituent body in the five districts of each province—a body of which we were last night told by the hon. member for Coventry, that not two in a hundred can read and write—is the noble lord to call that body together for the purposes described in the instructions? Would it not be wiser to leave the governor-general on his arrival at the seat of his government, and after he has been put in possession of all the facts of the case, and has collected the opinions of the various authorities on the subject, to act as he may think proper, rather than on the 20th of January to tie him down to any particular course? I repeat, then, frankly, that although I will not propose a vote of censure on these instructions, my condemnation of them is not the less unqualified; and confident as I was in the success of the motion of which I gave notice, with reference to the bill before us, I am equally confident that her Majesty's government will find themselves compelled to withdraw these instructions. I say that these instructions ought not to be maintained; I say they cannot be maintained. If you wish for conciliation in Canada, you will not maintain instructions directing the governor-general to select three members from the legislative council of Upper Canada, and to invite the House of Assembly of Upper Canada to nominate ten of its members, not for the purpose of giving the governor advice with respect to the affairs of Upper Canada, but for the purpose of uniting with individuals selected from the legislative council of Lower Canada, and elected by the constituent body of the legislative assembly of Lower Canada, to consider, among other matters, "the provision that should be made to meet the necessary expenses of the civil government in Lower Canada, the state of the law affecting the tenure of landed property in that province, and the establishment of a court for the trial of appeals and impeachments." All these topics, be it observed, are exclusively interesting to Lower Canada. Why introduce into the committee of advice thirteen persons from Upper Canada, whose very presence may possibly excite irritation? I ask any reasonable man whether such an instruction as this is not, at least, more than necessary? If the noble earl should arrive in the colony in May, he will be the best judge of what, in the existing state of the position of the colony and the feelings of the people, it is expedient for him to do. Would it not be a wiser course to leave the noble lord to his own discretion, instead of saying to him, "If you call a committee of advice it shall consist of such and such persons; and although the subjects on which the advice of the committee is to be given concern exclusively Lower Canada, thirteen of the members of the committee must be Upper Canadians?" Sir, after the challenge of the noble lord to state my opinion of these instructions, it would be uncandid and dishonest on my part were I to abstain from declaring, that I consider the manner in which her Majesty's government propose to proceed calculated to rouse opposition to their own measures, and to obstruct what may perhaps be found to be a very desirable object, the union of Upper and Lower Canada. On that ground, Sir, I object to her Majesty's government making known their instructions to Lord Durham. But why have they done so? If they adhered to the proper and constitutional course, they would not have communicated his instructions to the noble lord until he was ready to sail; but they found it necessary to publish these premature instructions for the purpose of propping up their abominable preamble. This has driven them to the melancholy expedient of giving the governor-general of a colony his instructions three months before the period of his sailing; but I tell them, with the same confidence with which I predicted the success of my amendments to the bill, that they will be obliged to repeal their instructions. To those instructions, however, I totally disclaim making any allusion, otherwise than as stating my private opinion respecting them. Sir, I might urge other reasons for condemning those instructions. I am not willing that parliament should part with the power or the means of entering more deeply into the question of our North American provinces. We may find it necessary to institute an inquiry at the bar of this House into circumstances connected with those provinces. It is possible that we may consider it advisable to unite the provinces of New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Cape Breton, and Prince Edward's Island with the two Canadas, each province having a domestic government, but all externally pursuing a common interest, and prepared to defend that interest when involved in difficulty and exposed to danger. If this could be accomplished, if the time should come when the plan that I have hinted at may be carried into effect, I can easily conceive that great advantages would be the result. Those colonies have for many years been the outlet of the superabundant population of this country, a population carrying with them reminiscences of old England that must occasionally break out in the expression of feeling; and which, in spite of the French Canadians, and in spite of the neighbouring democratic states, would in all probability, in the hour of danger to that mother country whose language they speak, and whose institutions they admire, induce them to rally round our standard, and to share the difficulties and perils of foreign war. Let us not, then, tie up the hands of parliament from entering into any investigation from which such beneficial results may at some future period be derivable; and for that reason I am unwilling to confine the considerations connected with this subject merely to the union of the two Canadas. Notwithstanding the comparative weakness of our other North American colonies, their union would add to the strength of each, and would tend to elevate them in the scale of civilisation. I will not abandon the hope that such a union may some day be formed; and, to facilitate its formation, I would fortify the British interests in Canada, leaving them the full possession of their rights, but retaining in our own hands the means of providing for the good government of the province.

The bill passed through committee, and the House resumed.

THE BALLOT.

FEBRUARY 15, 1838.

In the debate on Mr. Grote's motion for leave to bring in a Bill, enacting that votes at elections for members of Parliament shall be taken by way of Ballot,—

SIR ROBERT PEEL spoke as follows:—Mr. Speaker, one charge has been preferred against me in the course of this debate to which I must plead guilty. The member for Sheffield (Mr. Ward) has asserted, that on the last occasions on which the question of ballot has been brought forward, I have contented myself with a silent vote. This is the fact: but as I have on three several occasions, since the year 1830, delivered my opinions on the subject of the ballot—as I have declared my decided objections to that mode of taking votes, and my reasons for entertaining them, I do not consider the imputation of occasional silence a very serious one. It is painful to travel over and over again the beaten circle of a stale and exhausted subject, and to consume the precious time of the House of Commons, by the repetition of statements and arguments perfectly familiar to your hearers. If I could have recriminated on the hon. gentleman—if I could have charged him with the offence of holding his tongue—I cannot say that, in my opinion, the debate would have suffered from his silence.

He imputes to me a great confusion of ideas, in confounding a right with a trust, in considering the franchise of the voter to be a trust, for the exercise of which he is responsible. He says, that I was the first who discovered that the privilege of voting was of the nature of a public trust, and that the doctrine is exclusively mine.

Now, first, as to the novelty and the exclusiveness of this doctrine. I have heard the following question put in this House by others than by me: "What is the nature and obligation of the electoral trust?" I have heard this House adjured in emphatic language to "guard the commonwealth against innumerable breaches of trust committed by electors." I have heard supposed appeals made to this House, by electors, couched in the following language: "We (the electors) are tempted on every side to induce us to forfeit our trust." These are not extracts from my speeches, but from the speeches of the member for the city of London (Mr. Grote). He, indeed, denies that publicity is any security for the faithful performance of the trust. He thinks the ballot will enable the voter to discharge his duty more conscientiously; but he does not deny that the voter has a public duty to perform—that he has had committed to him a most important trust. The difference between him and me is not as to the existence of the trust, but as to the security for its faithful discharge. The doctrine, therefore, in regard to the elector's franchise being a trust, is neither novel, nor exclusively mine.

Now for the argument of the hon. gentleman contesting that doctrine. He says the franchise is not a trust, because it is a right. As if a trust could not be coincident with a right. I presume I have at present a right, an absolute legal right, for a time limited by law, to a seat in parliament. But have I not a trust, also, co-existing with, and derived from that right? But, further, according to the hon. gentleman, the elective franchise is not only a right, but it is a right partaking of the nature of property: it is a right of the elector, as absolutely his own, as any other property can be. Was there ever heard such a doctrine? Was the elective franchise ever placed upon such a thoroughly sordid ground? If the franchise be a right involving no trust, and partaking of all the incidents of property, why does the hon. gentleman object to the sale of votes? According to him the elector has an unquestionable right to dispose of this species of his property to the best bidder. Why, then, call for the ballot?

Now, what is the origin of this, the really novel doctrine, of which the hon. gentleman will probably prove, not only the first, but the single advocate? It is not mere confusion of ideas on his part. It is, that he feels the pressure of the argument in favour of publicity, as a security for the faithful execution of any public trust. It becomes, therefore, his manifest interest to show, if he can, that the elective franchise is not a trust; that it is thereby exempted from the application of that rule of publicity which is considered the most effectual check against abuse. The hon. gentleman is the man who proposed the present system of taking votes in this House—who extended the time of a division from ten minutes to half an hour, for the express purpose of preventing secret voting—of publishing the names of the members who vote on any question, and the side upon which they vote, in order that their constituents and the public may know the fact—in order that members may be responsible to public opinion—in order that the salutary check of publicity may constantly exercise its tacit but powerful influence. What avails it to say, that the function of a member of parliament is different from the function of a voter—that the privilege and the trust of each respectively are derived from different sources? The question is, if both are public trusts, why is not the security against abuse, admitted to be good in the one case, good in the other? The ballot would occasionally give different results from open voting, if adopted in this House—it would be occasionally a check against the undue influence of private partialities and of party spirit, but you refuse, and wisely refuse, to purchase these occasional advantages at the cost of greater evils and greater abuses? Upon you rests the proof, that the same principle does not apply to the secret voting of electors, and there cannot be a more signal proof that you feel the pressure of the argument against you, that you fly for refuge to the ridiculous position, that a privilege, which is a right, cannot involve a trust; and to the monstrous doctrine, that the elective franchise is a right of the voter over which he has a control as absolute as that which he has over his property. So much for the hon. gentleman's complaint against others, of a confusion of ideas, and novelty of doctrine.

The hon. gentleman has another appeal to make to me. He says, that I have declared myself an advocate for the correction of all proved abuses—this term also having been, like the argument in respect to the franchise, a discovery of mine. Now, says the hon. gentleman, as I can show the abuse of intimidation and undue influence to be incident to open voting, and as you are pledged to correct proved abuses, you must adopt my remedy of the ballot, or propose a substitute. My answer is, that from the complicated relations of society—from the perversity of human nature—from the imperfection of all human devices—every institution, every public right that exists, must be liable to occasional abuse. Show me one that is free from it. Is trial by jury never abused? Is the liberty of the press never abused? Will it be sufficient that every shallow projector should show an abuse, in order that he may claim assent to his remedy? Surely he must satisfy us, that in the correction of one abuse he is not engendering others of greater magnitude? that in cutting out one gangrenous part, he is not injuring the vitals?

My belief is, that abuse in this case does exist, but that the extent of it is grossly exaggerated; that landlords, speaking generally, are not the tyrants they are represented to be; that the influence they exercise, is not so much the influence of intimidation, as the natural and legitimate influence which is almost inseparable from the relation of landlord and tenant. There is no doubt, that during a contested election every appeal that can be made to the prejudices, passions, feelings, interests, of the voters, is made by each party, and will continue to be made, whatever may be the mode of taking votes. But we must not confound the language of heated partisans during the contest with the practical exercise of power afterwards; and I apprehend that the instances are of rare occurrence, in which a tenant, voting against the wishes of his landlord, is dispossessed of his holding; that when the excitement which prevailed during the conflict has subsided, better feelings regain the ascendancy, and the tenant is not disturbed. I come to this conclusion quite as much from a consideration of what is the interest of the landlord, as from implicit confidence in his sense of justice and generosity. It clearly would not be for the pecuniary interest of landlords to eject tenants, eligible in other respects, because they were lukewarm or hostile at an election. But it may be said that party feelings, that the electioneering spirit of the landlord, will prevail over his pecuniary interest. My answer is, that the political influence of the landlord will be injured by harshness and severity towards his tenants, and that you have in that public opinion, which you will paralyse by secret voting, a natural and efficacious check upon tyranny, the more efficacious, because it does not merely operate by way of remonstrance. It does not merely make a tyrannical act unpopular: but it visits such an act with the penalty of the diminution of that influence which the act itself is intended to uphold. There are, no doubt, instances, in which the gratification of vindictive feelings will prevail over every other consideration; but can it be denied that the political weight and influence of a landlord will be better promoted by justice and forbearance towards his tenants, than by injustice and severity; and that, if political weight and influence be his object, a sense of his own interest will dictate to a man not swayed by passion, but by common prudence, the policy of not shocking the public feeling by acts of oppression and tyranny?

I shall proceed briefly to detail the grounds upon which I object to the system of secret voting.

In the first place, it is a system totally at variance with all the institutions, usages, and feelings of the people of this country, with all the maxims which have taught them to believe that free discussion, that publicity, that the light of day, that public opinion, are the great checks upon abuse. The people have been habituated to canvassing at elections, to the solicitation of promises, to all the activity and all the artifices, by which, at a contested election, one party seeks to gain a superiority over another. Every voter's inclinations and intentions are known; there is no neutrality, scarcely an instance in which a vote is reserved until the day of election. This may be right, or it may be wrong; but it is the inveterate usage of the country, and all this you hope to counteract by a small piece of cunning machinery, by Mr. Green's or Mr. Grote's ballot-box.

My belief is, that there will be no secrecy. I doubt, in the first place, whether you can give any assurance of what I will call the "mechanical secrecy" of the ballot-box, whether it can be so contrived as to guarantee absolute concealment. According to your hypothesis, landlords and customers will burn with desire to know in what manner their tenants and their tradesmen have voted. Every effort of mechanical skill, every device of vigilant dexterity, will be employed to discover the great secret. If it be discovered, nay, if there be a suspicion that it may be discovered, the ballot-box fails. The fears of unjust punishment, magnified by doubt and uncertainty, will continue to operate on the mind of the voter.

In order to insure the success of this system of secret voting, it is indispensable, not only that there shall be absolute secrecy, not only that there shall be the impossibility of fraud, but a perfect conviction on the minds of voters and of the public, that the disclosure of votes, and that fraud in taking the votes, are impracticable. Now, at every polling place throughout the country, there must be a ballot-box placed in some apartment casually provided, committed to the charge of some inferior agent—a deputy, I presume, of the returning officer. The returning officer may be a warm partisan at the election. The result of the balloting may disappoint the public expectations. Votes have been promised in sufficient numbers to carry the election of one party, but the other has succeeded. In nine cases out of ten, there will be a suspicion of unfair play—an unjust one, perhaps, but how will you correct it?

Suppose there be unfair play, and who, seeing what has been effected by mechanical skill, what apparent miracles it has performed, deceiving the senses and bewildering the reason of men, can be perfectly sure that the contrivances of your ballot-box may not be defeated through superior dexterity, combined with dishonesty, in those who have charge of the ballot-box? Suppose there be unfair play, what means can you resort to of detecting it? Suppose there be the imputation of fraud, how can you refute it? You can have no scrutiny. You cannot open the ballot-box. Your pledge to the voter is absolute concealment of his vote. Surely this is in itself a great objection to your system. You not only free the voter from all sense of responsibility, you not only enable him to discharge in secret a public trust, but you preclude yourselves from all subsequent inquiry, from all satisfaction of the public mind, even if there should be a prevailing suspicion that there has been dishonesty and fraud in the taking of votes, and that the rightful member has not been seated.

But let us concede, for the sake of argument, that mechanical secrecy can be effectually provided for, that there shall also be a perfect conviction on the public mind that it is so provided for, and that the possibility of fraud is excluded. Still I contend the ballot will give no effectual security either against intimidation and undue influence, or against general notoriety of the manner in which votes have been given. After the ballot shall have been adopted, what will be the practice at an election? Canvassing is not to be prohibited. All the appeals now made to the prejudices, feelings, passions, interests of the voters, may still be made. And, by the way, why is not canvassing, why are not these appeals, prohibited? According to the principles of the member for the city of London, they ought to be; at least, according to the principles laid down in one part of his speech, for he is at direct variance with himself upon this head. In one part of his speech he observed, that landlords would still make an appeal to the reason and affection of their tenants and dependents, and that, what he admitted to be the legitimate influence of property, would not be diminished. But in another part of his speech he stated, that the voter was as much bound to give his vote according to the pure dictates of his conscience, as the witness to give his evidence on oath, and the jurymen to find his verdict: and that it was as great an offence to tamper with the vote, as with the evidence or the verdict. If this be so, why do you tolerate canvassing? What legitimate influence can property exercise? What right can there be to appeal to the affection of voters? Did any landlord ever take a witness or a jurymen aside, and remind him of long family connection, or of benefits received, as a reason for influencing his testimony, or his verdict? No; there is an obvious distinction between the two; the universal usage of mankind has at least recognised such a distinction, and it will prevail over all the analogies which the refinements of argument may try to establish.

But to return. The election approaches. The landlord and his steward, with a long train of friends, will canvass the tenants. Precisely the same appeals will be made, and with precisely the same result. The instances will be rare in which the promise of a vote will not be freely given. Can it be withheld? Not according to your hypothesis; for, so far as the previous promise is concerned, the influence of the landlord, and the fear of oppression, are untouched. The doubtful voter will be asked to stay away; to pair off with the certain enemy. What remedy does the ballot-box give? You contend, that though canvassing is not to be prohibited, it will virtually cease under the system of secret voting, because it will be useless—because no one will think it worth his while to ask for the promise of a vote, when he is not certain whether the promise will be kept. What an unfounded assumption! If true, what a condemnation of your own measure! for it rests the vindication of secret voting on the imputation of universal dishonesty, and universal distrust. Depend upon it, that in nine cases out of ten, where the voter is subject to influence, and where influence would now be exerted, it would continue to be so. The promise will be asked, the promise will be given, and the promise will be kept. There will be occasionally an ill-conditioned fellow, with a spite against his landlord, or with his head turned by the tirade of the last radical newspaper, who will break his word; but the general rule will be—the observance of good faith. If it be, the ballot will have done nothing; for the promise will have been given from the same motives which now influence the vote. But, supposing the observance of good faith be not the general rule; supposing that promises are freely given, and afterwards violated, will the ballot give an effectual protection to the voter against the landlord who shall be disposed to abuse his power—will no suspicion fall on the violators of promises? Is it possible that in a country like this, in which perfect publicity has hitherto accompanied the exercise of the franchise—in which every man's vote is talked of and canvassed—in which the contested election occupies the thoughts, and is the theme of conversation for weeks before and weeks after it takes place, a man can so regulate his language, his company, his very looks, that there shall be no guess as to his inclinations and intentions—that the cunning agent shall have no means of discovering from his intimate associates, from his family, from his servants, from his wife—or, at least, of vehemently suspecting, which is the tenant that has kept, and that has failed to keep, his word? Now, vehement suspicion is no ground for inflicting a legal penalty; but it is a ground on which a landlord, assumed by the hypothesis to be of an oppressive and vindictive character, might harass an obnoxious tenant. These, Sir, are the main grounds upon which I doubt the efficacy of the ballot to insure secrecy, and to protect the voter.

It is said, however, that if the ballot shall effect little good, it will do no harm, and may therefore be adopted without danger. I dissent from this opinion. In times of perfect tranquillity the ballot might possibly be merely a delusion, but in times of great public calamity or excitement, it might be the instrument of irreparable evil. There might prevail a temporary clamour for war or for peace; unreasonable prejudices, with regard to public matters of deep interest; there might be false impressions purposely created by a government, during the prevalence of which it might be deeply and permanently injurious to the public interest to have a general election, the voters being freed from all control of publicity. The fever of the moment, the popular cry, might deaden the influence of reason and the influence of property, much more effectually under a system of secret than of open voting. I know it will be said, that this implies distrust of the constituent body—that it presumes they are unfit to be trusted with the elective franchise. It certainly does imply, that there may be occasions when the public mind is for a season under the influence of prejudice, of passion, of unwise impatience, and that it is for the public interest that a public trust should be discharged under responsibility to public opinion—to that sober public opinion which, a few months afterwards, will pronounce judgment; subject also to the present control which property, and station, and more enlightened views, may legitimately exercise, and can exercise with greater effect at such seasons of excitement under the present system of voting, than under the ballot. I do mean to imply this distinctly; and my position is, theoretically and practically, more sound than that for which you contend; namely, that every voter is entitled to exercise precisely an equal degree of influence upon the administration of public affairs—no matter what may be the differences in point of property, or education, or experience—and that he may exercise the privilege that has been conferred upon him, not for his individual advantage, but as a public trust, in secrecy, free from all responsibility, and without even the possibility of being questioned.

It has been taken for granted, in the course of this debate, that the ruling principle with the tenant is to obey the commands of his landlord. A radical candidate finds himself opposed by the farmers, and at once attributes the opposition to himself, not to the freewill of the tenant, but to the control exercised by his landlord. One gentleman has admitted that he found a great change, a great reaction, in the opinion and feelings of the landed proprietors, but complains that the tenantry should have been made to change their votes. But why made to change? Why should not the reaction have extended to the tenantry? Why should not they have voluntarily partaken in the sentiments, or the fears, which influenced their richer neighbours? Suppose the repeal of the corn-laws has alarmed the gentry, or the correspondence with rebels in Canada had disgusted them, is it not a more natural presumption that similar fears and similar disgust have extended to the occupiers of the soil as well as the proprietors, than that one class has been coerced by the other?

The examples of foreign countries have been again cited as an argument for the ballot. It is said that it comes recommended to us in modern times by the practice of France and the United States, and is sanctioned by the venerable authority of Rome. Even if the ballot had been a successful institution in other countries, no safe conclusion could be drawn therefrom as to the easy adaptation of it to the inveterate habits and feelings of this country. It would be difficult to judge what has been the reciprocal effect in any country of political institutions upon the character and manners of the people, and of character and manners upon such institutions—how they have acted and reacted upon each other. I was struck in the course of this debate by the contrast drawn by one hon. member (Mr. Lytton Bulwer), between the character of the aristocracy of Germany and of that of England; but I drew a totally different conclusion from that which the hon. gentleman drew, as to its bearing on the question of the ballot. “Look,” said the hon. gentleman, “at England and Germany at this day. In Germany, where the constitution keeps the nobility apart from the people, the nobility have not the energy, the ambition, the excitement, sufficient to produce great men, and the most eminent names spring from the people: but in England, where the constitution has more or less forced the gentlemen to cultivate the public opinion of the masses, you find in the class of the gentlemen the great ornaments of literature, of the state, of the army, exhibiting that intellectual eminence, and exercising that moral influence, which must always result from uniting the aristocratic advantages of leisure and property, with the popular elements of activity and ambition.” Now, if this be, as I believe it to be, a just panegyric upon the character of the English aristocracy—if the contrast with the aristocracy of continental Europe be correctly drawn, there is surely a strong presumption against any material change in those institutions which, in all probability, have principally contributed to produce this happy result. But there is a peculiarly strong presumption against this particular change, that is, against the system of secret voting. According to your own showing, the personal intercourse between the aristocracy and the masses (so far as elections are concerned) is to be diminished. The gentry are to be virtually excluded from that particular field on which, in political matters, they come habitually into contact with the masses. There is to be no motive for soliciting a promise; all the stimulants to energy and activity which are now supplied by the necessity of personal canvassing, of unremitting personal exertion, of appeal to every motive by which an elector can be influenced, are to be deadened or destroyed. It appears to me, then, to be a perfectly just conclusion, that if the character of the upper classes in England do stand so deservedly high, and if it be mainly attributable to the combination of the aristocratic advantages of leisure and property, with the popular elements of activity and ambition, it is most unwise to disturb, by experiments of uncertain issue, the political institutions of the country, of which that aristocracy is the ornament, and particularly by a system of secret voting to paralyse existing incentives to the activity and exertion of the upper classes, and to their personal contact and intercourse with the people.

Now, with respect to the examples of foreign countries which have adopted the ballot. In France, the main object of it is protection from the influence of the government. Yet it would appear that in France, the ballot fails in these respects at least; first, in producing a complete assurance on the part of the public as to this perfect secrecy of voting; and, secondly, in preventing the exercise of influence in elections on the part of the government. There repeatedly is dissatisfaction in France with the results of the ballot; charges have been preferred against the government, or the agents of the government, of violating the secrecy of the ballot-box. The first of the four charges preferred against the government of the Prince de Polignac, was interference with elections, and the violation of electoral rights. At every general election there is in France the direct and avowed exercise of government influence. Demands are made upon all the subordinate functionaries of the government to support by their vote the views and interests of the government; and when the charge of interference is preferred against the government of the day in the Chamber of Deputies, the answer is not denial, but recrimination—“You did the same.” If the ballot-box in France does give perfect protection to the subordinate officers of the government, if it insures perfect secrecy, removes all apprehensions of fear, or expectation of favour, whence the circulars of French ministers, the exhortations to the electioneering activity and zeal of their dependents, the rewards for the exhibition of these qualities, the punishments for the want of them? And does the ballot in France justify your predictions, that there will be no motive to solicit the promise of a vote, when you have not the means of ascertaining how the vote will be given?

The ballot is in force in the United States, but what are its effects? Is there no canvassing there? No solicitation of votes? Is there secrecy as to the vote? Is it not notorious that the influence of party feeling, the influence of institutions, laws, manners, habits like our own, the love of publicity, the prevalence of free discussion, the open expression of individual opinion, defeat the precautions of the ballot-box, and establish, by voluntary disclosures, or by indications of opinions which are tantamount to disclosures, a general notoriety as to the manner in which votes have been given? In the United States, when the ballot was originally introduced, there had not previously prevailed the inveterate usage of open voting. The people had to form a new constitution; they were at liberty to adopt such institutions as might appear to them most consistent with its ruling principles, unembarrassed by previous usages and prejudices in favour of other pre-existing institutions. If the ballot had succeeded there, it would not necessarily follow that it must succeed in another country, where it would have to struggle against the current of established habits, and the feelings connected with them. But if it fails in the United States in insuring secrecy (I speak not of mechanical secrecy)—if there even “sensus morosque repugnant”—if it is there counteracted by the influence of feelings stronger than the provisions of the law, and that the votes taken in secret are, nevertheless, generally notorious, is there not reason to apprehend that it will fail here also in establishing secrecy, and that the security it professes to give, will be perfectly delusive?

The example of Rome has been again appealed to, and the hon. gentleman (Mr. Lytton Bulwer) has referred to Gibbon's authority, for the purpose of establishing the fact, that the ballot was effectual in Roman elections in securing the voter from intimidation and improper influence. The expressions of Gibbon, referred to by the hon. gentleman, in respect to the veteran being freed by the ballot from the controlling influence of his general, point out the particular passage which the hon. gentleman has in view. Now let us take the whole of that passage, and then judge whether Gibbon can be fairly referred to as an authority in favour of the ballot, and its operation upon the state of society and the civil government of Rome. The passage is this:—“The tribunes soon established a more specious and popular maxim, that every citizen has an equal right to enact the laws which he is bound to obey. Instead of the centuries, they convened the tribes; and the patricians, after an ineffectual struggle, submitted to the decrees of an assembly, in which their votes were confounded with those of the meanest plebeians. Yet as long as the tribes successively passed over narrow bridges and gave their voices aloud, the conduct of each citizen was exposed to the eyes and ears of his friends and countrymen. The insolvent debtor consulted the wishes of his creditor,—the client would have blushed to oppose the views of his patron—the general was followed by his veterans, and the aspect of a grave magistrate was a living lesson to the multitude. A new method of secret ballot abolished the influence of fear and shame, of honour and interest, and the abuse of freedom accelerated the progress of anarchy and despotism.”

When next, Sir, the hon. member for the city of Lincoln quotes Gibbon, I hope this will encourage him to give the whole passage, instead of only a portion of it.

There is a remarkable passage in Pliny, with respect to the practical working of the ballot in Rome. Pliny had admitted, that for some evils in elections, the ballot would probably be a remedy, but he feared it would introduce evils more aggravated than those which it might correct. In writing afterwards, he says, that his apprehensions had been confirmed by the result; and in the course of his observations he gives this brief, but striking, description of the vote by ballot:—“Poposcit tabellas, stilum accepit, demisit caput, neminem veretur, se contemnit.”

The reverence for authority was gone—the fear of public opinion was removed—the aspect of a grave magistrate—the living lesson (as Gibbon calls it) to the multitude, ceased to encourage or rebuke; and the voter retired from the ballot, conscious perhaps of the violation of a promise, with the sense of shame in his demeanour, and the feeling of dishonour and degradation in his heart. And be assured that, if this feeling be introduced here, if you accustom the voter to the violation of a solemn promise, if you make him believe that a lie told to a landlord is of little comparative consequence, you will dearly purchase the advantage of a secret vote, at the price of promises disregarded—truth habitually violated—the sense of honour destroyed, and self-esteem extinguished.

You tell us that the ballot is necessary for the perfection of past reforms, and for the contentment and satisfaction of the people. The ballot is now proclaimed to be the great, the only measure which can secure liberty of opinion, and lay the foundations of concord. I distrust your prophecies. I compare your past predictions, as to the results of great constitutional changes, with your present description of them. You told us, a short time since, that the one thing needful for our harmony and welfare, was the destruction of nomination boroughs, and the infusion of more of the democratic principle into the constitution and working of the government. Your opinions prevailed—your views were accomplished. Six short years have passed, and so far is it from your prophecies having been fulfilled, that, according to your own declarations, reform has been an utter failure; it has aggravated all the former evils of elections—there has been more of intimidation, more of expense, more of corruption, since the passing of the Reform Bill than there was before. There is now, if we are to credit your assertions, no legitimate ground for confidence in the members assembled within these walls. The existing system has lost all title to national esteem; in fact, we have no representative system. The baneful principle of nomination remains in force. We are described, in short, to be in the last stage of that decrepitude in which the power of Rome crumbled into dust, when the forms of free government were preserved, but all the vital energy was extinguished.

All these are your expressions, not mine; your expressions applied in the course of this debate, to the present reformed representative system of this country. I contrast them with your former predictions, when that very system was under discussion, and when you hailed the measure of parliamentary reform as the second great charter of national liberty. So will it be with the ballot. Six years hence you will discover, not only that it is inoperative, but a positive curse. Then will arise the complaints of new abuses—of new schemes of wholesale and systematic bribery—of payment for votes, contingent upon the successful result of the election—of voters harrassed and punished upon bare suspicion of imputed frauds, and the impossibility of detecting them, if the pledge of perfect secrecy is to be fulfilled. But, above all, will arise the indignant complaint, that the constituent body is a limited and privileged class, protected from all responsibility, shielded by secrecy in the exercise of public functions, enabled, because unchecked by shame or public opinion, to gratify private pique, or, perhaps, to profit by the new and secret corruption which ingenious bribery will have devised. Then will come the demand, even now plainly foreseen and foretold—the demand for extended suffrage as the necessary consequence, nay, as the only remedy, of the special evils of the ballot—for suffrage, not circumscribed by arbitrary rules as to residence or property, but for suffrage, co-extensive with population, and restricted only, if at all, by the age of twenty-one. Thus will you proceed from change to change, one rendering inevitable another, partly from the restless appetite for innovation, growing with indulgence; partly from the impatience, the justifiable impatience, of new and intolerable evils. Thus will you proceed, until the whole principles and character of your constitution and form of government are changed, and a fierce democratic republic is erected on the ruins of a limited monarchy.

Believing that limited monarchy to give much better securities for peace, prosperity, and liberty, than such a republic—foreseeing that the ballot must involve future changes in the representative system, more extensive and important than the ballot itself—changes inconsistent with the principles of a mixed form of government, by King, Lords, and Commons, I shall give my unqualified opposition to this motion.

On a division, the numbers were: Ayes, 198; Noes, 315; Majority against the motion, 117.

BREACH OF PRIVILEGE—MR. O'CONNELL.

FEBRUARY 26, 1838.

Viscount Maidstone brought under the notice of the House a speech of Mr. O'Connell's, delivered at the Crown and Anchor, in which the hon. and learned gentleman accused the Tory committees of the House with a uniform system of perjury. He would move for a vote of censure against him.

SIR ROBERT PEEL, before he noticed the speech of the noble lord who had just sat down (Lord John Russell), begged to refer to one remark made by the noble lord (Lord Howick) who moved the previous question. It appeared to him that the noble lord did not accurately remember what had passed in the House with respect to the bill relating to controverted elections. The noble lord who represented her Majesty's government (Lord John Russell), was desirous that the improved system of controverted elections should be immediately brought into operation; "but," said the noble lord (Lord Howick), "that benevolent and virtuous intention of her Majesty's government, was defeated by the opposition which was offered to it on the opposition side of the House." He did not recollect the anxiety of her Majesty's government to force forward that measure for the introduction of an improved system. He certainly did remember the noble lord stating the course he meant to pursue with respect to the fixing of the days for the controverted elections; he did remember the noble lord saying, "he would not pledge himself absolutely to fix the day, because some extraordinary contingency might occur with respect to the petitions that might prevent him," though the noble lord then fixed the day for taking the resolution into consideration. That day arrived, and he and his friends were panting with anxiety for a knowledge of that extraordinary contingency which might defeat the noble lord's intention; but the noble lord stated that he had referred to the petitions, and found nothing extraordinary in them, and therefore, instead of allowing him (Sir R. Peel) to fix the day, the noble lord did it himself, and adopted the very terms of his (Sir R. Peel's) motion. The noble lord was successful in carrying the second reading of the bill; why, then, did he not persevere? The noble lord carried the second reading by a much larger majority than he had upon most other questions—he carried it by a majority of fifty three—but he fixed the days on which the election petitions should come on, and he never, acting for the government, fixed the day on which to proceed with the bill. Here was the bill as originally brought in; here it was, declaratory of the original intentions of the author of it; and what said the last clause, with respect to which there was such an intense degree of anxiety, because, forsooth, it was to substitute a new tribunal for the old? The last clause, which was not forced upon the noble lord by a powerful majority, but which was supported by him as his own voluntary act—the last clause ran thus: "And be it enacted, that this act shall take effect from and after the last day of the present session." He begged leave, then, to deny that her Majesty's government had shown any very determined or sincere intention to substitute for the present system of trying controverted elections a new one. He objected to the proposal made by the noble lord at a subsequent period, because he thought that an attempt to substitute a new tribunal, by a bill to be passed through both Lords and Commons, in the present conflict of parties, would have consumed so much time as to leave them no alternative, if all the existing petitions were subject to the new mode of trial, to indefinitely postpone them; and it was the first duty of the House to proceed to the adjudication of the controverted elections. Nor would the country be satisfied with the postponement till the new tribunal was constituted. The hon. and learned member for Dublin proposed a plan which would have met all the objections now made to the present tribunals, because it would have removed the trial of controverted elections from this House. The hon. member for Liskeard's bill, which was supported by the government, was of a totally different character, and if the imputations which had been cast on the House were just, they ought not to adopt that bill, for it would still leave to the House the power of adjudication on election petitions. He now came to the speech of the noble lord, (Lord John Russell,) and to the consideration of those arguments by which the noble lord endeavoured to convince the House, that the proper course in this case was to pass to the order of the day. The noble lord was surprised at the appeal made to him by his (Sir R. Peel's) noble friend, but it was perfectly justifiable. How was it possible, after the noble lord had given public notice of his motion, that he could now consent to proceed to the order of the day? Why, the noble lord had placed himself in the same boat with his noble friend. The noble lord did not rise and say the House had no authority on the subject, or that it would be advisable to consider it in the mean time, but he got up impatiently and eagerly, and said, "As soon as you have decided your question of privilege." [No, no!] He should like to be informed in what respect he misrepresented the words of the noble lord. He did not mean such a decision as the noble lord now anticipated, that of passing to the order of the day. The motion now made implied a shrinking from the decision of the House. The notice of the noble lord was this—"Provided the house entertained"—[The remainder of the sentence was lost by the vehement cheering from the ministerial benches]. Why, in what a miserable position did they place themselves by this interruption. Observe how the supporters of her Majesty's ministers manifested their exultation because they thought he had made a verbal mistake! Well, then, the noble lord gave notice that, if the House of Commons entertained the motion of the noble lord (Maidstone), he (Lord John Russell) would bring forward a motion of his own—that he would submit for the consideration of the House, a case of breach of privilege, alleged to have been committed two years since. In other words, his noble friend, and other gentlemen serving on election committees, having thereby an important and delicate public duty to perform, which they had discharged to the best of their ability, and according to the dictates of their conscience, being deliberately charged with the commission of foul perjury, had called upon the House for protection against such aspersions; and the answer, the conciliatory answer, of the noble lord was—"If the House of Commons affords you the protection you seek, I will bring forward for its consideration the similar charge against certain members of a former parliament, made by a right rev. prelate two years since!" That was the satisfaction proposed to be given by the noble lord. But, then, his noble friend had a right to make a specific appeal to the House. What were the simple facts of the case? Here was a charge of "foul perjury" preferred against members of that House, and that charge was made against them acting in their judicial capacity. Such a charge, serious as it was, made in the heat and excitement of a public dinner, might not be visited with the censure of the House. But an opportunity was given to the hon. and learned gentleman who had preferred the charge, to explain it—he had not been called on suddenly to answer; nor taken unawares. The noble lord, the member for Northamptonshire, had given the hon. and learned gentleman full notice of his intention to ask the question, and it was therefore perfectly competent for the hon. and learned gentleman to have said, that it was perfectly true, that in a moment of excitement he had preferred the charge, and that he made it, feeling that the honour of those with whom he was associated, had been impeached by similar charges having been preferred against him and them, and no more perhaps would have been thought of it. But the hon. and learned member took the more open and manly course of distinctly and deliberately, in his place, admitting, that he had made the charge, and that he still adhered to it. Members serving, or liable to serve, on committees, had then no alternative but to appeal to the House for protection. In the first place, was the charge well founded? That was the material point at issue. The first authority he should cite on this subject was that of the noble lord, the Secretary for the Home Department, himself. In the course of the present session the noble lord observed, "Now, without conveying an imputation of perjury on any side, when I see so much jealousy evinced as to placing the names of adverse parties on committees, I must say that the fact seems to me to be a proof that such decisions will be party decisions. The main reason for this is the uncertainty of the law of elections, and more especially of the right of voting in Ireland. This was the case on the Longford committee in particular. Where there are different decisions on the same grounds, party bias will occur. In saying this, I by no means impute deliberate perjury to the members of those committees." The noble lord admitted that the charge was unfounded; he acquitted them of deliberate perjury; yet he refused to afford hon. members the protection of the House! The noble lord admitted the right of hon. gentlemen, who implored the protection of the House under such a charge; admitted their right to protection; yet no protection was to be afforded! There was the authority of the noble lord himself for the position. He admitted that any charge of foul perjury, founded upon the proceedings of those committees, was unfounded, and yet he refused to give the members of those committees the protection of a resolution of that House. On what ground did his refusal go? Why, the noble lord stated that there was a strong prejudice in the public mind on the subject. Was it not the duty of that House to set right the public mind whenever it was evidently swayed by improper and unfounded prejudices? Ought they, upon such a ground as that, to succumb to any charge, however gross and unfounded, that was made against members of that House? The best possible mode, and the most obvious, to encourage in the public mind these very prepossessions, was to shrink from declaring them unfounded. The noble lord said, there was in the public mind generally a prejudice against the mode of proceeding by election committees; but surely the distinction was quite clear between a desire to amend a defective tribunal and a wholesale charge of foul perjury against them. It was quite consistent to admit, that political bias did operate on the decisions of election committees, and to desire to see the system changed; yet, also, to resent warmly the charge of wilful perjury against certain members of that House. The noble lord argued, that the true way to elevate the hon. and learned member in public opinion would be to visit him with the censure of the House. To visit him with an unjust censure would undoubtedly have that effect; but if the censure professed to be passed was a just one, why should the House of Commons shrink from recording it? Not, surely, because there were strong opinions in the public mind on the subject of election petitions. If, however, the present motion for censure was passed by, what would the House do with regard to the election petitions? If they were to pass this over, he should like to ask them what were they to do suppose a petitioner were to approach the House and charge them with foul perjury? Would they censure him? Would they reject his petition? Why, the same person might present another petition and say, that when the same charge was preferred against them they passed to the order of the day. What, in such a case, would they do with such a petitioner? What did they do with a petition the other day, which contained a charge of perjury against the Roman Catholic members of that House? The doctrine that the Speaker then laid down was, that they could not receive any such petition—that no petitioners had a right to charge members with perjury, whether they were Protestants or Roman Catholics. He was not present himself, but he understood the Speaker to have said, that such a charge would preclude the petition which should contain it from being received by the House. To take another case:—Suppose a member, forced by the order of the House to serve on a committee, were to say—"I was ready to have discharged my duty, to have sacrificed my time, and to have endeavoured to the best of my abilities to fulfil the trust imposed on me. I appealed to you for protection against the charge of foul perjury; you would not afford me that protection; I will not, then, exercise the judicial functions you impose upon me, subject to the contingency of such consequences." What would the House do with a member under such circumstances? Would they commit him to Newgate? Here would be the case of an individual refusing to act, not from pique or mere personal feeling, but because he declared that the House paralysed his powers of judging, so that no decision which he could give would be satisfactory. Would the majority which, it was said, would negative to-night the resolutions of the noble lord, be prepared to commit a member so situated to Newgate? If they would be so prepared, he had not heard any thing urged to show why the House of Commons should not proceed in such a matter as any court of justice in the kingdom would proceed. He remembered a case of a similar kind, which occurred in 1834. Mr. Hill, a gentleman then in parliament, had reported some conversations which were said to have taken place between certain members as to the votes proposed to be given for government on certain questions. Here was a charge against the members for Ireland—how did the House deal with it? Why, on the first day of the session attention was drawn to it. By whom? By Mr. O'Connell! The hon. member stated, "He must observe that the question before the House was a public one, inasmuch as it concerned deeply the constituency of Ireland to know whether any of their representatives had behaved in the manner described. The noble lord had satisfactorily replied to the question put by himself and another Irish member, but other members, and amongst them his hon. friend, the member for Tipperary (Mr. Sheil), had been interrupted when he rose to propose the same question to the noble lord. His hon. friends and constituents, were deeply interested in their character, and therefore he pressed the noble lord to be more explicit." "The hon. member for Tipperary had constituents who had a right to know whether the member they had sent to that House was worthy of their confidence or not; for the sake of that portion of the community there interested, then, and also for the characters of the hon. members themselves, he felt, and he was sure the House would, on a little reflection, concur with him, that an opportunity of explanation ought not to be denied to those who sought it." In the present case, also, the noble lord had constituents who thought his character and title to their trust ought to be supported. There were also many other members who thought that in such a case as this, it was for the public interest that they should be protected from a charge of so serious a nature. In the same debate, however, Mr. Hume, then member for Middlesex, "advised the hon. and learned gentleman not to notice such vague insinuations against members of parliament;" to which Mr. O'Connell replied, "This is not a vague insinuation made by the public press or by parties out of doors, but a serious imputation preferred by a member of parliament." The previous question was moved, but he (Sir R. Peel) felt it was due to the Irish members that there should be an investigation, and he accordingly voted for an inquiry. The motion for the previous question was rejected, and the inquiry took place. But in the present case, the charge was distinctly admitted, and a determination to adhere to it was declared. There was no allegation of proof, for although hon. members, who had spoken on the other side, broadly stated their opinions that the tribunals were defective, yet they thought that the charge of foul perjury could not be sustained. This being so, then, he called upon the House to protect its members from the charge of foul perjury that had been brought against them. Night after night, in the debates in that House, imputations were cast upon the great measure of reform by those who aided in passing it; night after night it was declared, that there had been more intimidation and expense and corruption at the last election than there ever occurred before. Now, they had heard it stated, that they—the reformed parliament—were disqualified by foul perjury, or the disposition to it, from discharging their judicial duties, from which it would necessarily be inferred that they were equally disqualified from the discharge of their other and more important duties. He really must say, that he was surprised that hon. gentlemen and noble lords opposite would consent that such imputations should be cast upon the acts of the House; and if they thought they had the power, which the House undoubtedly had, not of persecuting any one, but of vindicating the honour and dignity of their proceedings, and, in the exercise of strict justice, defending their own members from unjust imputation—and if they desired to prevent such charges from being drawn into daily precedent, as by connivance and forbearance they would—then he entreated them to disregard those consequences which the noble lord had threatened, of unduly elevating the hon. member on the one hand, or of exciting unfavourable impressions on the minds of the vulgar, on the other. He entreated them to do that which they believed to be consistent with truth and justice, and they would be amply rewarded for disregarding an appeal to their passions, and unfounded apprehensions of evil consequences from their proceedings.

COLONIAL ADMINISTRATION.

MARCH 7, 1838.

Sir William Molesworth moved for an "Address to her Majesty, respectfully expressing the opinion, that her Majesty's Secretary of State for the Colonies, does not enjoy the confidence of that House, or of the country." Lord Sandon moved, by way of amendment, an Address, containing a direct vote of censure on the government.

am placed in a disadvantageous position with respect to my noble friend by a dispatch being quoted which is not before the House, and the right hon. gentleman deals in an unfair manner towards me, unless he mean to produce a copy of the dispatch from which he has quoted. But, Sir, this I say with respect to that dispatch, that my noble friend, in 1835, was prepared to make an immediate settlement of every important disputed question in Canada, reserving for future inquiry matters of subordinate detail. But you, the ministers, allowed two years to pass away after my noble friend was prepared to settle all the points in dispute before you brought forward your resolutions which were the result of the commission which you issued. And those resolutions did not propose the settlement of any single litigated point which two years before Lord Aberdeen had not given Lord Amherst ample powers to settle. I challenge the right hon. gentleman to contradict that statement. The only difference between your resolutions and the course proposed to be pursued by Lord Aberdeen, is this—that you proposed to take money from the Canadians without their consent; whereas Lord Aberdeen did not propose any such thing. Lord Aberdeen gave full and positive instructions to Lord Amherst upon all the points involved in Canadian affairs; he gave positive instructions with respect to the legislative council, to the tenure's act, to the trade act, to the pending financial question, and, in short, to every point that demanded the attention of the government. He told Lord Amherst that his duty was to remove all grounds of complaint still unredressed, and to apply efficacious remedies to every existing grievance. This he was to accomplish effectually. But, says the right hon. gentleman, Lord Aberdeen proposed to give up the territorial and casual revenues to the House of Assembly. It is true Lord Aberdeen did propose to do so, but upon express conditions, and the revenues were not to be given up till the conditions were fulfilled. Instead of entering upon an indefinite inquiry into the state of Canada, at a time when the minds of men were inflamed, and wanted not a fresh inquiry, but a redress of grievances, the course taken by my noble friend was to send out a single commissioner with instructions, not couched in equivocal language, admitting of doubt, and raising questions as to the intentions of those who prepared them; but my noble friend said to Lord Amherst—"Go forth to Canada—tell them that the whole of the territorial and casual revenues shall be given up, but upon these express conditions: first, that a civil list for the payment of the salaries of civil officers shall be granted; secondly, that the salaries of the judges shall be provided for; thirdly, that funds shall be provided to meet casual expenses; and fourthly, that every payment for which the faith of the government was pledged shall be promptly provided for." These were the conditions; and Lord Amherst was told that if the House of Assembly rejected them, they would then be in the wrong, and it would become the duty of the imperial government to consider what steps ought afterwards to be taken. My noble friend said to the Canadians, "I am willing to listen to any proposal for an amicable settlement respecting the constitution of the legislative council;" but did my noble friend palter with them in a double sense? No. He said distinctly, that the constitution of the colonial government shall be so far respected that the legislative council shall not be an elective-council, and that the executive council shall not be responsible to the House of Assembly. So that my noble friend distinctly stated, on every point, what was the course the government intended to pursue, and what were the terms offered to the Canadian assembly; but certainly, in case of Lord Amherst's failure, my noble friend reserved to himself the opportunity of considering what course it would be proper for him, in that event, to adopt. Now, what is the course which her Majesty's government has adopted? They first appointed commissioners to go forth to Canada and institute inquiries, after every subject of inquiry had been exhausted, and after evidence had been obtained which more overburdened than instructed them. With the Canadians panting for something effectual to be done, you send out three gentlemen as commissioners, after all the inquiries of 1833 and 1834, for the purpose of inquiring anew. Here lying before me is the report of those commissioners; and I will say, although I am not desirous of saying anything in the absence of the right hon. baronet (Sir Charles Grey) which I would not say in his presence—but if ever any document was calculated to throw ridicule upon a government commission, upon those who were in chief authority, and to excite and inflame discontent, it is the report of these commissioners, who were so selected that it was almost certain they would differ, and the expectation of whose difference of opinion has been realised by the event. Of this every man may satisfy himself who reads this report. If the right hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Grey) be present, would he allow me to refresh his memory with some of his own expressions with respect to this commission. The commissioners were instructed, among other things, to make a report in reference to the executive council, and they accordingly make a report which the right hon. gentleman signs. But the moment he signed that report, he attached a remonstrance against it; and another of the three commissioners also attached a remonstrance against his own report, and then the chief commissioner comes in, and

The commissioners made a report on the executive council, which was signed by Lord Gosford, Sir George Gipps, and Sir Charles Grey. The very next paper is one bearing the signature of Sir Charles Edward Grey only, and contains what is called a statement of his difference of opinion upon the third report of the commissioners, and the hon. gentleman thus expresses himself:—“My principal objection to the present report is, that having, in the 12th, 14th, 16th, and 17th paragraphs shown very forcibly and truly that an executive council, removable at the will of the Assembly, would be incompatible with the subordination of the province to the empire, we recommend measures in the 30th, 32nd, 34th, 35th, 36th, and 38th paragraphs, which, taken in conjunction with the recommendation of the majority of the commissioners in the first report, would create the institution we have decried.” Just conceive the commissioners thus divided in opinion on a question on which the wishes of the people were fully made up. The right hon. gentlemen opposite sent out three commissioners to make a report on the propriety of granting an elective legislative council; and in their general report they say, in paragraphs 12, 14, 16, and 17, that they have insuperable objections to making the executive council elective; and yet, in paragraphs 30, 32, 34, 35, 36, and 38, they admit that it seems desirable: and this they said with the view of throwing oil over the troubled waters of discontent. Would hon. gentlemen opposite undertake to say, that if the propositions of my noble friend, Lord Aberdeen, had been adopted in 1835, that they would not have had an entirely different effect? Was it the same thing, that they adopted two years afterwards? Are two years nothing in the history of a discontented people? [Cheers.] If hon. gentlemen mean by their cheers to remind me of Ireland, and refer to the experience which they have had of the effects of delay with respect to that country, do they consider the delay is not a condemnation of the government as to Canada? You point a most harmless sarcasm at me, but through my sides you inflict a fatal wound upon yourselves. If in Ireland the state of discontent has been aggravated by delay, what will you say of the government delay with respect to Canada? Upon this point I will commence with the authority of the hon. gentleman who spoke last night, and who then said that delay was of no consequence. What, however, did the hon. gentleman say in his published report? He said, “I cannot express as I could wish, the importance which ought to be attached to a prompt use of the opportunity which is presented by the address of the Assembly to his Majesty.” This was written in 1836, a year after Lord Aberdeen had been out of office; but what further said the hon. gentleman? “If it,” that is, the opportunity, “be missed, the government will go rapidly down the stream; if it be rightly—by which I mean temperately but firmly—used, I see nothing in Canadian affairs which, with skill and forbearance, is not capable of adjustment.” I have the authority, then, of the hon. gentleman, that the differences were capable of adjustment, and that the colony was not in so bad a state that it might not be brought safely out of its troubles. I rely on no statement of my own, I trust only to the evidence of your own commissioners, of your own officers; and by that evidence, as I told you, I will show that on your delay I rightly charge the revolt which has broken out in Canada. I have shown here, from the evidence of one of your own commissioners, who in his speech of last night absolved you from all blame, that he was of opinion, in March, 1836, that he hoped for a satisfactory adjustment, and that he then “saw nothing in Canadian affairs which, with skill and forbearance, was not capable of adjustment;” and yet the same hon. gentleman asked last night, with an air of triumph, whether, if the propositions sent out to Lord Amherst had been produced to the Assembly, they would and now comes forward the Under-secretary for the Colonies, and asks us how we can reconcile it with our sense of duty to censure the government now, after having concurred with it upon the address moved immediately upon the reassembling of parliament after the Christmas recess? The Vice-president of the Board of Trade, too, has made this charge upon us. "Sir," says the right hon. gentleman, "whilst the issue of the rebellion was uncertain—when it was unknown whether the efforts of the revolt were effectually quelled, you indicated no opposition to the government; you kept yourselves entirely in the background, and by your silence seemed to give assent to all that had been done; but now, when every thing is settled, you come forward to censure the government." Why, to be sure, if ever there was an exhibition of greater fairness in a party, it was to be found in the very course which the right hon. gentleman pointed out as being so extraordinary. When we heard of the defeat of the British arms—when the public mind in England was agitated—when the issue was uncertain—we did not come forward to create an undue prejudice against the government, by bringing its conduct under immediate consideration. "But now," says the right hon. gentleman, "now, you are prepared to do so." Did I shrink, when the Canada bill was under consideration, from submitting to the House those amendments to that measure which I thought to be necessary? Did I show that want of political courage, imputed to me by the right hon. gentleman, of evading all mention of disturbing the government while the issue was uncertain? Has the right hon. gentleman so soon forgotten what passed in the discussion upon the Canada bill? Did I not give notice whilst that bill was under consideration that, as there were parts of it to which I decidedly objected, I meant to move amendments upon which I should take the sense of the House? Perhaps the right hon. gentleman considered those amendments light and insignificant, and therefore had allowed them to escape his recollection. But the noble lord (Lord John Russell) did not so consider them; for the noble lord told me, that if I persisted in moving those amendments, and if I declared that I proposed them, not from a mere desire to rectify some of the details of the bill, but because I dissented from the general Canadian policy of the government, it would become a matter of grave consideration with the government whether they would not immediately retire from office. Was not that distinctly intimated to me by the noble lord? And was I able to give the noble lord any consolatory assurance? Was I enabled to use one single gratifying expression in the answer I returned to the noble lord? Did I not, after the express invitation of the noble lord, distinctly state, that I adhered to every opinion I had previously expressed on the subject of the Canadian policy of the government—that my objections were not objections of detail, but objections of principle, and had I not the satisfaction, after all, of finding the noble lord adopt my amendment? Therefore, I do not consider myself liable to the charge, either of the Under-secretary for the Colonies, that we are now bringing forward an amendment which is inconsistent with our support of the first address to the Throne upon the subject; nor do I think myself liable to the charge of the right hon. gentleman, the Vice-president of the Board of Trade, that when the issue of events was uncertain, I abstained from pressing such amendments to the Canada bill as I thought material, after I was told that the pressing of them might endanger the existence of the government. The right hon. gentleman preferred another charge specifically against me. He asked me how it was possible for me to concur in a condemnation of the government, seeing that I had been connected with an administration which had mainly aggravated the difficulties of managing the affairs of Canada. The right hon. gentleman contended, that the government which had existed previously to 1828, when the Canada committee was appointed, was the government mainly chargeable with delinquency in respect of Canada. That being the opinion of the right hon. gentleman, and being his opinion, I suppose the opinion of the government also, I own it does somewhat surprise me, that the present administration, when they came into power, showed no indisposition whatever to unite with some of those who had belonged to other administrations existing previous to 1828, and who, of course, must be held responsible for any unwise or injurious measures that might have been adopted towards Canada. When the right hon. gentleman, the Vice-president of the Board of Trade (Mr. Labouchere), and the hon. gentleman, the Under-secretary for the Colonies (Sir George Grey), were dealing out so largely their invectives against administrations which existed previously to 1828, they should have looked to their right hand and to their left, and remembered how many of their present colleagues were just as much chargeable with misconduct towards Canada as any of those who sit on this side of the House. The noble lord (Lord Palmerston), the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, was connected with every government that existed from the year 1800—I do not know when—down to the year 1827, and I see many gentlemen upon the ministerial benches who were connected with previous governments in the same way. Why, then, if you objected so much to the colonial policy of the administration which existed prior to 1828, why did you not mark your disapproval of it, by refusing to enter into any kind of coalition with those who had in any way been parties to it? Was not Mr. Grant, the present Lord Glenelg, a member of the government previous to 1828? But when you first came into office, what course did you pursue? Did you not take for your colonial secretary, Lord Ripon, who had been connected with every government from the time of Lord Liverpool down to 1828. The very man whom you appointed minister for colonial affairs had been connected with that government up to the year 1827. And what did you do with Mr. Wilmot Horton? He was the representative of the colonial department during the seven years preceding 1828. What course did you pursue with respect to him? Why, you absolutely appointed him Chief-governor of Ceylon—you selected him who had been representative of the colonial-office in this House from the year 1822 to the year 1828, during the time of these enormities of our government, to fill one of the highest stations in the colonies you had it in your power to bestow. Was it possible that you could condemn that policy when one of the very men who administered it from the year 1822 to 1828, was appointed colonial secretary; and another of his friends was appointed a Chief-governor of Ceylon? But the right hon. gentleman mistakes the point at issue; and so does every one on his side of the House. We do not deny the great difficulty attending the administration of affairs in Canada. There were great difficulties, some arising perhaps from neglect on the part of former administrations, but the greater part inseparable from the state of society in Canada: inseparable from the fact, that a great mass of the population was of one religion, while those possessed of wealth, intelligence, energy, and education, belonged to another; this being aggravated by other evils peculiar to Canadian society. But what is the charge against her Majesty's government? It is not a denial that they had difficulties to contend with, but the charge we prefer against them is this—that the revolt in Canada—the necessity of putting down that revolt by force of arms—the necessity of extreme severity by the suspension of constitutional rights—might have been averted if ordinary foresight and ordinary vigilance had been exercised. And I do conscientiously believe that proof, showing to demonstration the truth of that charge, can be adduced from the papers which are now lying before me. While admitting the difficulties with which you had to contend, as well as former administrations, arising from the state of society in Canada, I feel perfectly confident, if I had to argue this question before twelve men who were entire masters of these documents, that I should obtain a verdict of guilty against you, and an affirmation of the charge that there have been vacillation, irresolution, and want of foresight, in your policy, sufficient to account for the revolt that broke out in Canada. Again, you say that the charge brought against you is, that your course has been conciliatory. That is not my charge against you. It is not that it has been a conciliatory course; but that you have shown your disposition to conciliate at a wrong time; that your policy has been characterised by inactivity at one moment, and by superfluous and uncalled-for activity at another. I will proceed to show the contrast between your policy and that which was pursued by Lord Aberdeen, whose was not a policy employing force, not a policy of uncalled-for and misplaced rigour, but a policy with which, I challenge you to the proof, that yours will not suffer in the comparison. When Lord Aberdeen entered office, in 1835, he proceeded at once to the consideration of the affairs of Canada. The right hon. gentleman has referred to a dispatch prepared by my noble friend, Lord Aberdeen, and having done so, I think it but fair that he should produce that dispatch. He has no right to show that there existed any inconsistency between me and my noble friend, from the contents of a dispatch remaining in the colonial-office, when that dispatch was not before parliament. I

SIR ROBERT PEEL: I heartily rejoice that I gave to the noble lord who has just sat down (Lord Howick) the opportunity of explaining a charge which was supposed to have been brought by him against my noble friend—of expressing his approbation of the conduct of Lord Aberdeen as colonial minister of this country, and of paying to him a tribute of praise, which I believe to be as justly deserved on the part of my noble friend, as, I must say, it was creditable on the part of the noble lord who paid it. I was surprised at the sensitive and irritable feelings which were displayed by the right hon. gentleman who had but recently closed his address to the House. I should have thought that the chancellor of the exchequer, responsible for his public conduct, having filled the situation of colonial secretary, would have been content to vindicate himself from any imputation brought forward by my noble friend (Lord Stanley); and brought forward, I must say, in no unkind or unfair spirit. I certainly think it an extraordinary principle for the right hon. gentleman to lay down, that because his public conduct has been questioned in fair argument, he, therefore, has a right to attribute to him who questioned it, a departure from those friendly feelings which had heretofore subsisted between the right hon. gentleman and the noble lord. I was surprised at the retaliation of the right hon. gentleman. His conduct was fairly open to be questioned by my noble friend. How was it possible to express an opinion upon the colonial policy of the government, and to attribute the evils which we now assign to that policy, without subjecting the right hon. gentleman's conduct to comment, and in some respects to animadversion. But let me ask the right hon. gentleman, was it perfectly decorous in him to charge my noble friend with misconduct in the colonial department, when he was himself a member of the same government with my noble friend? Your doctrine now is, that the whole of the government is responsible for the act of any particular member of it. If that doctrine be well founded, with what decency do you, who were the colleagues of my noble friend, attribute to him improper conduct in his administration of the duties of the colonial department? With what decency can you charge my noble friend with improper conduct, when you, according to your own showing, shared in the responsibility of every thing he did? Who was it that, after experience of his conduct in Ireland—who was it that called my noble friend to administer the affairs of the colonial department, at the very moment when the most important measure ever connected with that department was about to be submitted to parliament? And do you quarrel now with my noble friend upon the subject of the colonies? Did you then feel all the evils which you now profess to feel as arising from his promptitude and decision? If you had such a feeling in your mind, why did you not at once declare that you would not share in his responsibility. Why do you now come forward complaining of despatches, which you say ought not to have been sent out, and to the sending out of which you attribute all the evils that have arisen in Canada? Would it not have been more becoming in you to have refused your sanction to the sending out of those despatches in the first instance, than now, after the lapse of four years, to bring forward that act of my noble friend as a matter of complaint when your own conduct is impugned? Was it upon the subject of Irish policy or of colonial policy that your union with my noble friend terminated? Was it not on account of his steady and consistent adherence to principles which he declared he would never cease to follow? And when he left your government, did you not at all, una voce, admit that your chief pride and ornament had left you? Did you not all feel that you had lost him who had rescued you from a hundred difficulties, with which, but for his powerful aid you were unable to cope? Did you not all feel that you had lost the most powerful support of your government? I pay you the compliment of believing that you felt all this, because I know you said it. I know it was said by you that, upon public, as well as upon personal grounds, you more deeply regretted your separation in public life from my noble friend than any event that could possibly occur to you. Coming, now, to the more immediate subject of debate, I may state, that I shall proceed at once, without one word of unnecessary preliminary preface, to a consideration of the real questions at issue upon this occasion. They are two-fold; first, the amendment we have proposed; second, the policy which that amendment calls in question. I make no apology for this amendment. This amendment is consistent with every opinion that I have given upon the subject of your colonial policy. That this amendment surprises you is no matter of astonishment to me; because it is an amendment utterly at variance with every principle upon which you have acted in public life. It is an amendment which partakes not of the character of ambiguity, dilatoriness, or irresolution. It is an amendment which contains the sentiments we avow—an amendment that in plain, direct, straightforward terms, arraigns the policy you have pursued. It asks for no confederacy with those to whose opinions we are opposed. It makes no truckling compromise with opposite principles, for the purpose of swelling the numbers of a division. It seeks to found upon it no compact, nor compact alliance. On the contrary, it declares the determination of the conservative party in this House. It declares their determination to support the Crown, and to maintain the authority of the Crown. It expresses satisfaction at the success of her Majesty's arms; but at the same time, consistently with that expression of satisfaction at the success of her Majesty's arms—consistently with that expression of a determination to uphold the authority of the Crown, it expresses in direct terms a want of confidence in the government upon the subject of Canadian policy. And you cannot account for this! You fancy that it can only proceed from some pressure from behind. You are so uncharitable as to judge of us by yourselves. Knowing that in your own case the prevailing influence has been the pressure from behind, you suppose that no other persons can act, unless impelled by the same power. The noble lord, the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, says, that fusion and coalition are the ultimate objects of the amendment. Although I repudiate altogether any concurrence in the motion of the hon. baronet (Sir W. Molesworth), although an amendment has been moved which that hon. baronet cannot support—although it must be well known that the hon. baronet would disclaim concert with me, as much as I should disclaim concert with him, on account of the extreme opinions which we entertain, yet, in spite of all this, the noble lord (Lord Palmerston) cannot discover an assignable motive for this amendment, unless it be intended as the forerunner of a coalition between the hon. baronet and myself. The amendment is objected to on various grounds. First, you say that we have concealed our feelings; that hitherto we have approved of your policy. Is that the fact? Did we approve of your policy during the discussion on the Canada bill? Did I not distinctly declare that I thought it was to the weak vacillating conduct of the ministry that the revolt in Canada has been mainly attributable? When I concurred in your address, and gave my sanction to your bill, can it be said with truth that I approved of your policy? Did I not expressly declare, in the words of the amendment, that, although I would enable the Crown to vindicate its authority—although I cordially rejoiced in the success of her Majesty's arms, yet, that it was to the irresolute, vacillating, and dilatory conduct of the government that I attributed all the evils that had arisen in Canada? The hon. gentleman, the Under-secretary for the Colonies (Sir George Grey,) asks, how it was possible for us to concur in the address voted to her Majesty, and why, if we entertained the sentiments we now express, we did not then move an amendment condemnatory of the government? I will tell the hon. gentleman why it was that we did not. It was because the noble lord (Lord John Russell) expressly invited us to concur in the address, saying that he did not mean, at that moment, to agitate the question of whether the government were to blame or not. And this is the return we meet with. This is what the noble lord said, "The question which I wish to propose this evening to the House is, whether they are prepared to maintain the authority of the Crown in Lower Canada, and not whether her Majesty's ministers are to blame." And then the noble lord went on to say, "If at any future time any hon. member shall think fit to bring the question before the House, I shall be prepared to maintain that we, her Majesty's ministers, are in no respects deserving of censure for the course we have adopted; but the only question for consideration to-night is, what course we ought to adopt for the maintenance of the authority of the Crown in the revolted provinces of Canada." We trusted the noble lord; we trusted to the noble lord, who told us not then to make it a party question. Yes, you told us that the first duty of the House of Commons was to rally round the Throne, and to maintain the authority of the Crown; you told us that to quell rebellion there should be an expression of unanimity on the part of the House; you told us that if we swelled the amount of your majority at that time, we should have an after opportunity, if we thought fit, of impugning the conduct of the government. We believed you. We assented to your address; we moved no amendment; not have been rejected? What right had the hon. gentleman to speak with so much certainty of the fate of propositions which have never been made to the Assembly? The intentions of Lord Aberdeen were but the opinions adopted last year by the government, and embodied in the resolutions then proposed to the House; the commissioners suggested nothing more than was contained in the instructions sent out by Lord Aberdeen, to Lord Amherst, with this exception, that Lord Aberdeen had said that what was to be done should be accomplished only on the Assembly agreeing to discharge the arrears due to the civil authorities and the judges, and enabling those officers to perform their functions. On the granting of these supplies, the colonial-office was willing to consider fair proposals; and if, after his noble friend's propositions had been laid before the legislative assembly, offering to give the members a control over the public revenues, on condition of a proper provision being made for the civil list, and for the due payment of the salaries of the judges and of the civil officers—if, after that, the Assembly had rejected the offer, his noble friend would have come to parliament for assistance; he would have stated, that the offer had been made and that it had been rejected—that government had no other source on which to depend for the payment of the salaries of the judicial and other functionaries than on the produce of the Crown revenues. The parliament would have acted upon this, and would have granted a sum within its control, and the conduct of the government would have prevented an outbreak. I can show, Sir, that the exact contrary course has been pursued—that the hopes held out of an amicable settlement have been defeated in consequence of the unlucky accidents and the conduct of the government and of their officers, notwithstanding that it had been distinctly stated that there was every reasonable prospect of an amicable adjustment. In one place Lord Glenelg attached the utmost importance to the preservation of strict secrecy as to the instructions given to the commissioners, and said that the strict preservation of this silence was essential to the success of their mission, but observed that he could not too earnestly enjoin their great circumspection in this respect; that no indiscreet word should pass, or reference be made to them, but that even in the questions proposed to a witness, and in the very manner and tone in which they were put, this habitual caution should be preserved. Allow me to ask how these instructions were to be accomplished? What was the particular look which the commissioner was to put on, when a person was under examination, to prevent him from having any suspicion of the commissioner's opinions or instructions. Lord Glenelg said, that this silence was most essential to the success of the mission—that great circumspection was to be used, and that this habitual caution was to be preserved—and finished by saying that this course was of the utmost importance for the prevention of jealousies, and to keep alive the goodwill of the Canadians. The commissioners went out; and Lord Gosford opened the legislative assembly in a speech which was well calculated to raise false hopes on behalf of the Canadians. He had not read his instructions to the Assembly; and though his speech was so worded, and was so equivocal, that to an unpractised eye it left the whole matter open, yet in the instructions it was the manifest intention of government that the legislative council should not be rendered elective. If I wanted an instance of misleading I could not select a more flagrant one. Lord Gosford, indeed, stated in round terms that the constitution would be supported by the government, which was willing, however, to sanction such reforms as did not militate against the integrity of the institutions of the country. No man could doubt that he would have declared against an elective council; but instead of so doing, his lordship said, that if the Assembly desired an elective council they might express their opinions on the subject to the government, and thus the Assembly was left without the means of ascertaining the intentions of the government, though it was evident to those versed in the perusal of dispatches that there was to be no elective council. You allowed, however, Lord Gosford to go to Canada, and when he got there he delivered a speech to the Assembly, in which it was left extremely doubtful whether the Canadians were to have a legislative council or not, or whether even the question was perfectly open for consideration. And what was the result? The Canadian Assembly voted an address to the governor, not precisely agreeing with the former hope of adjustment. I wish to establish one or two of these points of policy as a specimen of what might easily be extended to ten or twelve others, and to entreat the particular attention of this House to them, that they may hear what answer the noble lord can make to them. After the first speech of Lord Gosford, all hope of adjustment and accommodation was at an end. Sir George Gipps said, "I did not think that we were ever at liberty to publish the instructions, and even if we had done so, no good effect could have been produced. We were so far successful, that there was every reasonable prospect that on the 9th of the last month the arrears of the last three years and the supplies for the current year would have been granted." It is one of your own commissioners who says this, as if the first speech of Lord Gosford had had so much effect on the Assembly as to induce them to grant the arrears of the supplies for three years. Then what afterwards took place? These instructions, which Lord Gosford had withheld, stating the importance of their being kept secret, were published in extenso by Sir F. B. Head, in Upper Canada. And what was the consequence? "We had," said Sir George Gipps, "the most complete assurance that, on the 9th of March, 1836, the determination to grant supplies for three years was adopted and approved of at a meeting of the persons of the greatest influence in the Assembly, the question being to come on, on the 9th; when on that day, however, the dispatches, which had been published in Upper Canada, reached Quebec, the course of proceeding was at once changed. The question of arrears was at once set aside, supplies for six months were granted, and now the majority of thirty-four or thirty-five was once more reduced to the old minority of eight, though the question of supply had been carried by thirty-five against forty-seven." Now what does this show? That in the first communication made by Lord Gosford the minority in the Assembly was thirty-five to forty-seven. Sir Charles Grey and Sir George Gipps said, that in a private meeting of the leaders of the Assembly, it was determined to grant three years' arrears of supplies; your instructions are then published, and your minority is reduced from thirty-five to eight, and all hopes of accomplishing the end so much desired are thus lost, in consequence of the misconduct of your own officer. Then what said Lord Gosford? He gave the same account of the matter. Every hope which had been entertained failed, and whose fault was it—what was the cause of this—the publication of the instructions occurred? Lord Glenelg communicated the dispatches to Sir F. Head, and although in Lower Canada he had forbidden their publication, he said nothing on that subject with regard to Upper Canada—he gave no command that there should be any caution exercised in their publication, but on the contrary, he told Sir F. Head that he must lay the substance of the dispatches before the assembly in Upper Canada. It was conceived necessary that the two colonies, being closely connected, the assembly of Upper Canada should be made acquainted with the intentions of the government, and so by this course every hope of an amicable settlement was destroyed. Is not this a case, then, in which, from want of foresight, and from irresolute conduct on the part of the ministers, a great evil has arisen? You well knew the state in which the country was; there was a disaffected and dissatisfied body then ready to take advantage of every blunder or false step which you might make; and was it not, therefore, the more imperatively your duty to take care that you did not give an opportunity to them to improve their position against you, in consequence of your apparent negligence? You pursued the same course with reference to the executive government. You deluded them there, too, with false hopes. I am not charging you with any want of conciliation; but that it was through your vacillations and your blunders, that the reasonable hopes which had been entertained of an amicable adjustment were taken away. Then again, you gave the dissatisfied parties a great advantage over you, on account of your exciting hopes for the improvement of the executive council. Now that is the only other point to which I will refer, the noble lord, the member for North Lancashire, having already alluded to the legislative council. Now, how stood the executive council? When you proposed resolutions last year, one of the conditions on which you gained the assistance of public men was, that you would make some improvements in the constitution of the executive council. The privileges and favours, and acts of grace, by granting which you were disposed to reconcile men for the loss of their constitutional privileges, was the very same improvement which you had before promised in the same terms in which your resolutions were couched. A future improvement was promised with respect to them; but would any man for one moment doubt, that at the same time

tial tribunal, was to transfer it to some extraneous jurisdiction, to dispossess the House of Commons of all authority in respect to decisions in controverted elections, and to vest the power in some tribunal, having no necessary connection with the House of Commons. He would avail himself, therefore, of the opportunity which the moving of the order of the day gave him, for the purpose of submitting his general views, not so much in respect to the details of the measure, as to the principles by which, in his opinion, the House should be governed, in sanctioning any amendment of the law respecting the trial of controverted elections. As he was desirous of divesting his observations altogether of party colour, he begged leave at the outset, to state, that the suggestions he should offer were merely his own individual suggestions. He spoke the opinion of no other member; in point of fact, he had conferred with none. He therefore should suffer no disappointment in the event of his observations being deemed by the House unworthy of adoption. He offered them merely as his own individual suggestions. He was most desirous of seeing the difficulties of the present system effectually remedied, and he was most desirous, also, that the discussion on this subject should not partake either of the asperity or bias which party discussions were necessarily subject to. As he stated before, the suggestions he meant to offer were entirely his own, and in order that he might not incur the risk of acting under the influence of party bias, he avoided communicating with any one. He presumed he might take for granted that no party in the House was desirous of upholding the present system, and that for the character of the House, as well as for the sake of securing impartiality in their decisions, it was most desirable that they should apply themselves deliberately to the consideration of a remedy. He thought he might assume, that this was the prevailing opinion of the House. In point of fact, the very reading of the present bill a second time, implied, that the opinion of the House was in favour of some alteration of the present system. This, therefore, being conceded, the question was, what amendment should be proposed? Should they transfer the jurisdiction from the House to some other extraneous tribunal, or should they, while retaining the jurisdiction to themselves, seek to apply a remedy to the admitted evils? He had expressed an opinion the other day, after the strong opinion declared by some gentlemen, in which a considerable body of members appeared to participate, that the time had arrived, when they ought to consider the expediency of a transfer of the jurisdiction; he had expressed a strong opinion that it was desirable that there should be some discussion on the subject. The observations he then made, appeared to meet with considerable concurrence, and he then expressed himself desirous of being understood as by no means pledging himself on the subject, that he intended to apply his mind to the question, and to give it an impartial consideration, but that he reserved the declaration of whatever opinion he might come to, for a future opportunity. He had given this important subject the consideration to which it was entitled, and he must say, that the result was, that he was strongly of opinion that it would not be desirable for the House to part with its jurisdiction. He had entered upon the consideration of this subject, perfectly unprejudiced, with rather, if any thing, from a sense of the defects of the present system, an inclination to part with the jurisdiction, but more mature consideration induced him to take a different view, and, with the permission of the House, he would proceed to state the grounds upon which he entertained a strong opinion that it would not be for the public advantage, or for the character, or interests, or privileges of that House, to divest themselves of jurisdiction over controverted elections. He entertained this opinion upon two grounds, first, there being a strong constitutional objection to the transfer; and secondly, on the ground of the extreme difficulty of constituting a new tribunal to which the jurisdiction should be transferred, or of determining the rules upon which it should proceed in its decisions. When he looked back to the early history of the circumstances under which the House asserted its claim to this jurisdiction, he was bound to say, that he thought that claim was asserted under circumstances which made him most reluctant to part with it. Early in the period, when the great conflict arose between the House of Commons and the Crown, with respect to the assertion of their privileges, the House claimed this as one of its most important rights. He was quite ready to admit, that this jurisdiction might be parted with, without incurring precisely the same risk that accompanied the transfer at the period at which the transfer took place; the jurisdiction was not now so necessary for the maintenance of the independence of the House of Commons; but, while he admitted that the same risk would not accompany the transfer, he must say, that he had come to the conclusion, that it would be most unwise on the part of the House of Commons to part with it. The first instance in which the right of deciding upon controverted elections, became matter of serious controversy between that House and the Crown, was in the reign of Elizabeth. "In that reign, a question arose with respect to the return for the county of Norfolk. The fact was, that the chancellor had issued a second writ for this county, on the ground of some irregularity in the first return, and a different person had been elected. Some notice having been taken of this matter in the Commons, the Speaker received orders to signify to them her Majesty's displeasure, that 'the House had been troubled with a thing, impertinent for them to deal with, and only belonging to the charge and office of the Lord Chancellor, whom she had appointed to confer with the judges about the returns for the county of Norfolk, and to act therein according to justice and right.' The House, in spite of this peremptory inhibition, proceeded to nominate a committee to examine into and report the circumstances of these returns, who reported the whole case, with their opinion, that those elected on the first writ should take their seats, declaring further, that they understood the chancellor and some of the judges to be of the same opinion; but that 'they had not thought it proper to inquire of the chancellor what he had done, because they thought it prejudicial to the privilege of the House to have the same determined by others than such as were members thereof. And though they thought very reverently of the said Lord Chancellor and judges, and knew them to be competent judges in their places, yet in this case they took them not for judges in parliament in this House; and thereupon required that the members, if it were so thought good, might take their oaths, and be allowed of, by force of the first writ, as allowed by the censure of this House, and not as allowed of by the said Lord Chancellor and judges: which was agreed unto by the whole House.' This judicial control over their elections was not lost. A committee was appointed in the session of 1589, to examine into sundry abuses of returns, among which is enumerated, that some are returned for new places; and several instances of the House deciding on elections, occur in subsequent parliaments." This passage was from Hallam's Constitutional History, who went on to say that—"The establishment of the jurisdiction in the hands of the House of Commons, was the consequence of the attempt made by Elizabeth to claim the jurisdiction for the judges of the Court of Chancery. The claim, however, was not abandoned by the succeeding sovereign, for in the first year of James I., the same attempt was made by the Crown, to set aside the precedent established by the House of Commons in the reign of Elizabeth. The attempt was made upon the accession of James I. The question arose, upon this case, between Sir Francis Goodwin and Sir John Fortescue. Sir Francis Goodwin had been elected knight of the shire for the county of Buckingham, and was adjudged by the clerk of the Crown not to have been duly elected, because he was an outlaw. This led to a controversy between the Crown and the House of Commons. The House of Commons presented to the Crown the humble answer of the Commons House of Parliament to his Majesty's objections to Sir Francis Goodwin's case. Objection the first, That we assume to ourselves power of examining of the elections and returns of knights and burgesses which belongeth to your Majesty's chancery and not to us. Our humble petition is, 'That until the 7th of Henry VI., all parliament writs were returnable into parliament, and consequently the returns were then examinable.' That in that year an act was passed, making the writs returnable into the chancery; but, says the Commons, 'The power of parliament to examine and determine of elections remaineth, for so the statute hath been always expounded ever since. The clerk of the Crown hath always used to attend all the parliament time upon the Commons House with the writs and returns; and also the Commons, in the beginning of every parliament, hath ever and used to appoint special committees for examining controversies concerning elections, and returns of knights and burgesses.' This practice is warranted by reason and precedent. By reason, 'Because the court in which the service is due ought to be the court which has the examination of the rights of its members, and it is warranted by precedent.' The House went on to enumerate tecting you? I cannot vote for the motion of the hon. baronet, the member for Leeds, as I think the motion is unjust in its nature. If a minister of the Crown had committed, in his particular department of the government, some act of gross neglect or malversation, or some act for which he was singly responsible, it would be perfectly right that the House of Commons should signify to the Crown its reasons for demanding the removal of the minister from the councils of the Sovereign. In this instance, however, the charge against Lord Glenelg involves an attack on the whole course and policy of the colonial government. But, according to the motion of the hon. gentleman, his object would apparently be attained by the removal of Lord Glenelg from the colonial department, and the substitution of himself, or any other liberal politician, in the place of that noble lord. This, however, will not satisfy me, for you will only relieve all the rest of the government from any responsibility by making the sacrifice of one individual minister, whom you will replace by another individual. The hon. gentleman said that his object was to visit the whole government with censure. Why, then, does the hon. gentleman propose to remove one minister with the view of punishing the whole? Why not regard the colonial policy of the government, not as the act of one minister, but of the whole cabinet, and call on the House to express an opinion on it? The noble lord, the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, made a proposition which would have removed some of the difficulties they now experienced—the noble lord might have pursued a course which, after the panegyric he passed on his noble friend, the Colonial Secretary, appeared to be the natural course, the noble lord might have moved a counter-resolution, implying the approbation of the House for the colonial policy of the government. The hon. baronet gave the noble lord such a fair opportunity that I cannot understand how flesh and blood could hear an attached friend assailed in the way in which the noble lord the Colonial Secretary was attacked, without coming forward to his rescue with such a proposition, and I cannot help feeling that the noble lord, the Secretary for the Home Department, will still adopt this suggestion, as he adopted my amendments to the Canada bill. If the noble lord opposite will propose the counter-resolution, approving of the colonial policy of the government, I will venture to promise on the part of my noble friend, the member for Liverpool, that my noble friend will waive his resolution, and will consent to fight the battle upon this point of the resolution alone. The hon. baronet proposed, “That an humble address be presented to her Majesty, respectfully expressing the opinion of this House that, in the present critical state of many of her Majesty’s foreign possessions in various parts of the world, it is essential to the well-being of her Majesty’s colonial empire, and of the many and important domestic interests which depend on the prosperity of the colonies, that the colonial minister should be a person in whose diligence, forethought, judgment, activity, and firmness, this House and the public may be able to place reliance.” That hon. members mean to negative a resolution which sets forth such an extraordinary collection of qualities in an individual, is not surprising. But it is rather hard on the part of the noble lords and the right hon. gentlemen opposite, to give a direct negative to the proposition that another minister of the Crown—their colleague in office—should be a man of diligence, forethought, judgment, activity, and firmness. I certainly cannot agree to the hon. baronet’s motion, but I trust that a distinct vote of approbation of the Canadian policy of the government will be proposed, upon which the sense of the House can be taken. For the resolution of the hon. baronet, another might be proposed which might run thus:—“That an humble address be presented to her Majesty, respectfully expressing the opinion of this House that, in the present critical state of many of her Majesty’s foreign possessions in various parts of the world, it is essential to the well-being of her Majesty’s colonial empire, and of the many and important domestic interests which depend on the prosperity of the colonies, that the colonial minister should be a person in whose diligence, forethought, judgment, activity, and firmness, this House and the public may be able to place reliance; and seeing that the noble lord at the head of the colonial department does embody in himself these various qualities of diligence, forethought, judgment, activity, and firmness, this House is of opinion that the administration of the affairs of the colonies of this country should continue to be committed to the noble lord.” That is the amendment which I suggest, and if it is taken up by the noble lord, we will withdraw the proposition which we have made, and divide on the noble lord's resolution. And observe, the noble lord has a recent and powerful precedent in favour of such a course. When hon. gentlemen in opposition attacked the Spanish policy of Mr. Canning, Mr. Canning did not content himself with a mere rejection of the resolution; he moved no previous question; he proposed no direct negative; but he moved a counter-resolution, expressing the entire confidence of the House in the line of policy which had been attacked. This is the most recent example of the sort, and its adoption by the noble lord on the present occasion will remove every difficulty. The proceeding of the noble lord has considerably amused me; for after loudly panegyrising the noble lord in another House—to whose great talents and high character I bear a willing testimony—after having gone over the terra-queous globe, for evidences in favour of that noble lord, the noble lord opposite assumed this bold attitude of defiance: he said, "I will move no previous question; I will leave the previous question as a shelter for others; I will"—I thought the noble lord had been going to propose a resolution of perpetual confidence in Lord Glenelg—but, said the noble lord, "I will meet the motion with a flat negative." Surely noble and hon. members will not let the occasion pass over without some faint testimony of approbation of the unhappy victim singled out by the hon. baronet. Sir, I repeat, I cannot vote for the motion of the hon. baronet, because I think it unjust; but at the same time, I cannot vote to negative the motion, because this latter course might be considered as an implied approbation of the Canadian policy of ministers. But this being the case, will the noble lord tell me what course it is which he would have advised us, who entertain strong opinions on the subject, to pursue, or what pretence of a charge there is against us for having embodied our own opinions in resolutions directly charging the government as the cause of the evils which have taken place in Canada. Sir, I do not know what the result of this motion may be; but this I know, that the course which has been adopted by the other side of the House on this debate, of appealing to the political partialities of friends, instead of relying on the justice of the cause, instead of showing that the charges are unfounded, convince me that it is entirely impossible for us—the terms being adhered to in which the resolution was mooted—to meet it in any other way than by a distinct declaration of our opinions. At the same time, it is equally for the honour of the party with which I am connected, that, whatever may be the result of the amendment, it should be so framed as to express the feelings on one point, of even those gentlemen who, while they differ from us as to the government principles of colonial policy, cannot refuse, at least, to approve of our sentiment of exultation at the success of her Majesty's arms, and the restoration of tranquillity in Canada. Of this I am sure, that we should have been charged by you with weakness and timidity, if we had adopted an evasive course, and that we should have been degraded and dishonoured if, when we found ourselves compelled to approach a discussion on the Canadian policy of the government, we had shrunk from declaring that we reprobated the system which had been pursued, and that, manfully adhering to the opinions which we have always expressed, while we are determined to support the authority of the Crown, we will visit with our censure those who we think were the real authors of the revolt, and who have contributed to undermine the power, and weaken the resources of this great empire.

CONTROVERTED ELECTIONS.

APRIL 2, 1838.

On the motion that the Controverted Elections' Bill be re-committed,—

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, that some time since, he expressed an opinion that it would be desirable, before they made any progress with this measure, that there should be a general discussion as to the specific questions which should govern their amendment of the law on this subject. An opinion had been expressed very strongly by some hon. gentlemen, that no attempt to amend the present system, could be effectual for the purpose, and that the only hope of constituting an impar-

that you made the communication, you should have been ready with your act of grace. Can any man doubt, that the country being in the state in which it was, the people being divided, and each party seeking to take advantage of any laches which the government might make, that it was the duty of the government to deprive them of the opportunity of saying, "You have made promises which you have not performed; you did not do as you declared you would; but you have made some vain excuse for your neglect?" In 1836, what said the committee with regard to the executive council? I want to show you the conduct of your own officers, for there can be nothing more singular than their conduct. On the 14th of March, 1836, Sir G. Gipps said, and I request the House to pay attention to what was his evident feeling on the subject—"As the governor, in his speech, on the 27th of October, 1835, declared the constitution of the executive council to be vicious, and promised some alteration, I think we may be expected by this time to have adopted some settled opinion with respect to the alteration which it is proposed shall be made. Why, here is the opinion of your own commissioner, who thinks that some alteration having been promised in the executive council, by the governor, in the month of October, 1835, every one would be struck with the idea that, six months having elapsed, sufficient time had been allowed for the government to make up their minds. In 1837, it appears, matters have got into such a state, that the government is obliged to take fresh means, and they again promise some improvement in the executive council, and then Lord Gosford writes that there is no further excuse for procrastination; but still, when the time comes, nothing is done on the subject of the executive council. You knew the state in which the colony was, but in spite of that, you lay resolutions on the table of the House of Commons. You knew the position of the colony then as well as you did when Lord Gosford made his last speech, and why not say that the difficulties were insuperable, or why not at first take the course which you were afterwards compelled to take? Why not say to Lord Gosford, "We are unable to make a selection, we have implicit confidence in you, and we tell you beforehand, we leave it to you to make the selection, and therefore, exercise the utmost vigilance, and make that selection which appears to be the best." Here we have another instance, and it is the last to which I shall refer, of the failure of the hope of an amicable settlement being come to, and in this case it proceeded from your not having fulfilled the promises which you made. I have thought it best to go into these minute cases, because, if I had dealt in declamation, the noble lord would have said that I rested my case on general statements of charges without having cited any specific case, or without having drawn the attention of the House to any positive instance in which false hopes had been raised, and had not then been realised. I have endeavoured to show a few instances in reference to the conduct of government respecting the executive council, and also in respect of the instructions forwarded to Sir F. Head, and that it was in consequence of your own acts in those instances that the difficulties arose. I will not go into the question with respect to the military force, but it appears to me that there is proof that three years ago there were parties in Canada who were influenced by different feelings in politics, and sufficient warning should have been deemed to be given by that circumstance alone to have induced the government to see the necessity of having a sufficient force in the colony to meet the advances of either party, without one party being called upon to contend with the other. It was not merely your duty to suppress the revolt when it should take place, but you should also have been prepared to meet it with your own power, and without the necessity of calling on either party to defend the colony by means of its voluntary aid. On these grounds it is, that I feel justified in giving my support to the resolution of the noble lord, with a view to expressing my opinion on your conduct with reference to Canada. I am not forced to bring the motion forward in consequence of any pressure from without; but because an hon. gentleman gave notice that he should call the attention of the House to the colonial policy, and I wished to know in what position I and the party with which I have the honour to act, are placed in reference to that motion. At the same time, as I said before, I shall make no apology to the House. But this is a perfectly novel proposition, that the motion should not be agreed to, because there is a chance of displacing the government by it. There is no defence urged by hon. gentlemen opposite, who state they shall oppose both the original motion and the amendments of the Canadian policy of the government. You have not a word to say in vindication of the charge of vacillation and irresolution brought against the government. Every hon. gentleman on the other side, who is not connected with the government, who has addressed the House in the course of the present debate, has abandoned this point, and has admitted that the conduct of the colonial department has been characterised by vacillation, irresolution, and want of foresight. The first hon. member who addressed the House last night after the noble lord, the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, was the hon. member for Marylebone, who said—I took his words down at the time—"I think that the Canadian policy of the government is exceedingly bad," although the noble lord, the Foreign Secretary, who spoke immediately before the hon. gentleman, had said that the Canadian policy of the government was the first and brightest gem in the course of policy pursued by the present government. The hon. gentleman was followed by other hon. members on the same side, who declined voting for the amendment; but, at the same time, every one of these hon. gentlemen said, that he could not approve of the conduct of government as regarded the affairs of Canada; but all joined in a general chorus against the amendment, because they said they thought, if it were successful, we should succeed to office. Was this a sufficient reason for withholding assent to the proposition before the House? The right hon. gentleman, however, had been searching for grounds of consolation for a beaten government. The right hon. gentleman read an amusing piece of writing as to the degree of beating which a government could receive consistently with its continuance in office. The right hon. gentleman looked back, under the infliction of the stripes received last week—for, out of the five divisions which took place last week, the government were beaten upon four of them—for some consolation to the number of defeats sustained by former administrations. "I will apply," said the right hon. gentleman, "to the records of past beatings, to see what degree a government can sustain, and continue to exist." The right hon. gentleman quoted several occasions where former governments had continued after being defeated, and quoted the instance of the salt-tax and other measures, when, he said, the Tory government were severely beaten. I could, however, in addition to the cases quoted by the right hon. gentleman, mention other instances of men remaining in office after repeated beatings. Notwithstanding the conduct of all that have preceded us, notwithstanding all the cases quoted by the right hon. gentleman, and notwithstanding, what I never doubted, his tenacity of life under the infliction of a severe beating—tenacity, however, which I admit is produced by the same motive which influenced myself while in office, namely, a sense of duty to those with whom I acted—I am afraid that the right hon. gentleman, with all his tenacity of life, could hardly survive, if beaten under the present circumstances. The right hon. gentleman asked, how can we persevere in our amendment, seeing we are incapable to form a government, in case we should drive the present administration from office? But I trust we are to come to a division on the colonial policy of the government; not on our power to form an administration. I have not to consider, at the present moment, what government could be formed; I have only to look to what the honour of the conservative party demands, for the purpose of vindicating their heretofore expressed opinions as to the misconduct and weakness of the government in its Canadian policy. The hon. baronet brings forward a motion on the subject, and what would the right hon. gentleman have me do? Would he have me absent myself from the House altogether? Not to appear here and avow my opinion, as long as I have a seat in the House, would be a course of proceeding to which I shall never assent. I might be compelled to give my vote on any particular question from a sense of duty, or a question might be put in such a way, that I could give no opinion either on the one side or the other; but this I never would consent to, namely, to refuse to appear here, and abstain from expressing my opinion on any particular line of policy. This is what I have never done, and it is what I never will consent to. But would the right hon. gentleman have us to move the previous question? Alas! you have so damaged the previous question, that, for some time to come, no gentleman will like to be seen in its company. After the exhibition you made of the previous question last week, you can hardly wish for the renewal of it; and what would you say to me if I proposed it, for the purpose of shielding and pro-various precedents in the reign of Elizabeth, in which the exclusive right to adjudicate upon controverted elections was reserved to the House."

The example had been followed in every popular assembly constituted in any state that had adopted the British constitution as its model. He believed that, without exception, in all states in which a free government prevailed, the popular branch of the constitution had claimed those privileges as peculiarly belonging to a popular assembly. They claimed the exclusive right of examining into the qualification and due return of its members, and nothing but the strongest conviction that justice would not be done, could make it expedient, in his opinion, to part with the power which the House of Commons possessed. Although, therefore, upon constitutional grounds he was of opinion that it was of the utmost importance that the House should not part with its exclusive privilege of adjudication upon the rights of its members, at the same time he must say, that this must be subordinate to considerations of justice. Justice must be administered, and he did not hesitate to say, that, provided they could not have a guarantee for the administration of impartial justice from the present system, a strict adherence to it ought not to prevail. But he feared that the utmost difficulty would be found in constituting a new tribunal, supposing the House to be determined upon the expediency of making the experiment of a transfer. To what tribunal was the jurisdiction to be transferred? He apprehended that they would not be satisfied to transfer it to any inferior authority to that which adjudicated upon the civil rights and liberties of her Majesty's subjects. He should think it would be expected that the judges of the land, or some others of equal authority, should, in case they parted with the jurisdiction, be the parties who should exercise it. He had the strongest objection to mixing up the judges in matters of mere politics. The judges, in the execution of their duty, must, no doubt, decide upon political matters. Great questions of political libels, sedition, and treason, were determined upon by them; but, then, the adjudication of controverted elections partook of party, as distinguished from political considerations; and he must confess, considering the universal satisfaction that now prevailed with the administration of civil and criminal justice in this country, and the universal conviction that it was as important as the administration of justice itself, that there should be no suspicion of partiality, he thought that this universal feeling of confidence might be seriously weakened, if they made the judges of the land the persons to adjudicate upon party disputes. But then, again, would they intrust this power to a single judge? Supposing they overruled the objection, as to the danger of prejudicing the character of the judge, by devolving upon him a duty partaking of a political character, would they in all cases devolve upon a single judge the duty of determining both the law and the fact of controverted elections? If they did so, he thought that this would be a monstrous power to give to a single judge, to decide both the law and the fact in cases of controverted elections. If, on the other hand, they adhered more closely to the general principles of the law, would they have any security that a jury, however constituted, would be more free from political bias than the members of the House. Or would they sanction, in this case, a departure of that great principle of our jurisprudence which required an absolute unanimity amongst the jury to convict? In his opinion, if they did not require unanimity in this case, they would be originating a precedent for a very serious encroachment upon the constitution of juries, as established in this country. If they required unanimity on the part of the jury, he thought it would be very difficult to select a jury of twelve men who, in matters involving so many dubious points in law, and so many intricate matters of fact, should arrive at an unanimous verdict. There was another point also, which suggested itself to the House, with reference to any contemplated external judicature in controverted elections. Would they require of the judge, who was to try these cases, the same strict adherence to law as in purely legal cases in the courts of Queen's Bench and Common Pleas? If so, in his opinion, there would be many cases which parliament would investigate and visit, which in the application of the strict letter of the law might escape. It appeared to him, therefore, that if a judge were appointed to try election petitions, either he must be guided by the moral principles and discretion of parliamentary law, or he must depart from all the rules and principles which had hitherto guided election committees, to the strict legal doctrines which prevailed in the courts of law. Now, either of these alternatives appeared to him to be open to great objection; he thought it equally objectionable that the rules of the courts of law, should be rigidly adhered to in election cases, or that the judges should have to administer a species of law with which they were not familiar, and which was applied by parliament, rather on lax and equitable principles, than by well-defined rule, and which differed materially from the strict statute, or common law of the country. On this double ground, he thought the Crown would find so much difficulty in appointing a tribunal for this particular purpose, that nothing but an insurmountable ease of necessity, amounting to demonstration, should induce the House to forego its present privilege of deciding upon the seats of its members. At the same time, if it could be proved, that justice could not be done without seeking a new tribunal, that would be such an argument of necessity, as would, of course, overrule all his objections. It was, however, because he did not despair of finding a tribunal in this House better qualified, in his opinion, than any other, to decide upon these points, and better calculated to give a verdict which should meet the impartial justice of the case, and give general satisfaction to all parties, that he should support the retention of this judicial authority by the House. He was far from abandoning the hope of being able to constitute within this House a better tribunal in these matters than could be constituted any where else, and of the perfect impartiality of which, as well as of their competency, there could be no doubt or suspicion. Whatever course they took—whether they retained their jurisdiction in its present form, or consented to its entire transfer to an extraneous tribunal, or whether they retained it in a modified and altered form, he thought the suggestion of his noble friend (Lord Stanley) was well worthy of consideration, and that a committee ought to be appointed, with a view to determine by what preparatory law they could put an end to the doubts and differences of opinion which prevailed upon several points of election law, and which led to adverse and conflicting decisions. At the same time, he must say, that the complaints against election committees, arose frequently from the mode of selection, and from having young and inexperienced men to adjudicate upon points of law which were full of doubts and difficulties, and on which great differences of opinion prevailed. He thought, therefore, that a declaratory law, clearing up existing doubts, would be an important preliminary to whatever form of tribunal they might hereafter decide upon adopting. Let the House take, for example, the question of distance, the mode of admeasurement of the seven miles. What could be easier than for the House to decide that? Let them look to the question of trusteeship of chapels, upon which the revising barristers were constantly coming to opposite conclusions. Was it to be wondered at, then, that election committees, having such questions to decide, should be confused by the opposite decisions, and should come to conclusions different from those arrived at by other committees, and without the slightest ground of partiality? Why, he asked, should not parliament interfere under such circumstances? Let them take the case of an overseer, who had the power, by his own neglect, to disfranchise 100 persons. Surely, nothing could be more unjust, than that any public officer should be allowed, through his own neglect, and without any fault of theirs, to disfranchise a large number of voters. So there were many other questions of a similar nature, and of the like importance, which, he thought, on a careful review by a well-selected committee, might be set at rest. He did not, however, overvalue in extent the importance of judicial decisions of this kind; for it would be almost impossible to anticipate and lay down the law, upon the points of difficulty or dispute which might possibly arise. For the House to step in to define what bribery was, for instance, would be almost impossible, so as to foresee and guard against every variety of circumstance under which it might present itself. Therefore, whilst he thought it desirable that the House should declare the law upon some disputed points, which had already arisen and become ascertained, he did not expect, having done that, they would have gone very far towards removing all the evils and difficulties of the present system, though he thought they would have done much towards preventing unnecessary litigation and expense, which was, in his opinion, one of the main evils attendant upon every process of trial in this country. They would be doing much in clearing up and setting at rest disputed points, which, as long as they remained doubtful, induced speculative men to enter upon litigation, and engage themselves and others in much unnecessary and fruitless expense. This would operate as a relief equally to members and to their constituent bodies. He hoped, therefore, that the House, without entertaining the idea of establishing new tribunals in this matter, would appoint a committee upon the subject. This, he considered, would be an essential preliminary in any case, whether with the view to the establishment of a new tribunal or not. As far as the time which he had for the purpose would allow him, he had endeavoured to ascertain what were the practices of assemblies, answering to the House of Commons, in the different countries of the world, where a constitutional form of government existed. The result of these inquiries was, that he found it uniformly, and without exception, to be the case, that these assemblies had adopted the principle acted upon by the British House of Commons, namely, that of deciding for themselves upon the qualifications and seats of their members. Without tiring the House with a variety of details from all these quarters, he would select, as the two most important instances, the practices of France and of the United States. In France, the ultimate decision upon every return was entirely in the Chambers, so that they were there very much in the position in which this House was, before 1770, when the Grenville Act was introduced. The French Chambers did not devolve upon any committee the business of deciding upon the seat of a member, but reserved that final right to the whole constituent assembly. The right hon. baronet read the following statement from a paper of the French practice:—

“A detailed account is kept, in each Electoral College, of all the proceedings that take place day by day, during the progress of the election. It includes a statement of the fact, that all the formalities required by the law have been observed—the claims of voters—the protests against alleged irregularities in the proceedings.

“These detailed accounts, or procès verbaux, are sent by the Prefect of the Department to the Minister of the Interior, and by him are transmitted to the Chamber of Deputies.

“Petitions by parties interested, complaining of irregularities at the election, may be addressed directly to the Chamber of Deputies.

“Each member sends to the Chamber the proof of his qualification. That is, a certificate of his birth, and certificate of his payment of his amount of taxes, required by law to constitute his pecuniary qualification.

“The verification of the rights of the deputies to their seats is the first duty of the Chamber.

“The day after the opening of the session, the Chamber is divided by lot into the nine bureaux. There are 459 deputies; each bureau, therefore, consists of 51 deputies.

“The procès verbaux of the elections, and every document relating to the elections, are divided among these bureaux, each of which meets in a separate apartment.

“Every bureau makes a report to the Chamber, on the subject of the elections of which it has had charge, and recommends that they shall be declared valid, or annulled, as the case may be.

“The Chamber divides on each.

“The general principle observed in France is—

“1. That the whole Chamber of Deputies, and that authority alone, can pronounce definitively on the validity of an election.

“2. The final decision on every question connected with the validity of an election, the rights of the electors, the regulating of the proceedings, the qualification of the member, is with the Chamber.

“3. Every thing which precedes the final discussion and decision of the Chamber, is merely a preliminary examination, intended for the information and instruction of the Chamber. The decisions are presumed to constitute the rule by which future decisions in analogous cases are regulated.”

Having read these particulars to the House, he must say that he apprehended that the practice of France could not form a rule for their proceedings on the present subject; for if any one would take the trouble to refer to the debates which took place in the House at the time of passing the Grenville Act, he would see that the general adjudication of the House upon contested elections was considered one of the most objectionable features of the old system. He would now beg the attention of the House to a few particulars of the same kind from the United States, which he had from a person of very good authority, in whom he placed the highest reliance:—

“Exercising important political powers, his political opinions are generally in accord with those of the majority. He appoints all the standing and select committees, though by a rule of the House, the House may do it if they please. This, however, is rarely done, except in relation to select committees under peculiar circumstances, or when it is desirable to the Speaker that it should be done.

“There is no other security as to fairness or impartiality, in the appointment of committees by the Speaker, than that which a high sense of duty and a just regard for his own character and that of the House may be supposed to inspire.

“In the construction of the important committees of the House, where subjects involving political principles, or affecting the existing administration, political considerations must operate, at least so far as to give a majority of the committee to the dominant party. The committee of privileges and elections is, however, free from the objection of political bias than most others.

“Objections on this score have been sometimes made, especially under high party excitement, and can be urged against the report of the committee when it comes into the House. Few decisions of the committee are reversed, and in a service of more than fourteen years, I have not, I think, known more than one or two reversals. The system has generally worked well, and no effort has ever been made, within my knowledge, to change it.

“All contested elections are submitted to the committee of elections in the first instance, who examine and report their opinion, with the evidence, if desired by either party, or the House, or deemed by them necessary.

“The rules are, that all committees shall be appointed by the Speaker, unless otherwise directed by the House, in which case they shall be appointed by ballot.

“It will be the duty of the committee of elections to examine and report upon the certificates of election, or other credentials of the members returned to serve in the House, and to take into consideration all such petitions and other matters touching elections and returns, as shall or may be presented to come into question, and have been referred to them by the House.”

It would be seen from this that the committee of privileges of the United States did not differ very widely from the election committees of this House, except that the power of adjudication was, in the United States, in the House. Having entered sufficiently into these circumstances, he would now approach what appeared to him to be the most important question which this subject involved, namely, what practical remedy the House should adopt in respect to the adjudication of contested elections, assuming that it retained its jurisdiction in this matter. He thought it could not be denied, that for many years after the Grenville Act was passed, it worked practically well; and he (Sir Robert Peel) certainly recollected that in his earlier parliamentary career, he had not heard so many objections urged against it as had lately been raised. He would very briefly state what, in his opinion, were the chief defects of the present system. In the first place, all the preparatory proceedings were of a nature to taint the rest. Each party naturally endeavoured to secure as numerous an attendance of the adherents of his party as possible, and the consequence was, that the public saw an unusually large assemblage drawn together, for the purpose of striking an election committee, and a degree of excitement and zeal prevailing amongst the members of both parties, which very ill accorded with all the moral notions of a judicial proceeding. When men assembled together in large numbers, for any purpose calculated to awaken their political feelings, they were much more liable to be betrayed into party decisions than they would be, individually, if invested alone in their own persons with certain duties, and duly sensible of the responsibility which they incurred. If any thing could induce him to give a partial decision, it would be the excitement which prevailed in the House itself on the appointment of election committees. There was, also, this to guard against—how far the scruples which might induce an over-punctilious man to give a decision, contrary perhaps to his own impression of the case, for fear of incurring the imputation of having acted under the influence of party bias. His opinion was so strong against this preliminary step, and the stamp which it gave to all subsequent proceedings, that, in his opinion, nothing could remedy it. Supposing even the wish to be on all hands to guard against any thing like an undue influence of party in the constitution of the committee, yet had it not frequently occurred, with perfect fairness in the mode of the selecting the committee, that it had been composed of ten members of one party, and only one of another? In two or three instances, which he at the present moment remembered, that had been the case. Another error, to which the present system was subject, was, in his opinion, the predilection of the parties themselves to exclude from the committee those very men whose opinion on such a subject was likely to have most weight. A party to a contested election, having full confidence in the abilities of a very clever counsel, whose services he had retained, preferred rather to have it in his hands to address a committee composed of gentlemen who knew little or nothing about the matter, than to submit his case to a committee of experienced men whose opinions were known to have weight and authority. These were a few of the objections to which the present system was liable; and in coming, in the next place, to consider what could be done to remedy these defects, he must say, that, after all that had been proposed by others, he had very great hesitation in offering any suggestions on the subject. He was desirous, in the first place, of doing away with the practice of summoning members for the purpose of having their names drawn upon a committee, and he wished also to exclude, as far as possible, the influence of party, and to do away with the practice of excluding members whose authority should have most weight in matters of this kind. With these objects in view, he should propose, that after a general election, the first act of the House should be to determine who were liable to serve upon election committees. Some extent of service should be prescribed, also, which should entitle a member to exemption from subsequent committees; for he did not think, for instance, that a man's having served upon a committee on a petition, which went off in half an hour, on a point of form, should entitle him to exemption. Whether or not the members of government should be liable to serve, was a point which he should leave to themselves. He very much doubted, also, whether he should exclude those members from participation in election committees who happened to be themselves petitioned against. Indeed, he could not see any wise or reasonable principle upon which they could be excluded from this duty, whilst they were permitted to exercise every other right and power as members of that House. He thought, also, that this rule held out a great inducement to parties to petition against members, for the mere purpose of preventing them from sitting on election committees. He thought the House should facilitate bona fide petitions as much as possible, but that, at the same time, it should give no encouragement to frivolous petitions, which had no other object than that of crippling the public service of the member so petitioned against. It was still a matter of doubt with him whether this rule should be abandoned, but, at the same time, he threw out the point as one deserving of consideration. Having once determined who were liable to serve on election committees; they came now to the great difficulty of appointing an assessor, or judge, whose authority should guide and have weight with the committee. He saw a very great objection against calling repeatedly upon the Speaker, in matters of this kind. It was certainly of the utmost importance that the Speaker should hold the scales of justice between contending parties; but, at the same time, he thought it extremely desirable, that he should not be continually liable to be called on to settle disputed points between conflicting parties. All he (Sir R. Peel) would call upon the Speaker to do, would be one single act, which he was sure he would perform with the most perfect impartiality and integrity, and in a manner to give satisfaction to all parties. What he should call upon the Speaker to do, would be to nominate a committee, which he should call a general committee for elections, and which he should propose should consist of very few members, perhaps four or six, or some such limited number. The House and the country, he was sure, would cheerfully repose confidence in the perfect impartiality with which the Speaker would in all cases proceed to nominate the general committee. Perhaps it might be desirable to require the consent of the House to the committee, when nominated by the Speaker; or it might be deemed better and simpler to leave the matter finally in the hands of the Speaker. This, however, was a point upon which he (Sir R. Peel) was indifferent, though he thought it so easy to constitute a general committee of this kind with perfect fairness, that the matter might safely be left in the hands of the Speaker. The committee so appointed would be perfectly impartially constituted; and to this committee, acting under the obligation of an oath, he would leave the duty of appointing the select committees which were to try all election petitions. Suppose, for instance, there were thirty election petitions pending, the general committee of four or six, would have to select thirty committees to try these petitions, either by selecting thirty election committees in the first place, and then appropriating them to the several petitions by ballot, or by selecting the committee individually to try each particular petition. He must say, however, for his own part, that he was so averse to every thing having the colour of chance about it, that he should much prefer the latter course, of appointing a distinct committee to try the merits of each particular petition. Suppose, for instance, there was a petition from Dublin. He would leave it to the general committee to appoint a committee to try the merits of the petition, with full confidence that they would select a competent and impartial committee for the purpose. In the next place, he should propose, that the election committees should be more limited in their numbers. He thought seven would be quite enough to form a committee, perhaps five might be too few; but he should have no objection to reduce the number to seven or nine. If it was thought that mistakes might still be made, and persons be nominated by the general committee, to whom some personal objection might reasonably apply, it might be desirable that the general committee should, in the first place, appoint eleven or thirteen names, giving the parties to the petition a limited right to strike. Suppose, for instance, seven were to be the constituent number of an election committee, it might still be a question whether the general committee would appoint those seven at once, or whether they should nominate eleven, giving the parties on either side a right to two strikes. In the next place, it was desirable, he thought, to give the committees the aid of assessors. In order to do this, they might either compose the committee of six members, with a legal assessor, who should be their chairman, with the voice and authority of a judge, and equal in every respect to any other member of the committee; or they might constitute the committee of seven members, and give them the assistance and aid of an assessor. There were one or two points, upon the respective merits or preferableness of which he would then give no opinion. One very great difficulty in the appointment of assessors would be this; that the call for their services would not be uniform or permanent. At the first meeting of parliament, after a general election, there would naturally be a comparatively large number of petitions, and the services of several assessors would, of course, be required; whilst, in subsequent years, there might only occur two or three contested elections. If a permanent staff of assessors, therefore, were to be kept up, the public would be burdened with the salaries of officers whose services were only required for one year out of every four or five. Upon this point, therefore, he should be inclined to copy the principle of an Irish act, and provide, that all persons who were willing to act in this capacity, should notify their willingness to the House, and that they should be selected from the list so formed, by the general committee, for the particular cases which occurred to require them. At the same time, he would have it understood by those parties, that whilst the House was willing to pay them liberally for their services whilst the occasion for them lasted, its connection with them ceased with the occasion, and that the House was at full liberty to choose where it pleased on all subsequent occasions. With regard to a court of appeal, to ratify or dissent from the decisions of the general body, he thought there were such objections to this tribunal, that it ought to be avoided unless it was found absolutely necessary, or unless the points in dispute were of too grave a nature to be left to the determination of a single judge. These were the general principles on which he supposed a tribunal might be constituted within the walls of parliament, free from the objections which applied to that which at present existed. He should have no attendance of members on the ballot. He should exclude the operation of chance. He should have a preliminary committee, fairly selected from those sitting in the House, who should have the benefit of a legal adviser, who might regulate their decisions, in a manner not only consonant with justice, but in such a way as to ensure satisfaction on the part of the House. He should also ensure on each committee the presence of a competent number of members experienced in the forms of the House, and who should not be disqualified on the ground of ability and experience. He did not conceive it necessary to trouble

the House with any further suggestions, in addition to those he had already stated, and which were exclusively his own. The bill of the hon. gentleman contained many of the objections which applied to the present system. It was defective as to the initiatory proceedings, which were left by it under all the influence of party excitement; because there would continue the same motives, the same manifest interest for each party to attend in as great numbers as possible. And, on the whole, unless he saw some chance of remedying the main defects of the present system, by some course fundamentally different, he could not see any advantage in a change merely providing for subordinate defects. All the main objections to the present system remained in force against that which was now submitted, besides others of minor importance, which peculiarly applied to it. With respect to the appointment of an assessor, he thought it of so much importance that adverse litigant parties should both choose a tribunal for the decision of their disputes, that he would invite them to an agreement on this point, and do all that could reasonably be done to effect that object. And when he knew how often parties coincided in the appointment of an assessor, he could not help thinking that when the services of men of eminence were secured, both by the honour of the station and the ample remuneration which attached to it, there would be no great difficulty in getting adverse parties to agree to an assessor. It was a sound principle of jurisprudence, generally acted on, that when litigating parties could do so, they ought to adopt friendly arbitration. These were the suggestions which he thought it right to offer, after having given the subject the best consideration which he could, and which, at any rate, were not founded in any lurking desire to secure advantage to party. "I do feel," said the right hon. baronet, "that the interest and honour of the House are concerned in the amendment of this system. I do believe, that the interests of justice are involved in its amelioration, and I am satisfied that this House, which professes to be governed by principles of honour and integrity, must necessarily entertain the strongest desire that any tribunal appointed to decide controverted elections, shall, as far as possible, partake of that integrity, and honour, and be free from the imputation of partiality."

Bill to be committed on the 11th of May.

LORD DURHAM'S MISSION.

APRIL 3, 1838.

The Marquis of Chandos proposed a motion to the following effect:—"That the expenditure, for one year, on the establishment of Lord Gosford, as Governor-general, amounted to £12,678; that such establishment was founded on a just and liberal scale, and is a proper precedent to be acted upon in the case of the establishment of the Earl of Durham."

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, he had heard such extraordinary comments made in the course of this debate, upon the motives of his noble friend, with whom this motion had originated, and upon the demand made in the House of Commons with respect to the public expenditure, that he felt it absolutely necessary to rise for the purpose of protesting against the precedent sought to be established. He thought, that the hon. gentlemen, who, with a very natural feeling, prompted by fraternal affection, had risen on that side of the House, could not imply, that the opposition had shown any disposition unfairly to question the appointment of Lord Durham. He did not consider that they were entitled to call in question the qualifications of the Earl of Durham for the office to which he had been appointed. Her Majesty had the unquestionable prerogative of selecting whom she should think proper to fill that office; and he should think it inconsistent with the respect which he owed to the Crown, and the privileges which the Crown exercised, if he made the particular qualifications of the noble earl the subject of discussion in the House of Commons. He must say, that he had not heard, in the course of the debate upon the Canadian affairs, any expression which Lord Durham had a fair right to complain of. He did believe, that never had any appointment been made, which, considering the excitement that prevailed with respect to party politics, had been treated with more perfect fairness by the opponents of her Majesty's ministers, than the appointment of Lord

Durham. He considered this question to be one entirely apart from the jurisdiction of the House of Commons; but, at the same time, he must contend for the absolute right of the House of Commons to bring forward propositions relative to the public expenditure. And he must say, that the noble lord (Lord John Russell) had not discharged his duty in a manner becoming a minister of the Crown, when, upon this question of expense being raised, the noble lord imputed it to unbecoming motives. What would have been said of the opposition, in the government, if the opposition had questioned the expenditure of any public office, if no satisfactory answer had been given to the question, but they had taunted their opponents with unfairness, or if, in questioning the expense of a public establishment or arrangement, they had imputed to the opposition that they had been influenced by motives of party hostility or mean malignity? Such conduct would have been justly characterised as little short of treason to the privileges of the House of Commons, and an insult to the understanding of its members. In professing his concurrence with the course pursued throughout the Canada discussion, he neither meant to raise any question as to the qualifications of Lord Durham, nor did he then question them in the slightest degree; but, consistently with that intention, he had a perfect right, and after the manner in which he had been challenged, he would exercise the right of inquiry, whether or not the establishment proposed for Lord Durham did not exceed the just bounds of economy? He did not, in this respect, find any fault with Lord Durham—the fault he found was with her Majesty's government. He must say, that the first letter written by Lord Glenelg to Lord Durham, the first letter that appeared in the papers, was a letter without precedent, as being addressed by a minister of the Crown to a public officer. The House would from thence see, that if the establishment proposed by Lord Durham had been ten times more extravagant than it was, the imputation would not have rested upon the department which left Lord Durham the exclusive judge of his own expenditure. He would ask, was it ever known, that a minister of the Crown addressed a letter of this kind to a public officer, about to proceed in the execution of his duty? Supposing it were desirable to prescribe beforehand the establishment, what authority ought there be to limit that establishment? Was it the individual himself, or was it the Treasury, after communication with that individual, and with the department to which he was responsible? [Lord John Russell: So it was.] The noble lord said, So it was. But look at the letter of Lord Glenelg. No previous arrangement having been made on the subject, it apparently never occurred to the government to determine what ought to be the proper outfit or establishment. But here was the letter of Lord Glenelg:—

“My Lord—I have the honour to inform you, that a desire has been expressed by a member of the House of Commons in his place, that a statement of your lordship's establishment, as Governor-general of the British North American provinces, and her Majesty's high commissioner for the adjustment of certain affairs in Canada, should be laid before the House. Lord John Russell, on the part of her Majesty's government, having assented to this request, I shall be obliged, if your lordship will furnish me with a statement of your establishment for this purpose.

“The Right Hon. the Earl of Durham, G. C. B., &c. &c.”

He would say, then, upon the terms of this letter, which was to be consulted for the purpose of ascertaining the meaning of the writer, that it appeared to him that never were terms made use of which could more clearly acknowledge Lord Durham as the judge of the establishment which ought to accompany him to Canada; and he was surprised that Lord Durham, with the natural desire of every man going on any eminent service, in the first place, that that service should be effectually performed, and next, that those who accompany him should be amply remunerated, did not seek for a still more extensive establishment: but the treasury of the country should be the judge to correct this natural feeling in its officer, and to curtail within proper limits the establishment with which he ought to be accompanied. The course pursued by her Majesty's government, he repeated, was entirely without precedent. He was bound to say of these estimates, admitting to the full extent the natural desire on the part of the noble lord to ensure the efficiency of his mission, and admitting also, that true economy often consisted in a sound and judicious exercise of liberality, admitting the weight of all these considerations, he was bound to say, that he thought the noble lord's estimate of the expenses of his mission to be much larger than was necessary. First, there was a chief secretary, with a salary of £1,300 a year, then a military secretary, at £700 a year, and then, two under-secretaries; he did not mean to say 200 secretaries, though perhaps, in so saying, he might only be anticipating what was to follow; no, but there were two under-secretaries, at £300 a year each, and then, besides all these, were to be a private secretary, and a legal adviser. Now, looking at these appointments only, if his opinion was asked on the subject, he was bound to say, that he considered them exceedingly large; he thought them enormous in reference to the duties which were to be performed. With respect to the legal adviser, with the salary of £1,500 a year, the noble lord, the Secretary for the Home Department, said, that he was not in the slightest degree aware of who was intended to fill that situation. Now, that being the case, he was really sorry for the noble lord's ignorance on the subject. The noble lord was, in this instance, like the phoenix, a vast species alone, for he could venture to say, the noble lord was the only man in the House who did not know who the legal adviser of Lord Durham was to be. He would undertake, at least, to say, that there were many members, composing what was termed "her Majesty's opposition," who could confidentially inform the noble lord upon the subject, if called upon. [Name.] He certainly should not have considered himself entitled to name the individual to whom he referred, as the communication had been made to him privately, and it might possibly happen that he was mistaken. But of this he was quite sure, that in the communication which had been made to him, a trap had not been laid for the purpose of misleading him. And as the hon. and learned member for Liskeard was one of those who called upon him to name the intended legal adviser of Lord Durham, he would only say, that when the hon. and learned gentleman said to him, "I shall not be among you when the controverted election bill is discussed," that observation gave him distinctly to understand, that at the period in question the hon. and learned gentleman's face would be directed towards the western possessions of her Majesty. Now this was an inference, which, coupling the declarations of the hon. and learned gentleman himself, with the rumours which were previously in circulation on the subject, he thought a very remarkable one. [No!] Oh, then, the hon. and learned member went out gratuitously, and in that case there was another candidate for the office of legal adviser. He thought, that, when any one who knew the rumour previously in circulation, and then coupled with it the information which the hon. and learned gentleman volunteered to confide to him, that he should not be here when the controverted elections bill was discussed, he might very fairly infer, that nothing would induce the hon. and learned member to abandon this measure, but the hope of rendering valuable service to the public, by giving legal advice to the Governor-general of the Canadas. If he was mistaken in drawing this conclusion, he could only say, that he was extremely sorry for it; but that, at the same time, it was one into which he had fallen bona fide. However the case might be, he must say, that he thought these half-confidences were very inconvenient, or at least the hon. and learned member ought to have added a postscript, or warning note, to this effect:—"Mind, I am not going to be legal adviser to the Governor-general of the Canadas." He must say, that he was rejoiced to hear, that the hon. and learned gentleman was not to be the legal adviser of Lord Durham; not from any personal objection to the hon. and learned gentleman, or from any doubts as to his qualifications for such an office; but because he thought that, if these appointments were too freely given to members of parliament, it might amount to a virtual evasion of the statute of Anne, which rendered the appointment to a new office, inconsistent with a seat in that House. Now, as to the necessity for the office at all, he must say that, considering that the act which Lord Durham would have to administer was one of the very plainest and simplest description, he thought that the taking out a law adviser upon the subject, in addition to all the other secretaries, was quite unnecessary and uncalled for. Then, again, was the point of outfit, upon which he thought that the House of Commons ought to have some information. With respect to the motion of his noble friend, the question was simply this; that the establishment of Lord Gosford was a fair precedent to regulate that of Lord Durham. Now he put it to the House whether there was any thing unfair in this very simple proposition. The hon. member for Limerick, who considered that Lord Gosford's establishment was too large, thought also that that of Lord Durham ought not to exceed it. If that were the hon. member's view of the case, it would be impossible for him to oppose the present motion, for he who opposed the present motion, must either hold the proposition that this was a subject which was not within the legitimate cognizance of the House of Commons, or must be prepared to maintain that the resolution was niggardly and parsimonious in its allowance of expenditure. The hon. member for Kilkenny had taunted the hon. member who had succeeded him, for what had fallen from him on this occasion, but did the hon. member mean, succeeded him as member for the county of Middlesex, or in the advocacy of the doctrines of economy? For it so happened, that the hon. gentleman had not only ceased to represent the county of Middlesex, but also to uphold the right of the House of Commons to meddle in matters concerning the public economy, without exposing itself to the imputation of personal malignity, or disappointment, or other unworthy motives, to those who brought the subject forward. The hon. gentleman declared that this was the first occasion on which the advocacy of economy had proceeded from this (the opposition side of the House). Now, it was always a tedious and invidious task to enter upon comparisons between the economical arrangements of one government or another—but he would beg to state a few facts, illustrative of the feelings of government, when he (Sir R. Peel) and his friends were in office. [Mr. Hume: I did not allude to you.] Oh, the hon. member did not allude to him (Sir R. Peel). Perhaps, he only alluded to the younger members of that side. However, he was going to show that the attack of the hon. member against former governments, on the score of want of economy, was unfounded; and he should proceed to prove what he averred, by citing the practice of the government in a precisely analogous case, when he was at the head of the treasury. On that occasion he, in conjunction with his noble friend (Lord Aberdeen), advised his Majesty to send an individual out to the Canadas, to perform certain duties. The individual selected for this appointment was an individual of the first rank and station—Lord Amherst; a nobleman holding the rank of earl in this country, a nobleman of no obscure name or station, and one who had never filled any subordinate office, but had recently filled the office of Governor-general of India, with all the gorgeous and royal splendour which surrounded that appointment. In the next place, let them consider the duties which Lord Amherst would have to perform in Canada. His lordship was to be Governor-general of Canada, and also his Majesty's royal commissioner; so that, as far as titles went, the appointment was very analogous to that of Lord Durham. The duties which Lord Amherst would have to perform were thus described in a letter, dated April 2, 1835, from Lord Aberdeen to Lord Aylmer, notifying to the latter nobleman the appointment of Lord Amherst: "This individual, in the capacity of his Majesty's royal commissioner, will repair to Lower Canada, fully instructed to examine, and, if possible, to terminate, the various points of discussion, in the hope of composing all those differences which have so long agitated the province, and which have deeply afflicted his Majesty's loyal subjects. For this end, it will be the object of his Majesty, to renew an inquiry into every alleged grievance, to examine every cause of complaint, and to apply a remedy to every abuse that may still be found to prevail; for this end, there is no sacrifice he would not cheerfully make which should be compatible with the fundamental principles of the constitution itself, and with the continued existence of the province as a possession of the British Crown."

The right hon. baronet then proceeded to state the duties which were included in the commission of his noble friend, who expressed his belief, "that some comprehensive scheme of general education might be adopted." ["Oh, oh!"] Why, sir, (said the right hon. baronet,) the noble lord was allowed to dwell on the important duties of Lord Durham's mission: and surely it is a legitimate course for me to show what those were which appertained to Lord Amherst's office. Show that I am speaking of matters which are inapplicable: answer me, if you can, but do not suppose that you will succeed in doing so by uttering unmeaning sounds. I am contending that my noble friend's duties were not exactly of equal amount to those of Lord Durham, but that they were, on the whole, most important, as he filled both the offices of governor and high commissioner. I don't say, that the two offices were exactly of equal importance; I make every just abatement on that account; but still they were of an analogous nature; and Lord Amherst, a person of high rank, and who had filled the most important offices, was selected for the former situation. Now, what was the establishment of, and the expense proposed to be incurred by, Lord Amherst? And I ask the hon. gentleman, who has attacked the want of economy of a conservative government, to compare the establishments, making every just abatement for the difference of duties of the two noble persons, and then to answer me this question, Which of the two governments has given the greatest practical proof of economy? I admit to the noble lord, that he cannot extinguish the system of special missions. I acknowledge that it is exceedingly difficult to decide what expenses may be incurred in an extraordinary and temporary duty; and I say at once, that the mission of Lord Amherst was a special mission, and that equal objections apply on principle to Lord Gosford's office of chief commissioner on a special mission also. But the establishment of Lord Amherst, as governor and royal commissioner, in what did it consist? Mr. Elliott was the single person appointed by the government to accompany him. I believe, on Mr. Elliott's recommendation, a clerk was assigned him. There was also a private secretary. That was the whole extent of the establishment. Let those who are now at the treasury contradict me if I am wrong; but I believe that the total charge incurred for the outfit did not exceed £1,000, when the arrangements for that mission were completed, and that Lord Amherst was on the point of sailing. I may be wrong in my recollection, (but if I be, I am subject to correction,) and I don't believe, that the total charge incurred by the preparation of Lord Amherst for the voyage, with an outfit, exceeded the sum of £1,000. Now, when I look at the expenses preparatory to Lord Amherst's departure to fill a situation of rank, and when I remember the duties which devolved on him, I ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Hume) whether he is warranted in saying, that a conservative government never gave any practical proof of economy? I will allow you to make every increase on account of the difference of duties, and yet I will still maintain this position, that the establishment proposed for Lord Durham does far exceed, does exceed in a fourfold degree—that establishment, for duties which were nearly analogous, provided for Lord Amherst. Sir, I protest, therefore, against the doctrine which has been maintained, that because we (the opposition) question the expense of public establishments, you have therefore a right to answer us by saying, that our considerations are not those of public economy, but spring from hostility to the individual, or disappointment that members at this side of the House are not favoured by being selected for those appointments. That charge, I say, is unfounded; but this charge I prefer against you, who have been the constant advocates of economy, that when an individual, participating in your political sentiments, is appointed to a public situation, you then show a tendency to forget the principles which you have professed; and that your political accordance with the man, obliterates your recollection of the principles which you maintained against governments to which you were opposed. And then it is, that you call the questions which we originate, paltry questions, not deserving consideration; and then it is, that you reconcile yourselves to an establishment, when connected with the services of your own friend, which, had the position of political parties been reversed, he who sanctioned, he who advised, your proceeding, would be the first in high-sounding terms to denounce, as aggravating the feelings of the country suffering under distress, and as evidence of a wanton and profligate disposition on the part of government. With what triumph would you have referred to the avowal that your finances were in such a state that you could not part with a third of the soap-tax? How you, or some of you, would have dwelt on what I have before heard stated, that a great number of the hand-loom weavers might have subsistence provided for them by the sum allowed to the extravagant establishment which was proposed to be confirmed and sanctioned! But now, because that establishment is proposed for one in whose political sentiments you concur, you (the class of which the hon. member for Kilkenny is the representative and warmest advocate) forget the principle which you formerly avowed, and try in every manner to throw ridicule and contumely on those who act in a temperate and moderate manner, in accordance with your practice; and you, through your leader, the hon. member for Kilkenny, justly give rise to the imputation, not only that you have been succeeded by others in your seats, but that you are also succeeded by others in your advocacy of the principles of retrenchment and economy.

The motion was negatived.

CONTROVERTED ELECTIONS.

SIR ROBERT PEEL rose for the purpose of fulfilling an assurance he had given to the House some weeks before, to move for leave to bring in a bill to amend the existing jurisdiction of parliament in respect to controverted elections. He begged to be understood, as not proceeding upon the present occasion, on the assumption that the House had resolved to maintain within its own power the right of trying election petitions, but rather, on the assumption that complaints having been made of the present system, as being defective and inadequate to the attainment of justice, it had determined to listen to, and consider any proposal which should be made, having for its object the perfecting of that existing system, by the removal of its alleged defects. He thought the general wish would be, that every experiment to perfect the present system should be tried, and proved unsatisfactory, before they consented to part with the power which for centuries past they had enjoyed—that of deciding who were to be the members of that House. He must confess, that, in approaching this subject, which he did with much diffidence, he was, for general reasons, very adverse to any such change as that suggested, without its absolute necessity being first fully and entirely established. In the first place, he thought such a course objectionable on the general ground, that it was inexpedient to alter what for many years had been the law, and in the next place, he felt the difficulty of devising any tribunal to replace the existing one, which, acting without the control of that House, was likely to be a satisfactory substitute for it. He confessed he could not divine the nature of the new tribunal. Should it be a single judge, deciding without the intervention of a jury, or should it be a judge acting in concert with a jury? Should the tribunal be independent of that House, or not? In his opinion, to make a judge independent, and to give him a summary jurisdiction in cases of elections, without any power of appeal, would be to constitute another estate within the country, to exercise powers of the utmost importance. It would be giving to a single individual a most enormous degree of power, and one which in all probability would be attended with highly injurious consequences. He was now supposing the case of an independent judge; but supposing it was decided to give the trial of controverted elections to a judge who should not be independent, on whom, or on what body, should he be made dependent? If he were to be made dependent on the judgment of the House of Commons, there would arise all the objections which now applied to the existing committees. It was indeed manifest, that if the members of the House of Commons were to be declared incompetent to act as a jury for the trial of election petitions, they must be quite as much so, to discharge the duties of a court of appeal from the decisions of any tribunal which might be appealed from. But, then, supposing there was to be the intervention of a jury, how would that alter the case? How could they exempt that jury from that very political influence and party views, which they alleged rendered members of the House of Commons incompetent to decide in election petition cases? Would summoning the jury from another and distant part of the kingdom from that in which the election disputes arose, meet the difficulty? That might be a very good plan to obviate the influence of local prejudices, but not the influence of strong party feeling. Suppose they were to bring a jury from Devonshire to try a controverted election in Kent, was it not just as likely that they would be as imbued with political and party bias as the tribunals which were now complained of? He confessed he should feel the greatest objection to see the House of Commons declaring itself disqualified from exercising that power, which every other popular assembly in every free state in the world, following their example, did exercise, and exercised without complaint. To part with power was not in itself free from objection; but for that House to part with power on the simple allegation of unfitness, from either incapacity or the want of impartiality or integrity to discharge the ordinary duties of a tribunal, tended so materially to diminish their moral influence, that in their case it would be doubly objectionable, unless on a clear case of necessity being established, to abandon any of their existing privileges. He did not mean to say, that, if it were proved justice could not be done short of such a measure, he should object to it; but until convinced that such was the fact, until convinced that, while the power of trying controverted elections remained with the House, it was impossible that the ends of justice could be accomplished, he maintained it was their bounden duty to stand by their privileges, and while taking every means to establish a proper tribunal within their own control, to declare their determination to hold and maintain that control in the same manner that for years past they had exercised it. The power of the House of Commons, like most others, was founded on popular opinion, and if they were to present themselves to the public with a declaration that they had become unfitted for the exercise of the power which for years past had been exercised by parliament, it was obvious that public opinion must, more or less, abandon them, and with it take no small portion of the influence they at present enjoyed through its means. It had been argued by the hon. and learned member for Dublin, and others who had adopted his views, that the complaint of the public being levelled generally against tribunals consisting of members of parliament, it was not probable that any tribunal composed of the same materials as the present, although under a different system, could be satisfactory. But he was not prepared, even founding this conclusion upon general reasons, to admit that that was a necessary conclusion. He could believe, that the same materials might be combined under a different form and in a different manner, so as to produce very different results. He could conceive some men, who had once been partisans in particular questions, afterwards becoming impartial judges, if they were removed from that influence which had biassed them. He could come to this conclusion from general reasoning, but, happily, he was not driven to general reasoning to refute the hon. and learned member's argument, for the high and important authority of actual evidence could be brought, to prove the very conclusions which general reasoning so strongly sanctioned. There had been instances where complaints had not been found against the tribunal, but against the system under which justice was administered, and which complaints were afterwards removed when the same parties were chosen as judges under a different system. Let them look to the conduct of the House of Commons on the subject of election petitions, previous to the passing of the Grenville Act. Nothing could have been more unjustifiable than their decisions in cases of controverted elections, previously to that time; they frequently decided without hearing the evidence; and frequently on private evidence, which had been canvassed outside the House; and frequently, and most notoriously, from party feelings and opinions. A change had been made in the constitution of the tribunal, but the materials remained the same. Members of parliament were still called to decide on election petitions, but in a different form, and all complaints immediately ceased. For several years after the House had formed a different tribunal, complete satisfaction was given. But first, perhaps, the House would permit him to read the character given by the author of this act himself—he meant Mr. Grenville—of the administration of justice on these questions, previous to the passing of that measure. When Mr. Grenville's Act was passed, in the year 1770, that gentleman thus stated the objections which existed to the administration of justice on controverted elections by the House of Commons as a body:—"How often, for instance, Sir, while the merits of a contested election have been trying within these walls, have the benches been almost empty during the whole examination; but the moment the question approached, how have you seen the members crowd eagerly to their seats, and then confidently pronounce upon a subject, on which they have not heard a syllable, but in private from the parties themselves! This is not all, Sir; we have frequently seen trials of strength upon some previous question, between the friends of the sitting member and the friends of the petitioner."

At that time they had found the evils of a previous trial of strength and of party power before the cause to be determined really came on. "And we have also frequently," Mr. Grenville added, "I blush while I declare it, seen justice sacrificed to numbers, and oppression exalted on the shoulders of a giddy majority into the sacred chair of legislation. This is a grievance of an alarming magnitude, and I propose to offer a means of redress, on a future day, to the consideration of this House."

Nothing could be more marked than the complaint thus made against the decisions of the House of Commons, previously to the Grenville Act, and in the discussions which followed Mr. Grenville's introduction of the measure. Language equally strong was lavishly applied in condemnation of the then tribunals. The House of Commons adopted Mr. Grenville's proposition, in the first instance, as an experiment; but after the lapse of about four years, so satisfactorily had it worked, that it was proposed to adopt it as a permanent measure. Lord North and Mr. Fox opposed the proposition, but, on a division, the motion for rendering it a permanent measure was carried by a large majority, one of its principal supporters being Mr. Dunning, no mean authority at that period on matters connected with the law of parliament. Dr. Johnson, too, who had spoken of the Grenville Act, said that—"The claim of a candidate and the right of electors are said scarcely to have been, even in appearance, referred to conscience; but to have been decided by party, by passion, by prejudice, or by frolic. Thus the nation was insulted with a mock election, and the parliament was filled with spurious representatives; one of the most important claims, that of a right to sit in the supreme council of the kingdom, was debated in jest, and no man could be confident of success from the justice of his cause. A disputed election is now tried with the same scrupulousness and solemnity as any other title."

But Dr. Johnson wrote this only about four or five years after the experiment had been made. Let the House, however, descend a little lower, and see what had been the success of the bill at the end of a period of twenty years: and in the first place it would be proper, in order to make the authority conclusive, to take the time when party feeling ran the highest, and when political bias decided the questions before parliament. The period he would select was the year 1784, immediately after the great struggle on the India bill, between Mr. Fox and Mr. Pitt. Mr. Fox at that time presented a petition to the House of Commons, complaining of the return made by the high-bailiff of Westminster, and praying that the validity of that return might be tried by a committee of the House of Commons, selected under the provisions of the Grenville Act. Upon that occasion Mr. Fox bore testimony to the good working of the act in the following terms. He said:—"That bill, Sir, originated in a belief, that this House, in the aggregate, was an unfit tribunal to decide upon contested elections. It viewed this House, as every popular assembly should be viewed, as a mass of men capable of political dislike and personal aversion; capable of too much attachment, and too much animosity; capable of being biassed by weak and by wicked motives; liable to be governed by ministerial influences, by caprice, and by corruption. Mr. Grenville's Bill viewed this House as endowed with these capacities, and judging it, therefore, incapable of determining upon controverted elections with impartiality, with justice, and with equity, it deprived it of the means of mischief, and formed a judicature as complete and ample, perhaps, as human skill can constitute."

Such was the doctrine of Mr. Fox, who at first opposed the Grenville Act, as to its operation twenty years after it had been passed. [An hon. member: not twenty, only ten.] Well, it might be only ten, or say, fourteen years afterwards; but this was the opinion of Mr. Fox, when political feeling ran the highest, that he should be tried by an impartial tribunal in an election committee. But he would revert to more recent times, and would adduce, for the purpose of fortifying his argument, that the same materials might be combined in a different form so as to produce a different result, the changes that had taken place in transacting private business in that House when the materials had remained the same. By the recommendation of the Speaker a great revolution had been effected in the system of committees on private bills, which had produced perfect satisfaction, and was free from complaint. Until recently, these committees were an useless ceremony, and worse than useless, for great injustice was done by the opportunity given for private canvass. The House of Commons, on the recommendation of the present Speaker, who had paid great attention to the subject, adopted a different system with respect to private bills. In pursuance of that system, a general committee, consisting of forty-two members, was appointed, to which committee every petition for a private bill was referred, to examine whether or not the petitioners had complied with the standing orders of the House. They had the highest authority, that of the Speaker himself, as to the beneficial change which had been produced by this regulation. To prove this, he would read a part of the examination of the right hon. gentleman before the committee on private bills. "Sir J. Graham.—Have you observed a satisfactory change in the mode in which the business is transacted by the committee of forty-two on the petition for a bill, as contrasted with the former practice, when the members were taken from the adjacent counties?—There cannot be a question that the superiority is immense, and the satisfaction is in proportion. I made no secret that when that committee was appointed I had my ears open, and should be ready to hear any complaint, but I never have heard the slightest question made as to the propriety of their proceedings, and never a word against the impartiality of their judgment.

"When the allegations in a petition for a bill were disputed heretofore, was not there a canvass notoriously carried on among the members for the adjacent counties?—Certainly.

"Has that canvass continued under the new system?—I believe it has entirely ceased; I believe it to be as completely successful as any experiment can possibly be.

"The great change was the introduction of the principle of selection in lieu of the chance which before belonged to the system?—Yes, and one great change was, that the gentlemen who composed the committee of forty-two, felt that they were in a new situation, that they were to set an example of the course of conduct which was intended to be a precedent, as far as it could be, for the conduct of the House: that was the doctrine laid down at the time the committee was appointed.

"Your expectations have been fully answered by the change?—Entirely.

"Chairman.—Do not you think they have, from the very principle of their appointment, a feeling that they have a trust reposed in them?—I have no doubt of that; I took the liberty of stating it in the strongest terms at the time of their appointment, and they entirely acquiesced in it. I endeavoured to show that no one ought to go upon that committee who was not prepared to attend and perform the duty, and that no person ought to be upon it, who was not prepared to decide as judge or jurymen."

Now, he would ask the House, whether this evidence on the part of the Speaker, as to the beneficial effect of the regulation introduced respecting private bills, did not afford strong ground for believing that, by a change in the construction of the materials which existed in the House, means might be devised, reposing on the integrity of hon. members themselves, of avoiding the effect of party feeling, and of producing, with reference to election committees, the same advantageous results which had been derived from the change which had taken place with reference to the committees on private bills? It appeared to him that there were three great objections to the present mode of deciding election petitions. In the first place, a practice had grown up tending to do away with many of the advantages which might otherwise attend the appointment of an election committee. He meant, that the matter was frequently brought before the House in some preliminary debate, upon some trivial point, respecting the recognizances, for instance; and the example was set to the committee by the House of Commons itself, of deciding the question upon party grounds. This, Mr. Grenville had pointed out as important to avoid, and had said, that it would lead to frequent party discussions between the friends of the petitioner and the friends of the sitting member. He thought it would be a great advantage if the House would abstain from these previous discussions; and that, from first to last, election petitions were left to the consideration of the committees to which they were referred. The committee which had been appointed to consider whether an amendment of the law in this respect could not be made, had traced the subject from the time when the recognizances were entered into, on an election petition, to the close, where a taxation of costs was made; and in its report they said, that they had examined agents and others who possessed information on the subject, and that they thought nothing more easy than to adopt some method which should render it unnecessary for the House to interfere in these preliminary matters. The question of the recognizances was one of the simplest things in the world, the solvency of the party being the only point to be ascertained. At present, this duty devolved on one of the clerks of the House of Commons and a master in chancery, but it frequently happened, that the master in chancery had other duties to attend to elsewhere, which he considered paramount to those of the House of Commons, and that he could only allot a certain time, and at a certain hour of the day, when it would perhaps be most inconvenient for the other officers to attend. It might perhaps be immediately before four o'clock, and yet often in the same day there were fourteen or fifteen cases in which recognizances were to be considered, and then the time was insufficient. Would it not be better to appoint one individual, who should act under the authority of the Speaker, on whom these duties should devolve, who would consult the convenience of all parties, and who would have ample time for the consideration of these questions? The noble lord opposite (Lord J. Russell) had suggested the other day, in order to simplify the matter, as the testimony required was not as to character, but as to solvency, that the matter would be simplified by allowing the surety the option of entering into the recognizances, or of depositing the money. The petitioner was now obliged to enter into a recognizance of £1000 for himself, and to find two sureties in £500 each, or four of £250; but if any person preferred, instead of finding sureties to this amount, to deposit the sum in the hands of the Speaker, it appeared to him, that by this plan every obstruction would be removed, and that the guarantee now requisite for the costs would be just as well secured. But to make it equal to all parties, it was said the principle must be extended further. This plan might do for those petitioners who were rich, but would not do for such as were poor. He did not, however, see that objection; for rich men could always get sureties easier than poor men. Suppose a poor man found three sureties for £250 each, and he himself lodged the remaining £250, he could see no reason why it should not be permitted, as all they desired was, that a certain sum should be forthcoming, and every object which parliament wished to accomplish would be fully secured. It would then be easy to make an inquiry into the sufficiency of a surety without any appeal to the House of Commons. To guard against a defeat of justice, they might give to the parties authority to enter into the recognizances within a certain discretionary period, but, at the same time, the more strict they were in their rules, and the more determined to enforce them, the more effectually would they succeed in their object, and the better would the business be done. But if they were lax in their requisition, if they received applications, and decided without proper evidence, on the representations of solicitors and of the parties interested, the more lax would be the conduct of those to whom they delegated authority. The great defect of this part of the system was not incidental to the Grenville Act, but it was the entertaining, by the House, of preliminary questions; and he would propose that the House should give up all interference with such questions. Another great objection, as it appeared to him, was the entire confidence evinced by the House in the selection of committees by chance. It was sometimes said, that on the whole it turned out well; that if there was one committee in favour of the ministry, the next was in favour of the opposition, and thus they neutralized each other, and the balance was even; but, for his part, he could not conceive a greater libel on the administration of justice than such an assertion. It was no satisfaction to the country, or to the parties more immediately interested, to know that, upon the whole, the committees, as regarded their composition, were evenly balanced, and that the wrong done by one was adjusted by the wrong done by another. Such a system was not creditable to the House; and such statements must tend to lower its decisions in the eyes of the public. It was their bounden duty to do justice in every case, and to form a tribunal, so pure and honourable, as to inspire the firmest confidence in its decisions, and calculated to do justice to all parties, of whatsoever party in politics they might be. That object could not be attained by a system where chance decided the composition of the tribunal. One of the greatest objections to the present system, by which election committees were appointed, was the right to challenge, which was invidious, and tended to wound the feelings of honourable men. It was a bad commencement of a judicial investigation. Another objection to the challenge was, that by its operation all the professional experience, and all the parliamentary experience of the House, was excluded from election committees. He did not mean to say, that all professional men, and all those who had a long experience of parliamentary business, were absolutely and necessarily excluded, but undoubtedly the tendency of the system, from whatever cause, was to exclude from election committees those who were best qualified to perform the duties which devolved on them. Such certainly was the tendency of the present system. He should like to take the present session, and examine how many professional men, and men of long parliamentary experience, had been appointed to serve on election committees, and to compare their number with that of non-professional members who had been chosen for the trial of disputed elections. He thought that the House would be surprised at the smallness of the number of professional men, and of those who were otherwise the best qualified for the discharge of the duties imposed upon the members of those tribunals which had been chosen; and he was confident that they would be much struck with the number of members selected, who had, at the last election, been returned to that House for the first time. The number of members chosen by the ballot, under the present system, was thirty-three; and it was not unfrequently the case, when the reduced lists were given in, that not less than seven out of the eleven of those who were to try the merits of disputed elections, were young members, who, before the present session, had never been in parliament. He had the fullest confidence that those young members would discharge the duties devolved upon them with equal integrity and honour as the oldest members of the House; but it certainly was rather hard to impose upon them the performance of a difficult and invidious duty, and, at the same time, deprive them of the assistance and co operation of professional men, and men of long parliamentary experience. Unjust as such conduct was, yet, somehow or other, the tendency of the present system was to produce such results, to exclude experience and professional knowledge, and to place on the tribunals, for the trial of controverted elections, those who, from want of experience, were much less qualified to decide on difficult and complicated questions of election law. Such were some of the evils resulting from the system of chance. Another point to which he would advert, related to the oaths which at present were imposed on members of election committees. He was perfectly persuaded that there was no member of that House who would regard lightly the oaths which he had sworn; yet, from the manner in which those oaths were taken, and when members felt that they were chosen by chance, there might be a disposition to take a different view of questions from that which they would take if they were openly appointed, and the fullest confidence reposed in their integrity and honour. To guard against that danger, and to remedy those evils to which he had alluded, he proposed to adopt a diametrically opposite principle from that which was at present acted upon. In the first place, he proposed that all the proceedings in regard to recognizances should be intrusted to the hands of a single officer, and invited the House to part with so much of its jurisdiction as related to recognizances. He had, on a former occasion, drawn the attention of the House to the present mode of proceeding in regard to recognizances, and a committee had in consequence been appointed; and when the report of that committee was laid upon the table of the House, it would be found, and on the most satisfactory evidence, that the recommendations of that report were in perfect accordance with the proposal he had made. He was also of opinion, that the same officer should be intrusted with the taxation of costs. The duties of such an officer would be simple and easily performed, whereas, under the present system, there was much complaint and dissatisfaction; but if the whole proceedings in regard to costs were intrusted to one responsible individual, all ground for those complaints would be removed, and much delay and expense would be saved. Under the present system, as he had stated, the House lost, in a great measure, the professional experience of those hon. gentlemen who were members of that House, and who were also members of the legal profession. There was great unwillingness on the part of those hon. and learned gentlemen to serve on election committees. No doubt they had other duties to discharge, yet still he thought the House had a fair claim upon their services. The fact, however, was, that they were reluctant to serve on election committees, and availed themselves of the right of challenge which the present system allowed, or, by pairing off, eluded being chosen. Those committees were, in consequence, generally deprived of those eminent counsel which the House contained. Now, this was not altogether fair; and he thought that when those hon. and learned gentlemen came into parliament, the House and the public had a right to call upon them to bear an equal share of the burdens. Instead, therefore, of continuing a system that excluded those learned gentleman from serving on election tribunals, he thought it was their imperative duty to adopt such a plan as would secure for the trial of controverted elections a fair proportion of the legal knowledge of the House. He would next proceed to that part of his plan by which he hoped to obviate these evils. In the first place, then, he proposed to substitute discretion and confidence in the place of chance. His bill was prepared and printed, and he should not, therefore, go into the whole of its details at that time, as the House would, at no distant period, have an opportunity of fully discussing every portion of his measure. The bill would be laid upon the table as soon as possible, and he only waited for the report of the committee, to which he had previously alluded, to place it before the House. At present, he asked for no division, nor for any pledge; and he would not provoke a discussion at that time, but simply give an outline of the plan he proposed for their adoption. He might mention, also, that he had adopted the suggestion of the noble lord opposite, and that the measure he intended to bring forward was only of a temporary nature, and it would be so framed that, should any well-founded complaint be made against its operation, the consideration of the whole question should again necessarily come before parliament. The provisions of the bill were simply these:—In the first place, he proposed that the Speaker should be empowered to appoint a certain limited number of members of the House for the management of all election proceedings, the number so elected to form a general committee on election petitions. A question might arise in regard to this part of his plan—namely, whether they ought to make the power delegated to the Speaker absolute, and the list of members selected by him not liable to be questioned by the House. If the power of the Speaker in the selection of the members of the general committee was not made absolute, then they might require that a list of the members chosen should be laid on the table of the House; but in that case he proposed, that if no objection should be made to the list within a limited time, it should, at the termination of such a period as might be determined on, be held to be valid. Perhaps the latter plan would be the one most approved of; and as he was unwilling that the House should part unnecessarily with any portion of its jurisdiction, he thought it would be most advisable to require that a list of the members chosen by the Speaker should be laid on the table of the House. He presumed that that committee would be chosen with perfect fairness and impartiality; and, upon the general committee so chosen, he proposed that they should devolve the appointment of committees for the trial of all controverted elections. He also proposed—and he spoke now of the general committee—that all the proceedings of that committee should be recorded, and that a short report should, at regular periods, be communicated to the House, in order that they might have the check of publicity—a check, of all others the most valuable, as regarded the actions of public men. He ought previously to have stated, that he proposed that at the commencement of every session the House should be called over, for the purpose of ascertaining who were and who were not liable to serve on election committees. He would exclude no one, whatever might be his situation. He did not propose to exclude the ministers of the Crown, as he thought such a proceeding would be unfair and unjust. If, however, their public duties prevented them from acting, without inconvenience to the service of the country, then he proposed that they should be excused. He also proposed that those hon. members who were advanced beyond sixty years of age should not be required to serve. There were other cases, in which temporary causes of disqualification would operate, such as being petitioned against, or having voted at an election. Of course, he did not propose to enforce the services of those whose affairs absolutely required their absence from the House. Such persons, on satisfactory reasons being stated, he proposed to exempt from serving on election committees. When once the general committee had been appointed, he proposed to invest them with the most ample powers to call on members of the House to serve on the committees for the trial of disputed elections; and he proposed that those committees, to be nominated by the general committee, should be composed of seven members. He further proposed, that the election should be made by the general committee at the shortest possible period before the trial of any disputed election was to take place. By such means they would get rid of party excitement, and the members who were to try the merits of any election would come to the discharge of their duties with less chance of their minds being biassed towards either party. He discountenanced all strikes, but he reserved the right of challenge in certain cases. For instance, if a member was petitioned against, there would be a right to challenge, and the House would have the power to prevent him from sitting on an election committee. There were also two other specific cases, in regard to which the right of challenge would exist. The first was the case of any hon. member having voted at an election. If any hon. member voted at an election, and was nominated a member of any election committee, then the right of challenge would remain in force. The other case was that of relationship within a certain degree. He proposed, however, entirely to abolish the strike. In the next place, he proposed to give publicity, as far as possible, to the proceedings of the committees, and in order to accomplish that object, he proposed that the whole of the proceedings should be taken down in writing, and that the names of the members, as often as the committee divided, should be placed upon record, so as to show how each individual voted. He proposed, also, that the whole proceedings of the committees should be laid upon the table of the House. He was aware that those proceedings often extended to an inconvenient length, and that it might be impossible to lay the whole before the public. But there could be no difficulty in stating fully every question on which a vote might be taken; and he thought it essential that those questions, and the names of the members of the committee voting in every division, should be laid upon the table of the House. Such was an outline of the plan he proposed for their adoption; and, having explained the general objects of the measure, he thought it would be better not to allow himself to be betrayed at that time into a discussion of its details. A more convenient period would offer for that purpose, when hon. members would be more prepared for entering upon the consideration of the details. There was one point to which he had not yet alluded. An assessor to election committees had been proposed; but he felt so confident that there were materials for the proper and equitable settlement of disputed elections within the House, that he felt the greatest reluctance to the appointment of an assessor; and the appointment of assessors, therefore, was no part of his plan. He had now stated the grounds of his objections to the present system, and the remedy he proposed for the evils which existed in the present election tribunals; and whether his plan might, or might not, receive the sanction of the House, was to him a matter of comparative indifference. He was willing to give up his own measure, if a better should be brought forward. This was not a party question; and he was sure that every member of the House was equally anxious with himself to remove those evils in their election tribunals which had been so much complained of. If the House would divest itself of its power to the extent he had proposed—if they would put an end to the operation of chance, and trust to discretion and confidence instead—then, indeed, they would invest the members of election committees with a judicial character, and they would find that they would bring to the discharge of their duties, impartiality and integrity. If they adopted such a plan, and succeeded in their designs, they would rescue the House of Commons from the degrading stain which would be cast upon it, if they were to tell to England and to the world that there was not within its walls materials wherewith to compose a fair, an honest, and impartial tribunal. He believed that there was abundant materials for such tribunals within those walls; and, if they adopted such a plan as he had recommended, they would elevate the character of members, and increase the confidence of the country in their decisions. If they adopted such a plan, he had no doubt that the members chosen would divest themselves of party feelings; and when they found that implicit confidence was placed in their integrity and honour, that they would make the discharge of their judicial functions superior to every other consideration. The right hon. baronet, amidst loud cheers, concluded, by moving for leave to bring in a bill to amend the laws relating to the trial of controverted elections.

TITHES (IRELAND).

MAY, 15, 1838.

On the motion of Lord John Russell, the order of the day was read for the House to resolve itself into a Committee of the whole House, to take into consideration the resolutions respecting Irish Tithes. The noble lord then moved that the Speaker do now leave the Chair.

Sir T. Acland moved that the resolutions of the 7th and 8th of April, relative to Tithes, be rescinded.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, if the hon. and learned gentleman (Mr. O'Connell) has exceeded the limits which he prescribed for himself at the commencement of his speech, I am the last man that should be disposed to regret the superfluity, because, if I wanted a speech to justify the course of my hon. friend—if I wanted a speech to show that it is desirable we should know the principle on which her Majesty's government mean to proceed—it would be the speech which we have heard from the hon. and learned gentleman. The hon. and learned gentleman says, that we propose to rescind a certain resolution which he read. The effect of that resolution was, to appropriate a certain surplus of the Irish church property to the education of all classes of her Majesty's subjects, without reference to their religious denomination. The hon. and learned gentleman says, that because we propose to rescind that resolution, we must intend to govern Ireland through the medium of hardships and coercion. Then I ask the hon. and learned gentleman, what does he think of those who practically abandon the resolution? If it be so great a crime to explain to the people of Ireland and to the people of England what are your real intentions—if it be so great a crime to ask you to efface from the records of parliament the principle which would apply a surplus of church property to education not connected with the Protestant faith—let me ask the hon. and learned gentleman, how he justifies it to himself to give his assent to resolutions which we are told do not involve the principle? Does the hon. and learned gentleman maintain that those resolutions do involve the principle? Do they involve the principle or do they not? This is a final settlement—this, we are told, is to be a satisfactory settlement. Then, I ask, do the resolutions to which we are asked to assent, involve the principle of the resolutions of 1835, or not? If not, how does the hon. and learned gentleman reconcile it to himself to give them his support? If they do, how does he reconcile his construction of them with the construction put on them by the noble lord, the Secretary of Ireland, and, as it appears, also by the noble lord, the Secretary of State for the Home Department. In the latter case, which authority are we to believe? And if a doubt exist between the government and the hon. and learned gentleman, who on this subject has such immense influence and authority—if we show this, do we not furnish a conclusive reason why we should have all vagueness and ambiguity cleared up, that we may come to a perfect understanding of the principle on which we are proceeding? I would ask, further, can hon. gentlemen be surprised at the anxiety and doubt that pervade the Protestant minds in Ireland, when they receive the declarations that are made? The hon. gentleman says, he gives his assent to the resolutions on this ground. He thinks, then, following up his own principles, that you ought to have the religion of the majority established in Ireland. As you have the religion of the majority in England established, and as you have the religion of the majority in Scotland established, so, says the hon. gentleman, according to his principles, you ought to have in Ireland the religion of the majority established. And it is worthy of observation, that while the hon. gentleman professes peace, and intimates that, after refusing the payment of tithes for five years, he is now setting a different example—while he refers us to the precepts of Christianity, and professes every thing that is mild and conciliatory—he always reminds us, as he has done this night, that the Scotch took to the hill-side with their broad-swords—and that in Scotland the religion is that of the majority. "But," says the hon. gentleman, "though I consider this doctrine sound and conclusive, yet I will not push it to its practical results;"—and this is the security we have. "I don't ask you," says the hon. and learned member, "to establish the religion of the majority in Ireland, because we utterly repudiate any connection with the State. We are so satisfied, that a participation in any portion of the church property would so desecrate our faith as to deprive it of its influence, that we cannot consent, under the circumstances, to receive a portion of that property, and we, therefore, choose not to push to their legitimate conclusions our arguments with regard to the principles." The hon. gentleman is looking with some anxiety for the quotation which he sees I am about to make. I am not surprised at it when I see what security there is in the abstinence of the Irish people. I have said he rests his own forbearance on the ground that he repudiates any participation in church property; but it was to him that the people of Ireland gave this assurance, as a condition of the establishment of tranquillity in that country. "Would you tranquillize Ireland, follow up this plan." Now, what plan? Of course you would suppose a plan in utter repudiation of any connection with our participation in church property. Quite the reverse. "Follow up this plan; give the glebes, to the value of £300 per annum, as the pay of the clergy of the great and overwhelming majority of the people of that country." Gentlemen of property and influence may refuse to pay tithes for five years; but there is one species of property that is staple, that is exempt from spoliation, that a refusal to pay tithes cannot effect, viz., the glebes in the possession of the church. Leave the church nominally in possession of the tithes which may be withheld by conspiracy and the advice of subtle men; but if you wish to establish tranquillity, follow up this plan:—leave the tithes with the Protestant Church, but take the glebes for the Catholic. The hon. gentleman appealed to the Act of Union; he says, he holds by the Act of Union, and wishes to give that national compact a fair trial. He concludes that the Act of Union establishes the equality of civil rights—good. Does it nothing more? Was it not one condition of the Act of Union that the Protestant Church in Ireland should be maintained unimpaired? And was not that a fundamental condition? I ask, then, is it fair of the hon. gentleman to declare his adherence to that part of the Act of Union which favours his views, but to deny its validity in matters with which his views do not accord? In order to form a correct judgment of the nature of the proposition made by my hon. friend, and of the justice of those accusations which have been preferred against him and others by the noble lord, it is necessary for me to take a short review of what has taken place with respect to this question. There are many hon. gentlemen from whose minds the facts may have been obliterated by the public events that have since transpired, and there are also many who, not having been in the last parliament, may not have watched the progress of the question so as to be thoroughly acquainted with it. I consider it necessary, therefore, that I should preface my answer to the noble lord by shortly reverting to what has transpired on this subject. I came into office at the latter end of the year 1834, and I was at that time sincerely desirous of effecting a settlement of this tithe question. Such was my anxiety, that I exposed myself to a charge of plagiarism by adopting the principles of the former government. The charge was, that I had taken up the bill brought in by his Majesty's preceding government. I, however, brought in that measure which proposed a deduction from the incomes of the clergy to the amount of twenty-five per cent., and the reduction of the tithe composition to a rent charge. We professed a desire to correct any abuse in the Protestant Church, to reduce those incomes that were excessive, and to require duties from those who did not perform any. Was I allowed to proceed with that measure, the principle and details of which were taken from the bill of the hon. gentleman opposite? No; I was met by a preliminary objection; I was told, that I should not proceed practically with the consideration of the measure, because it was necessary to pass a resolution embodying in it principles which were considered indispensable to the settlement of the tithe question. I told the noble lord that he would have the opportunity of his triumph over me equally by bringing in a practical measure, but I deprecated the introduction of a principle in a resolution which would have a tendency to bind parliament hereafter. I said, "Bring in your own measure, adopt your own principle, if it is a good one, and capable of practical development, and if your reasons prevail, your success shall be equally decisive of my fate." Not content with that, however, the principle was pressed, which declared, that if there were a surplus, it should be applied to purposes of education; and this was superadded, that at no time could any settlement be satisfactory which did not embody that principle. Such a resolution was perfectly unnecessary. I foretold the consequences of its adoption. I told you that your triumph, as public men, would be of short duration. I did not mean official triumph; it is possible for men to be in office and not to be triumphant. No man is, perhaps, better entitled to lay down that maxim than myself. I asked you to avoid establishing a principle which, for all time to come, must preclude a compromise. I begged you to avoid deciding, by a single vote, so great a question. I warned you against a course which appeared to have the effect, though it had not really, of passing by the House of Lords. You persevered, though you knew that the success of a practical measure must be equally decisive of my fate; you persevered, and you said, "We will lay down for the guidance of public men and future parliaments this principle, and they shall not approach the tithe question unless they adopt it." The hon. gentleman opposite succeeded. I said then, as I say now, that I never would be a party to that principle. I will not consent to the alienation of the church property from purposes strictly ecclesiastical, and, rather than do so, I took the course which every honourable man would take under similar circumstances—I relinquished office. The hon. gentleman opposite brought forward their own measure in 1835. When they did so, I moved an amendment. We moved that the bill be separated into two, for the purpose of manifesting our adherence, in opposition, to our own principle. We moved that the bill be separated into two, for the purpose of establishing a rent-charge in lieu of tithe composition, and effecting the necessary reforms in the church, being of opinion that the diverting any surplus to purposes of education would be properly the subject of a separate bill. How were we met when we made this proposition? And now I want to know who were the real parties who obstructed the settlement of this question. As I said before, when we attempted to bring this question to a satisfactory conclusion, by placing it on that footing upon which it could be brought under practical consideration, we were met by this resolution, upon which the compact alliance was formed. And upon this resolution we went out. And when we proposed the separation of the two measures, how were we met? Why, the right hon. gentleman, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who is now taking notes—thus replied, and observed that we attempted to lay down no abstract principle of our own; we did not meet the proposition of the noble lord by the principle, that church property should stand devoted to spiritual purposes only; we merely said, let us have a separate bill. How were we met? The Chancellor of the Exchequer said—"The hon. baronet now called on the House to sever the two propositions, either for no purpose at all, or for the purpose of passing that portion of the bill relating to the concession of the million, and the settlement of the tithe question, and of throwing out the other portion of the measure relating to appropriation. If the right hon. gentleman wished the House to retrace its steps, would it not, then, have been much more decent if the right hon. gentleman had come down and asked them to rescind the resolution they had sanctioned in so many forms?"

"The more straightforward course," added the right hon. gentleman, "would have been, for the House to have been called on to rescind its former resolution; and, if any hon. gentleman thinks he can vote for this resolution without rescinding the former vote, let him recollect the cheers with which the announcement was received; that it was intended to negative one part of this bill and to carry the other part.

"I am prepared to argue the case when we go into the committee, after having negatived this resolution; but I will not allow what was a parliamentary minority on a former occasion to convert itself into a majority, by a little sleight of hand and legerdemain dexterity, such as moving a resolution which is apparently one thing, though most unquestionably it means another."

Thus, when we propose the particular course that would have avoided the difficulty, we are told that we are not candid and straightforward. And when we now come with a proposition to rescind the resolution, when we adopt the very suggestion that was offered to us, we are told that we may be very candid and straightforward, but we are making you pass under a disgraceful and dishonourable yoke, and your flesh and blood revolt against it. Thus passed 1835. In 1836, the question was again brought forward. My noble friend (Lord Francis Egerton) asked for leave to bring in a bill, embodying your own principles, and, at the same time, asked the noble lord (Lord John Russell) to postpone his bill then before the House. "No," said the noble lord, "I will not postpone my measure." My noble friend then moved his bill as an amendment, and again it was rejected. The noble lord's bill was sent to the House of Lords, that is, the bill passed by the noble lord in 1836. The House of Lords passed the bill, reducing the composition to a rent charge by twenty-five per cent., making reforms in the church, but not embodying the principle of appropriation. I asked the noble lord to take the amendments into consideration. The noble lord refused to take them into consideration, because they did not adopt the principle of the resolution; and the noble lord said, that if this House entered upon a consideration of the bill, as sent by the House of Lords, it would be a recantation of their former resolution, and thus this bill was also lost. The year 1836, therefore, passed, with an ineffectual attempt to bring this question to a settlement; 1837 came, and now I approach that part of the noble lord's speech, in which he made use of this language, that attempts had been made to deceive him by the declarations put forward by us, and that hereafter he would consider such declarations as nothing more than tricks and stratagems. I must beg leave to say, that, whilst I have been in opposition, I have refused to have any secret negotiation. I have held no communications, and this not from any personal disrespect towards those who differ from me, but because I think it naturally shakes the confidence of a party in those in whom they place confidence. Whatever has passed upon this, or upon any other occasion, has passed in the face of day, and in this House; and therefore, in the most peremptory terms, as peremptory as is consistent with the courtesy of parliamentary usage, I deny that the noble lord has been deceived. I will first refer to what passed at the close of the last session of parliament with respect to the Irish Tithe bill. That bill made no progress in this House, on account of circumstances for which government were not responsible,—the lamented death of his late Majesty. A debate arose upon the Municipal Corporation bill for Ireland. The question between us is this—has the noble lord ever had the slightest ground for believing that I had relaxed in my opposition to the principle of the resolution of 1835? Has any act or declaration of mine ever entitled the noble lord to believe, that I would be a party to any settlement of the Irish Tithe question, which should involve, directly or indirectly, the principle of appropriation? I peremptorily deny it. The noble lord made this declaration—"That no false delicacy, no false pride, or improper fear of reproach, would induce him obstinately to adhere to any thing that heretofore had passed." Do I taunt the noble lord with this declaration? Do I turn round and say, "You forced me out of office upon this question, and now you apologise, and recant your former declaration?" No: for my part, I declare, though that resolution of 1835 was fatal to my government, not a word of taunt should the noble lord have heard from me on this subject; and if the noble lord will now adopt that course, if he will consent to abandon the resolution, if the noble lord will proceed to the consideration of the question with a view to a final and satisfactory adjustment, that is the only way in which the question can now be satisfactorily settled. Do not let it remain suspended as at present. Do not let us aggravate the evil by discussions, without any specific object. Do not let us vote upon a resolution which, whether it be adopted or abandoned, will be the cause of engendering bitterness in Ireland. The noble lord and his colleagues know, that it is impossible to leave the question in its present state. This declaration I made last year upon the subject. This declaration I made in the same session in which my noble friend declared, that he was desirous to see those great questions which divided the House on Irish matters brought to a satisfactory settlement, and that he would participate in all measures that would have that effect; but that he never would consent to a settlement of Irish tithes upon the principle of the appropriation of church property to secular uses. This was what was said by my hon. friend, who, I suppose, is also included in the reproach of the noble lord—this was what he said at a later period, namely, on the 9th of June. And what course did we take upon the bill of last year? We supported the noble lord's bill on the second reading; and so little desirous were we of offering a mere factions opposition to the bill, that when Mr. Sharman Crawford opposed the bill on the second reading, my hon. friend and myself divided with government against that hon. member's motion. Although we thought that the bill contained a principle that was objectionable, what course did we take? We said, "There will be an opportunity in committee to oppose the objectionable parts; do not, therefore, let us refuse our assent to the second reading." We consented to the second reading of the bill, although there were many, at least some, on the other side of the House, who opposed it. The hon. member for Southwark (Mr. Harvey) opposed it, on the ground that it did not go far enough, and that it did not give enough of church property; but we declined to co-operate with those who sought to obstruct the measure of government. What, then, was the language of my noble friend that was calculated to deceive, and which entitled the noble lord (Lord John Russell) to say, that he had been placed in a false position in consequence of tricks and stratagems? This was the language of my noble friend (Lord Stanley): "However anxious I may be to see this measure carried, as the basis and groundwork of a great national settlement of the important questions which agitate the public mind, I should not discharge my bounden duty if I did not frankly declare, that no consideration whatever, with reference to this or any other bill—no asserted probability of a settlement—no profession of acquiescence in its provisions, will ever induce me to give my consent to the taxation of the clergy for this unjust and illegal purpose." What was the principle of the bill of 1837? It laid a tax of ten per cent. upon the clergy, for the education of all classes of all religious denominations; and against that principle, which virtually contained the appropriation principle, I objected. But when was the language used, which had deceived the noble lord? Was it in the course of this session? I have this year professed my desire to see the question settled; but I said, without the abandonment of the appropriation principle no settlement could be satisfactory. I deeply regret the obstacles that have arisen in the way of the settlement of this question; I lament those divisions that exist in Ireland sincerely, and more so than if they existed in England, because in the former they are more dangerous; but this is a great question of principle, involving the permanent security of the Irish Church, and I repeat that I cannot consent to a settlement which shall devote any portion of church property to secular uses. What I now contend for is, that I never led the noble lord to believe that I would consent to a settlement upon any other condition. The noble lord intimated, that he had postponed the Irish Municipal bill till after the Irish Tithe bill, at a request of mine, and that by that means he had been placed in a more unfavourable position. I deny the fact. The noble lord gave a formal notice that he would ask a question of me, and he did ask that question late in March; but so little expectation had the noble lord that I would make a compromise on the subject of the Municipal Corporations bill, or any other bill, that the question put by him was simply this—namely, if I would let him know if my noble friend would make a motion, as he had done last year, whether he intended to divide the Municipal Corporation bill into two; and whether he intended to submit to the House a proposal for abolishing, but not reforming municipal corporations. The noble lord was so completely in ignorance of the course we meant to pursue on this or any other measure, except so far as he could collect from our public declarations. The proposal of delay, therefore, was not made from me, but it originated in an unusual question being put by the leader of a government to a member in opposition. After the noble lord's formal notice, I said that I could not give any explanation as to my future course; but I begged leave to ask a question of the noble lord respecting Irish tithes, and in asking that question I made use of this explanation. This was on the 27th of March last, before the recess. I made use of this explanation. I find entered on the journals of parliament these resolutions, and they may be considered as still remaining in force. [Question, question!] I did not seek this. The position in which I am placed is rather an unusual one. I am laying the foundation of an answer to the question of the noble lord, on the answer to which his own reply would mainly depend. I find these resolutions on the journals of the House—"That this House do resolve itself into a committee, in order to consider the present state of the church establishment in Ireland, with a view to apply any surplus of its revenues, not required for the spiritual care of its members, to the general education of all classes of her Majesty's subjects, without distinction of religious persuasion; and it is the opinion of this House that no measure on the subject of tithes can lead to a satisfactory and final adjustment, that does not embody the principles contained in the foregoing resolutions." These resolutions were voted by a former House of Commons, at the instance of the noble lord, now the leader of the present House, and coupling them with the Speech from the Throne, entitled himself, I think, after the lapse of four months, to put this question to the noble lord, "Whether it is his intention to bring forward a measure on the subject of Irish Tithes, and whether that measure will involve the principles contained in these resolutions?" After the noble lord had given his answer, I stated: "There is a prospect, I trust, of coming to a settlement on the Irish Poor-law bill; I, for one, wish it may be possible to come to a settlement with respect to the Irish Corporations bill, and the bill relating to the Irish Church—but I feel myself bound to what I always have said on the question, that a security for the Irish Church must be an essential condition of any such settlement." I must say, then, coupling what I said in 1837, and the declaration made by me in 1835, that I am not chargeable with making declarations from trick or stratagem, and that I have not placed the noble lord, as a member of the government, in an unfavourable position on this question. What is the course which the noble lord has taken? What is the nature of his resolutions? I do not wish to reciprocate personal attacks upon the other side of the House; I will not bandy hard words with the noble lord. I do not think it answers any purpose. I heard the speech of the noble lord; I heard the temper of it with deep regret. It is in vain for the noble lord to say, that we will not concur in a satisfactory settlement of this question, when, at the same time, he is opposing insuperable obstacles to its settlement, by rousing every feeling of pride—by telling men like the Irish clergy, men who have been deprived of their tithe for the last four or five years, men who have submitted to poverty and oppression, and who now say they are ready to make further concessions for the sake of peace, provided you maintain the integrity of the establishment; by a minister of the Crown telling such men, after such privations and such sufferings, that they set a price upon the value of peace, while they offer to give up fifteen per cent. of their income for the purpose of insuring peace in Ireland,—by telling these men, who have in many cases abandoned their just right, who have been deprived of their tithes, who have lived upon funds doled out by charity—that they are insensible to the peace of Ireland—that their constant anxiety and deep interest for the establishment arise from mere mercenary motives—that they think more of their pockets than of the tranquillity and peace of the country—I say, Sir, making such charges against such men, places difficulties in the way of a settlement of this question, so vast, that any authority or counsel of mine—if authority I have—must fail to produce a satisfactory settlement.

Sure, the most bitter, is a scornful jest."

Then the noble lord comes with this question, whether we are justified in moving to rescind these resolutions. I do not attempt to conceal, and if I did, I could not, that it is difficult for a government to consent to the formal rescinding of its own resolutions. I think, for the character and honour of public men of both sides, that the public should know what are the principles on which we proceed; and if I were to say that the rescinding of this resolution would not be a severe blow to the government, I should be guilty of hypocrisy. But it was open to the noble lord to have avoided this discussion. I say, on my own part, that if the noble lord held this session the language he held last session, if he had come forward and said, "We will attempt the settlement of this great question of Irish tithes, in which Irish conflicts arise—we will propose a measure, and a reasonable measure, with respect to Irish tithes, and we will ask you to consent to an Irish Corporation bill, founded on the principle of popular election;" and if the noble lord had said he would abandon the resolution of 1835, if the noble lord had said he would not shrink from the unpopularity of that course, if he had proposed a settlement on this footing, and said, that he would not guarantee that the arrangement should be final against future attacks, but that he would pledge himself to use the full weight and influence of government to make it final; and if the noble lord were to give up the principle of the resolution of 1835, I do not believe that the noble lord would find a great minority to insist upon the resolution. But what course does the noble lord take? Does he take the manly course of declaring that he will not retain the resolution of appropriation? Quite the reverse. The noble lord has taken a course with respect to his proposed Tithe bill, and the nature of his resolution, which is calculated to excite suspicion and alarm. The noble lord made no speech in laying his resolutions upon the table of the House, and permitted them to go to Ireland without any explanation of his objects and motives. And of what nature are the resolutions? I read them over and over again, and I now doubt whether they contain the principle of appropriation or not. I am inclined to believe that they do contain the principle of appropriation. Am I singular in that opinion? What is the language of the noble lord's own supporters? What said the member for Wiltshire? He said, that he had read the resolutions over and over again, he devoted whole days to them, but it was not till last night that he discovered that they did not contain appropriation; and, he it observed, this was not till after the hon. member had heard the speech of the noble lord. The noble lord, the mover of the resolutions, yesterday made a speech of one hour and a half's duration, and yet he never told us whether the principle of appropriation was contained in them or not. He left us more bewildered at the conclusion of his speech than at the beginning. I never before knew an instance of a man, holding the situation of Secretary of State, and leader of the House of Commons, discuss a great question upon a motion which he meant to be the foundation of its settlement, and never to state what he meant. It was not till the end of the debate last night, that the noble lord, the Secretary for Ireland, told us, that he believed the appropriation principle was not included in the resolutions. What said the hon. member for Sheffield (Mr. Ward), than whom, on the wording of resolutions, no man in the House was a higher authority? He had been the mover of resolutions of his own, and was a good judge of what the resolutions were intended to be. With all the hon. member's experience of resolutions, what said he of the vagueness of these resolutions of the noble lord? He said, that on reading the resolutions, his first impression was, that they were vague and ambiguous, but on reading them again he said he thought he discovered in them the germ of appropriation. This was the construction the hon. gentleman put upon them. Those were his own phrases. What course does the noble lord ask us to pursue? I will not say, whether there is any stratagem or trick; I have no right to impute motives, but this I will say, that never was a proposal made so calculated, though perhaps not intended, to entrap us into difficulties, for he asks us to go into committee upon those resolutions, without first stating what is his proposition respecting appropriation. Let me ask, how any impartial man would look at this question? After all that has been said on the subject of Irish tithes—after making this a popular instrument by which you have heaved a former government from office—after all the division in the country upon the subject, for the honour and credit of both sides, it should now be distinctly understood whether the question of appropriation is, by those resolutions, affirmed or not. Now, what is the position in which we are now placed by the noble lord? We are invited in committee to express in the first place an opinion, "that the tithe composition in Ireland should be commuted into a rent charge, at the rate of seven-tenths of their amount." Now, what amendment could be proposed to the first resolution, but one purely of detail and of amount, as, for instance, to give seventy-five per cent. instead of seventy? But, after having exhausted all discussion in matters of detail on the first resolution, there was the sixth resolution hanging behind:—"That it is the opinion of this committee, that the rent-charges for ecclesiastical tithes should be appropriated by law to certain local charges now defrayed out of the consolidated fund, and to education, the surplus to form part of the consolidated fund." Now, I ask, supposing we had assented to this resolution, would not there have gone forth one universal impression throughout this country, and Ireland, that we had abandoned the principle of appropriation? Why, what was said upon the subject of these resolutions by the hon. and learned member for Dublin? What construction did that hon. and learned member put upon these resolutions? I think his words upon this subject of great importance; and he expressed these in a letter which he published soon after these resolutions were promulgated. The right hon. baronet read an extract from the letter in question to the following effect:—"Such was the plan of Lord John Russell. It held out the prospect of an immediate amelioration to the extent of thirty per cent., which, however, was scarcely adequate to what was required; another amelioration which it promised was, the appropriation of the surplus of these rent-charges to county burdens which had hitherto pressed on localities; and lastly, it speedily offered a direct appropriation of funds for education." The hon. and learned member's letter continued by stating, that "he certainly did not concur in all Lord John's arrangements, but that he thought it contained the germs of a future arrangement, and a more perfect and final settlement." I say, Sir, that when the people of Ireland are told by such high authority as that of the hon. and learned member for Dublin, that these resolutions are chiefly to be esteemed because they provide a direct appropriation for the purposes of education, and because they are the germ of a future arrangement and more perfect and final settlement, they are warranted in drawing two conclusions—first, that the principal of appropriation is contemplated in these resolutions; and secondly, that even this arrangement is not to be a final settlement, but is only to be used as a stepping-stone to other arrangements. On these grounds, I consider it to be absolutely necessary to arrive at a satisfactory understanding upon this point before we proceed further in this question. Three courses were open to us, by which this understanding might have been attained: either the noble lord might have made a manly and frank avowal, that, finding it impossible to pass this measure, fettered with the principle of the resolutions of 1835, he was prepared to sacrifice the appropriation clause in order to arrive at a satisfactory adjustment of the question; or we might have brought forward an abstract resolution of our own, condemnatory of the principle of appropriation; but that was a course which appeared to us obnoxious to the objection urged against your own resolutions of 1835, that they were abstract resolutions, fettering the practical consideration of a particular subject; or lastly, the means were open to us which we have adopted, of asking the opinion of the House upon this question, and of showing our faithful adherence to the principles which we formerly defended, by moving the rescinding of those resolutions of 1835, as being calculated to obstruct the satisfactory settlement of this great practical question. To have put off this discussion would not in the least have forwarded the practical result at which we aim. We could not have discussed these resolutions in committee without giving rise to it; or, if your course had been by bill, the very preamble to the bill would have raised the question; and therefore, on the whole, it appeared to us most satisfactory, that, as a preliminary proceeding, we should elicit the opinion of the present parliament upon this great point at issue, and show that our opinion remains unchanged in reference to it. These are the grounds upon which I oppose these resolutions, being unable to lend my aid to the passing of a measure which shall tend to the alienation of church property. The grounds upon which I act, are not any dictates of false pride, which the noble lord speaks of; but because I conceive, that to alienate church property to secular purposes will inevitably shake the foundations of that establishment. The noble lord referred to the Act of Union, and said, that he was resolved to maintain the church establishment because it was guaranteed by the Act of Union. I, Sir, adopt the same principle. The noble lord says, that to disturb the church would cut a rent in the Act of Union. I agree with the noble lord, and I say, that if we adopt the principle of alienating the property of the church, we create that rent. The question, Sir, with me now, is this—is the Church of Ireland likely to enjoy more of staple freedom, under the existing state of the law, or by purchasing a short respite from persecution at a cost of some £50,000 or £60,000? And my opinion is, that unsatisfactory as is the present state of the affairs of the church, it is less to be deplored than it would be after purchasing a small portion of good-will, or rather a brief immunity from attack, on these terms. It is not the amount of the money that I speak of, but the principle which is involved with it. What have we to urge in favour of the maintenance of the church establishment at present? The national compact entered into at the time of the Union—the solemn guarantee given to the Protestants of Ireland, that the Protestant faith should be the established faith of that country, that their church should be the Established Church. All the details and statements which are now advanced against the propriety of this arrangement, are there fully considered—the relative numbers of the Protestants and Catholics of Ireland were taken into account by the statesmen of that period—the poverty of the Roman Catholic population, and their poor ability to supply the means of religious culture, were all appreciated; but still the principle was adopted and declared, that the church of the minority should be preserved. The legislature of that day was not blind to the anomaly of the arrangement, but, with full consideration of the objections to which it was liable, they determined as they did. There is another act connected with this subject—I mean the Act for the Relief of the Disabilities of the Roman Catholics. The noble lord was pleased to taunt me for the part I took in the passing of this measure. I can only say, that I hear with perfect indifference any taunts which may be thrown out against me on that subject; for I feel that, if I had taken any other course than the one I took, for the purpose of gratifying any feelings of personal ambition or pride, I should have been so ashamed of my conduct, that I should have been inclined at once to retire from public life. I brought forward that measure on account of the state of the public mind of the people of England at that period, apprehending more danger from the fact of ranging the Protestants of this country in hostile feeling against those of Ireland, than could arise from the privileges to be conferred by that enactment. I entertained that opinion, I submitted it to the Crown; and was I, after having so done, to go out of office, and, for the sake of an appearance of public consistency, to offer a sham opposition to the very measure I had just recommended to the King, because I had always previously opposed it, and yet permit it to be carried? In my opinion, Sir, such conduct would have been dishonourable and dishonest to the fullest extent. In truth, it would have been much more convenient to me, at that period, to have gone out of office, and allowed the hon. gentlemen opposite to pass that bill; but having advised the King to sanction the measure; and the King having adopted my advice, I felt bound to sacrifice all personal considerations of every kind, and to assist in passing it. Some may say, that I should have come to this decision earlier than I did; but no one can say, that, having adopted that opinion, I left office, or shrunk from any of the personal responsibility which that opinion entailed upon me, including the sacrifice of party ties in which I had hitherto been bound up, and the risk of losing the confidence of those with whom I had always been accustomed to act. Would any one say, that it was any purpose of party power or aggrandisement that induced me to abandon, what had been the chief pride of my life, the representation of the University of Oxford? The noble lord, when he taunts me for my change of conduct in respect to the Roman Catholic Relief Act, and when he taunts my noble friend near me for now acting in concurrence with me on this and other questions, can surely not forget the very evident rejoinder to which he subjects himself. The noble lord can surely not forget the year 1827, when, on the great subject of parliamentary reform, he published an opinion that he saw no necessity for such a measure. But I will not pursue this further. These are too important subjects to be trifled with in this manner. I will not retort upon the noble lord any of his taunts. I do not, in fact, feel any thing that has been said, because I know, that any imputations of the sort, whether upon myself or my noble friend, are unjust and unfounded. I do not feel them, they make no impression upon me, and therefore I shall not reply to them. I was speaking of the Roman Catholic Relief bill, and I said, that at the time of the Union we had a guarantee that the Protestant Church should be maintained as the Established Church in Ireland; and although the passing the Roman Catholic bill was not in the nature of a compact, yet I am convinced that the majority of persons in the country then believed, that civil equality to Roman Catholics might be conceded by that measure, with perfect security to that establishment. If, at the time of debating that proposition, the hon. and learned member for Dublin had told us, that the measure of relief would yet be incomplete—if he had told us his story of the Scotch taking to the hill-side, and armed with swords, and informed us that the first consequence of the Roman Catholic Relief bill would be the spoliation of the Church of Ireland, let me tell him, that that measure never would have been passed. No; the people of this country would never have consented to the removal of those disabilities, if they had known that the inevitable consequence of it was to be the alienation of the property of the Church. So far from such a result being contemplated, I refer to the opinions of Lord Plunkett, Mr. Grattan, Lord Carbery, and others, who distinctly denied that such would be the case. I refer also to the preamble of the bill, which stated that the removal of the civil disabilities of the Roman Catholics would tend to strengthen and maintain the Irish Church. This is our position now; but the moment we depart from it, and consent to purchase a little diversion of hostility from the Church, at a cost of £50,000 or £60,000, that very moment the principle upon which we stood is abandoned, the Act of Union no longer guarantees the inviolability of the Church of Ireland, and we admit a principle of appropriating the revenues of the Church to purposes of education, exclusive of the establishment. I do not mean to say, that it would become immoral for a Protestant father to give his children the benefit of this instruction; but it cannot be denied, that in bringing forward an indiscriminate system of education, we imply that it is to be a course of instruction not in the principles of the Established Church; and, therefore, the whole state of things in that respect would be at once changed. With respect also to your amount as applied to your principle. You say that £400,000 is too much for the revenues of the Church, and you propose to abstract £50,000; but surely if you cannot maintain the maintenance of that Church upon the grounds of morality and reason, do you think that the Catholics of Ireland will be satisfied with an eighth only of these revenues? The principle of the noble lord is at once fatal to the establishment, whilst it has not the advantage of purchasing even present peace. On these grounds, therefore, I think that the present position of the Church of Ireland is better than it would be by accepting any such composition. The noble lord says, that the question now before us is a question between two distinct principles of government. I am ready, with the noble lord, to come forward to give all civil privileges to the people of Ireland, provided we can do so, still adhering to the principle of maintaining the integrity of the Established Church. This was the condition upon which I agreed to, and the people of England allowed of, the Roman Catholic Relief bill; and unless we now have satisfaction on this head—namely, the security of the Church of Ireland—we shall prefer the satisfaction of awaiting the devolution of the new powers which may be directed to undermine its strength, to voluntarily giving up an eighth of its revenues to be diverted to purposes foreign to its objects. With reference to education, I should like, I must confess, to see the country so circumstanced as to allow of a system of education being conducted by members of the Church Establishment [laughter]. Hon. members who laugh at this observation can surely not rightly apprehend its import. I said, that I should like to see the country so circumstanced as to allow of that principle of administering instruction; but I am too well aware that that cannot be the case in Ireland, if any doctrines of the establishment, or if any section of dissent, are made a sine qua non in the room of instruction. I am perfectly ready, however, to allow of instruction being provided for the Roman Catholic population on general subjects; for I conceive that the interests of the country would be better consulted by giving them education than by keeping them ignorant. The alternative, therefore, is not between a course of Protestant education or of Catholic education, but a third course is open to us of general moral education, which I should willingly adopt. I certainly prefer a general course of instruction of this kind; and, so far as the duties of the State are concerned in it, I should not object to allow the grant of any sum of money which might be deemed necessary for the purpose. And here, in fact, there is no real difference of opinion between me and the noble lord. It is just as well that this instruction should be paid for direct and at once out of the consolidated fund, as by the complicated machinery of your sixth resolution, which, in fact, is a mere delusion. Whilst I object at all to the principle of alienating the funds of the Church from strictly ecclesiastical purposes, I still more strongly object to applying such alienated funds to a course of education from which the principles of Protestant faith are excluded. The principles on which I object to this mode of appropriation are these—By this measure no satisfactory arrangement can be arrived at: it will alienate a part of the property of the Church, whilst at the same time it will not give satisfaction to the Roman Catholics of Ireland. In passing such a measure as this, you would be abandoning your duty as a Protestant legislature, by allowing a principle which will in itself undermine the Protestant Church, or at least give the means, by future agitation and discontent, to bring it to a state of ruin. Upon these grounds, therefore, I give my cordial support to the amendment of my hon. friend, in order to show my consistent maintenance of a principle, which I ever defended in office, and which I still adhere to in opposition.

The House divided on the original question. Ayes, 317; Noes, 298; majority 19. The House went into Committee, pro forma, and immediately resumed. Committee to sit again.

NEGRO APPRENTICESHIP.

MAY 28, 1838.

The order of the day for taking into consideration the matter of the proceedings of the House of the 29th and 30th of March, and the 22nd of May, relative to Negro Apprenticeship in the West Indies, having been read, Sir George Grey moved a resolution to the effect, "That it was the opinion of the House that it is not advisable to adopt any proceeding for the purpose of giving effect to the resolution of the 22nd of May."

SIR ROBERT PEEL would leave it to others, who had more practical knowledge and local information than he had, to enter into the more minute details into which the hon. gentleman who had preceded him had gone; his main object was rather to state those leading considerations which had brought his mind to the conclusion, the force of which he most strongly felt, that it was fit the House should not proceed to carry into execution the resolution which, by a majority of three, the House of Commons had affirmed on a preceding evening. He had no difficulty whatever in taking a course either for rescinding that resolution in direct terms, or a course which he considered to be exactly tantamount, namely, the passing of a resolution that the House of Commons was not prepared to carry the resolution of the previous evening into effect. He would not enter into the discussion of the mere terms of the resolution; for the rescinding the resolution of the hon. baronet, the member for Warwickshire, would imply, that the apprenticeship system was to continue until the year 1840; and the affirmation of the resolutions moved by the hon. baronet, the Under Secretary for the Colonies, would imply exactly the same thing,—would be so considered in the colonies, and he apprehended would be as effectual for the purpose of removing delusions and misunderstandings, as if the resolution of the former night was rescinded. He had no difficulty in rescinding that resolution first, because he thought the course of proceeding adopted by the hon. baronet, the member for Warwickshire, the proceeding by resolution in a grave matter of this kind, was most objectionable. Here was an act of parliament, which had been adopted by both branches of the legislature, involving, in his opinion, a solemn engagement, which it was attempted to repeal, not by an act of parliament to be submitted to both those branches of the legislature, but by a single resolution, carried after a short debate, precluding that which was most necessary, namely, the consideration of the details, by which alone the principle of such a measure could be judged of. To do this, and thus to evade a compact into which the legislature had entered, and to evade it without inviting the House of Lords to be a party, was a course which might be taken at any time when the public feeling could be easily excited, and by which the House of Commons might escape all the difficulty of executing its own principle, though from the execution of that principle it was impossible to recede. If the hon. baronet, the member for Warwickshire, had asked for leave to bring in a bill, that measure would have passed through the several stages which had been wisely provided in order to guard against precipitate decisions. But the hon. baronet had not taken that course; he had sought to involve the House, by the decision of one night, in difficulties for which he himself had no solution. He had carried his resolution, and, having done so, now said he left the difficulties arising from it to be dealt with by others. Now, he must say, that nothing could be more unfair in a matter of the gravest importance, and in a question upon which the public feeling was so easily excited. If the hon. gentleman was confident of the justice of the principle of his resolution, and the feasibility of its execution, he, the author of the resolution, ought to have been prepared with a remedy for the difficulties into which he brought the House; and it was not enough to say that, by a slight majority, he would not only contravene the decision of the other House of Parliament, pronounced some time since, but also the decisions of that House, pronounced not two months since, and then shrink from the execution of his plan, and ask others to frame its details. Therefore, for the purpose of guarding against and discouraging a practice of this nature—a practice, as he conceived, calculated to fetter the deliberate judgment of Parliament,—he had no hesitation in taking a course which would annul the hon. baronet's resolution; he had no hesitation in taking a course which would amount to this—that the resolution ought to have no effect. He should now state, without exaggeration, and without any attempt at declamation, the train of consecutive reasoning by which he had come to the conclusion, that it would be neither wise nor just suddenly to terminate the period of apprenticeship in the colonies. He apprehended, that that period had been fixed and enacted, in the measure of 1833, for a double purpose; first, he considered it had been expressly enacted to provide in part the compensation to the proprietors of slaves, and next, he considered it had been enacted for the purpose of instituting a preparatory state, which the negroes should pass through previous to the complete termination of slavery. Could there be a doubt, that a contract had been entered into? Why, it appeared to him, that if ever there was an engagement entered into by parliament, it was the engagement, that in compensation for the loss of the labour of the slaves, there should be, first, a pecuniary grant made to the masters, and secondly, that a proprietorship in their labour as apprentices, for a given period, should be awarded as part of the compensation. With respect to this point, what had been the language of those by whom the act of 1833 had been passed? What had been said by his noble friend the author of the measure? His noble friend on July 24, 1833, stated in this House, "When I introduced this bill, I distinctly stated (and I do not shrink from avowing it now) that I consider the period of apprenticeship to be part of the compensation to be paid to the proprietors." Could any thing be more express than this declaration of the author of the measure? And what said the then Chancellor of the Exchequer, the same evening? Lord Althorp said, "All I would observe is, that the period of apprenticeship is an essential principle of the bill, and if the period of apprenticeship was reduced to two years it would be equivalent to no apprenticeship at all, and this amendment, if carried, will be totally destructive of one of the main principles on which the bill is founded." But what were the enactments in the act itself? Those enactments gave a right of property in the labour of the negroes during the period of apprenticeship; they enabled parties to dispose, for pecuniary compensation, of the right to labour during the period of apprenticeship. Could, then, any thing be more clear, than that parliament considered that the right to labour was compensation, when it permitted that labour to be disposed of. He would ask what regulations the hon. baronet proposed with respect to the sales which had actually taken place under the bill? What regulations did he propose with respect to those parties who, relying not only on the implied faith, but the positive enactments of parliament, had disposed of the right they had to the labours of their slaves? Was the party who had paid his money for that labour, to lose it without chance of compensation of any kind whatever? If that was said, then such an act of injustice never was committed. But to remove all doubt that this was the compact, he would quote from the report of a committee, to which the hon. baronet (Sir E. Wilmot) was himself a party, in 1836, in which they spoke in these terms of that arrangement by which the labour of slaves, as apprentices for seven years, was made part of the compensation granted to the planters. That committee said:—"Under these circumstances, they must express a conviction, that nothing could be more unfortunate than any occurrence that had a tendency to unsettle the minds of any class, with regard to the fixed determination of parliament, to preserve inviolate both parts of the solemn engagement, by which the services of the negroes were secured for a definite period, and under specified restrictions."

Here then, again, was a recognition of that arrangement, as a solemn engagement, by the committee which sat to consider the state of the law, and the practice under the law, in the colonies; and that committee was composed of men, not prejudiced in favour of the proprietors, but who were disposed to execute their duty faithfully and impartially, and they recognized the position for which he contended, that there had been a compact between parliament and the planters. But it had been said, there was no written engagement. Perhaps not; but there were unwritten engagements, which ought to be as binding on parliament as a contract formally executed; and if the faith of parliament was pledged to this—if it was understood in the West Indies, in this country, and throughout the world, that this had been an arrangement, made for the purpose of depriving the proprietors of any claim or arrangement over their slaves, whether that engagement was written or unwritten, he contended, the faith of parliament ought to be held as solemn an engagement as if the parties had sealed the compact. The question then still remained, had there been any violation of the contract? He took it, that the apprenticeship formed a part of the compensation quite as much as the £20,000,000 of money which had been paid; and then he had to inquire, had there been such a violation by the planters generally as would entitle the House to visit them generally with punishment? Of course, he had also to consider whether or not the penalty the hon. baronet proposed, was a just penalty. Was it to be confined to the guilty? did it exclude the innocent parties from suffering by it? If not, he could not consider it a just punishment. Parliament had a just right to interpose to secure to the negro every right and privilege which he was entitled to expect from the abolition act, and that would be a just punishment on the planter for a breach of contract; but still it was necessary to ascertain whether or not there had been such an universal, or at least such a general, neglect of the compact by the planters, as to entitle the legislature here to fix any penalty, and if so, whether that proposed was a fitting penalty, and consistent with good policy and the permanent interests of the slaves themselves; for care ought to be taken, lest, in attempting to punish the planters, the negro population also might suffer. Now he had attempted to read the evidence, and he felt convinced that no satisfaction could arise from referring to individual extracts, because any man, on either side of the question, might make out an excellent case both ways. It was impossible to judge the matter but from general results, because in many colonies the state of things was different. In Antigua, for instance, the legislature had declared for immediate abolition, in Barbadoes, they were maturely considering with good-will the possibility of giving effect to the acts of the Imperial Parliament, and that being so, it surely would not be right for the legislature to interpose, and to rob the Assembly of Barbadoes of the grace of their measures. If so, how could this country expect to govern that colony? Was it to draw a line of demarcation between the white and the black population—to determine the hands in which the power should be vested, and conduct the executive government of the colony in all its branches? If not, surely it was to the interest of the slaves for this country to conciliate the white population. With respect to Barbadoes, would any man, looking at the permanent relations between the whites and the blacks, advise parliament to take a step, by which the white population should learn that the House of Commons had stepped in, and suddenly deprived them of the act of grace and favour which they themselves had contemplated. Nothing could be more unfair and unjust. Look, again, at Jamaica, and there the report before the House led to the same conclusion. Let it not be understood, however, that he was the advocate of the course pursued by the Assembly in Jamaica, for he could not consider it any thing short of infatuation. Seeing how inevitable was the arrival of the period when the slave would be entirely free—when no colonial power could defeat the intention of Parliament—knowing there were two short years only to elapse before the slave would be entitled to every privilege—looking at these things, how any men possessed of legislative functions could not discover it was their own true interest and policy to apply themselves with fidelity and good-will to the fulfilment of the wishes and intentions of the Imperial Parliament, and to provide every wise measure for that period, the approach of which was inevitable, he could not understand. But, had there been on the part of the whole West-Indian body such a violation of their duty as would justify the interference now proposed? He did not think there had; and, in proof of this position, he would take the report of the committee of the House of Commons in 1836. It was there stated, that the mutual irritation which had prevailed among the black and white population was decreasing, and that, on the part of the negro population, industrious habits seemed to be gaining ground. The hon. gentleman opposite asked, why there should be an interval of two years for the purpose of framing preparatory measures? and he said, “What have you done during the last four years?” Why, this delay was recommended by that very committee of 1836, which contained some of the best friends of the negroes, and they declared that it would be most prudent to defer all preparatory enactments till the period immediately preceding the period of emancipation. The House, then, was fully justified in not having passed any preparatory measures, because those who were among the warmest friends of the negroes had advised their postponement. With respect to Jamaica, hon. members opposite had themselves admitted, after a full examination, that there was no doubt of a successful result to the experiment in that colony.

Antigua had anticipated the period fixed for emancipation, and Barbadoes was preparing to follow her example. Now, what was the case with respect to Guiana? The governor of that colony appeared to have conciliated the good-will of the slaves to a degree which rendered his authority on these points most valuable. Any conclusion might be supported from the voluminous extracts laid on the table, but he confessed, that he placed much reliance on the opinion of a man like Sir James Carmichael Smyth. If evidence could be trusted at all, Sir J. C. Smyth seemed to have completely succeeded in conciliating the good-will of the negro population. He began by a bold and impartial execution of his duty, and, disregarding alike intrigues and menaces in the discharge of it, he fully succeeded in gaining the affections of the negro population. And what was the opinion of Sir James Carmichael Smyth, with reference to the slave emancipation act in Guiana? He stated, that when he compared the condition of the apprenticed labourer with what he had been as a slave, he felt no small degree of satisfaction in reflecting upon the share which he had taken in carrying this measure into effect. The hon. gentleman opposite said, that millions of stripes had been inflicted on the apprenticed negro. Now, he thought that it was best to deal with this question without exaggeration. What was the opinion expressed by Sir James Carmichael Smyth, with reference to the amount of punishment inflicted in Guiana? Why, that he could lay his head on his pillow with the reflection, that throughout the whole colony not one single lash was given which ought to be withheld; and he also said, that, looking at what had then been already effected, he could look forward to the greater alterations which must be made in August, 1840, with something like confidence. He said, also, and it should be recollected that this came from one of the greatest friends of the negroes, that the period of apprenticeship ought not to be shortened. Surely it was better to rely on the testimony of a man, with the experience of Sir James Carmichael Smyth, than on unauthenticated statements, coming from persons whose names were often not mentioned. Looking, then, at the state of Antigua, Barbadoes, and Guiana, he could not come to the conclusion, that there had been that general infidelity to their engagements on the part of the West-Indian proprietors which would sanction a departure, on the part of the House, from the compact which was entered into in 1833. Then arose the question, whether the considerations urged by prudence and sound policy would suggest, that with a view of punishing the planter the period of apprenticeship should at once expire. He thought that such a course would be most unjust, as far as the planters were concerned, and most unwise, with reference to the interests of the colonies. The proposal made by hon. gentlemen was, to put an abrupt and immediate termination to the state of apprenticeship without any preparatory measures. There might be a difference of opinion upon the question whether apprenticeship ought ever to have been introduced, though he thought that his noble friend had done right in substituting that system for a state of slavery, without incurring the fearful risk of an immediate emancipation; but many of those who differed from him on that question, concurred with him in deprecating an abrupt and immediate termination to the existing system. Were hon. members quite sure that the real comforts of the negro were not more in the power of the whites than they at first imagined, and were they quite certain, that if the negro were suddenly placed in the state of a British freeman, he would enjoy all his material comforts? The House should remember that our colonies were not under a despotic government, like that of Spain, which could by a royal ordinance secure to the newly-emancipated apprentices all the practical rights of freemen. Only two years remained for the consideration of measures to be found for the regulation of a new state of society, and he trusted that the House of Commons would not, by sanctioning a breach of engagement, at the same time be guilty of such precipitation and folly as never could be expected from the legislature of Great Britain, or indeed from any other legislature in the world. They might depend upon it, when the year 1840 should come, the condition of the master and the apprentice would demand the careful and impartial attention of parliament. They would have many evils and difficulties to contend with, and unless they showed by their votes, to the white proprietor, that they acted with deliberate judgment, and held the scales of justice with a steady hand, they would impair and weaken the power which they would then be called upon to exercise. If they in their hearts believed, that the immediate abolition of the system of apprenticeship was just and necessary, let them pass the required enactments; but if once they showed, by yielding to extrinsic impressions, that parliament was prepared to abdicate its function and to suffer them to devolve on Exeter-hall, he not only thought that they would strike a great blow at the legislative authority of parliament, but he did not hesitate to say, that they would deprive themselves of that influence which they ought to exercise hereafter in moderating the violent passions which must be excited in our West-Indian colonies. He also felt the full force of the argument which had been urged during this debate, that the conduct of the British parliament in regard to this question would not only have an important influence upon the condition of the negroes in our own colonies, but also upon the condition of the millions of slaves in other countries. If we told the planters in other countries that this experiment had failed, we might depend upon it that the difficulties in the way of an amicable adjustment of slavery in those countries would be formidably increased. His belief was, that no power on the face of the globe could effect the permanent continuance of slavery. He believed, that the wisest course both for France and America to adopt, would be, immediately to take into their consideration measures for the ultimate termination of slavery. It was impossible to witness the spectacle of 800,000 negroes emancipated by England, without feeling assured that their condition must materially influence that of 5,000,000 of slaves; but, in the name of humanity, let us set others an example of the peaceful and amicable adjustment of this question. Let us beware how by any such act, we put in hazard the realization of this prospect. Were we to tell foreign countries that they had no right to come to any compromise on this subject, and that there was no medium between slavery and immediate emancipation? If we held that language we should be throwing fresh obstructions in the way of a peaceful settlement. He believed, that the great triumph of the experiment would be an amicable adjustment; but if liberty was to be wrested with violence from the master, by the slave, he could see nothing in the distance but a long course of violence, anarchy, and bloodshed. If, however, the House of Commons showed that they could raise themselves above the appeals that were made to their passions, and permitted this experiment to be fairly and successfully worked out, they might look forward to a time, perhaps they might even live to see it, when in every other country of the world the very name of slave would be forgotten. But it was possible that by misleading the slave, and by inciting persons to tell him that by a vote of the House of Commons he was actually free, he might be led to acts of violence, in endeavouring to assert his liberty, which must be repressed by force, and which would not only prevent our own apprenticed negroes from following a course of peaceful industry, but would, at the same time, afford to the slave proprietor of other countries, an excuse for doggedly refusing his assent to an amicable adjustment. Upon these grounds he should feel it his duty to give his cordial support to the resolutions proposed by the hon. baronet the member for Devonport.

An amendment by Sir E. Wilmot was negatived, and the original motion carried by a majority of 72.

SEIZURE OF THE VIXEN.

JUNE, 21, 1838.

Sir S. Canning moved for the appointment of a select committee to inquire into the circumstances connected with the seizure of the Vixen, and her cargo, by a Russian man-of-war, in the Bay of Soudjouk-kale.

SIR ROBERT PEEL: I really feel it to be superfluous to trouble the House further with a prolongation of this debate. After the eloquent and argumentative speeches of my right hon. friend and the noble lord near me, and the lame attempt at a reply by the noble lord opposite (Lord Palmerston), it is perfectly clear, that in point of argument, the case is satisfactorily settled. The noble lord has called the speech of my noble friend "a pugnacious speech." The noble lord was most unhappy in his epithet as in his argument. It was an able and a convincing speech—it was a logical and an argumentative speech—but the epithet "pugnacious" cannot be applied to it. Pugnacious, if I remember aright, in reference to a speech or a debate, means a conflict of arguments ; but that the speech of my noble friend cannot be so designated, is evident from the simple fact, that all the argument is on his side. I recollect a high classical authority for the use of the term. It is that of a gentleman placed in a situation nearly similar to that of the noble lord opposite :—

—“ *Miseræ cognosce proemia rixæ
Si rixæ est, ubi tu pulsas, ego vapulo tantum.*”

The noble lord expressed his surprise that the result of my right hon. friend's motion should be of so trifling a character. But may I not be permitted to express my surprise at the observations of the noble lord in this respect? What! is the vindication of the character of a British merchant, and the protection of the commerce of this country, such trifles in the eyes of the noble lord, that he can be surprised at my right hon. friend's interference on their behalf? It may be an insignificant matter in the eyes of the noble lord, and a few tons of salt may seem to him to be a mere trifle; but the subject is one which involved as great a stake as if the cargo were of precious stones; and, at all events, that is no language for a Foreign Secretary of this kingdom to use when any of its interests are at issue. It is no matter what may be the size of the vessel seized—it boots not what is the nature of her cargo: it may be salt or it may be diamonds—the House of Commons is the place where such a case as this question involves should alone be decided. The noble lord, in the beginning of his speech, certainly exonerates Mr. Bell from blame—he acquits him of wrong, and he casts no stigma on him: but, long before he concludes, he casts them on him in abundance. Why is it so? The noble lord, at the outset of his observation, denies the committee moved for by my right hon. friend, on the grounds that Mr. Bell's character is intact; but the noble lord cuts himself off from that ground, by casting imputations on that gentleman's character before he concludes his speech. I know nothing of Mr. Bell—I have no acquaintance with him—I have no knowledge of him, except in his capacity of a British merchant; but still, I think, the noble lord might have done his own cause more service, if he had not endeavoured to damage Mr. Bell. The noble lord has cast imputations on Mr. Bell's character. I have his words. They are—“Mr. Bell was endeavouring to entrap me under false pretences.”

Viscount Palmerston denied having employed the word false. He only said, that Mr. Bell was endeavouring to trap him under pretences.

Sir Robert Peel: Well, be it so. The noble lord also says, that Mr. Bell was concerned in an attempt to involve two great countries in a war. Why, what motive could a British merchant have to promote a war between two countries such as Russia and England, unless he acted under the direction of his own government? If, as the noble lord has stated, Mr. Bell possesses large property in Russia, what motive could he have—still more so as a British merchant—in promoting a war between the two countries, unless he understood that it would please the noble lord, or some one in power and authority? I am given to understand that Mr. Bell would be a great loser in the event of such a war, and the noble lord has quite failed in assigning any reason why he should desire it. If the noble lord had succeeded in showing that Mr. Bell was acting on intelligence with the British government, I should have been able to understand it, however unwise I might deem his conduct. The motive in that case would be obvious. Now, it is not; and, therefore, the noble lord is at fault in his observations respecting him. After listening to the speech of the noble lord, and the hon. and learned gentleman behind him, I ask myself, for what purpose are the different departments of the state in this country constituted? Are they to assist British merchants—to counsel, to guide them, to point out when they are wrong, and to encourage when they are right? If the case before us be taken as a specimen, I should rather say, that they were established for the purpose of bewildering him. The noble lord has said, that he is himself the “Foreign-office,” and that no authority but his was to be taken in all matters connected with that department. What does the noble lord mean? Does he exclude altogether the Under-secretaries from all share in it? Does he mean to say, that British merchants and consuls communicating with the Foreign-office, were not to take any thing on the authority of an Under-secretary of State, unless he proclaims it at each word to be derived from the noble lord alone. Is every communication not made in that manner to be looked upon as invalid? I have been Under-secretary of State myself. I have been Secretary of State also, and though I know not what foreign ambassadors might do, I do know, that no British merchant would look at the difference between Secretary and Under-secretary, in the way of information relative to his business. In cases of such a confidential nature as that under discussion, an Under-secretary would venture to make a communication without authority. The objection, therefore, is an invalid one, and the line of difference drawn by the noble lord cannot be sustained. Let us now consider the position of Mr. Bell, as a British merchant, after he had sought information on the subject from the public authorities. In 1831 the noble lord received a distinct intimation from Russia, that she meant to establish fiscal rights on the coast of Circassia. The noble lord says, that it would not be convenient to communicate that intelligence to the public. Granted. But when did Mr. Bell make inquiries respecting it? Years after. According to the laws of Russia, the Black Sea was to be open to all vessels; but that they could only touch at certain ports on the eastern shore, where quarantine and custom-houses were established. What communication did the noble lord make to Russia, on receipt of this intimation of her intention? I will agree with him, that it may not have been convenient to make it public at Lloyd's at the time, but what communication did he make to Russia, when he learned that Circassia was to be no longer an independent power? What did he say, when he was informed that Mr. Bell's vessel had been seized? In a letter of Lord Durham to the noble lord, it is said, that the forcible interference of any foreign power with the peaceful occupation of a country was to be condemned. Perhaps, he had heard of the noble lord's opinion. Was not Mr. Bell justified in undertaking this voyage under such circumstances? What satisfied Lord Ponsonby after the seizure of Mr. Bell's vessel? Was it the decision of a Russian judge—some Scythian Lord Stowell? No; all the authority ever exhibited for the act, was an imperial order, dated St. Petersburg, and directed to the Russian admiralty in the Black Sea, directing it to confiscate the Vixen, and declaring it and the cargo a good prize. The noble lord, he was sure, would never think of relying on such an authority in a question where the law of nations was solely concerned. What other authority had the noble lord? That of Count Nesselrode, who said, that the reason assigned for the confiscation of the Vixen was, that she entered a port ceded to Russia by the treaty of Adrianople; and the justification was twofold—first, having on board a cargo not allowed by the fiscal regulations of Russia; and, second, having entered a port declared to be then in a state of blockade. If such an official declaration could be had so easily from Russia, and was deemed satisfactory by the noble lord, why had he not essayed to procure a similar satisfactory explanation from that country relative to the declaration made by Russia six years before? Between the 19th of April and the 23rd of May, a remarkable change from official declaration to satisfaction occurred in his manner—all apparently induced by the assurance received from Count Nesselrode, that Turkey had ceded the coast in question to Russia by the treaty of Adrianople? Again, I ask, why did he not apply to Russia, at the proper time, for some similar assurance or explanation respecting her claim to a right of blockade on that coast? Why did he not protest against that Ukase, and so have retained to himself the power to have contested the assumption at any time he thought proper? He might have said, "I have received such a declaration, 'tis true, but I will not admit its force." That might have been consistent and politic; but there was nothing of the kind done or thought of, and almost as soon as the question was raised, it was set at rest, on the satisfactory assurance of Count Nesselrode that the coast had been ceded by Turkey. Certainly, Mr. Bell did not receive the most satisfactory assurance or information on the subject. He applies to the Foreign-office, and he is told, "Look to the Gazette, and see if the blockade be recorded there." There certainly was no direct communication from the noble lord at the head of foreign affairs, to warrant Mr. Bell's enterprise; but, looking to the communications of Mr. Urquhart, and Lord Ponsonby with him, respecting the rights of Russia and the protection of England, I don't see how any man could come to any other conclusion than what Mr. Bell did, respecting his right to trade and his claim to the protection of his country. The noble lord may say, that Lord Ponsonby might, in his explanation, have confounded the ideas of blockade and "fiscal regulations," but he does not allow Mr. Bell that excuse. Extending to the noble lord himself that excuse—allowing him to have interpreted the edict of Russia, in 1831, to have duly extended to “fiscal regulations,”—it may be easily inferred, that he need not have taken the trouble of protesting against, or contesting such a harmless edict. It certainly looks as if he had thought the whole affair a trifle, till the affair of the Vixen enlightened him, for he had six years to think of the matter, and yet said nothing about it. The noble lord said, that Mr. Bell might have had a political object in his commercial speculations. It appeared, however, that Lord Ponsonby himself was a willing party to this political object, according to the statement of Mr. James Bell. He says in his account of his interview with Lord Ponsonby:—“I then informed his lordship, that it was my intention to proceed in a vessel I expected daily, to a certain point on the coast of Circassia, which I had fixed upon as most eligible for the trade I had in view; and that, as I had ascertained before leaving London, that our government did not acknowledge any right on the part of Russia to impede trade with the country in question, and as nothing seemed to have since occurred to change the position of affairs, I should endeavour to attain the object I had in view, and should not be diverted from it, unless force were employed on the part of the Russian government, in which case I should seek redress from the British government, and hoped to obtain his lordship’s aid in so doing. In reply to this, his lordship stated, that he perfectly coincided in the propriety of the plan I had adopted, to which he had no objection whatever to offer, as he considered it an indisputable point, that Russia had no right to interfere with, or prescribe rules for, British trade with Circassia; and that, if I adhered to the straightforward course detailed to him, he had no doubt of my being able to establish a claim for support from the British government, in which he would be glad to render me all the assistance in his power, requesting me at the same time to transmit him information as to what success attended my enterprise.”

What, then, did Lord Ponsonby mean when he told Mr. Bell that it must be necessary, for his own interest, carefully to avoid every thing that would wear even the appearance of an attempt to evade a blockade? He could not mean “fiscal regulations” here. I must say, that if Mr. Bell became a politician, you made him so by your advice, countenance, and support. You told him that Russia had no right to demand dues, though she might have to blockade the coast. Where is the British merchant who would not attempt to trade when so assured and supported? From Lord Ponsonby, he goes to Mr. Urquhart, and if, by his official advice, Mr. Bell went wrong, the noble lord who appointed Mr. Urquhart, and sent him to Constantinople, is responsible, and not the British merchant who acts on his information. I am aware, that this case is one of a very peculiar nature, and I may say peculiar hardship. A court of law, I fear, will not grant redress. I do not say, that a House of Commons would give redress, but I say that there is a strong case for inquiry. There are three distinct points in favour of Mr. Bell: first, the six years’ concealment of the blockade, by the noble lord at the head of foreign affairs; second, the dry answer returned to Mr. Bell, when he demanded such information as might have served for his guidance, from the only competent authority; and third, the further encouragement given him abroad by Lord Ponsonby and Mr. Urquhart, all form solid grounds for this inquiry. The noble lord says he will resist it. It would be dangerous, perhaps, to give the political portion of the subject into the hands of a select committee, but the demand for inquiry stands upon grounds to which that objection cannot fairly be made. A British merchant comes before the House of Commons, and states, that he has been encouraged by the government to embark in an enterprise, by which he has lost his property, through foreign interference and aggression, and that he can obtain no redress. He declares, that the courts of law are not available to afford him compensation—that the assurance offices will afford him no redress—and that, as a last resource, he applies to you. You may refuse him this redress; but if you do, I forewarn you that your decision will not be satisfactory to the public, who look attentively at these proceedings—and, still less, will such a decision be satisfactory to the great and intelligent body of British merchants, so deeply interested in the case, and who so naturally look to you for protection, sympathy, and justice.

TITHES (IRELAND).

JULY 23, 1838.

The House went into Committee on this Bill. On the 1st. Clause being read, Lord John Russell proposed to omit it, and substitute for it a clause declaring, that the right of all persons to tithes, or to composition of tithes which had already accrued, or which might hereafter accrue, should cease and determine, &c.

On the amendment being put,—

SIR ROBERT PEEL rose and said, Sir, I have an amendment to propose to the clause which the noble lord has moved should be substituted in lieu of the first clause of the bill, and which has been just read from the chair. The noble lord's substitute clause proposes, that the rights of all persons to tithes and compositions for tithes which have already accrued, or which may hereafter accrue, shall altogether cease and determine. The effect of this proposition would be to give a legislative extinction to all tithes, or arrears of tithes, that have already accrued. With respect to the extinction of all right to tithes which may hereafter accrue, I do not so much object to that part of the proposition, for parliament proposes to give as a substitute in lieu thereof, a permanent and secure rent-charge. But, Sir, I very much doubt the policy of extinguishing all right to tithes which may have heretofore accrued. At the same time, when I say this, I fully feel the difficulties by which the subject is environed, and I agree in the desire, so far as not to violate any principles, to make a final and satisfactory settlement of this question by the legislative extinction of tithes. I agree in the noble lord's proposition that a sum should be applied to the extinction of all arrears of tithe, and, that it should be a definite sum. I am satisfied with the proposal of the noble lord, that a sum of £300,000 should be applied to the liquidation of those arrears. That sum is to be composed of the remainder of the million, namely, £268,000, and over which the noble lord has absolute control, and of £40,000, which the noble lord expects to be able to make up from the recovery of the amount of claims still due by solvent parties. The noble lord then proposes, that that sum, which for the sake of clearness, I shall assume to be £300,000, shall be together applied to the liquidation, exclusively of the arrears of 1836 and of 1837. On these parties to whom the arrears for these two years are due, receiving their portion of the amount to be applied to this purpose, the provision of the noble lord's clause is, that then and thereafter, the claims to arrears of all persons being tithe-owners should be extinguished by law. Now I very much doubt the justice, as well as the policy, of that proposition. In the first place let us take the case of an incumbent who vacated his living at the commencement of 1836, and who had claims for arrears for 1834 and 1835. Now, would not the peculiar force of this case be considerably augmented if it should appear, that such an incumbent had forborne to enforce these claims from a desire to wait until he should be enabled to understand what opinion parliament would express with respect to the final settlement of this question. Well, then, let us take another case. Let us take the case of a widow whose husband died at the commencement of 1836, and who had unsatisfied claims for arrears of tithes that accrued in the years, 1834 and 1835. Now, would it not be unjust that this party, without having received any kind of compensation whatever, should be deprived of her undoubted legal right to recover the amount of these unsatisfied claims? Indeed, Sir, I must repeat, that I very much doubt the policy as well as the justice, that persons who at present are in the possession of legal rights to enforce the recovery of debts due to them, shall by your enactment, be deprived of those rights, and lose the power of recovering the debts due to them, for no other reason than that other persons, who had no better claims, should be enabled to receive a proportion of what was due to them for two years. Why, what was it more than this, that one party whose claims related to two antecedent years should, without any compensation or consideration whatever, lose all claims, and be deprived of their legal rights on the payment to other parties of arrears or compensation in lieu of arrears which related to the two subsequent years of 1836 and 1837? I doubt the policy of your declaring as you do by this clause, that under no circumstances in future shall tithes be enforced. That no matter how solvent a debtor may be—that no matter how contumacious, vexatious, or obstinate the resistance to the payment of these claims may have been, you are by your legislative act to declare this resistance successful, and that neither the tithe-owner nor the executive government shall hereafter be enabled to enforce the payment of these arrears. I fully agree that parliament must interfere for the settlement of these arrears by a specific grant of a sum of money, which sum, I agree, should be that which the noble lord proposes to apply to this object. I also agree in the propriety that parliament should clearly understand what amount of pecuniary burthen should be placed on the United Kingdom for the settlement of this question. I do not call upon the government to make any proposal that the amount of arrears, which amount is indefinite, should be paid in the proportion of 75 per cent. or of 60 per cent. This would not be a reasonable expectation to entertain, that the government should make an indefinite proposition of this kind. The amount of arrears being unascertained and indefinite, were such a proposition made, the sum applied for their liquidation would be indefinite also. It seems to me reasonable that parliament should only be called upon to grant a definite sum; but that parliament should ascertain what proportion this sum would bear to the arrears, and that an option should be given to the party to whom the arrears are due to accept or reject the terms offered by the government. I would also propose that in every case where the offer was accepted, the government should inherit the right of the tithe-owner, and should be left the power to determine whether they would enforce the payment of the amount due by the debtor or not. By the adoption of my proposition you will save two principles. You will avoid violation of the rights of property, which will not be the case if the proposal of the noble lord, in its present state, be carried into effect. I do not think it is fair, that you should force parties to accept certain sums in lieu of existing rights. I can understand that you may fairly say to a party, "We offer you a certain sum in lieu of your existing rights—we make that compensation as liberal as we can—you may refuse it if you like; but we warn you, if you do that, you must expect great difficulty in the recovery of those arrears. You may seek to recover them if you choose; and if you take that option, we will do our duty towards you. We will assist you with the aid of the civil power, whenever it be necessary; but you may find it wiser to accept the compensation which we now offer you in lieu of those claims." I can very well understand the fairness of pursuing such a course as this. You would do injustice to no one, because you would leave to every party the power of rejecting or accepting the offer you made them. If they did accept your offer, the object you have in view would be carried into effect without any violation of the rights of property; and if they did not accept your offer, you would leave every party in the situation in which you found them. My own opinion, undoubtedly is, that your offer will be accepted; and that the tithe-owner will consent to accept his proportion of £300,000. I think, that the opportunity of accepting or refusing that offer should be given. To those who declaim so eloquently, and object so strongly to the application of the public money to any such purposes as this, I very much fear that neither the noble lord's proposition, nor mine, will be likely to give much satisfaction. It is very easy to talk in this way. It is very easy for hon. members, who have no connection with Ireland, and who are not acquainted with the condition of things in that country, to get up and say, "Oh, why should not these claims be enforced? Why should not these arrears be recovered, by pressing for the payments on those by whom they are due?" I object to the burthen of such an amount for the settlement of tithes being placed upon this country." It is quite easy to talk in this way. I agree upon this point, that it is easy for hon. members who have no responsibility, to get up in their places, and declaim in this way; and, after having become warm and eloquent upon the topic, then sit down to enjoy the cheers with which their speeches are applauded. But, Sir, no one can deeply and fully consider this question, without becoming fully sensible of the difficulty of bringing it to a satisfactory conclusion; or without, on the other hand, being convinced of the beneficial consequences that would result from the final settlement of the question on a permanent and satisfactory basis. However, if the advance of £300,000 would secure the permanent and satisfactory settlement of the Irish tithe question, I firmly believe, in even the narrowest view of the question, that with respect to the pecuniary burthen to be placed on England and Scotland, I say, that I firmly believe, if such a result could be secured, that the peace of Ireland would be cheaply purchased by the payment of £300,000. Nay, more; if it depended solely on my own wish, I do not hesitate to say, that I would not shrink from even a farther advance if I felt that we could thereby place ourselves upon the threshold of satisfactory settlement, because it appears to me, that we are going to place the question on an entirely new footing, and to place the payment of the clergy on a totally different system. Whatever may be the effect, or whatever difference of opinion may be entertained with respect to the Established Church, we are going to place the tithes upon an entirely new footing, and a system altogether new. We are about to place the Irish landlords under an obligation of taking on themselves the support of the clergy of the Established Church. We are going to give to the clergy of the Established Church the most enlarged powers for the protection of their future income, which we have thought fit should be reduced in amount, in consideration of the increased security to be derived from the altered system under which they are placed. We are going to remove the clergy from all contact with the occupier in the relation of tithe-owner and tithe-payer. We all agree, that this is desirable. But then we cannot do this, without first making some just and reasonable provision for the settlement of the arrears. Now, in concurring in the necessity of doing this, I can by no means concur in the opinion expressed, a few days ago, by the hon. member for Southwark, that this is only the first of a series of demands which this country will have to answer on the part of the Irish Church. I by no means think, that any such thing is likely to be the case. Nay, more; I can hardly see the circumstances under which, after what we are doing now, it is possible that there can be a fresh demand on the part of the Irish Church. I will, then, assume, that the sum of £300,000 is to be applied to the settlement of this question. Our single wish is, to effect that settlement in a satisfactory manner. As I am anxious to do justice to the clergy of the Established Church in Ireland, I would even consent that, within certain limits, the sum of £300,000 should be still further increased; but under existing circumstances, that is, perhaps, impossible. Whatever is to be the amount, it seems to me that it would be desirable, that the government should take the additional sum out of the Consolidated Fund. Whatever the sum is to be, let it be at least a definite sum. I believe the noble lord calculates with certainty, on being able to recover £40,000, to make up the remainder of the £300,000. I therefore, think, it would be much better, and give an increased feeling of security, if the government would advance the whole sum of £300,000, and hold themselves responsible, or at least should themselves undertake the collection of the £40,000 which the noble lord expects to be able to recover. Let them repay the advance of the £40,000 by applying to that purpose the sums that they expect to recover from the landlords. Let us, then, agree, that the sum of £300,000 should be the amount advanced by parliament. My proposal is, that nothing should be done until we first ascertain the amount of the arrears due. I sincerely desire, that we should approach the settlement of this question altogether unprejudiced, and only governed by the consideration of how we may best come to the most satisfactory and beneficial result. I hope hon. members will be convinced, that by adopting my proposition they will commit no violation of any principle—that they will not interfere with any rights of property; and that my plan, whilst it possesses those advantages, has an equal tendency to the settlement of the question. I propose no appropriation whatever of the money advanced without full preliminary inquiry. As I said before, I would appoint a commission to inquire. Should the expense of a commission form any ground of objection, I do not think there would be the least difficulty in finding persons, sufficiently alive to the interests of the Church, to be willing to undertake those duties if it should so be wished, without compensation. I propose, that three commissioners be appointed; let two of them be appointed by the government, and let the third be appointed by the Primate of Ireland. Or if this be objected to, let the government have the appointment of the three commissioners, but let it be understood that one is to be appointed specially to watch over the interests of the Established Church. I would then propose that these commissioners should proceed to inquire into, and to review the whole subject of arrears of tithes; that they should collect information with respect to the amount of arrears now due, not alone the arrears due on account of 1836 and 1837, but likewise of the arrears due on account of 1834 and 1835. I would propose, that the amount due for all the years should be stated, and that the commissioners should class those arrears under different heads—that those of 1834 should be classed by themselves, and so on for each year, down to the arrears of 1837, thus including in this way each of the four years, for which the arrears are due. I would also propose, that the commissioners should mention in their report any special circumstances connected with any particular portion of those arrears, that those matters of a special nature might afterwards be taken into consideration. After the commissioners had ascertained the amount of the arrears, and what proportion was due for each year, I would then propose, that the money advanced should be applied, not for the liquidation of the arrears of any one or two years, but that it should embrace within its scope the whole of the four years. I would not apply the same principle to the whole of the arrears, but I would not exclude the whole or any part thereof from the benefit of the compensation, not of course giving the same amount of compensation with respect to 1834 and 1835, as with respect to those of 1836 and 1837. There may be cases in which many of the clergy suffered those arrears to accrue from a forbearance on their parts, and from a wish to avoid the introduction of causes of disturbance or agitation into their parishes. With respect to these cases I will now say nothing, but propose that the commissioners should ascertain the facts, and should in their report suggest for future consideration the principles on which repayment should be made. I would, moreover, propose, that the plans suggested by the commissioners should not be binding until they should have received the sanction of parliament. Nothing would then remain to be done in this respect, but that the £300,000 should be divided on such principles as would appear to be most consistent with justice for the settlement of those arrears. Now, as to the offer of compensation, it is my firm belief, that in nine cases out of ten, the offers would be accepted, and that without any violation of the principles of property, we should be enabled to arrive at a satisfactory settlement of the title question. To come now to another point of the noble lord's proposal. The noble lord proposes, that in paying the arrears for the two last years, the right to the recovery of all arrears which had previously accrued should altogether cease, and be entirely forfeited. Now, surely, there would be no justice whatever in that proceeding. We could introduce or promulgate no more dangerous principle than that of acknowledging a claim and denying a remedy. The claim becomes at once extinguished if the remedy be taken away. You make an advance of money, the distribution of which is to be confined to particular parties, and though you declare your intention to extinguish the rights of other clergymen, you say that they are to receive no compensation whatever. Now, surely, no one can attempt to say that this is justice. Take the case of a clergyman, who, at great expense, and by great trouble and exertions, brought his claims for the arrears due to him in the two antecedent years to a successful issue, but though he had succeeded in placing them on this footing, had himself received no benefit. Well, he dies, or is transferred to another parish. A new incumbent comes in in 1837, and reaps the whole benefit of the exertions of his predecessors. You then give this new incumbent all the benefit of your compensation, whilst his predecessor, the benefit of whose exertions he has reaped, gets nothing in respect of the arrears relating to the two antecedent years. You say to the representatives of this man—"We will give nothing whatever to you—this parliament has determined to take away your legal rights—we will give you nothing to compensate you, but we will take care to deprive you of the power to enforce your undoubted and acknowledged claims." This, let me warn you, is a dangerous principle to introduce into legislation, and is as applicable to every other claim, no matter what its nature, as it is to the payment of these arrears. It is saying to any man whose rights you take away—"You must make a sacrifice for the benefit of the public, but we will take care that the whole burthen of that sacrifice shall fall exclusively upon yourself." There are many instances in which you may apply the same principle on the same grounds. It would be easy to show, if that principle were recognised in our legislation, that no property would be safe. As to what should be really done, my proposal comprises the whole case and meets every difficulty. I would include the tithes of 1834, as well as those of 1837. I certainly might feel it right to allot a smaller sum to him to whom arrears were due from 1834, than to the individual whose arrears had accrued in 1836 or 1837. As I said before, I believe, if, as I think you ought you were to give the option, that in most cases your offer would be accepted. You might, if you thought it necessary, contract the time during which the option should be given. I was represented to have said on a former occasion that fifty per cent would be an adequate compensation. I have since got several letters from Ireland stating that fifty per cent. was too little. But I have this diligently to deal with—the sum to be appropriated to this purpose is definite, whilst the amount of the arrears is indefinite; so that I only know one part of the question. It strikes me, however, that the proportion between the arrears and the sum advanced for compensation, may enable you to offer fifty per cent. for the arrears of the two first years, and sixty-five per cent. for the arrears of the two last years. I have this to observe, that in case your offer is refused by some of the parties, the more will remain to be divided amongst those who accept your proposal. Parties will consider, whether it is not better to accept the offer of the government than to bear the burthen of enforcing their own rights. I am firmly convinced that before three months, most of the parties to whom these arrears are due, would be anxious to get instead of them a net advance from the public funds. But even if they did not accept your offer, I believe that such a plan would be equally successful if you carry into effect the amendment which I now have the honour to submit to the consideration of the House. My amendment is this. In the fifth line of the clause which the noble lord proposes to substitute for the first clause of the bill, I propose after the word “accrue” to insert words to the effect, that the rights of all persons to compositions for tithes, or arrears of tithes, shall, in the cases hereafter mentioned, vest in her Majesty, and that the rights to all persons to tithes to be hereafter due, shall altogether cease and determine. If the words I propose, be adopted, it will imply that in certain cases, to be hereafter more fully and specially mentioned, if the offer made to the tithe-owners shall be accepted, the existing right of tithes should be transferred from the clergy to her Majesty’s government. It would rest in their hands then to determine whether or not these claims should be extinguished; but in any case, unless compensation was given, I contend that the rights of parties ought not to be interfered with. My proposal does not involve a greater advance of the public money than that of the noble lord. The sum proposed to be granted, will be sufficient, as far as I can at present see. The sum to be devoted for this purpose is subordinate to the greater and more important consideration of what is the best mode to settle this question with a view to securing the peace of Ireland, and also without violating any great public principle, or the rights of property. Keeping before our minds the great principles which should ever guide our legislation, our duty is to consider what is the best mode in which we can come to a final and permanent settlement of this question. It is of the deepest importance that whatever settlement we make should be satisfactory, and that, whilst we secure the peace of Ireland, we should endeavour to place on a proper basis the interests of the church. I sincerely hope that neither my proposition, nor that of the noble lord, will be rejected on the ground which was put forward the other night, namely that the protestant church in Ireland is on a rotten foundation. I cannot help saying, that I heard with deep regret that speech of the noble lord (Viscount Howick), having a tendency to produce excitement and alarm amongst the friends of the established church in Ireland. I can very well understand the grounds on which the noble lord felt it consistent to abandon the appropriation principle, but having abandoned that principle of appropriation, why did the noble lord think it becoming in him to make a declaration which would excite alarm and agitation in Ireland, and which was calculated to prevent, so far as the declaration of a minister could prevent, the success of the measure which the noble lord himself had brought forward. For my part, Sir, it is my sincere belief, and my strong conviction, that the established church will be maintained in Ireland. I believe it absolutely essential to its maintenance that the limited provision now about to be made for the support of its clergy, should continue to be made. I consider, indeed, that after the deductions from the income of that church which parliament has decided on making, that there will not remain more than is barely sufficient to maintain the clergy in that decent comfort which is necessary to the performance of their ecclesiastical duties. I am at the same time certain, that you will never reconcile the people of Ireland to the continuance of that church by merely providing that ten per cent. shall be deducted from the amount of the revenues of the church, and still less will you succeed in that end by declaring that an indefinite and unascertained surplus which may possibly accrue at a period some forty years hence shall hereafter be applied to the purposes of education. I think it much better that that sum which is the property of the church should be appropriated to the support of the ministers of that church. Depend upon it, the noble lord will be no more able to maintain the principle which he propounded the other night, than he was able to maintain the appropriation principle. The noble lord says, that if he pushed his principle to its legitimate extent, that he ought to go further. Why, possibly in the declaration he made, we may find some clue to the interpretation of that principle. It would be better that the noble lord should at once, and above board, tell us what is the conclusion of his principle, and what is the ultimate limit of its application. I tell the noble lord, that I consider that his principle, if brought to its legitimate conclusion, would be nothing more nor less than establishing the religion of the majority, and of transferring the wealth and influence of the minority to the support of the church of the majority. If this be the legitimate conclusion of the noble lord's principle, let me tell him, that no intermediate arrangement will give him any chance of such a settlement. What is the security that we hold for the maintenance of the established church. It is a fundamental principle of our constitution that the Protestant religion should be established as the religion of the state. In addition to this we had a guarantee at the time of the union of Ireland with Great Britain that the Protestant Church should be maintained in its integrity as the Established Church of that country. And mark you, this guarantee was given at a time when, whatever anomalies existed in that country were as well known as they are now, and when the disproportion between the Catholics and Protestant inhabitants of Ireland was as well known as it is at present. Well, then, at the time of the union we were given an additional guarantee, that the Protestant Church should be maintained as the church of the state. We had besides this the moral guarantee that ought to be held binding by the parties who gave it, and who assumed at the time, that the removal of the civil disabilities of the Roman Catholics was perfectly consistent with the maintenance of the protestant faith as the established faith, and with the maintenance of the Protestant Church as the Established Church of the country. In every thing that we did we always took care to maintain that principle. If you ask me to depart from that principle, I say I will not consent to do so, because you now assume a new position. I will not consent, no matter what may be the disparity of numbers, that the Protestant religion shall be maintained as the established religion of that country. I will insist that there shall be a sufficient provision to support the episcopal dignity of that church, and to maintain its clergy in decent comfort. This is a position which I can understand, and this is a position which I can maintain. You say, let four-fifths of the property of the church be applied to the use of the church, but let one-fifth be appropriated somewhere else and applied to some other purpose. I said when you made such proposal, that I never would give my consent to any such proceeding—that if I consented I should only weaken my title without acquiring any additional security. I believe, that the maintenance of this great principle is of the deepest importance—I mean the principle of maintaining the Established Church. I don't think that you will ever approach a satisfactory settlement of this question if you go the length of pushing the noble lord's principle to its legitimate conclusion, and establishing the Roman Catholic religion as the religion of the state. I don't believe, that by pursuing such a course as this you will stand much chance of making a satisfactory settlement of Irish questions. I think, on the contrary, that you will only open fresh causes for discontent and excitement, and, instead of a satisfactory settlement of Irish questions, you will lose all chance of securing satisfaction, and establishing the settlement of these questions on a satisfactory basis. If you take such a course as that to which I have adverted, you will run the imminent risk of renewing in fresh activity those dreadful contests of religious opinions which have heretofore existed, and which it has been the object of parliament to extinguish. In expressing my determination to maintain the Established Church, I adopt the principles that were settled at the revolution—those principles which were further recognised and confirmed by the Act of Union, and additionally guaranteed and strengthened at successive times by every promise and pledge that parliament could give. I repeat, that whilst I admit the perfect equality of civil rights in all classes of the state, and whilst I would remove any disability and extinguish every distinction, I consider it to be a fundamental part of the constitution of this country, and a principle intimately identified with its welfare, that the Protestant Church shall always continue to be maintained as the established religion of the state. In conclusion I will say that, after we have made every reasonable concession with respect to the amount of tithes in Ireland, the remaining amount of tithe, or of the revenue substituted in lieu thereof, should be solely and exclusively applied to the support of the ministers of that religion, which I trust we shall ever feel it one of the highest duties to maintain as the established religion of the state. The right hon. baronet concluded by proposing an amendment, to insert after the word "accrued" words "due in Ireland shall, in the case hereinafter mentioned, be vested in her Majesty, her heirs, and successors, and that the rights of all persons in and to all tithes or compositions for tithes:" that the tithes of all parties to recover arrears of tithes should be maintained, and that where parties consented to accept the terms proposed by the government, the right of all such parties should be transferred to, and vest in, the government.

In reply to a remark by Lord Howick, Sir Robert Peel said, that the noble lord had mistaken him in supposing that he had alluded to the noble lord in his observations on the opinion of those who had promoted emancipation. At the time of the Emancipation act, the noble lord was, he himself admitted, too young a member to have his opinion taken into account, and what he (Sir R. Peel) alluded to, was, not the opinions of individual members, but the public declarations of the chosen champions of the Roman Catholics—of the chief promoters of their cause. He was speaking of Mr. Grattan, who, in the bill he brought in for the arrangement of the Roman Catholic question, included in the preamble the following expression; "Whereas the Protestant religion is the established religion of the state, and is solemnly guaranteed as such by the act of settlement, and the act of union, and whereas it would tend to the stability of the state if the disabilities under which the Roman Catholics labour were now removed." Here was no disguising of opinion. No one could be justified in accusing Mr. Grattan of an intention to diminish the securities of the Protestant Church, or of interfering with its property. No; on the contrary, his declaration was, that at the time of the passing of the bill they had the most distinct and positive assurances, from the most eminent authorities, that in their opinion the restoration of civil equality was perfectly compatible with the maintenance of the Established Church. He was alluding to Mr. Canning, to Lord Plunket, who told them the Established Church was the essential bond between the countries, and that he would throw Catholic emancipation to the winds, if he thought that one of its indirect results would be to injure the establishment. He was speaking of Lord Castlereagh—of all who had not disguised their opinions, but had given the most solemn assurances that, by the removal of the disabilities they were only taking fresh security for the church. So much for that part of the question. With respect to any opinion which the noble lord might choose to express or maintain, as an individual member, he (Sir R. Peel) was not disposed to quarrel; but he had objected to the noble lord's speech, as being the speech of a minister of the Crown. That was what made it absolutely necessary for him to be equally explicit as to his views of the arrangements now making, and the light in which they ought to be taken. The noble lord must admit that the declaration of the noble lord, the Secretary for the Home Department, namely, that while he did not concur in his views, yet that the noble lord equally dissented from those of the noble lord (Viscount Howick), was in itself sufficient demonstration how absolutely necessary it was, to make those remarks, and to draw from the noble lord such a declaration. The noble lord (Viscount Howick) contended that it was perfectly right and absolutely necessary for all persons, at all times, to express their opinions, and yet he proved, in the course of his speech, that his rule might sometimes be infringed on, and that in all cases it was not appropriate for a minister of the Crown to be so frank. The noble lord said, that he had made up his mind to the future fate of the Irish Church, and yet they had it, on the noble lord's authority, that it would at present be highly dangerous to express any opinion on the subject. It appeared then that there might be occasions on which the expression of opinion ought to be dispensed with. The noble lord had also said, that the longer the people of Ireland could be persuaded to acquiesce in the present establishment, the greater would be the harmony of the empire. His fear was, that the speech they had heard from the noble lord the other night, would disturb that harmony. He did feel, that when a minister of the Crown gave his opinion that the establishment was overpaid, that any settlement they could now make, would not be permanent, and that it ought not to be permanent—he did feel, that such a declaration, coming from a minister of the Crown, would materially interfere with the object the House had in view, namely, that the people of Ireland should acquiesce in the present settlement, and in the attempt now making to give to that country some prospect of order and tranquillity.

Sir Robert Peel's amendment was negatived, and the motion of Lord John Russell agreed to.

JULY 26, 1838.

Lord John Russell moved the Order of the Day for the third reading of the Bill, upon which Mr. D. Browne rose, and moved as an amendment that the bill be read that day six months.

SIR ROBERT PEELE said, the question we are now called on to discuss is this—whether we ought to vote for the third reading of this bill, or whether we should consent to the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Mayo. That amendment proposes to postpone the bill for the period of six months, and this is, in my mind, tantamount to a declaration, that the attempt that has been made for the settlement of the tithe question has altogether failed, and that there is no prospect whatever of our coming to an agreement upon any satisfactory principle upon which the future settlement of the tithe question can be made. This appears to me to be the effect of the amendment proposed to the House, and the proposition which this House would affirm by adopting that amendment. Now, then, Sir, the bill before the House contains two enactments, in both of which I concur. In the first place I fully concur in the future conversion of the tithe into a rent-charge. In the next place I fully concur in the transfer of the pecuniary burthen of tithe from the occupiers, who, in general, are Roman Catholics, to the proprietors and landlords, who, in general, are of the Protestant persuasion. I concur also—and concur most fully—in that enactment of the present bill, which sets at rest—and sets at rest for ever—the whole question of arrears; and so far as the operation of the bill is concerned, I think that setting aside the question of arrears, which might remain as an element of discontent, is, in itself, a very great advantage. Entertaining, then, those opinions with respect to the present bill, I find it impossible to assent to the proposition of the hon. Member for Mayo. Now, let me ask the House, if we consented to take that course, what would be the consequence? Why, this—if we rejected this bill, we should leave the tithe question not only in the state in which it has been for the last five years, but in even a far worse state; for, after the declaration of parliament, rejecting this bill, you would altogether exclude the prospect of any satisfactory settlement of the question whatever. From the views which have been expressed at the other side of the House in opposition to this bill, I am unable to infer any thing definite. One hon. member gets up and says, that he feels bound to oppose the present bill, because he is anxious to have this question settled upon rational grounds. Another gets up and says, that he will never consent to have this question settled upon any but a just principle. They deliver themselves thus of vague and indefinite generalities, but they will not condescend to tell us what they mean when they talk of having the question set at rest upon rational grounds and upon just principles. Indeed, Sir, I am surprised at the course that has been taken, and the ground on which the opposition to the third reading of this bill has been assumed. I had hoped, considering the length of time during which this question has been agitated, that men who felt bound to oppose it, would have done so upon broad and intelligible grounds. But, instead of this, we are met with some vague generalities—the expression of a wish that the question should be settled upon rational grounds and upon just principles. I ask hon. gentlemen, what they mean by these assertions? I can easily understand those who express a definite opinion. One hon. member stated, that he would be satisfied with no settlement short of the application of the voluntary system. Now, I thank that hon. gentleman for the candid and practical declaration of his opinion. I believe, that in the candid avowal of his, no doubt sincere opinions, that hon. gentleman will do more to place the question on intelligible grounds than those who dissent from every thing they hear proposed, and ask nothing more definite than the settlement of the question upon just and rational principles. With respect to the principle of appropriation, about which so much has been said this evening, I shall say nothing whatever. I know full well, how easy it might be to raise impediments of pride, which might prevent any settlement of the question at all. I will merely say, that I have always thought, and still think, the adoption of that principle, in any legislative measure, is, in every way, calculated to prevent a practical settlement of this question. In referring to what took place in 1835, the settlement was then resisted, because one of the principles on which it was founded, was the appropriation principle; and I must say, that I am more and more convinced, by every successive debate on this question, of the justice and propriety of the course which I took in resisting the appropriation principle. I ask you, who resist the present bill, and demand the settlement of this question on just principles, to say, whether you now consider the appropriation principle a just principle. The hon. member for Sheffield had said, that principles ought not to vary with the position of parties, whatever they might do with the lapse of years. You tell me, that the appropriation principle would be rejected by the people of Ireland now as worse than useless, and I ask you to say, would that principle, which you tell me now would be rejected, have been just three years ago? In what did the justice of your principle three years ago consist? One of the grounds on which this bill is objected to is, that the settlement cannot be satisfactory, inasmuch as that the Church of the minority is greatly overpaid, as compared with the Church of the majority. Now, supposing this, how is it possible that, according to the views you express, you could have effected a settlement by deducting a limited sum from the revenues paid for the maintenance of that Church, and appropriating an indefinite surplus, at an indefinite period, on the grounds set forth at the time? Now, how can you assert, after what has since been stated, that such an arrangement would have given satisfaction? Where was the binding nature of the compact? What would there be still, even after having adopted that principle, to prevent the hon. members opposite, or any other hon. member, from attempting to establish the voluntary principle? I showed you, that it was a delusive settlement. By deducting one fifth, you acknowledged the principle, that you still retained, what were called enormous revenues, for the support of the Church of the minority. Now, was this calculated to strengthen the Church? Would the hon. member for Kilkenny acquiesce in that course? It was on the ground that I have stated, that I felt bound to resist the appropriation principle. I cannot understand those who say, they are anxious for a settlement of this question, and yet propose to reject this bill. I think some settlement of this question necessary, and, upon that ground, I give my consent to the present bill. I cannot understand public men who say: that they will support this bill, because they hope that it will increase the evils of the Church. I think it would be better for the noble lord to resist the measure altogether, than support it on the ground that it was calculated to accumulate the evils of the Church. I think, indeed, that it would be better for the noble lord to resist the bill, if he had made up his mind that the present arrangement was calculated to entail upon the Church more evils than those under which it already suffers. Neither can I understand the course pursued by the hon. member for Drogheda. That hon. gentleman says, "You may pass this bill, and I, as a member of the Established Church, will not originate any subsequent agitation; but if my poorer neighbours shall think fit to renew agitation, they shall have my co-operation." I can understand his scruples as a member of the Established Church against the commencement of agitation, but I cannot understand his feelings when he says, that if persons influenced by motives in which he has no participation, shall commence agitation, he will not only not lend his assistance in quelling that agitation, but that it shall have his co-operation. When the hon. gentleman says, that his whole object in supporting this bill is to put down agitation, I confess I cannot understand the meaning of this public notice, that if the peasantry shall think fit to recommence agitation, they may know where to find a colleague. Sir, this bill, which we are now called on to read for the third time, includes three enactments—first, that Irish tithes shall be converted into a rent-charge, this enactment to be applied universally, wherever the case may require it;

secondly, the arrears of the million are to be remitted; and, thirdly, it deals with the existing arrears, which are not covered by the million, and provides that a grant shall be made by parliament of £300,000, by which grant that class of arrears shall be altogether extinguished. Concurring, as I do so much, in some parts of this bill, and deeply anxious as I am to see this session close with some successful attempt at the adjustment of tithes on just principles—the principles of relieving the occupying tenant, and transferring the charge to the landlords of Ireland—no opposition I could give to a single clause would induce me to withhold my assent to the third reading. I think, as I said before, it would amount to a parliamentary declaration that, after five years of anxious consideration, the adjustment of Irish tithes was found to be impracticable; and that attempts for the recovery of tithes must be immediately renewed, as all hope of assistance from parliament was hopeless. In my opinion, also, the evil would be greatly aggravated by the late approximation of opposing parties, and the failure of their united efforts. For these reasons, nothing but the strongest objections to parts of the bill at this late period, would induce me to abandon the hope of seeing it become law. But the bill before the House being very much in conformity with that which I supported on a former occasion, and as I feel that the settlement of the tithe question has not been at all affected by anything that has occurred since, I am naturally disposed to view with favour the adjustment of the tithe question in the present case. For these reasons, I shall support the third reading, and most earnestly resist the motion of the hon. gentleman opposite. There is one enactment of the bill, however, to which I do not assent. The enactment to which I refer is that which provides, that on the grant of £300,000 being made, all claims for arrears of tithes on the occupying tenants shall cease. Since this bill was first introduced important modifications have been made, the first and most important of which, in my opinion, is, that whilst all claim on the instalments have been relinquished, and the occupying tenantry relieved from all obligation to pay the arrears, I think that the provision was founded in justice, and I cordially rejoice to see it incorporated in the bill. Another modification has been introduced into the enactment, which relates to the existing arrears. At first, the compensation granted was only intended to be in lieu of the arrears which have occurred within the last two years. I decidedly objected to that proposition, as I thought it most unjust that parliament should interfere to prevent those to whom the arrears were due for the first four years receiving any compensation; and I believe the bill has been altered so as not to exclude that class of claimants from compensation; and I do not say, that they are to receive an equal compensation to those of the last two years, but a proportionate one for the arrears they are called on to abandon. By this means, the rights of no parties, whose claims are to be extinguished by the legislature, will be called on to abandon those rights without at least some compensation. The state of the law will then be this—that all those that have commenced suits for the recovery of tithes before the 16th of July last, will have the option of continuing their law proceedings. With them, there shall be no interference; but, if they think fit to do so without payment of costs, they shall be entitled to their share of the compensation intended by the bill. I apprehend that is the right construction. The violence thus done, when it is done, is in that class of arrear not covered by previous advances out of the million, and in which the parties have not instituted suits for recovery. Now, I am bound to state and to maintain my opinion with respect to this. After my best consideration, I think that my proposal was the best in every respect. I think the proposal that gave an option to parties to accept the offer made by government, or to enforce the law in cases where they thought fit, I think that proposal protected a great principle, and was every way better than the course which has been adopted. Sir, I admit that there is considerable force in the argument of the noble lord, in which he maintains that on the whole the option would not be very desirable. If the offer should be accepted by seven clergymen in each diocese, and the arrear insisted on by one, I am perfectly ready to admit, that this option would not be perfectly unrestricted, but at the same time we must recollect that in this case, although there might be moral obligation, there would be no legal compulsion. The principle would be maintained, so that in cases when the circumstances of the occupying tenant were as good as those of the landlord, in cases, for instance, when his rent amounted to £500 or

£1,000 a-year, and where such tenant should prove contumacious, the arrears might be recovered, I see no reason why government, in such cases as these, should not reserve to itself the power of vindicating the authority of the law. By this means the other alternative, that of making past resistance effective, would be avoided. At the same time, having taken the sense of the House fairly on the subject, I have done all I could to enforce my proposal by repeated argument; but I have been overruled by hon. gentlemen opposite: nor have I the slightest reason to believe that, if I were again to propose it, I should meet with any better success. Supposing the optional principle, then, defeated, I certainly wish that government, in adherence to their own principle, would adopt a course like this, that if they are determined to apply compulsion, and to deprive parties of their legal remedy, at the same time granting compensation, they should ascertain the full amount of arrears, really due. Even suppose it is their intention to give but seventy-five per cent. on the amount of the arrears, or any other per centage, still it is necessary to ascertain the exact amount. I am perfectly willing to admit, that at this advanced period of the session there are many obstacles in the way of ascertaining the exact amount, and I deeply regret that we did not take the matter into consideration at an earlier period, as the arrangement would have been more satisfactory to all, if we had been enabled to know the amount of property with which we had to deal. I am bound to say there is great difficulty in coming to a satisfactory conclusion, and the hon. gentleman opposite will recollect that when I resisted the exclusion of the clause as proposed by him, I did so for the express purpose of closely considering the pecuniary claims of a party, which, in my opinion, was suffering grievous wrong, and which I was anxious to protect from any further injury. I have taken the best means within my reach to come to a right decision on this subject. I have had, unfortunately, to consider the question unassisted by the natural representatives of the Irish Church, and I can only say that I have come to the best decision within the scope of my judgment for the individual interests of the Irish clergy, and the permanent interests of the Irish Church; and I now declare, in perfect unanimity with the opinions of those most interested, that from the many conflicting judgments and the extreme difficulty of the whole question, I cannot take upon myself the responsibility of rejecting altogether the proposal of the government. That proposal is, that all advances hitherto made from the million shall be remitted, and that a further sum of £300,000, shall be granted for the purpose of giving some compensation in lieu of existing claims. Suppose I rejected the offer now made, I cannot foresee the course government might take with respect to the remission of the instalments already paid. They might say, if the arrears are to be enforced, why not the instalments? I believe it might be competent to us, by uniting with such hon. gentlemen opposite as entertain principles very different from mine, who object, on principle, to any grant on this question—I dare say that, by uniting with them, I might possibly have excluded the clause, and by deciding it should have determined that under no circumstance whatever should the assistance of the treasury be offered for the settlement of tithe. I think that such exclusion would be tantamount to a declaration that parliament positively refused all interposition. If, therefore, I had voted with the hon. gentleman, as I might have done, I should formally and irrevocably have decided the question. [Mr. Hume: Not if you accede to the reform of the Church.] If the hon. member mean by reform of the Church, the abolition of sinecures where such exist; if he mean the abolition of pluralities on the system pursued in England; if by reform of the Church the hon. member mean an equalization of incomes, all I can say is, that to all that I shall most willingly agree, in as far as it will not interfere with the integrity of what still remains of the property of the Church. More than that I will not consent to. But I will not consent to the alienation of Church property. I will not consent to any violation of the principle of an establishment—but this I will do, that if you prove to me that in Ireland there are districts where the working minister is badly paid, and that there are other districts in which he has too much, I will consent to equalization, and I do so with no other view than to effect what will best conduce to the spiritual and temporal interests of the Church. I will consent to what I call true reform; that is, such appropriation of the Church's revenues as shall make sure that in every district the wants of the Protestant population shall be adequately provided for. As I said before, if I excluded this clause I should for ever shut out the prospect of compensation, but by consenting to it I do not finally determine on its merits, but refer it to another branch of the Legislature, well competent to decide on questions in which the Irish Church is concerned, and where that Church is fairly represented. That branch will decide this great question, whether the emergency is so urgent, or the circumstances so special, as, on the whole, to justify the violation of the principle of property. I will not shrink from frankly declaring my own opinion. I think, from what we know of the position of the Irish clergy, that, if this clause were now excluded, their situation would be extremely painful. I cannot exclude from my consideration the whole circumstances—I cannot exclude from it the position of the clergy with respect to government—and I must say, that the opinions we have heard expressed by members of the government increase the difficulty. My own opinion is, that active interference on the part of government, backed by a determination to enforce the law, would be completely effectual. But, at the same time, I cannot omit from my consideration that if government does not entertain this opinion, and that some members of it profess an opposite principle, it will be exceedingly difficult to enforce the rights of the church. Independently of this, I must consider the individual wants of the Irish clergy, and the permanent interests of the church. If I reject this offer, I leave the clergy in this position—I shall have converted composition into rent-charge, and thus have implied on the part of the legislature, that the present system is defective, and thus be throwing another obstacle in the way of recovery of arrears. I should be telling the clergy that all hope from the public funds was futile, and that, therefore, they had no other resource for the recovery of their arrears but an immediate enforcement of the law. In cases where arrears have lain over for four years—observe, not in the cases where suits have been instituted—if I object now to any offer for the settlement of the question, I cannot conceal from myself that, in the South of Ireland, any attempt to enforce the tithe would be attended with extreme difficulty. So much for the individual interests of the clergy. For the general interests of the church, I should say, that the new system admits conversion into rent-charge, under circumstances most likely to prejudice those interests. In the north of Ireland the landlords have already undertaken the collection of tithes, so that it is in the south the new law will principally operate. In the south the arrears are due. I should then have contemporaneously a conversion of composition into rent-charge, and a general appeal to the law. Under such circumstances I fear, that the prospect of a permanent settlement would be greatly diminished if I were to compel the clergy to resort to law. As I said before, I object to this provision. I wish it were more liberal—that it were possible for the noble lord opposite to give a somewhat larger equivalent. I retain all my objection to the principles involved in this clause, namely the abandonment of legal right, and a refusal to enforce the law; but after conferring with those best qualified to judge, and having had no opportunity of conferring immediately with those interested, finding no one willing to take upon himself the responsibility of rejection, I am placed in the painful situation of being obliged to select amongst the numerous existing difficulties the one least pregnant with danger to the interests I am desirous to protect. I cannot, therefore, consent to the total exclusion of the clause from the bill—I cannot altogether abandon the hope of a pecuniary provision. I therefore consent to the clause, thinking that the principle is not finally determined by its adoption on the present occasion. I think I shall merely be giving time for further communication with Ireland, and enabling the other branch of the legislature to determine what, on the whole, under existing circumstances, is best to be done with this question—whether it would be better to leave the law as it stands, to give the parties their legal remedy but no compensation, or to accept for the Irish Church the government proposal. I therefore will not oppose this clause. It would, perhaps, be more satisfactory for me to refrain from passing an opinion, but I never will take the plan of absenting myself from the House, and I therefore do not hesitate to say, that if the hon. gentleman press his amendment, I shall vote against it and in favour of the clause.

Bill read a third time.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (IRELAND).

August 2, 1835.

Lord John Russell moved the order of the day for taking into consideration the Lords' Amendments to this Bill. Amendments read a first time. The noble lord, previous to moving that the amendments be read a second time, proceeded to an able analysis of them, and stated his conviction that the Bill, in its present shape, could not be accepted by that House. He trusted the House of Lords, when they came to reconsider it, would consent to establish the municipal franchise in Ireland upon the same principle as it already existed in England and Scotland.

SIR ROBERT PEELE would have been perfectly content to discuss the merits of each of the amendments proposed by the Lords upon the individual clauses which contained them; and he could not help thinking, that that course would have been infinitely better than the one taken by the noble lord. The noble lord, however, had adopted a line of proceeding which precluded him from taking the course which his own sense of expediency and justice would have dictated, and had enlarged in undue, unjustifiable, and he thought unwise, sarcasms upon the authors of those amendments—sarcasms which, however they might have been intended, were calculated, if possible, to throw obstructions in the way of the settlement of this important question. The noble lord began his speech by a sarcasm upon the House of Lords for having changed their opinion with respect to Irish corporations. The noble lord began by stating, that the lords had heretofore withheld corporations from Ireland because the people of Ireland were not fit to have them. The noble lord put the ground of withholding corporations, not upon the true ground, that the Lords, seeing the state of society in Ireland—seeing the conflicts of party there—did entertain an opinion that, while they were willing to relinquish the old corporations, they were not, upon the whole, willing to establish new ones. He thought, therefore, that the noble lord, under any circumstances, should have spared his sarcasms upon those who had shown a desire to conciliate the national feeling of Ireland. When he recollected the changes of opinion which had taken place with respect to Irish measures—when he recollected the opinions formerly given with respect to the poor-laws by some gentlemen who were now the most strenuous opposers of them, and who thought the establishment of poor-laws in Ireland a sufficient justification for the repeal of the union—when he mentioned the discussions which had taken place with respect to the Irish church, and the course—he thought the wise course—which the noble lord had taken in receding from the opinions he had formerly maintained upon that subject—with all these things fresh in his recollection, he thought that the noble lord was the very last person from whom a sarcasm might have been expected upon those who, for the sake of peace, had been willing to make a sacrifice with respect to Ireland. He denied that the noble lord had given a just description of the bill which the Lords had sent down, and the noble lord had misrepresented, not only the general purport of the bill, but almost every clause that the Lords had amended or added. In the first place, the noble lord said, “The Lords have no longer persisted in their original opposition to the principle of corporations, but have sent down a bill, allowing that in some towns there may be corporations.” He asked, whether those words gave a just description of the bill which the Lords had sent down? So far from “allowing” corporations to certain towns, the purport and effect of the bill was this, that in eleven of the principal towns of Ireland there should be no discretion whatever. It made it obligatory upon those eleven towns to have corporations. Did the noble lord’s remark hold good with respect to other towns? Did the “allowance” of the Lords extend only to certain particular towns? The bill as amended by the Lords allowed every town in Ireland, which had 3,000 inhabitants, to apply for a charter of incorporation; and if in any of them, whether now possessed of corporate authority or not, a majority of the £10 householders should think it for the advantage of the town either that the old corporation should be continued, or that a new corporation should be constituted, in that case there was full authority given to the chief governor of Ireland to accede to the wishes of the inhabitants, and to continue the old corporation, or constitute a new one, founding the corporation, in either case, upon the self-same principles as those which were applicable to the eleven towns peremptorily incorporated by the bill. The noble lord then proceeded to comment upon the changes which had been made in the bill since it was sent up to the Lords from the Commons, and he said, "No less than ninety-two new clauses have been inserted in the bill which is now sent down to us." In reply to that he must remark, that the Lords had incorporated in the present bill the whole of the boundary bill of the government. And what were the authorities by which the boundaries, as adopted by the Lords, were defined? They were the commissioners appointed by the noble lord himself. The noble lord sent forth his commissioners, gave them their instructions, and they established these boundaries; and the Lords, content with the definitions of boundary contained in the report of the commissioners, consented to adopt them, but thought it would be better that they should be embodied in the bill relating to corporations rather than be made the subject of a separate measure. The noble lord made that an objection; but, if he mistook not, the noble lord at the head of the government distinctly and explicitly declared, that he thought this incorporation of the boundary bill with the present measure an improvement. This, therefore, accounted for the addition to the number of clauses. The House had, in fact, before it two bills instead of one; and he could not but think it expedient, when new corporations were established, that the boundaries of them should be defined in the measure which gave them their existence. In other respects, the Lords had only introduced such clauses as were necessary to give effect to the general outline which, some weeks since, he (Sir R. Peel) had sketched, as the basis upon which he thought it possible that the party with which he was connected might consent to the establishment of corporations in Ireland; and he must say, notwithstanding the altered tone which the noble lord, for some purpose or other, assumed upon the present occasion, that when he first stated that scheme the noble lord did not make the same objections to it; nor were those objections made by any one at that time. Then, perhaps, was felt the extent of the sacrifice which gentlemen on his side of the House, were making—the number of conflicting opinions which he had to conciliate—the prejudices and feelings which he had to overcome; and then it was the impression of the noble lord, and the general impression also of the ministerial side of the House that he had gone further than could have been expected for the purpose of coming to a settlement of the question. At any rate, so strong a difference of opinion was not then expressed by any member of the government. But the noble lord's objections and complaints did not end with the introduction of the clauses which were absolutely necessary to carry out the scheme which he had opened. The noble lord said, that considerable time was taken by the Lords in discussing the Poor-law bill, but that no sufficient time was taken by them in discussing the provisions of the Municipal Corporation bill. Whose fault was that? Whose fault was it that the Irish Municipal Corporation bill was sent up to the Lords on the 26th of June? By whom was it that the day for the coronation of her Majesty was fixed for the 28th of June, being the very time when it must have been known beforehand, that the attention of parliament would be indispensably required to all the most pressing and all the most important business of the session? Who did not know, with the invitations which had been given to every nation in Europe to send representatives to do honour to the sovereign of England, and with the natural desire which men of all classes would naturally feel to do honour to those who came to do honour to the Queen—who did not know that, at such a time, it would be difficult, or indeed impossible, to direct the undivided attention of parliament to the business of the session? Therefore, those who fixed the coronation for the 28th of June, and sent up the Irish Corporation bill to the House of Lords on the 26th of June, were the parties who were responsible if this bill had not received the mature and deliberate consideration which the noble lord deemed necessary. But whose fault was it that the amendments were not more fully discussed in the House of Lords? Those who proposed amendments to a bill, naturally expected that the objections to those amendments would come from the persons who dissented from them. It was not usual for those who proposed and supported an amendment to object to it also, for the sake of raising a discussion. Certain noble lords proposed amendments to give effect to a scheme, to the general outline and principle of which they hoped there would be no insuperable objection. Why did not the noble lord's colleagues in the House of Lords consider those amendments more fully? If they were defective in point of legal detail, where was the Lord Chancellor and the other high legal authorities? Why did they not consider the propositions which were made? Was not public notice given, that in committee new clauses would be moved? Whose duty was it, then, to be ready to discuss every portion of the measure, to defend that which they believed to be good, and to resist to the utmost every innovation or every addition which they believed to be bad? If blame were to attach any where for not giving sufficient attention to the bill, upon whose head should it fall? But this was not all. If the objections to the amendments in the measure were really so strong as the noble lord had stated them to be, why did the head of the government move the third reading of the bill in the other House? Why did not the noble premier refuse to move the third reading of the bill until the clauses were amended, and the measure moulded into the form in which he wished to see it? Upon these two points, therefore—first, the number of additional clauses incorporated with the bill; and secondly, the want of sufficient attention to the details of the measure—upon each of those points the sarcasms of the noble lord appeared to him to be perfectly unjustifiable. He now came to speak of a class of clauses in respect to which the noble lord had founded a grave charge against the House of Lords. The noble lord said, “I will now enumerate a long list of clauses, in the insertion of which I will endeavour to show you a lurking desire on the part of the Lords to vitiate the merits of the bill, by retaining for the present corporations all the powers which it was possible for them to maintain, and to throw disrespect and censure upon the new corporations, by withholding from them the functions which properly belonged to corporate bodies.” The noble lord justly said, that he viewed this part of the bill with great suspicion. The comments which the noble lord made upon these clauses convinced him that his mind must indeed be tainted with suspicion! He did not know who was the Iago who had been pouring this poison into the noble lord’s ear; but he certainly had never seen a gentleman in public life labouring more strongly than the noble lord did under the pains and pangs of jealousy. To show the degree of that jealousy, it would only be necessary for him to mention the construction which the noble lord had put upon several of these clauses; he would take the fourth clause of the amended bill. By that clause the noble lord charged the House of Lords with the intention of retaining to the freemen of certain towns in Ireland, and particularly to the freemen of Dublin, certain privileges beyond those to which they were entitled under the bill for the reform of the representation. Now it must be observed, that a great part of the objections which the noble lord had taken to the amendments of the House of Lords, applied with equal force to his own bill; but he had been so blinded by suspicion and jealousy, that in attempting to put an injurious construction upon the amendments of the Lords, he had involuntarily wounded himself, and exposed his own course of policy to exactly the same construction. He disclaimed altogether, on the part of the Lords, any intention whatever to reserve to the freemen of Dublin, or of any other city or town of Ireland, any privilege which they did not at present possess. It was admitted that the rights of the freemen ought to be preserved, and that they should not be made dependent upon the fact of whether there was a corporation or not. It therefore became absolutely necessary, according to the scheme of this bill, to provide, that in the towns incorporated the rights of the freemen should be preserved. The noble lord did not state the words of the clause upon which he relied as showing the animus of the Lords; and he (Sir R. Peel), on reading the clause carefully over, confessed he was at a loss to discover any words which substantially differed from those employed by the noble lord himself.

Lord J. Russell: the words upon which I founded my remark were these—“or might hereafter have been entitled.”

Sir R. Peel begged the noble lord to take care; for the words to which he objected, and upon which he now declared his remark had been founded, were in fact his own. [Lord J. Russell: No, no!] These were the words of the clause as proposed by the noble lord, and as they stood when the bill was sent up to the House of Lords:—

“And be it enacted, that any person who now is or hereafter may be an inhabitant of any borough, and also any person who has been admitted, or who might hereafter have been admitted, a freeman or burgess of any borough, if this act had not been passed, shall have and enjoy, and be entitled to acquire and enjoy, the same share and benefit of the lands, &c., of which any person in any body corporate may on seized or possessed for any charitable uses or trust, as fully and effectually as he or she, by any charter, statute, &c., in force at the passing of this act, might or could have enjoyed in case this act had not been passed."

He was only showing the injustice of the noble lord's observation with respect to covert and secret intentions on the part of the House of Lords. If there were any equivocal words introduced into the amendments of the House of Lords, he had no hesitation in disclaiming any intention of procuring for any freemen any privileges to which they were not entitled under the Reform Act if this bill should not be passed. He therefore did not despair of coming to an amicable arrangement with respect to the 4th clause. He presumed it was impossible for the noble lord to reinstate his own clause after having discarded it with contempt. Then with respect to the powers reserved to the old corporations. The noble lord had said, that the old corporators were maintained in possession of important municipal functions. He did not find in the bill any municipal functions to which the old corporators would hereafter be entitled. He found a distinction made between charity trusts and municipal trusts; and there was a different provision made with respect to trustees of charities in case they should be corporators, than that which was made with respect to ordinary municipal corporators. But here again the noble lord, in his own bill, made the same distinction, for he did not propose to devolve the new charity trusteeships upon the new corporations. He established a distinction between municipal functions and charity trusts, and in his own bill the noble lord provided, in the case of a trust of a charitable nature, that the existing trustees, being old corporators, should be maintained for a certain time, at the expiration of which the Lord Chancellor should proceed to appoint new trustees. He admitted there was a difference between the amendment introduced by the Lords and the provision of the noble lord. The House of Lords thought it highly important, that the whole question of charity trusts should be reserved for future consideration, and they therefore gave to the Lord Chancellor the power of filling up all vacancies that might occur; but they had not given him the power which the noble lord contended he should have, namely, the power of absolutely appointing the whole of the trustees. He, for one, would readily consent to any arrangement which could prevent charity trusts being perverted to political purposes. But it was his duty to say—and he did not shrink from saying it—that parliament having made a provision with respect to England, that the Lord Chancellor should have the power of appointment, he was not satisfied with that arrangement; that he did believe that political feelings had, in some cases, influenced the appointment of trustees; and that on that account he dissented from the proposal, that on a certain day the Lord Chancellor of Ireland—he being himself, of course, a partisan, and immediately connected with the government—should have the power of appointment. Another arrangement would be more satisfactory to him, which should provide a greater security against the appointment of trustees being perverted to political purposes. He knew it had been said, that under the pretence of retaining the power over charity trusts to the old corporators for a certain time, they had gone much further, and had included trusts which were not of a charitable nature. He could only disclaim any intention of so doing. The noble lord had referred to Clause 75. He was perfectly willing to admit that that clause as it stood at present was open to question. But the noble lord did not permit them, in the House of Commons, to come fairly to the discussion of that clause; but fastened on certain words in order to create suspicion against the House of Lords. The beginning of the clause ran thus:—"That in every borough named in the said schedule (A) in which the body corporate solely, or together with any other body or bodies corporate, or person or persons, is or are trustee or trustees for any purposes other than charitable uses or trusts." These words certainly appeared to imply, that the old corporators were reserved as trustees for all other trusts beside charity trusts. But he could only state that immediately the bill had passed the House of Lords the error was discovered; the clause having been copied from the bill of 1836. He held in his hand a copy of the bill, given to him some days ago, having this note written in the margin opposite the first and second lines in page 43:—"These words should have been omitted. The clause was copied from the bill of 1836." If, therefore, the noble lord had not stated the objection, he (Sir Robert Peel) was prepared with an amendment to clear up any doubt that might have existed on that point. The noble lord had stated that the word "charity" bore a technical sense, and that under that word they would in point of fact include a public institution in Dublin, which was called "The pipe-water." He could only say, that there was no such "covert design" on the part of the House of Lords, and that those "crafty men" never considered that under the word "charity" they were confining the pipe-water trust to the old corporation. If the word "charity" was a term which legally included other kinds of trusts than those really contemplated by the House of Lords when passing this clause, he would consent to any amendment which would exclude any institution which partook of the nature of a municipal rather than a charitable trust. The next point the noble lord adverted to was this:—he said, that a great alteration had been made by the House of Lords in that clause which defined the purposes to which the property of the corporations should be applied. "In England," said the noble lord, "you had confidence in the new corporations, and gave them the full control of the funds of the corporations; but in Ireland you adopt a different principle, and limit and define the purposes to which the surplus revenue shall be applied." But what did the noble lord do? He provided that in all boroughs the property should be held in trust for the payment of all municipal expenses which should be necessarily incurred for carrying into effect this act, and that in case the borough fund should be more than sufficient for those purposes—of course the House would suppose that the noble lord then provided that the new corporations (taking a comprehensive view of the public interests of the borough) should have the entire and exclusive control over the funds; but so far from making any such arrangement, the noble lord expressly provided that in every case, except in the city of Dublin, the surplus property of the corporation should not be applied towards such purposes as the corporation should deem for the benefit of the town; but that in the first instance it should be applied towards paving, cleansing, and lighting the streets of the said borough, and towards supplying the inhabitants with water. These were the suggestions of the noble lord himself, thus prescribing the objects to which the surplus fund should be applied. Now, the House of Lords retained those words of the noble lord, and the only alteration they had made was this, that the principle which the noble lord thought good for every town and city in Ireland except Dublin, should be applied also to the city of Dublin itself; and that, instead of the surplus funds of the corporation of Dublin being applied to political purposes, they should be applied to municipal purposes. That was the only difference between them and the noble lord, and that the only ground on which the noble lord charged the House of Lords with the crafty and covert design of spoiling this bill. When he on a former occasion called upon the House to support him in requiring the surplus funds to be applied to public purposes, all he could say was, that the principle at that time met with the unanimous assent of the House. He now came to clause 97, and in commenting on that clause the noble lord lost all self-possession. "Mark (said the noble lord) the subtlety of the House of Lords! Both the House of Lords and the House of Commons have condemned the existing corporations, both have joined in enactments which imply suspicion of those corporations, by tying them up in the disposal of their property to certain purposes; but still the Lords have introduced into this bill a clause which shall enable them, during the interval that must elapse before the old corporations can be extinguished, to deal absolutely with this property, and apply it to other than municipal purposes." He never was more surprised than when he heard the noble lord make this remark. For what was the fact? The House of Lords intended this power to apply only to the new corporations, and not to the old. They never meant to give the old corporations any power over this property which they did not possess by the bill before the amendment was introduced. If, therefore, they had given it in words, he for one would consent to alter it. Finding among the amendments in the English Municipal Corporation Act one to this effect, that they might provide new securities for old debts, the House of Lords thought it desirable to apply that principle to the new corporations to be established. Whereas, in the new corporations in England, it was made lawful for the council to execute any deed in the name of the body corporate for securing the repayment of any debt contracted by the said body corporate before the passing of the act; therefore it was thought that a similar power should be given to the new corporations in Ireland; and the noble lord had construed this into an intention to enable the old corporate body to part with the property. That he, and those with whom he acted, should ever be parties to introduce a clause, or even support a clause, which should enable the corporations to do that which they all had consented should not be done, was an imputation which he did not think it worth while to reply to. The next point to which the noble lord adverted, was the 108th clause, and so imperfectly had the noble lord read the clause, that he stated, the Lords had thereby given the town-clerks of the existing boroughs a life interest in their offices. They did no such thing. They did not retain any officer where there would be a new corporation; all they did with respect to them was, as in the English act, to provide compensation. They gave the new corporations the power of appointing new officers. It was not right, therefore, to say, that the Lords had fastened the old officers on the corporations. But they made this provision, that whereas there might be places in which the old corporations might be dissolved without any new corporations being formed, and in which certain duties might be required to be performed, in that case the House of Lords provided, that those duties should be continued to be performed by the present officers. Did that course deserve the character given to it by the noble lord? The noble lord next referred to the police. He certainly understood, that the proposal which he himself made was acquiesced in, and particularly by the hon. and learned member for Dublin.—namely, that as there was a constabulary force under the Lord-lieutenant of Ireland, and as there was no distinction made between a night and day force, there was no reason for constituting a separate constabulary force for the night in the corporate towns under the name of police. The House of Lords had, therefore, merely omitted the clause which enabled the town-councils to appoint a separate force. But said the noble lord, “You are depriving the municipal corporations of all their legitimate functions by preventing them from having a police.” What was the noble lord himself doing in Dublin? He was transferring the whole police of that city from the corporation to the lord-lieutenant, and he was going to pursue precisely the same course in the city of London. The noble lord contended, that it was desirable that the police force, which was intrusted with the preservation of the lives and property of the inhabitants of the country, should be under one controlling power, not liable to be disturbed by party and political prejudices; and he was accordingly about to propose, that the police of the city of London should be transferred from the corporation to the general government of the country. Then, again, he found fault with the House of Lords for including the Boundary bill in this municipal bill. But the very instructions which the noble lord gave to the boundary commissioners had been incorporated by the Lords, as the rule which should govern any future arrangement. How was it possible to go further with the government on that head, he could not imagine. The House of Lords adopted the principle of the noble lord himself, and yet his charge was, that, like factious and crafty men, they had sought to deprive the bill of all recommendation. Next, with respect to the alteration relating to the appointment of sheriffs. The noble lord also objected to this. He could only say, that he adhered to his own opinion, and thought it infinitely better that the lord-lieutenant should have the sole responsibility, and should be the sole judge who should be the sheriff, instead of that officer being appointed by the local authorities, whose appointment, after all, he might reject. The noble lord had said, that the machinery of the bill was cumbrous with respect to the commissioners. No doubt, in the first instance, the provisions of the bill on this head might be open to that charge; but if the Lords had not provided for the exercise of the powers of the commissioners, he was perfectly certain that they would have been accused of haste in not making such a provision. He now came to the most important point, which he had reserved for his last remarks—he alluded to the franchise. If he understood the noble lord correctly, he proposed to leave the bill as it now stood, with respect to those towns which were not to be incorporated by the bill, and that he should not object to give the majority of £10 householders in those towns which either have had, or never have had corporations, the power to apply for charters of incorporation, nor should he object to the appointment of commissioners, to be elected by the inhabitants for the management of the town, should they prefer it to a corporation. As the towns had the power already to apply for the benefit of the 9th of Geo. IV., he thought it better to leave each town to determine whether they would apply for it or not, rather than to enforce it upon them. But the noble lord had declared his intention of moving an amendment with respect to the franchise, and he (Sir Robert Peel) felt it incumbent upon him to take a similar opportunity of declaring, that it was his intention to dissent from any amendment which the noble lord might propose on that part of the measure. He was perfectly ready to defer the discussion of this question to the time when the noble lord should make his proposition. He had the strongest confidence in the justice and force of reasoning by which he should be enabled to contend, that if they were to have a £10 franchise at all, the suggestion made in the House of Commons, and adopted in the amendment of the House of Lords, was infinitely fairer, and more analogous to the practice in England, than that which the noble lord proposed. He must complain of the comments which the noble lord made on the course which he (Sir Robert Peel) took, when the bill was originally before the House of Commons. The noble lord had said, that the Lords had rejected the franchise he had proposed. Now, surely the noble lord must be aware, when it was said that they were about to establish a different rule in Ireland than in England, and when by Mr. Poulett Scrope's Act they were about to make an allowance for the repairs which ought to fall upon the landlord, and for the amount of the insurance—the noble lord must surely recollect that on that occasion he declared, that the difference between him and the noble lord was upon the question of landlord's repairs and insurance, and that he professed his entire readiness to remove that objection. It might be asked, why did he not propose it while the bill was before the House? Because he felt that the proposal of such amendment at a time when there was so much angry discussion, would not have met with that calm dispassionate consideration which it deserved, and he feared that it would have been rejected without any regard to its merits. But an indication to adopt an amendment of that description was thrown out, although he abstained from making any motion upon it. Was it not distinctly avowed by his hon. and learned friend the member for Exeter (Sir W. Follett), and himself, that if they could find out a distinction between the franchise in England and the franchise in Ireland, they were ready to make such provisions as that distinction required? The noble lord had laid down doctrines with respect to the franchise of a much more extensive nature than he now proposed to apply. On this point there was an irreconcilable difference between him and the noble lord. If he understood the noble lord, what he contended for was this—that the parliamentary franchise meant the amount which the occupier paid in respect of the premises he occupied. Thus, for instance, if a man paid £8 a-year for his house, and £4 a-year for taxes and rates, that in that case he had a fair right to be considered a £12 occupier. [Lord John Russell: Not for the parliamentary franchise.] Very good. But what he contended for was this, that the parliamentary franchise in England and Ireland meant this; the payment of at least £10 a year by a solvent tenant to his landlord, coupled with the payment by the tenant of all such rates and charges as properly belonged to the tenant to pay. The Irish Act, any more than the English Act, did not require the payment of £10 altogether in respect to the premises which the tenant occupied, but it required the occupation of premises, the value of which was £10 or more than £10, the tenant paying the rates and taxes which properly belonged to him. He proposed to introduce in the English Municipal Corporations bill the parliamentary franchise of England as the test of the municipal franchise; and he also proposed to introduce the parliamentary franchise of Ireland into this bill as a test of the corporate franchise there, with the rating, as a check against fraud. By the act of Mr. Poulett Scrope, in determining the net annual value for rating, they made an allowance by law which was not in practice made before, namely, that there should be added to the net annual value of the premises, in respect to which the rating took place, such a sum for landlords' repairs and for insurance, as upon the average of years should be required for the purpose of keeping the premises in a state of repair. They were told that they ought to give the Irish occupier the benefit of the deduction made by act of Mr. Poulett Scrope in the case of English occupiers. They were at that time aware that, according to the practice in Ireland, it was not the landlord who bore that expense. Yet he and his friends said, that they were perfectly willing to make the Irish tenant an abatement from the £10 franchise of the amount of the landlord's repairs and insurance. The amendment, therefore, which had been introduced by the Lords, was one which was suggested by him and his friends,\* when the bill was passing through the House of Commons. In practice, a certain per centage was not taken, but it was required in each case, that the amount of the landlord's repairs and insurance should be estimated; and this was more consonant to the English practice—the principle by which the noble lord professed to be governed—than to take an average sum which would not be applicable in many cases. The noble lord had made this proposition—that whereas the franchise might in some cases depend upon a house singly, and in other cases it might depend upon the possession of a house and land, he proposed that, in the case of both these qualifications, the amount of the reduction should be the same. Now, in England the reduction in respect to land was not more than  $2\frac{1}{2}$  per cent.; whereas, in respect to houses, the amount of the reduction differed materially. But the noble lord said, he would make no difference between houses and land. This he contended would be unjust in its effects, and he for one was resolved to stand upon the franchise as consented to in substance by this House, and which was included in the amendment of the Lords, there being no difference between the Lords' amendment and what was suggested by him in point of principle. He would not enter further into details at present; but he had been forced into the consideration of those details by the speech of the noble lord; not that he felt that he could not answer the noble lord when he should come to deal with the details, but he had adverted to them now, because that the noble lord had made a speech in a spirit which implied that the House of Lords had been actuated by a feeling of injustice, and an unfair spirit in making these amendments; and that, while professing to give effect to the principle as laid down by the bill, they had intended and contrived, by the abuse of the details, to deprive the bill of all its advantages, in respect to the practical benefit of settling these Irish questions in a spirit of conciliation and compromise. My opinion (said the right hon. baronet) is, that the Lords have acted in a perfectly fair and honest spirit, and that, believing the general plan which I proposed did not meet with any insuperable objection on the part of the government, the noble and learned lord who proposed these amendments, intended to give effect to it, and no more. The charges, then, of the noble lord against the House of Lords, in respect to each of those amendments, are thoroughly and utterly without foundation. I know not what course the noble lord intends to take; I know not whether he means to reject this bill altogether, and prevent the settlement of the Irish questions, thus keeping alive one great source of discord in this House and in the country; I know not whether that may be the result of our proceedings; but this I know, that at the expense of great misconception, at the expense of great personal abuse, at the expense of great sacrifice of private feeling, I have honestly and zealously laboured, in conformity with the principles I have laid down, to bring these questions to a settlement, and I shall deeply regret if my attempt shall fail; but I shall not hold myself, or those with whom I am acting, responsible in the slightest degree for the consequences of that failure.

Amendments read a second time.

A number of clauses were then inserted, the remainder of the Lords' amendments disposed of, and a committee appointed to draw up reasons for dissenting from the Lords' amendments;—to be stated in a conference with the Lords.

ADDRESS—ANSWER TO THE SPEECH.

FEBRUARY 5, 1839.

The Royal Speech having been read, and Mr. E. Buller having moved an Address in reply,—Mr. T. Duncombe proposed as an Amendment, to add the following words at the end of the Address:—"And to assure her Majesty, that as the amendment of the representative system, enacted in 1832, has disappointed her Majesty's people, and as that measure is not, and cannot be final, her Majesty's faithful Commons will take into their early consideration the further reform of the Commons' House of Parliament."

SIR ROBERT PEELE said, that there were three classes of topics which were under discussion in the debate of that night; first, the topics which were introduced into the speech and the address; secondly, those which were omitted from the speech and address, but which had been referred to by the mover and seconder; and, thirdly, those which were introduced by the amendment of the hon. gentleman, the member for Finsbury. Although it was not his intention to move any amendment to the address, yet he would shortly advert to the several topics introduced into the speech and address, omitted therefrom, and proposed to be added by the hon. member. Whatever omissions, however, there might be, parliament never met under circumstances of such great importance, or which afforded so much cause for deep anxiety in several quarters of the globe. Whether they referred to the affairs of Canada, to the disputes between Holland and Belgium, to the state of France, or to our Indian possessions, they would find that there were topics in all of these suggesting grave consideration, and which they could not regard without deep anxiety. The first reference which had been made in the speech from the Throne, was to the treaties which had been concluded with Austria on the one hand, and Turkey on the other; and though he concurred in the general policy of those treaties, he could not concur in the extravagant panegyric which had been passed upon them by the hon. gentleman who had seconded the address. He concurred in the policy of the Austrian treaty, but it was nothing more than a continuance of the treaty of the year 1829, which had been concluded by his noble friend, the Earl of Aberdeen. The opening of the Danube, and other circumstances, would of course suggest the extension of the principle of that treaty, but the reciprocal principle of the present treaty was the basis of the treaty of 1829. He concurred, also, in the policy of the treaty which had been entered into with Turkey; but he did not concur in the opinion that it would produce all the advantages which some hon. members anticipated. These treaties were held out as an effectual guarantee against the encroachments of Russia; but the treaty with Turkey appeared to stand thus—that whereas the powers of Europe had agreed to the importation of Turkish goods at a low rate of duty, which, in practice, had been found to give rise to illicit imports, an attempt was now made, by the substitution of a more reasonable and higher rate of duty, to establish a more legitimate entry into the various ports. The former duty on goods was, he believed, an ad valorem duty of three per cent., and it was now a duty of twelve per cent.

Mr. P. Thompson remarked, that the former duty was three per cent., the rise was two per cent., making the whole duty, at present, five per cent.

Sir Robert Peel feared, that in the present state of the internal government of Turkey, the superior authority would be so little attended to by the inferior persons, over whom it had little control, that we should not reap all the advantages which we expected, and that we should find ourselves thwarted, not by the superior government, but by the inferior authorities. He would next advert to a subject of far deeper interest—to a question which had for too long a time escaped the attention of that House—to the subject of the British empire and the British interests in India. When they considered the immense importance of diverting the attention of the inhabitants of India from war, and of teaching them the acts of peace, and when they contemplated the evil consequences of a great financial expenditure, imposing the necessity for an additional taxation, he was bound to say, that he could not consider this question without the greatest anxiety. He hoped that her Majesty's ministers would give them the fullest information—that the House would be informed of the causes which had led to the interruption of our amicable relations with Persia. When they saw the large accumulation of force, amounting to several thousands, on our Indian frontier, and when they saw the encouragement which this accumulation of force, causing a necessary withdrawal from other parts, would give to other governments—he trusted to receive such information as would afford satisfaction to the public mind in England. He would not then state his opinion of the course pursued by the governor-general, or her Majesty's ministers; he would not then utter one word in condemnation of it; but he required that the House should be furnished with every particular which could be communicated consistently with the interests of the country. If we feared incursion from Russia, we should have reason to apprehend greater evil if we took a wrong view of the intentions of Persia. If we converted Persia, which had been a friend to England and an enemy to Russia, into an enemy to England and a friend to Russia, we were raising up difficulties in that quarter of our empire. He need make no apology to the House for entering into these details—the whole subject was too important to require any apology from him. The attention of parliament had not been sufficiently drawn to the state of our interests in India. There had been much squabbling on matters of domestic interest, but of comparatively trifling importance; whilst these vast questions, involving peace and war, and on which the fate of nations depended, had escaped observation. The speech from the Throne made the following announcement respecting the relations between Persia and England:—"Differences which have arisen have occasioned the retirement of my minister from the court of Teheran. I indulge, however, the hope of learning, that a satisfactory adjustment of these differences will allow of the re-establishment of my relations with Persia upon their former footing of friendship. Events connected with the same differences have induced the Governor-general of India to take measures for protecting British interests in that quarter of the world, and to enter into engagements, the fulfilment of which may render military operations necessary. For this purpose such preparations have been made, as may be sufficient to resist aggression from any quarter, and to maintain the integrity of my eastern dominions."

He knew full well, that whatever might be said in the British parliament about the necessity of confining our conquests in India within our present limits, would be replied to by an assertion of the irrepressible tendency of our empire there to extend itself; he knew that it would be extended beyond its present limits, and that it would be said that it must go on extending itself in a geometrical ratio; but still he did not find in any public document a justification under that head of the proclamation of the Governor-general of India, nor could he discover any connection between that proclamation and the speech from the Throne. The proclamation of the Governor-general of India seemed to have more in view than the mere resistance of aggression. This he thought was a fair inference from this passage of the proclamation—"After a serious and mature deliberation, the Governor-general was satisfied that pressing necessity, as well as every consideration of policy and justice, warranted us in espousing the cause of Schah Soojah-ool-Moolk, whose popularity throughout Afghanistan had been proved to his lordship by the strong and unanimous testimony of the best authorities. Having arrived at this determination, the Governor-general was further of opinion that it was just and proper, no less from the position of Maharaja Runjeet Singh, than from his undeviating friendship towards the British government, that his highness should have the offer of becoming a party to the contemplated operations. Mr. Maenaghten was accordingly deputed, in June last, to the court of his highness, and the result of his mission has been the conclusion of a tripartite treaty by the British government, the Maharaja, and Schah Soojah-ool-Moolk, whereby his highness is guaranteed in his present possessions, and has bound himself to co-operate for the restoration of the Schah to the throne of his ancestors. The friends and enemies of any one of the contracting parties have been declared to be the friends and enemies of all." That was to say, that the friends and enemies of Runjeet Singh and of the Schah Soojah should be the friends and enemies of England. Now, to that sort of engagement on the part of British power in India he did not agree. It would further appear, from the proclamation of the Governor-general, that the force assembled on our western frontier had more for its object than the mere resistance of aggression. He said, "the Governor-general confidently hopes that the Schah will be speedily replaced on his throne by his own subjects and adherents, and when once he shall be secured in power, and the independence and integrity of Afghanistan established, the British army will be withdrawn." Now, he should require that the fullest information should be laid before the House on this subject. Here was a sort of guarantee given by the Governor-general, that the British army would not be withdrawn until Schah Soojah-ool-Moolk should be restored. That prince was deposed from his throne in 1809, and had been kept out of it ever since, though on one occasion he had endeavoured to recover his authority, at the head of an army of 20,000 men, and failed. Yet this was the prince whom the British government in India was about to restore, by the aid of an immense and most expensive military force, and when restored, no doubt another British force would be required to keep him on the throne. The principle was the same in the attempted restoration of the Schah Soojah as it would be in the attempt to restore Charles X. to the throne of France, with this difference, that the Schah had been thirty years dispossessed of his throne. In the years 1831 and 1832, the government of India had sent officers of great intelligence and industry to report on the state of Afghanistan; and what were the characters given by one of those officers (Captain Burnes) of the present occupier of the throne, and of him who had been dispossessed of it, not by the hostile interference of other nations, but by the dislike of his own subjects? Captain Burnes said, that the total overthrow of the dynasty of the late king was universally attributed to his misplaced pride and arrogance, and that he might have regained his power but for his rash attempts to exceed the authority belonging to the station which he had assumed before he was finally seated on the throne. The whole of the wealth of the country was in the hands of those who were inimical to his interests, and the bulk of the people believed that he had drawn down the mischievous effects upon them which had been produced; and from these circumstances, Captain Burnes drew the inference, that the restoration of the late king was an event which it was most improbable would occur. That was the account by this gentleman, founded upon facts which he had collected in the course of a tour made in the years 1831, 1832, and 1833. That was the only account which was in existence, possessing any authority, of these territories, and that stated that it was impossible to replace the late Schah at the head of the country again, on account of the feeling which existed against him; and yet the Governor-general informed parliament that he had entered into a guarantee, under which, by the interference of British force, the sovereign should be restored. He must say, that in the present state of India, the entering into that guarantee, to be supported by such a course as that which was suggested, required an explanation which had not yet been given—which might be given—but which, to be satisfactory, must be of a character very different from any which had yet appeared; for it must be obvious that the passage in the speech of her Majesty to parliament did not correspond with the proclamation of the Governor-general. With regard to the case of the siege of Herat, that stood upon very different grounds, and he would say nothing on that head; but a very different question arose, whether it was politic to enter into a guarantee by treaty to restore the Schah. The next subject to which it was necessary to refer was, the important matter of the Canadian affairs; and although he had nothing to object to the general purport of the speech, according to the construction which he placed upon it, yet he must say, that he thought the House would do well in its address, to express in very strong terms the sympathy which they felt in the sufferings and wrongs to which the British subjects had been exposed in that part of the possessions of this country, by the unjust and severe acts of aggression to which they had been exposed. He could not express his admiration for them too strongly—his admiration for the sacrifices which they had made, and for the valour which they had displayed, in maintaining their connection with England. They had not resisted from any cold calculations of pecuniary interest, or of their own immediate aggrandizement or security; but they had been influenced by the purest principles of loyalty, by their preference, after experience, for the monarchical form of government over the democratic; by their love for the British name, and by their determination to maintain their share in the liberties and glory of Great Britain; and for their exertions, he wished that in the last session (now it would come, perhaps, with less effect,) this House had expressed, in stronger terms, its sympathy in their sufferings, and its admiration for their loyalty and courage. When her Majesty, in her speech from the Throne, called on parliament to support her in maintaining the authority of the Crown in Canada, he took it for granted that that meant to intimate an intention on the part of the government to maintain the sovereignty of her Majesty in the North American possessions of this country. He took it for granted, that that was tantamount to a declaration, not only that the maintaining that sovereignty was intended, but that, after all that had passed, the honour of this great country was concerned in supporting that authority; and he imagined that her Majesty intended to manifest her determination, whatever might be the result, to support those gallant men who, far separated from this country, but aided by its troops, had been able to resist the insurrections of the disaffected, and had proved themselves worthy of their connection with England, and of their right to the language which they spoke in common with Britons, by their noble exertions, and by the sacrifices which they had so gallantly and so disinterestedly made. [Hear, hear! from Lord J. Russell.] The noble lord (Lord J. Russell) assented to what he said, and that established the authority which he had attempted to deduce from the passage to which he had referred; and it was a declaration to the world, directed to the people of Canada more particularly, intimating that when any persons might attempt to molest them, it was for the honour of the British Throne that support should be given to British subjects. If that were so, then it meant to declare, and by that declaration to cheer the spirits of those who might be doubting, perhaps, as to the course they should take, that their sacrifices should not pass unnoticed, if they were again called from their homes in order to repel any new aggressions of the same character as those which had been already made, and which were the most expensive and dreadful that had ever been inflicted on the people of any country. They might, however, rely on the protecting power of Great Britain being extended to them. It was important, also, that the declaration should be understood by those misguided inhabitants of the United States who had been the main cause of these aggressions. He was bound to say that he had never spoken but in this way—he had never spoken of the United States, in the whole course of his political career, with any other feeling than that of deprecation of any sentiment inimical to the government of that country; and he thought it important, for the sake of humanity, and for the sake of the civilized world, that the friendship of the two countries should be maintained without any interruption of the best feelings; but that consideration should never prevent him, as a member of the House of Commons, from expressing freely his opinion with respect to their conduct. Her Majesty, in her gracious speech from the Throne, did certainly—he knew not whether it was intended as such—give as faint praise as possible to the efforts of the government of the United States. He was glad that her Majesty had spoken the truth. All that she said with respect to the President of the United States was this:—"The President of the United States has called upon the citizens of the Union to abstain from proceedings, so incompatible with the friendly relations which subsist between Great Britain and the United States." Why, if that were all that the President had done—if all that had passed were considered—all that appeared to have been done was to issue a proclamation, calling on the inhabitants of the United States to abstain from any interference with the Canadians; and the very limited panegyric was justifiable, but he was still dissatisfied with it. He could not conceive anything more grievously unjust, than that the inhabitants of a country, standing in a position of friendly relationship with another adjoining country, should keep the subjects resident in that country, without any cause of quarrel, in a state of danger of hostile interference; and he could not conceive anything more dangerous than that such an example should be allowed to continue in existence. Let hon. gentlemen imagine the inhumanity and injustice which would arise, in the event of its being admitted that the people of one kingdom were justified in making an entry into the adjoining territory, with armed forces, in destroying its villages, and massacring the people; and that the only reparation which could be obtained, was an answer, that the government of that country, by whose inhabitants the insurrection was made, was weak, or was disinclined to interfere, or that it should only call upon its subjects to desist from such proceedings, and nothing more. Had anything more been done here? What had been done with respect to those persons who had broken into the arsenal belonging to the United States, and, having taken away the arms contained therein, had turned them against the British people? But what doctrine had the United States laid down under similar circumstances? When the Indians of Florida had entered upon, and had attacked the United States, did General Jackson satisfy himself by adopting that course? Did he not, on the contrary, march into the territory of the Spanish, and seize the forts, and hold them for the United States? And when the Spanish government complained of it, what was the answer? It was, "If you cannot maintain order among your subjects, we will." That was the doctrine to which he appealed from his confidence in its justice, and the American government, which he was sure, acts on the principle of doing as it would be done by. The Spanish answered that they were weak, but the United States did not say that they were in the same condition, and could not repress the inhabitants. Mr. Adams foresaw the possibility of such a case arising, and he said, in his answer to the Spanish minister who demanded satisfaction: "He took possession, therefore, of Pensacola, and of the fort of Barrancas, as he had done of St. Mark's, not in a spirit of hostility to Spain, but as a necessary measure of self-defence; giving notice that they should be restored whenever Spain should place commanders and a force there, able and willing to fulfil the engagements of Spain towards the United States, of restraining by force the Florida Indians from hostility against their citizens. . . . But the President will neither inflict punishment, nor pass a censure upon General Jackson for that conduct, the motives for which were founded upon the purest patriotism; of the necessity for which he had the most immediate and effectual means of forming a judgment, and the vindication of which is written in every page of the law of nations, as well as in the first law of nature, self-defence. . . . If, as the commanders, both of Pensacola and St. Mark's, have alleged, this has been the result of their weakness rather than of their will—if they have assisted the Indians against the United States, to avert their hostilities from the province which they had not sufficient force to defend against them, it may serve in some measure to exculpate individually those officers; but it must carry demonstration irresistibly to the Spanish government, that the right of the United States can as little compound with impotence as with perfidy, and that Spain must immediately make her election, either to place force in Florida adequate at once to the protection of her territory and to the fulfilment of her engagements, or to cede to the United States a province of which she retains nothing but the nominal possession, but which is, in fact, a derelict, open to the occupancy of every enemy, civilized or savage, of the United States, and serving no other earthly purpose than as a post of annoyance to them."

It was in order that the inevitable consequences of the continuance of the existence of the present system might be avoided, that this matter was of importance; for there was the risk of men taking the law into their own hands, who were constantly exposed to sufferings of the description experienced by the Canadians, and it was to avert that event, that he trusted that the United States would be zealous in co-operating with the British government now. The sentiments of the nation must be known, and it was for the general interests of all countries to prevent the repetition of such conduct. Supposing 200 citizens of the United States were to collect and enter Canada, and seize upon a village, the result might be, that before assistance could arrive sufficient to expel them, a great number of others might take advantage of the stand which they had made, and of the temporary victory which had been gained, and might pour in upon the country under circumstances so advantageous as to prevent their being expelled without great difficulty. It was his duty, therefore, as a member of the British parliament, to call on the government to make an appeal to the United States against the injustice of such a course. There was one other topic introduced in the address on which he had a wish to speak. He was willing to put that construction upon it, which it had received from the hon. member for Kilkenny, and the hon. and learned member for Dublin, that it pledged those who voted in support of it to nothing, and to acknowledge, that it need not be criticised with any great accuracy, and therefore he did not object to it; but he would now come to a topic which had been omitted in it, and which was not adverted to. It was evident that the hon. member who had seconded the address to her Majesty, had prepared the speech which he had addressed to the House under the impression that the subject of the Corn-laws would be alluded to in her Majesty's speech. He thanked the hon. gentleman for the opinion which he had expressed, and the views which he had taken upon that important topic, and which he believed would carry the greater weight from the high authority which the hon. member was known to be upon such a subject, from his knowledge of the facts connected with the matter, and he was exceedingly obliged to him for the clear manner in which he had expressed himself, and certainly for the very able speech which he had delivered in favour of the existing system. His hon. friends who sat near him, when the hon. gentleman was addressing the House upon this subject, had called upon him to cheer for the arguments which the hon. member had advanced; but he declined to take such an advantage of the hon. gentleman, because he was fully persuaded, that before he concluded his speech he would proceed to the demolition of his own premises. But when the hon. gentleman sat down, he never was so much surprised as at the termination of what he said; for he had never heard any speech delivered, as this was, not only by the seconder of the address, but by the chairman of the Chamber of Commerce at Manchester, which went so far to confirm those in their adherence to the present state of things who had been favourable to its continuance, and to awaken the doubts and suspicions of those who were opposed to it. His argument was quite complete in all its points: for if he had said, that he would prove that there had been a progressive increase in the exports of England, he would have been answered, that it was true that the quantities had increased, yet that the relative value had diminished, and therefore that argument had no weight; if he had said, that he would give the official valuation, then he would have been called on to say what was the declared value; but to silence all opposition, he at once said,—“I will give you the declared value; I will institute the best comparison; I will not take former years, when other systems were in operation; but I will select the years 1835, 1836, and 1837; and I will compare the exports of 1838 with those of those four years, under the same system of corn-laws, and I will show you a progressive increase, not only in manufactured commodities, but in the real declared value, which amounted to three millions and a half; and I will show you, that there is a reasonable way of accounting for the depression which has taken place. In 1837, it is true, you had a depression; but that is not attributable to the corn-laws. The years from 1834 to 1836 would afford fair tests upon which to decide the question, but the year 1837 would not; for it was not the corn-laws which caused the depression in that year, but it was the operation of the banking system; and the instant that was removed, the instant that the ligature which bowed us to the ground was cut, in 1838, we rose buoyant.”

The hon. gentleman proposed to produce quantities, and he (Sir R. Peel) was also prepared with quantities, which presented matter of grave consideration, whether it were proper to tamper with the existing system, and to show the House, that since that system had been in operation, a progressive increase of exports had taken place which was almost unheard of. The export of cotton yarn, in 1829, was fifty-seven million pounds; in 1830, it was sixty-two millions; in 1831, it was fifty-eight millions; while in 1838, it was one hundred and thirteen millions of pounds; so that there was an increase to the extent of double the quantity in 1838, as compared to the quantity exported in 1829. A similar increase had taken place in the cotton-thread exported, which, in 1829, was 1,074,000 lbs., and in 1838, 2,362,000 lbs., or more than double the quantity exported in 1829. But this increase had not been confined to cotton alone. In hosiery, the quantities exported for three years, 1829, 1830, and 1838, were: 1829—363,000 lbs.; 1830—346,000 lbs.; 1838—447,000 lbs. In calicoes, there had been an immense increase since 1829; the amount then was 128,000,000 yards printed, and 179,966,000 plain. In 1830—152,432,000 printed, and 190,262,000 plain. In 1838—264,724,000 printed, and 282,847,300 plain. In silks, also, the increase had been great.—[Mr. Wood: An average of four years.] He begged the hon. gentleman would speak with the tone in which he before spoke of the average of four years, and remove any gloomy apprehensions which it might convey to his mind. In silks, the quantity exported in 1837, was 80,710 lbs., and, in 1838, 146,293 lbs.; of silk and cotton, 27,410 lbs. in 1837, and in 1838, 52,863 lbs. This was the state of our commerce under the present corn-law, and he begged it to be recollected that there was an increase of three and a half millions not only upon the quantity, but upon the declared value.—[Mr. Wood: An increase of only seven per cent.] Yes, seven per cent.; but he did not perceive the same loudness now in the tone of the hon. gentleman's voice which he had observed when he first made the declaration which he had repeated. It was not only this argument, however, which the hon. gentleman had advanced, which was in his favour, but he had said, also, that he had reason to know and believe that our trade was in a sound, healthy, and improving state. The hon. member's account of the shipping interest was equally satisfactory, and showed that, under the existing system, that department of commerce had an equal right to boast of its stable and firm position. The question now, therefore, was, whether the British parliament should be so alarmed by that which was the inevitable consequence of a bad harvest; and he hoped that the House would pause before it acceded to any proposition which would have the effect of changing the law, and which would materially affect the agricultural interests of this country, having received from the President of the Chamber of Commerce at Manchester, the account which he had given of the stable and secure position of the commerce and manufactures of the country, exposed, however, as it was, to the disadvantages of a bad bank system; and he trusted that they would hesitate before they run the risk of needlessly undermining the foundation of that system which had been attended with such good effects. He now came to the last paragraph of the address. Her Majesty, in her speech, said—"I have observed with pain the persevering efforts which have been made in some parts of the country to excite my subjects to disobedience and resistance to the law, and to recommend dangerous and illegal practices."

He had no hesitation in saying, that by whomsoever or for whatever purposes these practices were resorted to, they would at all times meet with his most decided opposition. He cordially agreed with the expression which her Majesty used, and he hoped that that high authority, not introducing any new penalties of the law, but warning her subjects against being misled by the practices of designing men, and expressing her determination to enforce the existing laws, would have the proper effect upon all loyal subjects, and would tend to frustrate the designs of these men; but he said that the language, considering the state of life of the individual who used it, was highly improper. It was calculated to excite the people to violence, and to endanger the safety of property, and by that means to call down upon the heads of the offending parties the severest penalties of the law. The noble lord, however, must again excuse him for saying, that when he thought fit to advert to the subject of these meetings, he used language which was so capable of perversion, of being misunderstood, as to be dangerous in its effect. He would state the grounds on which this allegation was founded. On the 17th of September, a public meeting was held in London; and he found that a speaker there made use of the sort of language he complained of. Speaking of the men of the north, he said, "They were armed. He had seen the arms over their mantelpieces. But the national petition had come opportunely, and they would not have signed it, had it not demanded universal suffrage. If they should fail in the present instance, he would not attempt to say what would be the consequence. The rifles would be loaded—that would be the next step, no doubt; and he defied the power of any government, or of any armed Bourbon police, to put them down. It was no use to disguise the matter; secrecy was the ruin of all things. Every thing would be done openly by the people of Lancashire, and it would be done constitutionally and legally. Now for the people's charter. They demanded it, because it contained universal suffrage—because it gave them a voice in the choice of representatives—and they were justified in asking for this. Was it too much for those who produced all the food, all the clothing, all the necessaries of life—who fought all the battles of the country—to ask for a voice in the choice of their representatives? He would state what the people of Manchester were going to do. They intended, on Monday next, to hold a great meeting at Manchester—an aggregate meeting, where they expected no less than 300,000 men, two-thirds of whom were fit to bear arms."

A person named Wade, a clergyman apparently, afterwards spoke. He said—"He would now say a word as to the convention. One advantage of it would be, that the people would have an executive power to watch the government. If any unjust aggression were made on the people by the convention, they would have the power of calling a great convention, and those who did not agree with it, might go about their business."

Mr. Feargus O'Connor (formerly a member of this House) said, "They had had a taste of physical force in the north a short time since. Some of the metropolitan police were sent down to Dewsbury, but the boys of that noble town sent them home again. His desire was to try moral force as long as possible, even to the fullest extent; but he would have them always bear in mind that it was better to die freemen than to die slaves. Every conquest which was called honourable had been achieved by physical force; but they did not want it, because, if all hands were pulling for universal suffrage, they would soon pull down the stronghold of corruption. The Whigs had not only deprived the poor of their rights, but they had robbed the middling classes of theirs also, and all for the purpose of putting the power into the hands of the three devils at Somerset-house."

The Rev. Mr. Stephens, on the 24th of September, used this language:—"If the boroughreeve and constables had not made the declaration which they had made, and if these parties had not given the command of the police to be vested in the hands of the marshals of the day of that meeting, he would have come upon the ground armed, and would have brought 10,000 armed men with him to the meeting, and he would have moved an adjournment. He would have moved an adjournment of the meeting of the people of South Lancashire for one month, and he would have advised every one in the mean time to use all his influence over his friends and fellow-workmen, to flock towards the standard of the national charter."

Now, when the noble lord spoke of these meetings in the language he had used, though he did not doubt that his object was good, yet he must say, that he thought the expressions which he used were capable of being misunderstood. He would read a report which had been published of the noble lord's speech, and which had not been contradicted nor controverted. The noble lord said, at a dinner at Liverpool, on October 3rd:—"He alluded to the public meetings which were now in the course of being held in various parts of the country. There were some, perhaps, who would put down such meetings; but such was not his opinion, nor that of the government with which he acted. He thought the people had a right to free discussion. It was free discussion which elicited truth. They had a right to meet. If they had no grievances, common sense would speedily come to the rescue, and put an end to these meetings."

[Lord John Russell: I added a qualification.] The noble lord, from that very expression, clearly felt the justice of the remark which he had made. But suppose a mill was burned, and suppose that, instead of giving him assistance, it should be said that the mill-owner had duties to perform. He was prepared to say that, although the sentiments which the noble lord expressed might be just, they might be truisms; but even the unseasonable expression of truth in times of public excitement might be dangerous, and therefore he exceedingly regretted, that when the noble lord did accompany that declaration which he had made in favour of these meetings with a qualification, that qualification did not receive equal publicity with the other parts of the speech. I will now (said the right hon. baronet) say one word with respect to the amendment of the hon. member for Finsbury. The hon. gentleman anticipates that it will be impossible for this side of the House to assent to it, and I certainly, for one, will give a cordial vote against it. But with respect to the first portion of the amendment, that the measure of 1832 had disappointed the expectations of her Majesty's people, as the hon. gentleman and others on that side of the House are such good judges of the disappointment that has taken place, I will defer to that authority most readily, and as I prophesied that disappointment would be the result, I certainly do not dissent from that part of the amendment. I did dissent from the measure; I told you the English people, in the mass, were not deceived—that they did not place much confidence on the legislative power of a new parliament to redress their grievances—I told you that you overrated the extent to which of the reformed parliament would turn up. I did not suppose that "a phalanx of able and eloquent men," who had been hitherto languishing in obscurity, would be brought before the public. Supposing I had prophesied in 1830, when you drove me from power—when you made me responsible for every fire that took place—when you told me that public discontent would not, could not exist, without evident indication of misgovernment—that the people would not complain without good reason, and that the existence of dissatisfaction, and the prevalence of crime, were proofs of the bad legislation of those who held the reins of power. Suppose I had said, at that time, "Yes, but you have not two conventions sitting then, as there now are;" suppose I had said, "You will have the same fires and the same outrages in 1838, making every allowance for the excitement in France;" I do not consider, as regards the prevalence of excitements, you are at the present moment in a better condition than we were in 1830. If I had said that this measure you are clamouring for—the bill, the whole bill, and nothing but the bill—if I had said, you that are calling for this, and you will neither permit abatement or addition to it—if, whatever you may think of its finality now, you then held it to be the second charter of public liberty—if I had said, in 1838 you will be clamorous for a reform of this measure, as you now are, and that it disappoints the public expectation, and that you must be dragged upon the wheels of that which is ever to be stationary, it would not have been received with the good-humoured laughter with which you now greet it, but with a scowl of indignation at throwing any doubt upon the introduction of more popular opinions into the British constitution. I should have been denounced as a false prophet; I should have been told that there would be nothing but perfect satisfaction under the new parliament—under the bill, the whole bill, and nothing but the bill. It would have been said, these are the prejudiced views of a Tory, who clings to ancient abuses, and who will not look on the bright day that is now approaching. I may now be asked, Why, then, do you support this bill, which according to you is deserving of reprobation, and has been productive of disappointment? Because I take warning from experience, and because I find it has not produced satisfaction—because I know that a demand for further reform, in the expectation of producing satisfaction or finality, would be only aggravating the disappointment, and that in five years more, after having extended the suffrage to four millions of people, you would come again, and say, you have only given us household suffrage, when you should have given us universal suffrage. You will argue, it is quite clear, that whoever contributes by his labour to taxation, is entitled to a vote. I am confident, according to the hon. gentleman's own showing, that if all men are slaves who are not entitled to exercise the elective franchise, that nothing short of universal suffrage, in its most unlimited degree, will satisfy you. Why should it be limited to the age of twenty-one? Why have any limitation as to age, as in the case of the militia? Thus you will go on infusing popular principles into the constitution until it ceases to be a monarchy, and then, when you are suffering under the bitter experiences of the change, you will, perhaps, tell me—you were not a false prophet. Would to God that we had continued under the old standard of our ancient institutions, and that the country may yet preserve the inestimable institutions of a mixed and mild government!

"Many a gem of purest ray serene

Mr. Duncombe's motion was negatived, and the Address carried by a majority of 340.

NAVY ESTIMATES.

MARCH 11, 1839.

On the question that the naval force for the present year be 34,165 seamen, and 9,000 marines, including boys,—

SIR ROBERT PEEL stated, that it was not his intention to give any opposition to the vote which was proposed. Her Majesty's government, on their own responsibility, had proposed for the consideration of the House, that a certain number of seamen should be the general naval establishment of this country, and it was nearly impossible for any member of that House to enter so fully into the subject of the navy or army establishment, as to be able to question the propriety of the grant; but the government must be presumed to have a much more accurate knowledge of all the circumstances of the case than those who had not access to official information, and who could judge, therefore, only by the general aspect of affairs; and therefore, unless there was something unusual in the vote which would lead to a strong belief that it was much too small, or that it was extravagantly great, it was extremely difficult for any hon. member to propose an alteration in it. The main consideration which parliament should have upon this subject was, as to the amount of the vote; and, in reference to this, they must look, first to the relative strength of the naval establishment in this country, with that of the other powers; and secondly, to the present aspect of affairs, and the probability of this country being called upon to bring its resources into operation. Now, considering either one or other of these matters, he came to this conclusion—that the amount of men proposed for the navy establishment of this country could not be objected to on the ground of its exceeding that which was necessary. He could not say that it was an extravagant amount, but, on the contrary, it was more likely that he should say that the demands on it would be sufficiently answered by the provision made. It was impossible not to see that the exertions made by other powers—it might be without any hostile design—by the United States—France and Russia were becoming great naval powers, and were preparing to cope with Great Britain in the superiority which it had hitherto maintained over the seas, and it was impossible, therefore, to exclude the importance of those maritime powers from the consideration of the House. There was one material point also—that the House must not only take the actual strength with which it was possible to appear when it might be called upon to come in collision with other nations, into consideration, but also the degree of assistance which we might expect from our allies. Let the House look at the strength of the Russian fleet in the Baltic at this time. They must not, however, determine the amount of possible danger by its mere extent, but they must look at the other fleets there; and if they found that Russia had a complete preponderating power there, it was most material to consider, whether this arose as well from its own strength, as from the assistance which it might gain. In 1790, there was a most formidable conflict there. Russia and Sweden were then opposed to each other, and Sweden had no more than eighteen sail-of-the-line there, with which she contended against twenty-three Russian vessels, and it would, therefore, be found that the Russian preponderance proceeded not merely on account of her own superior strength, but on account also of the diminution of the other powers on the shores of the Baltic, on whose co-operation this country might have reckoned. Then, again, let them compare the exertions of France with those made in former times, and also with those of the United States, and they would see the mode in which they were preparing themselves. When he said this, however, he was willing to admit, that nothing could be worse policy than to show too feverish, too active a jealousy, with respect to the progress of those states. If the country had peace, let it have the full advantages of peace; and if they made any active demonstrations, they must do it in such a way as to bring no evil consequences upon themselves; but he looked to the strength of the country, and to the tremendous exertions she would have to make in case of any war breaking out, and while he was one of the last to advise that they should increase their resources during peace by an unnecessary demonstration, and by that means inducing other powers to magnify their own strength by reason of the suspicions which they should entertain, he was at the same time bound to say, that when the exertions made by other naval powers were witnessed, the time was arrived when this country should sedulously apply itself, not to a sudden demonstration of strength, but to a gradual and prudent collection of its materials of warfare, with which, in the event of war breaking out, they would find reason to congratulate themselves they were not unprovided. On that ground, he hoped that her Majesty's government would seriously consider the condition of the British navy, so as to make such additions as would enable them to compete with other naval powers. He should have been contented to discuss this matter upon the general principle; but that the hon. gentleman, the secretary to the Admiralty, finding himself pressed by a pretty unanimous, or at least a general expression of dissatisfaction at the conduct of the Admiralty, thought it expedient to rest his defence mainly upon the reductions made in the navy during the time he (Sir R. Peel) had been in office, and he said that Conservative attacks were very rife upon the government. In reply to that, he begged to say, that he was no party to any of those attacks, and so far from considering that they ought to be called Conservative attacks, he should say, that the assaults upon them came from a different quarter, while their best defence proceeded from a Conservative. The greater part of the attacks made upon the present management of the navy, came from persons whose politics corresponded with those of her Majesty's government—at least, that was true of a great many amongst the writers upon the subject. It did appear to him surprising that government should be so sore upon the subject, seeing that so large a proportion of those from whom the attacks proceeded, so far from incurring their displeasure, had actually been rewarded. The individual who signed himself "A Flag Officer," was, of course, not known—appearing under that assumed title they could not tell what might have been his reward; but Lieutenant Crauford, now a commander, who wrote upon the state of the Russian navy, had been promoted—so likewise had been Captain Napier. That gallant officer did not conceal the expression of his opinions, but he was rewarded, and the defender of the government was Sir John Barrow, a Conservative. Then, on the assumed ground that the assailants of the government on this subject were all conservatives, the secretary to the Admiralty thought proper to attack him and his government; he should now, therefore, proceed to consider whether the attacks made upon him were well founded, whether the course which the present government pursued could be justified and defended by an attack upon the government with which he was connected, and having repelled the accusations brought against him, he should proceed to inquire whether the conduct of the present administration was altogether free from reproach on the ground of neglect or misconduct. At this moment, the cry had set in against economy; and he, when in office, had been charged with neglecting economy. Now, he should show that he had not been guilty of that; he should show also, why he had listened to the doctrines of the economists, and proposed what was said to have been too small an amount of naval force. An hon. member had said to him, "You are the cause of all the attacks which are now made upon us; your government in the years 1834-5 proposed more inadequate estimates than ever were proposed before;" and, therefore, the hon. member inferred, that he (Sir R. Peel,) who had neither suggested nor incited any attacks on the board of Admiralty, ought to bear the blame of any improper attacks which might have been made upon it at a former period. Now, he would just remind the House, that although they might vote 35,000 seamen and marines as a fit establishment for the year 1839, that was no proof in itself, that his estimates for the years 1834-5 were inadequate. He requested the House to consider the situation in which he stood at that time. At the close of the year 1834 he came into office. He had to consider what should be the amount of the estimates for the ensuing year. He found that in the year 1818, when he had also been in administration, we had been content with a force of 20,000 seamen and marines for the navy, and that in the year 1823, we had only a force of 25,000 seamen and marines for the same service. In the commencement, then, of 1835, he had proposed that the naval force for the year should be 20,000 seamen and marines. Now, it was no proof, that though in 1818, he had thought a force of 20,000 men sufficient, the vote which he proposed in 1835 was inadequate; and even if the hon. gentleman opposite could prove that their vote of 35,000 men for the present year was right, it was no proof that his estimates for 1835 were justly liable to condemnation. What were the circumstances, he would ask, under which he had proposed the estimates of 1835? He landed in England on the 9th of December, 1834. At that time he had not accepted office. He accepted office the next day—on the 10th of December, 1834. The board of Admiralty was formed about the 1st of January, 1835. The House of Commons had required, that the estimates of the year should be laid on its table within a fortnight after the meeting of parliament. What, then, was the course which he had to pursue? In the month of August, 1834, his Majesty had declared in a speech from the Throne, that profound peace prevailed throughout the whole of Europe, and that all anxiety for the fate of Turkey was at an end, and his ministers had taken credit for the successful exertions which they had made upon that score; and had informed the country that it was in no danger from any renewal of hostilities. The board of Admiralty, he must again repeat, was not formed till the 1st of January, 1835. He therefore determined to take this course—namely, to adhere to the estimates which his predecessors in the government, who were in office up to November 1834, had prepared, with the full knowledge of all the exigencies of the public service. It had been stated, in the course of the debate, and that statement had not yet been contradicted, that three-fourths of the foundations of the estimates for the year 1835, had been prepared by the administration which quitted office in November 1834. In those estimates he found nothing to warrant even a suspicion on his part that they anticipated any interruption of peace; on the contrary, it appeared as if they entertained no fears about the prospect of peace being obscured, and that they were of opinion that it would not be wise to incur the jealousy of foreign powers, by increasing either our naval or our military establishments. He looked, then, to the provisions which had been made for them by his predecessors in office, and he found that the impressions which had been created by his Majesty's Speech from the Throne in August 1834, were completely confirmed by the draught of the estimates for 1835, which they had left behind them in their respective offices. He found, likewise, that if any inference as to their belief of the profound security of the world could be deduced from their inadequate preparations, that inference was greatly confirmed by the force ready for service in the different ports and harbours of the country. What vessels had they at the close of the year 1834, in the three principal ports of Portsmouth, Plymouth, and Sheerness? You had not at that time in any one of those three ports a single first-rate, nor a single second-rate, nor a single third-rate, nor even a single fourth-rate—nay, you had not even a single sloop or any steam-vessels. You had there, it was true, stationary vessels, but not a single vessel ready for sea was there in any one of the ports and harbours of Great Britain. He had a right, then, to infer, that his predecessors in office had no fear of any danger, and that they had no notion of any likelihood of the prospects of peace being obscured. He had, therefore, taken their estimates for the preceding year; and the first question which he had asked himself upon them was, as to the number of seamen and marines which had been actually employed. He found that it fell short of the number voted by 1,200 men. Three large vessels, the Caledonia, the Trafalgar, and a third ship of the line, of which he had forgotten the name, had subsequently returned home. The reliefs had all been sent out, and the actual number of men employed fell about 1,200 short of the number which had been voted. He had, therefore, taken as the foundation of his estimate, not the number contained in the estimates of the preceding year, but the number of men actually employed by virtue of it. But that was not the only foundation he went upon. As our appointment to office was not calculated to endanger the peace of Europe, as the country had amicable relations with all the foreign powers, ministers in 1835 determined to follow in the steps of their predecessors in office up to November 1834, and not to propose any increase in the establishments. But it would have been open to them, if you would have granted to us, which you would not, the experience of four or five months in the administration of public affairs—on finding, as he had little doubt but that they should have found, that their estimates were inadequate—it would have been open to the ministers to come down to the House at a subsequent period, and to state that such was the case; and under such circumstances he thought, that the House would have more readily given him increased powers, if he had said, “We did not like to act upon mere apprehensions of danger—we did not like to spread consternation and alarm throughout the country. The experience of a few months has shown us, that we were wrong in the view which we took of foreign affairs, and now we have acquired the knowledge, that a greater force is wanted than that which we originally required.” He was sure, that that was the course which men of sense would have pursued, and he was also sure, that it was a course to which the House of Commons would have assented. We were not, however, admitted (continued Sir R. Peel) to that experience; and I am not warranted, from the experience of what has occurred, in saying, that if we had proposed larger estimates than those which we then laid upon the table of the House, we should have found a very ready acceptance of them at your hands. All I know upon that subject is, that the hon. member for Kilkenny proposed, that our estimates should be referred to a select committee, and that in that proposition he was supported by some fifty or sixty of his friends. Our estimates, which are now considered so open to the fatal objection of economy, were then kept so long in a state of suspense in that House, that we were obliged to come down to the House and inform the hon. member, that if we did not gain one vote upon them, we should not be able to discharge the half-pay and pensions of the seamen and marines. I was myself obliged to ask the hon. member for Kilkenny to waive his objections to that item in the estimates, and to allow me to take a vote upon it without discussion. But if, instead of taking that course, I had come down to the House and said, “These gentlemen are cutting down the estimates too narrowly, they are not aware of the exigencies of the public service; let us increase the force of the navy; let us add to the number of seamen and marines; there is nothing like preparing for war," what chance should I have had of carrying such increased estimates, supposing that I had been induced to propose them? I proposed, then, under these circumstances, the estimates of 1835; and my charge against you now is, why, if you thought those estimates so inadequate as you now state them to be—why, if you thought that I was at that time undermining the sources of British power and of British ascendancy, you did not yourselves come forward to propose such larger estimates as you yourselves thought commensurate with the demands of the public service? You at any rate were not inexperienced in public affairs; you knew well what was the state of Europe in 1834. If you thought my estimates for that year too much reduced, why was not a single whisper heard from your ranks against the measures of retrenchment and economy which I then proposed? The hon. member opposite (Mr. Hume, we believe) behaved on that occasion fairly enough. When we put in our claim as advocates for economy, he said, "Oh, no! such a claim does not belong to you." Our claims to economy at that time were disputed, and when we showed that our estimate was less than the estimate for the preceding year by 1,200 men, it was replied that no credit was due to us for that reduction; we were told that our economy was reluctant—that it was forced upon us, and that we were only treading in the steps of our predecessors. But not a single whisper was then heard that our retrenchment was ill-judged and extravagant. Why was it not? In 1835 not one of you was manly enough to call upon the House for an increased vote to the navy; but now, in 1839, when the tide has set in against economy, and when the cry is for increased naval establishments, you are content, one and all of you, to sail with the stream, because it is in favour of that increase, and you say, with smirking self-sufficiency, that all the evils arising from the present reduced state of our naval establishments ought to be visited upon the head of my administration of 1835. But what was the amount of the enormous reductions which we made in that year? On the 1st of December, 1834, the naval establishment left to us by our predecessors in office, amounted to eleven sail-of-the-line, classed under the head of fourth-rates, and altogether to 160 pennants. Our inadequate estimates enabled you, however, to have, on the 1st of December, 1835, 167 ships employed in the naval service of the country—so that the result of our enormous reductions was, that you had at the close of the year a positive increase in the force of the year 1835 over that of the year 1834. It is true that you supported a much greater increase in the naval estimates for the next year. You have said that I taunted you with doing so from an undue fear of the power of Russia. I am bound to say that I have no recollection of having used any such taunt. I said it would have been better had you assigned the real cause of the increase which you then made; but I do not recollect having ever taunted the noble lord opposite on the score of his alarm upon the exertions of Russia. A large increase, however, was made, no matter as to the cause, in 1836, to the navy estimates; and now, with the utmost simplicity, the hon. secretary for the Admiralty comes forward and asks us what reasons had we for consenting to increase the estimates of 1836, which did not apply with equal force to increasing the estimates of 1835. Why, I heard, with my own ears, the hon. gentleman make a speech of more than an hour and a half's duration, in explanation of the reasons which, he said, existed for increasing the naval estimates of 1836. He did not at that time venture to assert that the estimates of the preceding year had been improperly prepared; and the noble lord, the leader of the party—what did he say upon them? I put it to the House broadly and distinctly, has the course of either the noble lord or the hon. secretary been fair to us upon this occasion? In 1835 neither of them ventured upon any objection to my estimates. In 1836 an increased estimate was proposed under their auspices, on the ground that the public service required that an additional force of 5,000 men should be employed. In the course of the debate which took place upon that proposed increase, I said, "I assent to it with readiness, for I cannot see that the estimates of 1835 should be the rule for the estimates of 1836." That, however, was not the language which the noble lord used at that time. What then was it? On the navy estimates for 1836 being proposed, the noble lord said, that he was ready to admit that when the estimates of the preceding year were prepared, there was no necessity for a larger estimate than that which was then submitted to parliament, but that he was convinced that if an increase had then been called for, it would have been assented to. But why should I overlay this point with unnecessary argument? Why should I again remind the House, that if my estimates were inadequate, it was the duty of the noble lord and his friends to have come forward and remedied the deficiency at the time, and that nevertheless they one and all shrunk from the performance of that duty, because economy and retrenchment were the order of the day, and the tide had not, at that time, set against them? What could have been easier, if my estimates were so palpably under the mark—what could have been easier than for the noble lord or for some member of his government, to have come down to the House in June, 1835, and to have said—“These estimates were prepared with a view to economy by those who had but an inadequate knowledge of the circumstances of the country. We know better what the country requires, and here is a supplementary estimate containing the items of the increased grant which we demand from you.” If you could have convinced parliament that such an estimate was necessary, parliament would have granted it willingly, and then you would have acted more manfully than you are acting now, when, after keeping our condemnation snugly in your pockets for four years and more, you are producing it to answer one of your party purposes. The right hon. baronet then proceeded to observe, that he did not presume to condemn government for attempting, in the present state of our finances, to reconcile their professions of economy with a due regard to the service of the country. He hoped, however, that government would well consider the situation in which we were placed at present. He did not wish to diffuse anxiety or consternation throughout the country; but looking to the present condition of our affairs on the north-west frontier of India—looking, too, at the war in which we might be embarked at the other extremity of the globe—looking at the state of Canada—at the unsettled question which we had with the United States, and at the active demonstrations which were making by other states in the other hemisphere; he could not refrain from expressing a hope that the government would consider carefully whether there was not at present justifiable cause for increasing the naval establishments of the country—an increase which, in point of fact, might ultimately be more economical than any rash diminution of them. He did not say this in any hostile spirit to her Majesty’s government, for he was well aware of the necessity under which they laboured of reconciling as far as they could the demands of the public service with those of economy. His charge against the government—for he had now done with the defence of his own administration—his charge against the government, or rather his suspicion of neglect and misconduct on the part of the government, was founded on this circumstance, that they would be unable with the force which they now demanded from parliament, and to which parliament would undoubtedly give its assent, to give that protection to the commercial interests of the country which their importance required. He looked at both the state and amount of our present naval force. He looked also at the distribution of it; and having done that, he could not reconcile the distribution of it with the demands for protection to British commerce. He recollected well, that in the year 1836, when the hon. secretary for the Admiralty moved for an increased grant on account of the naval estimates, he made the following statement:—“The first ground upon which he asked the House to consent to the resolution for an increase of 5,000 men was, that there was no British naval station in the world from which there were not pressing demands for an increased force. From the stations in the Pacific, where the English trade was increasing very much, there were continued demands for an increase of naval force. The demands made upon the Admiralty in this respect, had been reiterated through the Foreign-office by the Consuls of this country, as his noble friend at the head of that department well knew. Again, similar calls had been made upon the Admiralty by the Consuls at Mexico and Valparaiso, by the merchants resident there, and on the whole western coast of Mexico, claiming this aid in protection of their persons and their property, and declaring such increased naval force to be absolutely necessary for this purpose.”

In that paragraph of the hon. gentleman’s speech, he had distinct and positive proof that her Majesty’s ministers were aware of the necessity for increasing our naval force to give protection to our commerce on the coasts of South America. Nay, more, he had a direct admission from them that daily applications were made to them for the presence of such a naval force. He found that at present we had a force of twenty-one ships of the line, and of 35,000 seamen and marines; and now he asked them whether we had been able with that force to give that protection to British commerce in South America which our interests required? As he did not wish to enter into the general question at present, he would confine himself to the case of British interests in Mexico. First of all, let the House look to their amount. There were eight or nine large bodies of British capitalists engaged in mining operations in that country. Moreover, there was a very considerable debt due from Mexico to the inhabitants of this country. You would also find at Mexico, Vera Cruz, Oaxaca, indeed at almost every large port and populous internal town in that part of South America, extensive British commercial establishments. The amount of British capital thus invested in Mexico, was sufficient to demand of the government that it should look carefully to its protection. What, he asked, had recently occurred? So long ago as the 21st of March, 1838, they were aware that France was about to enforce her claims—perhaps just claims, perhaps claims neglected by Mexico—by demanding reparation, and if that was refused, by exacting it from the Mexican Republic. Very soon after that date, they must have been aware that France not only required from Mexico reparation for the injury she had sustained, and the dismissal of the judges and officers who had, as was alleged, improperly and illegally treated French subjects, but also preferred what certainly appeared at first sight to be rather a novel demand for one independent state to make to another as a sine quâ non for avoiding the consequences of a declaration of war—that the French inhabitants settled in Mexico, should be entitled to carry on a retail trade on the same footing as Mexican subjects. The notification made by the French Chargé d’Affaires to the Mexican authorities, in March 1838, was couched in the following terms:—“Should, which God forbid, this answer,” to the three demands, that was, “be in the negative upon only one point, should it even be doubtful upon only one point, should it finally be delayed beyond the 15th of April, the undersigned must then immediately place the continuation of this affair in the hands of the senior commander of his Majesty’s naval forces, of which a division is actually on the coast of Mexico, and this officer will put in execution the orders he has already received.” This, then, was a decisive proof that the French naval force was on the coast in March 1838, and the commander of that force had orders, if satisfaction were not given, to enforce the reparation. He said not a word as to whether or not the French government were right in demanding reparation in this fashion, but, assuming that France was perfectly justified, surely, when her navy was to be used for enforcing her rights, the British subjects in Vera Cruz and other places had a right to be protected. How was it possible for a powerful country like France to proceed to exact reparation by violent means, without so far endangering the security of the lives and property of British subjects as to make the intervention of the mother country necessary? Necessary for what purpose? To attack the French? No, but to give confidence to British subjects—to form a guarantee, that right and justice would be observed in carrying the projected hostile operations into effect. Early in summer, in July at the latest, they knew that France was fitting out an expedition against Mexico. The French squadron sailed from Brest on the 13th of September, and arrived at Vera Cruz about the 25th of October. The bombardment of San Juan d’Ulloa was executed on the 27th of November. After all the warnings we had had of the danger to which British interests were about to be exposed, we had no British minister resident in Mexico. He believed, that Mr. Pakenham did not arrive till after the attack. [Viscount Palmerston: there was a British consul on the spot]. He did not mean to say, that the British embassy was absolutely vacant, or that no subordinate officer was present; but he must say, when most important interests were exposed to imminent danger, there ought to have been a British minister, and not a consul, to look to them. The minister did not arrive at Vera Cruz till the 22nd of December, while the attack on San Juan d’Ulloa took place on the 27th of November, and that on Vera Cruz on the 4th or 5th of December. What naval force was there on the coast of Mexico to afford protection to British subjects? Was there a single British ship of war at Vera Cruz at the time when the attack was made? He did not ask the question without reason, as would be seen by the account of the transactions which then took place, which he would quote purposely from the papers that were supposed to vindicate the policy of government. He found this statement of facts in the Globe newspaper of the 8th of February, professing to come from a correspondent at Falmouth:—"They say that the French would have been cut off but for the distance of the army from the city, and the unexpectedness of the disembarkation of the French, as the British vice-consul is said by Santa Anna to have pledged himself most faithfully for the French, that they were not to disembark until after eight o'clock in the morning. The situation of the British inhabitants may be conceived, when it is related that not a single man-of-war lay there."

The Satellite, a sixteen gun-brig, stated to have been at Vera Cruz, was said by this correspondent to have gone on a cruise during the negotiation of a treaty, which would throw the whole of the losses sustained by the British on the government, as the commander of the Satellite must have been aware of the difficulties that existed, and that the treaty, having been offered during the bombardment, would never have been acceded to by the Mexicans. He (Sir R. Peel) would say nothing as to the doctrine maintained by the writer—that government was liable for the losses of British subjects, but he wished to know why the single British ship of war should have left the neighbourhood of Vera Cruz after the capture of San Juan d'Ulloa. Even if it had remained there, would it be contended, that with our twenty-one sail-of-the-line and 34,000 seamen and marines, a single brig of sixteen guns could afford sufficient protection to our interests? He (Sir R. Peel) was anxious to say nothing that might prevent any pending negotiations from being brought to a satisfactory conclusion; his questions were mainly directed, not to the claims of France, but the conduct of her Majesty's government. This correspondent stated, that, "however, after the first movement of the French, about thirty persons obtained a refuge on board the Express, and the day after she left the Madagascar arrived."

"The Express, he (Sir Robert Peel) believed, left on the 15th of December. The Morning Chronicle, in the account received from its correspondent, stated, "The greater part of the wealthy inhabitants of Vera Cruz had proceeded to Jalapa, taking with them their valuables. No British ship of war was at Vera Cruz at the time of this occurrence, and the Express packet was therefore detained to receive on board the British subjects."

If government replied to him, Where was the use of having the British force in the neighbourhood of Vera Cruz, or on the coast of Mexico, when we acknowledge the right of the French to blockade the coast, when we say that France is justified by the law of nations in taking this course to obtain redress for the injuries she has suffered? Then, he would ask, Why have you a squadron on the coast of Mexico at present? What was your object in withdrawing the whole of your force from the North American station, and despatching it to the Gulf of Mexico? Not, he presumed, to attack the French force. He trusted there was no ground for apprehending that. He presumed it was to prevent, in the excitement consequent upon a conflict, the possibility of outrage being committed by unauthorized parties on the property or the personal safety of British subjects, or to give them the means of escape, and provide them with some better resource in the time of danger than the Express packet. Well, but how did it happen, that with such ample notice that war was meditated by France, or at least hostile operations—for war, be it observed, had never been declared—and with such ample appliances for the protection of British commerce, the first duty of government, that of providing for the safety of its subjects from hostile assaults, had been for a long time entirely neglected? According to the statement he had read, there had been no ship at hand to watch over our interests but a little gun-brig after the 1st of December; and after that day even that source of protection was cut off, for the Satellite left the coast. He said, government had ample means of protecting British commerce. Why, we had now eleven sail-of-the-line in the Mediterranean. The statement made by the hon. gentleman opposite (Mr. C. Wood) the other night was, that there was no necessity for keeping eleven sail-of-the-line on that station; that no dangers menacing British interests in that quarter required a preponderating force; but that it was better to employ these ships in the Mediterranean than to retain them at home. Now, either it was necessary to keep eleven sail-of-the-line in the Mediterranean, or it was not. If it were necessary to have eleven sail-of-the-line in the Mediterranean, and two at Lisbon, then all he could say was, that the remaining seven sail-of-the line in commission were very inadequate to the duty of protecting the coasts of this country, and meeting unforeseen dangers that might assail us without warning. If, on the other hand, so many ships were not wanted in the Mediterranean, why were not five or six sail recalled to the home station to be kept as a reserve, ready to be called into action on unlooked-for contingencies? He wished to have an explanation from government as to the present distribution of the naval force. He could not account for the disproportion between the force at present maintained at home, and that maintained at former periods. How was it possible for ministers now to get a force ready speedily in case of any unexpected emergency? Suppose they had had to send out the ships to Mexico at short notice from the home station, how could they have effected it? The hon. gentleman opposite had told them it was not necessary to keep ships at home, because they could send out a steam-vessel to the Mediterranean station, and recall them in a very short space of time. That, however, was but a frail stay on which to place dependence, subject, as such a communication must be, to so many accidents from the weather, and from the risk of capture. What progress had been made lately in fitting out ships wanted to relieve others on foreign stations? The Malabar had lately returned from the American station, and it became necessary to supply her place by the Implacable. Would the hon. gentleman, the secretary to the Admiralty, state to the House, how much time had been consumed in fitting out that single ship of the line? If the ordinary at home was in such a state of forwardness that it could be brought speedily forward for active service, he greatly doubted whether they would have withdrawn their ships from the American station, and not rather have sent them out to Mexico from this country. If they kept eleven sail of-the-line in the Mediterranean, without any demand for their services, and two sail at Lisbon, while it appeared that, at the same time, there was but one ship-of-war, or not even one, present during the bombardment of San Juan, and the capture or assault of Vera Cruz, to give protection to British property, he knew not what vindication of themselves government could make to the commercial interests of this country. Look at the force of 1792, at a time of profound peace. In that year we had eleven guard-ships protecting the coast of Great Britain. In 1834, on the 1st of December, preceding his own appointment to office, we had not, except stationary ships, a single sail of-the-line on the home station. He could not see the wisdom of this policy, even although there might be no immediate danger of invasion. It was surely imprudent in the government of a country possessing such a vastly extended commerce, to leave the great naval ports without the means of meeting unforeseen demands upon our navy, that might be created by such events as had lately occurred at Buenos Ayres and Vera Cruz. He greatly feared that in such cases the absence of a British naval force—he did not mean a force with hostile intentions, for he trusted the assertion of the hon. secretary to the Admiralty, who had assured them that we might keep a sufficient force at Mexico without in the slightest degree endangering a collision with France—would always be attended with results disadvantageous to this country. If we appeared to take no interest in such events—if we abandoned the great arm of our supremacy, and permitted other powers to have a predominance over us in these expeditions—if we allowed great powers to exact hard conditions from independent states, and say, “If you fail to give us satisfaction in every one of the points we insist on, we will take your capital, and sack your towns;” and if we sent no British force to the scene of operations to watch over the lives and property of the Queen’s subjects, the commanding influence of this country would be diminished in those distant quarters of the globe, and we might come to regret that some of the eleven ships on the Mediterranean station had not been more usefully employed in demonstrating that Britain had not quite forgotten the existence of those regions. How likely was it, that in the excitement and heat of the contending parties, acts might be done, perhaps, without the intention to offend, which might place us under the disagreeable necessity of demanding reparation? An instance of this had but lately occurred—a British pilot had been taken out of the only ship of war we had on the coast of Mexico, the Express packet. He earnestly and fervently hoped that that act might not create any even temporary misunderstanding between two great countries. He should avoid saying one single word that could by possibility throw any difficulty in the way of an arrangement, perfectly satisfactory and honourable to both countries. I feel, said the right hon. baronet, the most perfect confidence that a great country like France, jealous of its own honour, will be the first to respect the honour of other countries. I have the greatest confidence that the remarkable and distinguished man who fills the throne of France, and rules the destinies of her people, who exercises the influence he possesses over the councils of that country less because he is its monarch, and has the regal state, than because, as I firmly believe, he combines in himself greater qualities for empire than any of its kings since the time of Napoleon, because he has known the vicissitudes of adversity and prosperity, and been taught sagacity by exposure to misfortune; because he has had wonderful opportunities of exhibiting both personal and moral courage—opportunities that are rarely given to any other man; because, from the union in him of so great courage, fortitude, experience, and prudence, he will be regarded by posterity in France as inferior only to the great warrior-statesman I have mentioned—I repeat, that I have the greatest confidence that under such auspices an amicable and mutually satisfactory arrangement may be effected. I can readily believe that, in the warmth and hurry of conflict, injuries may be inflicted for which, although unintentionally offered, it may become necessary to demand reparation. But what I want to know—and the time must come when we must know it, for the satisfaction of the people of England—is, what has actually taken place? My advice is, do not call for the information precipitately. Keep the question of the conduct of government entirely separate from the question of our relations with France. Avoid any thing which may wound the sensitive feelings of the French people; do not be too hasty in demanding acknowledgments which may preclude the possibility of a satisfactory arrangement; but this we must know—what steps have government taken in order to set this question in a light perfectly satisfactory? It appears, that the officer in command of the packet offered no resistance to the proceeding of the French captain. I do not mean to assert, that the officer should have made any such chivalrous and romantic resistance as would have risked the lives of his men for the purpose of protecting the pilot. But it was clear, that the French had no right to remove the pilot; and the officer ought, at least, to have made a strong remonstrance. He ought to have said, “To superior force I will yield, but to nothing but superior force. I stand upon the deck overpowered; you may take the pilot; I will not offer a resistance that I know must be fruitless; I will not peril the lives of my gallant crew, and run the chance of being sunk if I fire at you; but I surrender to superior force, and I strike my flag.” We must know, pursued the right hon. baronet, if we stand upon that footing; we must also know, how it happens that the admiral in command failed to give a direct and immediate account of a transaction so important. This occurrence took place on the 4th of December; this is the 11th of March, and yet we are imperfectly informed on the whole transaction. We must know what were the feelings entertained by a British officer in command, that could prevent him from immediately communicating with the Admiralty, and giving the fullest explanation. He knew, the right hon. baronet proceeded, the Admiralty must be aware of all the circumstances of the transaction, but he, for one, would forbear to call for them at the present moment, because he wished to throw no difficulty in the way of a settlement. Of course, the moment that Lieutenant Croke landed on the British shore, he was at the command of the Admiralty. The Admiralty could not mean to say, that because that officer wrote a letter to some consul, or other authority, which reached them through a third channel, they should remain inactive on his landing, without directing his immediate appearance before them, and requiring from him a full and sufficient account of the affair. They must see also what was the nature of the apology stated to have been made to the British admiral. He took it for granted that such an apology had been given, and he trusted it had been satisfactory. He hoped that, if for no other purpose, yet for that of preventing the principles of international law from being unsettled by any rash or unwarrantable act, and for the prevention of the enormous evils which must ensue, if the British flag, or any other neutral flag, were not considered a safe protection to those who sailed under it, occupied, for instance, in delivering the ship from peril in their capacity of pilots, all the circumstances of this transaction would remain upon record. He had now brought his observations to a close. He had said before, that he would cordially aid the government in providing means for placing at our command a more efficient navy than we at present possessed: he would support any increase that government might propose in the estimates, with the object of widening, if he might so say, the foundations of our naval power, and securing a regular supply of ships to be built from time to time. As he had stated, he should neither withhold his assent to the present estimates, nor should he press for information at present on the topics to which he had referred. But the three topics on which he had risen, principally with a view of insisting, were, first, his complaint of the neglect displayed by government of the increasing demands for protection made at the present time by British commerce in every part of the world; secondly, he had put forth his defence of his own government for not bringing forward larger estimates; and, thirdly, he had stated the ground on which he had imputed misconduct to the board of Admiralty, that, with the votes they had taken, and the number of men, and of sail of the line they had at their disposal, they should have so far neglected British interests in South America, and especially on the coast of Mexico, as the information before the country, if it were true, warranted him in asserting. But he should wish to ask at some future period, if it were possible that San Juan d'Ulloa was taken on the 27th of November, and the attack on Vera Cruz was made on the 5th of December, but that the British fleet did not arrive in the offing until the 31st December, and that even when Vera Cruz was taken, that small fleet neglected to give due assistance to the British commercial interests in the place? He did think that the time would come when the country would require on these points a full explanation, as well as on that other point, of the insult which had been offered to the national flag, when (he could most sincerely say) he hoped to have the satisfaction to learn, that nothing had been omitted, on the part of the government, to provide for the interests of British commerce, and to exact reparation for the insult which had been offered to the honour of the navy.

CORN LAWS.

MARCH 15, 1839.

In the fourth night's debate on Mr. C. P. Villiers' motion, "That the House resolve itself into a committee of the whole House to take into consideration the Act 9 George IV., regulating the importation of foreign grain,—

SIR ROBERT PEEL spoke as follows:—Sir, as this is the fourth night of the debate upon the corn-laws, and as I do not intend to avail myself of those daily discussions upon collateral topics with which we have been threatened by the hon. gentleman, (the menace of which is infinitely more formidable to me than that of the physical force to which he has alluded,) I desire to take advantage of this opportunity to express my opinions upon this subject. The hon. gentleman, in the conclusion of his observations, deprecated unanimity upon this side of the House. He exhorted us not to exhibit to an admiring country, so extraordinary a contrast with his own side of the House, and especially with her Majesty's government. Now if the hon. gentleman had deprecated unanimity amongst the agricultural members, for fear that it might be inferred, that they were influenced by motives of self-interest, I could understand his exhortation to disunion; but that which he fears and deprecates, is not the harmonious action of a single and exclusive class, swayed by the same fears and motives; he evidently anticipates from the progress of this discussion, and from the preponderance of the argument, that the representatives of the agricultural, the commercial, and the manufacturing interests, out of deference to the opinions and feelings of their respective constituents, will unite in resistance to the repeal of the corn-laws, not in order to protect the special interests of one class of the community, but the general interests of the whole. There are two modes of arguing a question of this kind. The first, and that which is infinitely the most convenient to the speaker, and the most palatable to a popular assembly, is to avoid any reference to dry details and close reasoning, to seize on some weak point in the speech of an incautious adversary, or to make an appeal on some party ground to the excited feelings and passions of your audience. The other is calmly to review the arguments opposed to you which have been chiefly relied upon in debate, to assign to such as cannot be satisfactorily answered their proper weight, and to attempt to refute those which may admit of refutation. This latter is the course I mean to pursue, from deep conviction of the magnitude of the question, and respect for the interests involved in it; but in order to pursue it satisfactorily, I must claim that patience and attention, which I incur the risk of forfeiting by preferring arguments and details, dull and uninteresting in themselves, to more popular and exciting appeals. I wish to review generally the reasons that have been alleged for a repeal or material alteration of the corn-laws; not those only that have been relied on in the present discussion, but those also which, though apparently forgotten in this particular debate, were mainly insisted on at the commencement of corn-law agitation. Before these debates began, and previously to the commencement of this session, I inferred that the chief stress would be laid upon the decaying state of commerce and manufactures. When I found that agitation was determined on, that the board of delegates had been constituted, that appeals were made to physical force, that the aristocracy and the landed proprietors of the country were denounced to public vengeance by those portions of the press which are generally the advocates of the existing government, I thought that the depressed state of commerce and of manufactures, and the impoverished condition of the mechanic and artisan, would be brought prominently forward. But what has become in this debate of the depressed state of manufactures? Why have the delegates been forgotten? When the member for Kendal (Mr. G. W. Wood) stated on the first night of the session, that manufactures were recovering from depression, and that the general commerce of the country was in a sound and satisfactory state, he provoked the utmost indignation by the manly candour of his avowals. Was he right or was he wrong in his statements? If he was right, why has he been punished for his honesty? If he was wrong, why have not you exposed his error? The fact is, you know that he was right, and that official documents, since published, have confirmed his statements. You know there could have been no permanent advantage in his concealment of facts, which if withheld, those documents must shortly have exhibited. The displeasure which he has incurred, the punishment with which he has been visited, prove that he deprived the advocates for repeal of the argument on which they had mainly relied, when he publicly proclaimed, with the authority belonging to his name and station, that manufactures were rapidly reviving, and that commerce was in a satisfactory condition. The member for Kendal, holding the high office of president of the Chamber of Commerce for Manchester, disposed of the first allegation—namely, of present decay, and general distress—when he declared it to be his opinion, that the commerce of England is at the present moment in a most satisfactory condition—that he never recollected a period when the return to a state of healthy commerce and of comparative prosperity followed so rapidly a season of preceding depression; when he showed that the shipping interest of the country is now in a vigorous condition, and is rapidly extending; and that, comparing the exports of the principal objects of British manufacture in the year 1838, with the average of the four preceding years, there is an excess in favour of the former of £3,112,000 of declared value, being an increase of  $7\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. When it became necessary to abandon the first position, another was assumed. It was said—“True, the general amount of exports has increased, but the increase has taken place in respect to those articles which most nearly approach the raw material itself, for the production of which the least degree of manual skill and labour is required, and which constitute the elements of foreign manufactures, competing with, and injuring our own. The very increase, therefore, so far from being an indication of prosperity, is a sign of decay.”

The member for Manchester (Mr. Phillips) takes this view of the question, and assures us that there is ground for serious apprehension with respect to the future stability of our manufacturing and commercial superiority. I should attach the utmost importance to these apprehensions, if they were shewn to be well-founded. So intimate is the sympathy between the condition of agriculture and trade, so powerful and immediate is the force of their reciprocal action upon each other, that if the prosperity of trade be endangered, the narrowest and most exclusive advocate of the interests of agriculture cannot be blind to the consequence. But the member for Manchester should not demand from us implicit faith in mere predictions. He should explain the ground on which his apprehensions are founded. If they are fortified by argument, or official documents, they are entitled to the utmost respect; but prediction without argument, and apprehensions not sustained by official returns, cannot be considered conclusive. I place against the authority of the member for Manchester, high as it unquestionably is, this paper, entitled "Trade and Navigation," delivered within the last week, not called for by an advocate of the corn-laws, but presented by her Majesty's command. This paper, the most recent and most authentic document we have, does not corroborate the statement that our exports of those branches of manufacture into which skill and manual labour enter, are upon the decline. On the contrary, this paper exhibits a very rapid recovery from depression. It contains a comparative view of the exports of British produce and manufactures, and an account of the shipping employed in the foreign and coasting trade for the years 1837 and 1838. Now, in the year ending the 30th September 1837, the average price of corn was 56*s.* 5*d.* In the latter year, ending on the same day, it was 69*s.* 10*d.* We have, therefore, an advance in the price of subsistence, and whatever may be the tendency of such an advance, the immediate effect of it has not been to repress the elastic energy and buoyancy of manufacturing industry, so far as we can form a judgment from this return. The total declared value of exports in the two years respectively is as follows:—1837—£36,228,468.—1838—£43,338,839.

Let us now refer to the items of which this general aggregate is formed, for the purpose of inquiring how far the allegation is correct, that although the general result may appear to be favourable, it is in fact otherwise, on account of the relative increase of the export of those articles, which are rather the foundations for foreign manufactures, than the elaborate produce of our own.

In Woollen-yarn the export was .....	£333,098	£365,657
In Cotton-yarn.....	6,965,942	7,430,582
In Linen-yarn.....	479,000	655,000

exhibiting an increase no doubt in the export of articles into which labour and skill enter only in a slight degree.

But then the increase in Woollen manufactures, other than Yarn, was from £4,660,000 in 1837, to £5,792,000 in 1838.

In Cotton manufactures, from £13,640,000 in 1837, to £16,700,000 in 1838.

In Linen manufactures, from £2,133,000 in 1837, to £2,919,000 in 1838.

In Glass there was a decline from £477,000 in 1837, to £376,000 in 1838.

But in Silk manufactures there was an increase, from £503,000 in 1837, to £778,000 in 1838.

In Hardware and Cutlery, from £1,460,800 in 1837, to £1,507,000 in 1838.

In Earthenware, from £563,000 in 1837, to £670,000 in 1838.

Now, looking either at the general result, of an increase in our total exports, from £36,228,000 in 1837, to £43,338,000 in 1838, or at the increase in specific articles of export, can it be denied that such an instance of recovery from depression, coincident with an increase in the price of food, is a satisfactory indication that the foundations of our manufacturing superiority are not undermined by the rivalry of foreign powers, and at any rate, not undermined through the operation of the Corn-laws? It was said, on a former occasion, that a mere increase in the quantity of exported articles is no test of manufacturing prosperity; that the money value may have declined while the quantity has increased. Be it so;—but the calculations to which I have been referring, are calculations not of quantity but of money value. The same official paper contains an account of the shipping employed in the foreign and coasting trade in 1837, and 1838:—In the first year there were 18,113 vessels employed in the Foreign trade, of which, 12,252 were British vessels. "In the last year, 19,639, of which 12,890 were British."

Now for the next allegation. It was to this effect:—"All this may be true, but it has become necessary, in order to maintain the contest for manufacturing superiority with other nations, to make so large a reduction in the price of the exported article, that the home manufacture is carried on with scarcely any profitable return to those engaged in it. Compare the proportion which the declared value of our exports in late years has borne to the quantity, with the proportion which it bore in former years, and you will find that the value is almost stationary, or perhaps declining, while the quantity rapidly increased."

This was the position of Alderman Waithman, which he manfully maintained for several successive years, notwithstanding he could procure no support for it. We admit the fact, that the price of the exported article, in many branches of manufacture, has declined; but we deny that it follows, as a just inference from that fact, that profits have been proportionally affected. It is impossible to make this point more clear, or to quote higher authority upon it, than by referring to statements made, and evidence given by manufacturers of Manchester of the highest character. In the year 1830, a committee inquired into the state of the East India trade, and the policy of opening it to British enterprise. Mr. Birley, a former president of the Chamber of Commerce of Manchester, and Mr. Kennedy, were examined before that committee. Their object was to show the probability that there would be a great export of cotton twist to India, if the trade were opened; and a paper prepared by Mr. Lee of Manchester, from which the following is an extract, was produced for that purpose. "In the year 1782, cotton twist, by Sir R. Arkwright's invention, exceeded the cost of the raw material 20s. in the pound for what is called in the trade No. 60. It now exceeds it by the mule only 1s. 6d. per lb., and taking into account the depreciation in the value of money, it cannot be estimated at less than a reduction of from 20s. to 9d. per pound—an astonishing instance of skill and economy superadded to the great advancement in both previously made by Sir R. Arkwright."

Q. "Can you furnish the committee with a comparison of the cost of labour in producing yarns in England in 1812 and 1830?"

A. "I can. I have a statement showing it by the pound; and also the price of a continuous thread a mile long, in 1812 and 1830:

Price of cotton.		Price of labour.
2s.	10d.	1s. 6d.	1s. 0½d.

Cost of manufactured article per lb.

In 1830	.	.	.	.	.	1s. 10½d.

"Is it then a matter of surprise that the selling price of a manufactured article should be reduced, when there is a reduction of one hundred per cent. in the price of the raw material, and when, by the wonderful contrivances of mechanical ingenuity, the same manufactured article which in 1782 cost in labour twenty shillings the pound, in 1812 cost eighteenpence?"

"It may be said, that there was a difference in the price of labour between 1812 and 1830?—There was not—the price of labour, in Mr. Kennedy's calculations for the two periods, is the same."

He says,—“In 1812 and 1830 the wages of labour are estimated at twentypence per diem for every person employed, including men, women, and children. The reduction, therefore, in the cost of labour was not a reduction of wages.”

It has been observed in this debate, that British manufactured articles are selling in foreign markets for less than prime cost, and that foreign markets are overstocked. Hear Mr. Kennedy also on this point. He was asked—“Do not you know that English manufactures at the present instant in India are now selling below the prime cost?”

He replied—“There is not a market in the world which we do not sometimes overstock, but I always expect good to result from that.”

At the same time I do not deny, that considering the extent of competition, there may be a material reduction of the profits of manufacturers, and that the pressure of such reduction is severely felt by many of them who have small establishments and a limited command of capital. They contend to a disadvantage with those who can undersell them in consequence of the employment of large numbers of operatives, in new manufactories built on the most improved principles, and filled with the best machinery. The position of the small capitalist does not materially differ in principle (I trust it does in degree) from that of the hand-loom weavers, after the invention of the power-loom. But this disadvantage to the small manufacturer is not traceable to the Corn-laws. It is not caused by the reduction of profits. If the large capitalist could realise a profit of twenty per cent. instead of the present amount of his profits (small as it may be), he would equally avail himself of the advantage to which his capital and consequent command over both labour and machinery entitle him. But if profits are so unreasonably low, how does it happen that the number of new factories has greatly increased within the last few years, that the factory destroyed by accident is instantly replaced, and that new factories are constantly erected? The reason sometimes given, namely, that those who are already embarked in manufacturing speculations, find it necessary to extend their establishments for the purpose of increasing the scanty amount of profit, is not very satisfactory. It does not at any rate account for the building of new factories by new speculators. It is said indeed, that although new factories have been built, and old ones enlarged, this has not taken place very recently; nay, more, that many of the factories so built are at present either totally or partially closed. This was said especially in the case of Preston, I believe. Now I hold in my hand a letter from Preston, calculated to mitigate the apprehensions on this head, which former statements may have caused. This letter positively declares that only two mills, and those very small ones, have reduced the time of working; that the owner of one of these mills is a Corn-law delegate; and that the owners of both of them, finding no other persons prepared to follow their example, have wisely resolved to sail with the stream, and resume their accustomed labours. The last and the most important statement of the manufacturers was to this effect: "All this may be very true; the declared value of exports may have increased, more mills may have been built, yet the increased quantity of manufactured goods is produced in consequence of the reduction of the wages of the labourer, and of exacting from him a degree of labour which he is unable to bear." Now, I consider this statement, that the condition of the labourer has been rendered worse by the operation of the Corn-law, a most important one, and I have no hesitation in saying, that unless the existence of the Corn-law can be shown to be consistent, not only with the prosperity of agriculture and the maintenance of the landlord's interest, but also with the protection, and the maintenance of the general interests of the country, and especially with the improvement of the condition of the labouring class, the Corn-law is practically at an end. But let us look to those documents which contain evidence as to the general condition of the working classes, and do they, I ask, show that the condition of the poor in those towns where manufactures are chiefly carried on has been rendered worse, or their comforts curtailed? I do not allude to those peculiar cases of individual suffering which will always be found where there are such complicated relations of society as exist in England. It will ever be the case that there will be particular cases of distress and suffering calculated to awaken our deepest sympathy; but the argument from individual cases of privation is not conclusive. It admits, too, of easy application to agricultural distress in case the Corn-laws were repealed, and the poor soils thrown out of cultivation. We might adduce the case of the peasant advanced in life, attached to the spot of his birth, able and willing to labour, unfit for any other than rural occupations, banished from home, and forced to seek a scanty subsistence in a manufacturing town. We should look at general results, and though not altogether satisfactory, yet perhaps no better evidence as to general results can be had than the Reports of the Savings' Banks. You say that your object is, that the manufacturing class should not merely be enabled to provide themselves with the means of daily subsistence, but to lay by something for the future comfort of themselves and their families. A wise and benevolent object! Let us see whether it is altogether frustrated. First, take the case of Liverpool. I direct attention to Liverpool, because it is the port most extensively engaged in the export of manufactured goods, and would consequently immediately feel the effects of any decrease in manufacturing prosperity. I am fortunately enabled to institute a comparison between the first period of the operation of the Corn-laws and the latter period, and thus to ascertain if any injurious effects have been produced upon the population of that important town by those laws. I shall refer to the first four years which elapsed after the commencement of the present Corn-laws, and the four years last past.

During the first four years, namely, the years 1829, 1830, 1831, and 1832, commencing the 20th of November, 1828, and ending the 20th of November, 1832, the number of new accounts opened in the Liverpool Savings' Bank was, according to this statement . . .	1,300
The average amount of deposits . . .		£55,000	0 0
During the last four years, namely, 1835, 1836, 1837, 1838—commencing the 20th of November, 1834, and ending the 20th of November, 1838, the average number of new accounts opened was . . .	2,040
The average amount of deposits . . .		£80,000	0 0

Now, does this, I ask, indicate any decline in the condition of the population of Liverpool under the operation of this Corn-law? But I have not confined my inquiries to Liverpool. I was also enabled to produce to the House a comparison of the amount of deposits and the number of accounts in the town of Nottingham.

In the three months of November, December, and January, 1837-8, the amount of deposits in the savings' bank was . . .	£	s.	d.
And in the three months of November, December, and January, 1838-9, the amount of deposits was . . .	12,270	4	6
In the first-named period the amount paid out of the bank was . . .	13,211	0	0
And in the latter period the amount of deposits paid out of the bank was . . .	10,096	0	0
	9,392	0	0

Thus showing that, in the three months which I have quoted of the last year, there was an increase of £940 in the amount of the money paid into the savings' bank, and a decrease of £700 in the money which had been drawn out. I have a return from Leicester, another town extensively engaged in manufactures.

In the year ending November 20, 1837, the number of depositors in the Leicester Savings' Bank, whose balances were below £20, was . . .	794
And in the year ending the 20th of November, 1838, the number of depositors under £20, was . . .	916
The amount of sums deposited in 1837 was . . .	£ 9,843	0	0
And in 1838 . . .	10,742	0	0
The total number of depositors in the first year was . . .	1,682
And the number in the last year . . .	1,876

I have also made inquiries of a similar character with respect to Birmingham.
In Birmingham, during the three months of November, December, and January, 1837-8, the amount received at the savings' bank was . . .	£	s.	d.
And the amount paid out to depositors by the bank was . . .	12,297	15	4
In the three months—November, December, and January, 1838-9, the amount of deposits was . . .	9,907	13	2
And the amount paid by the bank to the depositors . . .	14,870	6	10
	8,554	5	4

Showing an increase of the deposits, and a decrease of the money paid out by the bank. Of course, I have not omitted from my inquiry the chief seats of the cotton manufacture—Glasgow and Manchester. Before I refer to the report of the savings' bank at Glasgow, let me pause a moment, to contemplate the wonderful increase in the population and wealth of that great city—an increase, coincident with the operation of those laws which have given protection to domestic agriculture. In 1812 the population of Glasgow amounted to 103,743. The harbour dues received were £4,800. In 1838 the population amounted to 262,000. The harbour dues to £40,260. The increase in the consumption of coal is a still more striking indication of increasing industry, and productive power. In 1831, that is, shortly after the present Corn-laws came into operation, the consumption of coal in Glasgow, was calculated at 561,000 tons. In 1838, the Corn-laws having been in force during the whole interval, having exercised whatever of prejudicial influence they can exercise upon the enterprise and industry of Glasgow, the consumption of coal in the short space of seven years was more than doubled, amounting to no less than 1,200,000 tons. But to return to the savings' banks; the report from which I quote is the third report of the National Savings' Bank of Glasgow, made on the 22nd of February, 1839. It contains a comparative account of the state of the savings' bank in the two years ending 20th of November, 1837 and 1838 respectively.

In the first year the number of new entrants was	3,711
In the second year	4,694
In the first year the amount of deposits was	£48,193
In the second	75,798

In the first year, the number of depositors from the class of mechanics and artificers was 1,905. In the second, from the same class, 3,119. In the first year, from the class of factory operatives, there were 3,824 depositors. In the second, 6,342. In the first year, the average of the balances of individual depositors below £20, was £5:15:5. The average of the second year £5:17:11, the increase being only 2s. 6d. But how is this small increase in the average accounted for? "The great number of new entrants," says the report, "upon very small weekly deposits, is the true and gratifying reason of the apparently slow advancement in the money average of that welcome and deserving class 'not exceeding £20,' for whose benefit—from steady perseverance and provident habits—the savings' bank was especially intended." The last report of savings' banks to which I shall refer, is that of Manchester and Salford. The report was made on 4th of January, 1839. Among the vice-presidents and trustees of the institution for the present year are—

Right Hon. C. P. Thomson, M.P.	Geo. Wm. Wood, Esq., M.P.
Mark Phillips, Esq., M.P.	Jos. Brotherton, Esq., M.P.

The report observes:—"In submitting to the public their twenty-first annual report, the committee feel great pleasure in drawing attention to the gratifying result of their transactions with depositors during the past year. Since their last report, 3,346 new accounts have been opened, 20,453 deposits made, and £109,123:13:3½ deposited; showing an increase in the business unprecedented in the experience of the institution, the repayments to depositors being proportionally decreased. The difference this year, as compared with the last, is £42,697:16:11½ in favour of depositors, and the number of open accounts being now 11,862, shews an increase in them of 1,617."

The prospects of the future are still brighter. The report continues:—"Notwithstanding this so far most satisfactory progress, the population of Manchester and its neighbourhood affords scope for a much greater extension."

It must have been about the time that this report was in preparation, while the manager and officers of the institution were congratulating themselves on the present success of the savings' bank, and on the hope of its rapid extension, and were thus bearing public testimony to the improved condition of the manufacturing classes in Manchester and Salford; that in those very towns commenced the system of agitation which has received the sanction of the President of the Board of Trade. Then it was that the delegates were appointed, and meetings organized, and lectures to the labouring classes prepared, for the purpose of stirring up impatience and indignation with the Corn-laws, as the main causes of whatever evils they were exposed to. Then it was that those organs of public intelligence, which most strenuously support her Majesty's government, were denouncing the aristocracy and the landed proprietors as selfish tyrants, fattening on the labour and sufferings of the exhausted poor, and provoking (if other means should fail) the resort to physical force. True it is, the attempt at agitation has failed, not from the returning moderation and good sense of its authors, but because their allegations of manufacturing distress and decaying commerce were contradicted by the member for Kendal, and by the official returns: and, above all, because they found themselves utterly powerless to guide the tempest which they were able to raise. They soon discovered that agitation could not be restricted within the limits they would assign it—that it could not be directed exclusively against the proprietors of land—that the confederates, on whom they relied, would turn upon their leaders and tell them, whether truly or not I will not pretend to determine, "You who profess hostility to the landlords and aristocracy of the country—who impute to those classes of the community selfish motives—who attribute to them the desire to secure their own profits and to grind the poor—we will be no parties to your agitation—we will not lend ourselves to your schemes—we know that your only object is to increase the profits of the cotton spinner, and by lowering the price of corn, to lower at the same time the rate of wages." I abominate as much as any man the doctrines mixed up with opposition to the delegates and their projects; but, at the same time, it may be a salutary lesson to those who commence agitation, to find that the first to suffer by the lessons they have taught, are the agitators themselves. I here close the remarks I have to make with regard to the allegations of manufacturing distress, and shall proceed to review the main arguments relied on in the course of the present debate in favour of repeal or alteration of the Corn-laws. First, let us consider what these condemned Corn-laws have actually done. In the nine years intervening between the 30th of September, 1830, and the 30th of September 1838, the average price of wheat has been fifty-four shillings per quarter. Is this an unreasonably high price, compared with former periods, not of war, when the price of corn may have been raised by causes connected with war, but periods of peace?

The average price of the nine years preceeding the war of 1793, was fifty-one shillings. The mere price of corn either in the same country at different periods, or in different countries at the same period, is no satisfactory test either of comparative prosperity, or of the condition of the labouring classes. There might be much greater general prosperity, and much greater individual comfort under high nominal prices than under low. The year 1763, for instance, when the peace of Paris was concluded, is mentioned by writers upon the commerce and manufactures of this country, as the period at which its productive industry started into new life and energy, and began the glorious career which it was destined to run. Now let us compare the decennial prices of corn previously to 1763, with the decennial prices afterwards, and it will be seen that it is possible that manufactures may flourish, and the condition of the labouring classes improve, and yet the price of corn be on the increase at home, and also be higher in this country than in other countries. The inference is good for this, to disprove the assertion that cheap bread will necessarily benefit the working classes, and necessarily improve trade.

Showing a very considerable advance in the price of wheat in the periods of general ease and prosperity. I have remarked that the average price of corn for nine years, ending September 1838, during the prevalence of ordinary seasons, was not more than fifty-four shillings per quarter. It is said, however, that there was during that period great fluctuation in the price, that wheat was seventy-six shillings a quarter at one time, and thirty-six shillings at another, and again, seventy-five shillings and sixpence at a third. This is true; but such variations are, and will continue to be, the inevitable concomitants of variations in the supply, dependent mainly upon the influence of season; and it ought not to be forgotten that the weekly averages show that the fall from the highest point to the lowest, and the ascent again from the lowest, was as gradual as it was possible to be under any system of Corn-laws. So much for ordinary seasons. After the autumn of 1838 the Corn-law is submitted to a new trial—the harvest having been a failing one, and there being a necessity for a large import of foreign corn. The imports of the years immediately preceding had been very limited. Our wants having been almost entirely supplied from our own produce, we had not encouraged the cultivation of foreign corn by regular periodical demands. But when the time of pressure arrived, was there any serious difficulty in procuring the requisite supply? Is it not the fact, that, without any interference on the part of the legislature or the government, by the silent unaided operation of the existing Corn-laws, the ports were opened to foreign grain, free of duty, and that two millions of quarters of foreign wheat have been available for our consumption? What has been the effect of restrictions on the import of foreign corn upon the agriculture of Ireland? In 1807, the number of quarters imported into this country from Ireland was 463,000. In that year, the markets of this country were opened, without restriction, to Irish corn. In 1830, the quantity of corn imported from Ireland was 2,215,000 quarters. In 1838, 3,474,000. With such facts before us, how the import of foreign corn is to be beneficial to Ireland, or to facilitate the establishment of manufactures in that country, I cannot comprehend. I shall now proceed to state—I hope fairly to state, the general outline and substance of the arguments mainly relied on by the speakers in favour of a change in the present law, who have preceded me. If I omit any important argument, the omission is not intentional. The following appears to me a fair summary of those arguments: That the Corn-laws have a tendency, by raising the price of corn at home, to encourage the manufacturing industry of rival nations, and to deteriorate the condition of the working classes at home; that by preventing a regular and certain demand for foreign corn, they derange commercial dealings and diminish the chance of adequate foreign supply at the period of its greatest necessity, caused by the failure of our own produce; that by the suddenness of the demand for foreign corn when the pressure does arise, it becomes necessary to send bullion in exchange for corn instead of manufactures, and thus to incur the risk of derangement of the currency, if not of a stoppage of payments by the bank; that the present Corn-laws tend to aggravate the opposite evils of a too abundant and of a deficient domestic supply, and that they have totally failed to realize the object for which, according to Mr. Canning, they were specially intended, and which he predicted they would fulfil, namely, to ensure moderation and steadiness of prices. These are, I believe, the main objections to the present Corn-laws relied on by our opponents. In addition to arguments against these laws, they have the candour also to furnish us with predictions as to the happy consequences which will follow their repeal, predictions which might carry with them some authority, if unfortunately the results which they profess to foresee, were not exactly of an opposite character. That I may avoid all risk of misrepresentation, I will quote the very words in which the prophecies were conveyed. I begin with the Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Clay). He told us that “other of our chief articles of import, such as sugar, spices, tobacco, tea, wine, are objects of luxury, rather than of necessity—they are the produce likewise of limited portions of the globe, and those mostly distant from our shores; corn, on the contrary, forming the staple of human subsistence, there is scarcely any limit to the demand—if it were at a price within the reach of the labouring classes, and a great demand for our manufactures and full employment consequently afforded them the means of purchase. How wide too, were the regions, how vast the population, with which a free trade in corn would permit us to maintain a beneficial intercourse! There were few climates in which corn could not be produced, whilst it was almost the only staple which could be offered to us in exchange by countries, the vicinity of which would render commercial intercourse the most beneficial, and with which it was most important to us to preserve friendly relations. Almost the whole of central and northern Europe, by soil and climate, was fitted for the production of corn; throughout the wide regions watered by the Elbe, the Weser, and the Vistula, corn may be grown with advantage, and would be grown for our use, if we would permit its importation.” Here then would appear to be a boundless prospect of foreign supply. But what chance would domestic agriculture have of competing with these happy regions? Who would employ capital on domestic improvement when it could be transferred with such profit to fertilize the rich wastes of central and northern Europe? There we are told land pays scarcely any rent, labour is at the rate of five pence a day. Steam is diminishing every hour the distances which separate nations, and skill and machinery will stimulate to an increase of a hundred fold the natural capabilities of a neglected but most fertile soil. All this may be consolatory enough to the manufacturer, but it should be whispered into his ear exclusively, for it is calculated to fill with dismay the proprietor and occupier of land at home. For them, however, there are more encouraging predictions, and, fortunately, from higher authority. Without disparaging that of the member for the Tower Hamlets, still, from his position, from his avocation, from the habitual caution of his nature, and unwillingness to pronounce opinions not founded on the strictest inquiry, and maturest consideration, the member for the city of London (Mr. Grote) is entitled to superior consideration. In the same ratio in which the city of London stands to the Tower Hamlets, is the authority of their respective representatives on the subject of the Corn-laws. And what says Mr. Grote? "I have taken some pains to acquaint myself with the prices of foreign corn, and with the quantities which might be obtained at those prices; for these two circumstances ought on no account to be separated in looking at the question of the foreign corn trade." Mr. Grote then proceeds to explain the grounds on which his conclusions are founded, by reference to the prices of wheat at Dantzic and Odessa, and observes: "It will be seen, therefore, that in estimating the probable import price under a free trade, assuming 1,000,000 quarters, at 45s., I make a large allowance for improvement and extension of culture in foreign lands. It is my impression, that under a perfectly free trade in corn, a quantity of about 1,000,000 quarters would be supplied from abroad in ordinary years out of the 15,000,000 quarters which we habitually consume in these islands; and that this supply would come at a price of about 45s." If any confirmation were required to the views of the member for the city of London, it is supplied by the member for Sheffield (Mr. Ward). He observes: "What had the agriculturist to fear? When it was considered that wheat was a very bulky article, that but a very small proportion of it comparatively, on an average not more than 250 quarters, could be brought in one vessel, that the range of the exporting countries was very small, he could not understand what the agricultural interest had to apprehend from a change, which, besides, could not be brought into full operation till after a long series of years. Which were the exporting countries? France with a population of thirty millions, and a bad system of agriculture, arising greatly out of a too minute subdivision of land, could never be an exporting country to any considerable extent. Spain, and the other southern countries of Europe, from want of internal communications and other circumstances, could not for a very long period, if at all, export a very large quantity of wheat. From Belgium and Holland we had nothing to fear. Sweden and Norway did not grow sufficient for their own consumption. Coming to Russia and the Baltic, what were the facts? The largest exports from the Baltic in those excellent years, 1802, 1810, and 1818, with the price at Danzig at 64s. 11d., never exceeded 680,000 quarters." Mr. Ward gives the price of corn at Berlin, Dantzic, and other places, and the quantities exported to England at various periods, and remarks: "Corn was cheaper, no doubt, at Odessa; but the amount of conveyance thence would be three times greater than in the other case; for, besides the freight, there would be the probable damage of much corn in the transit, not to mention that, even at Odessa, it was impossible to say what the price would be raised to, when the enormous amount of English demand came into the market there, where the supply was comparatively so limited. Besides, they had no stock, no farming implements, no manures, no well devised plan of cultivation, and a very small population." Now I am content to argue the question upon your positions and upon your statement of facts. The agriculturists, you say, need be under no apprehensions from foreign imports. The Baltic is almost the only source of supply. The total quantity of foreign wheat which can be imported with a free trade in corn will not exceed one million of quarters, and the price per quarter will be forty-five shillings. Why, if this be so, what shameful exaggerations must there have been of the pressure and evils of the present Corn-laws? How perfectly baseless must be the anticipations, that there will be a boundless demand for our manufactures in exchange for foreign corn, if the Corn-laws were repealed! Within the last eight or nine years, we have actually imported from foreign countries not less on an average than 750,000 quarters of wheat per annum, and is it credible that the regular future demand for one million of quarters, that is, 250,000 quarters in addition to the past supply, will produce these enormous benefits? Will it again gravely be maintained that the Corn-laws impose a tax of eighteen or twenty millions on the people of this country, when all we are to hope for from their repeal, is an addition of 250,000 quarters to our imports of foreign wheat; the sole difference consisting in a regular, instead of a casual and occasional demand for this supply? Is this to raise the price on the continent to the level of prices at home? Is this to make a total revolution in the manufacturing industry of the continent, and to restore our pre-eminence by the destruction of foreign competition? Is the import of a little more wheat from the Baltic, to impede the progress in manufactures of France, Belgium, and Switzerland, not one of which countries, as we are told, is to increase their demand for our commodities by the export of corn? If Saxony can really undersell us in hosiery by 25 per cent., will so slight a cause restore the balance? What influence will the additional import of Baltic wheat have on the United States, our most formidable competitor, so far as the manufacture of cotton is concerned? The increase in the consumption of cotton for the purpose of manufacture since the year 1826, has been estimated at

In France	40 per cent.
In Europe, (exclusive of France)	100 per cent.
In the United States	160 per cent.
In Great Britain	129 per cent.

Can it be believed, looking at the present extent of our dealings in raw produce with the United States, that the import of a small additional quantity of corn will sensibly affect the relative position of the two countries, in respect to home manufacture? You taunt me with rejoicing in the successful prosecution of manufactures by other powers. I do not rejoice in it—I merely contend that it is the inevitable consequence of the return to peace, and the continuance of peace for nearly a quarter of a century. I do not participate in your surprise that a country like the United States, with the raw material at hand, as population increases, as towns and cities multiply, and as fertile land, easily accessible, becomes more scarce, should apply herself to the production of certain articles of manufacture. Your surprise reminds me of the Birmingham manufacturer, who prophesied, on the breaking out of war with England, that the crops of the United States would be devoured by vermin, because she had been supplied from Birmingham with mouse-traps, and had not skill enough to manufacture a mouse-trap at home. I will now consider the objection urged against the present laws in respect to the fluctuation of the price of corn in the home market. A speech of Mr. Canning has been quoted, in which he stated, that the great object of the shifting scale of duties was, to ensure steady prices, and expressed a confident hope that the prices of wheat would not vary more than from fifty-five to sixty-five shillings a quarter. The result has proved that it was unwise in Mr. Canning to attempt to prescribe exact limits to the range of variation; but it has not proved that either free trade, or a fixed duty would ensure a greater steadiness of price in an article so dependent upon the seasons as corn. Mr. Tooke, in his excellent treatise “On Prices,” discusses the remarkable variations in the price of corn during a series of years, and mainly attributes the rise and fall of the price to the abundance or deficiency of supply caused by favourable or unfavourable seasons. Mr. Tooke shows that a similarity of seasons prevails throughout a large portion of the world, and that countries within the same degree of latitude are visited with nearly the same vicissitudes of prosperity and failure with respect to agricultural supply. He relies not only on his own authority, but on that of Adam Smith, of Mr. Burke, and of Mr. Lowe for the fact. Adam Smith, speaking of the high price of corn between 1765 and 1776, attributes it to “the effect of unfavourable seasons throughout the greater part of Europe,” and expressly says that a long course of bad seasons, though not a very common event, is by no means a singular one. Mr. Tooke says, that there can be no reasonable doubt that bad seasons prevailed here, and, in a still greater degree, throughout the rest of Europe, in the interval between 1765 and 1776, and quotes the valuable works of Mr. Lowe, on the present state of England to the following effect. "The public, particularly the untravelling part of the public, are hardly aware of the similarity of temperature prevailing through what may be called the corn country of Europe: we mean Great Britain, Ireland, the north of France, the Netherlands, Denmark, the north-west and north-east of Germany, and, in some measure, Poland. All this part is situated between 45 and 55 degrees of latitude, and subject, in a considerable degree, to the prevalence of similar winds." Mr Lowe remarks on the similarity of seasons in England and continental Europe, in several recent years which he names, in 1794, in 1798, in 1799. He says:—"In 1811 the harvest was deficient throughout the north-west of Europe, from one and the same cause, namely, blight, while that of 1816 was still more generally deficient from rain, and want of warmth." Now, if you are right in maintaining that the shores of the Baltic will afford our chief supply, and if, in reliance on that supply, we diminish materially the production of corn at home, the misfortune of a generally deficient harvest may involve us in the greatest peril. In ordinary seasons, we may safely trust to a regular supply from abroad, and the discouragement of home production may not be seriously felt—but if the common calamity should arrive (and Mr. Tooke and the highest authorities show that it ought to be foreseen), that we may have cause bitterly to repent our loss of independence, and to find that the encouragement we have given to home production, by restrictive duties, was a provident insurance against the dangers of famine. It will not be the hostility, it will not be the caprice of foreign nations, that will withhold from us the usual supply; but the paramount duty they owe to their own people will induce them, in the moment of real pressure, to take the very step which France and other countries of Europe have actually taken within the last six months, and interdict the exportation of grain. Should that event occur, it is possible that the wealth of England may command a considerable supply, but in proportion to the deficiency at home, in proportion to the suddenness of the demand, must be our exertions. According to your statements our chief dealings will be confined to the Baltic; Odessa and the United States are too distant to permit any regular import. We shall not then have encouraged, by our dealings with distant States in ordinary seasons, any superfluous supply, to be available in the moment of need. Should the corn-growing countries of the Baltic be visited, at the same time with ourselves, with a deficient harvest, we shall have to export bullion for the purchase of corn wherever we can find it, and thus encounter that very risk of deranging the money market, and suspending payments in cash, which you consider the peculiar defect of the present law. The more you increase your dependence on foreign supply, the more, as it appears to me, do you increase, in the event of severe and general pressure, the risk of a momentary derangement. I have been referring to the authority of Mr. Tooke, mainly for the purpose of shewing that the present Corn-law ought not to be condemned because it has not ensured steadiness of price; for, that under any system of law, in respect to an article so dependent as corn is upon the variability of seasons, to an article, of which the supply cannot be suddenly limited, or extended (as it may be in the case of manufactures) in proportion to the demand, there must be unavoidably great fluctuations of price. The case of wool has been referred to by the President of the Board of Trade, and by the Secretary at War (Lord Howick), as an example of the benefit to be expected from subjecting corn to similar regulations in respect to import. They are quite triumphant on the discovery, that since a fixed and very low duty was imposed upon the import of foreign wool, the price of wool in the home market has increased. But they never told us whether the price of wool had been more steady. Now, what is the fact? From 1819 to the end of 1824, there was a duty of sixpence per pound on foreign wool. From the 10th December, 1824 foreign wool has been importable without restriction, at a fixed duty of one penny per pound. Has the removal of protection increased the steadiness of price? Just the reverse—I quote the following list of prices from a letter from Mr. Ellman, one of the highest authorities on the subject of wool, being the prices at which he disposed of his own wool, the best Southdowns, in a succession of years, before and after the reduction of the duty on foreign wool, from sixpence to one penny per pound. Price of Southdown wool,

Duty on foreign wool, being 1d. per lb.

Now, during the period above-mentioned, the import of foreign wool has increased from four or five millions to nearly forty millions of pounds, the sources of our supply have been greatly extended, trade has been perfectly free, duties almost nominal, and yet the price of wool in the home market, which was steady under the restrictive system, has been subject to very great fluctuation since its abandonment. If the argument from wool be at all applicable to corn—if the same result may be expected in the case of corn that has actually followed in the case of wool, what will be the consequence from a low fixed duty on foreign corn? Corn will be dearer in the home market, and the prices more unsteady. Is this the promised benefit to manufacturers on the one hand, and agriculturists on the other? A fixed duty on foreign corn will give you dearer bread and more unsteady prices. As a substitute for the existing laws we have two counter-proposals: the one for a repeal of all prohibitory duties—the other for the imposition of a fixed, in lieu of a fluctuating, scale of duty. The first recommended by the member for Wolverhampton, the second by the President of the Board of Trade, and the members of her Majesty's government in this House.

Let us first consider the proposal of simple repeal. The member for Wolverhampton says, that this is exclusively a landlord's question, that the landlord's interests are the only interests affected by it, that to the tenant it is a matter of indifference. He says the dealing in land, is like the dealing in any other commodity, the sale of a horse, or the sale of any retail article: that the landlord is a seller, the tenant a purchaser, with the free option for each to accept or reject the offer that may be made. But in the very same speech in which this position was maintained, there was a description of the farmer which seemed to exempt him from the ordinary condition of a perfectly voluntary agent and free purchaser. In that speech we were told that the farmers were a prejudiced body of men;—men strongly attached to localities, and withal very ignorant. [Mr. Villiers—I said they had not much education.] Men who in dealing might be taken easy advantage of. The hon. gentleman has not had much dealing with farmers, or he would not say that. Men of no intelligence. [Mr. Villiers—I did not say that.] Well, of little education—not men of business—much attached to localities—unable to transfer themselves and their capital to other pursuits. Why, that is what I rely on as constituting the distinction between dealing in land and purchasing an ordinary article. We are considering the interests of a class which, according to your own showing, consists of men without much education, not men of business, greatly attached to localities, apt to make engagements which are very unwise, and willing to agree to any terms which landlords may propose. Now, surely, if this be true, the present generation of farmers have a very deep interest in the question of the Corn-laws. The interest of those who cultivate the land under lease is manifest enough. But has the tenant at all no interest? Fixed by habit and attachment to the place of his birth,—unfit for mercantile affairs—unable to transfer his capital to other pursuits; could he contemplate without dismay any material reduction in the value of agricultural produce, or any material change in the relation which he bears to other classes of society? Could his interests be so distinguished from the interests of his landlord, that the latter would be the exclusive sufferer by a repeal of the Corn-laws? You tell the farmer, this simple credulous man, that it is manifestly his interest, and that of all other classes of the community, to buy corn at the cheapest market. He says, he cannot enter into competition with the foreign grower, whose land is more fertile, who commands labour at one-third of the rate, and who is free from the incumbrances of public and local taxes to which he is subject. You reply to him, that because we bear one burthen, that is no reason we should bear another; no reason why, because we are taxed heavily to pay the public creditor, we should voluntarily undertake another burthen, by paying more for our bread. But, says the farmer, "Extend the same principle to every thing else as well as to corn. Don't make me the sole victim of this excellent doctrine. Let me grow my own tobacco—let me manufacture and consume my own malt. Look at every article I wear, from the sole of my shoe to the crown of my hat—every thing is taxed, and taxed for the purpose of protection to manufactures—my shoes, my buttons, my hat, my gloves, my silk handkerchief, my watch, every article of manufactured linen. Whatever I require for domestic use is taxed. Gold and silver plate, paper, china, clocks, thread, pots, wax, wire, every letter of the alphabet presents some article of domestic manufacture protected by taxation from foreign competition. If it be right to buy corn in the cheapest market, it is right to buy every thing else; and if the article I sell is to be exempt from protection, let the article I buy be exempt also." What answer have you for the farmer? Can you deny the justice of his appeal? Nay more, suppose the farmer asks you to begin with the manufacturer before you visit him, will his request be an irrational one? Suppose he says, "I am a man of little education, of limited views, not a man of business, little versed in the principles of political economy, and not very clearly comprehending the doctrine of free trade; spare me for the present, and make the first experiment on my neighbour the manufacturer. He is educated, intelligent, a man of business, not attached to localities, sees all the evils of restrictive duties, and is ready to waive the advantage of protection. I the more earnestly implore you to deal first with the manufacturer, for I greatly fear, if you begin with me, that you will discover hereafter, that the principles of free trade, though applicable to corn, are not applicable to manufacturers, that there are insurmountable difficulties in discriminating between duties for protection and duties for revenue, and that you will finally tell me, that the welfare of manufactures and of agriculture is inseparably united, and that it will be for the manifest advantage of agriculture, that the protecting duties on domestic manufactures should not be hastily withdrawn." These apprehensions, if so urged by the farmer, are clearly not without foundation; for no less an authority than the Prime Minister has declared, that that man must be insane, must be actually a madman, who would propose in the present condition of this country the abolition of all protective duties, and the practical enforcement of the principles of free trade. Free trade in corn, however, is not the sole alternative. Her Majesty's ministers prefer a fixed duty either to the fluctuating scale, or to the simple repeal of the Corn-laws. Now every argument against protection to home produce, such for instance as the policy of buying corn in the cheapest market, and the folly of adding to the incumbrance of the public debt, another incumbrance in the shape of a tax upon corn, applies in principle with equal force to the fixed as to the fluctuating duty. The conflict between the advocates for free trade, and the advocates for fixed duty, will commence the very moment they have apparently triumphed over us. But what avails it to profess yourselves advocates for a fixed duty, unless you have determined on its amount? How easy it is for any noble lord or hon. member to say,—"I am opposed to the total repeal of the Corn-laws—I am opposed to the present laws—but I am in favour of a fixed duty?" What advance do we make towards a settlement of this great question by this vague declaration? What advance can we make unless the amount of that fixed duty be stated? And yet we are called upon to go into committee in complete ignorance of the views of the advocates for fixed duty—in the hope, I suppose, that under the guidance of Mr. Bernal, we shall be inspired with that sagacity which is denied to us while the Speaker is in the Chair. If her Majesty's government have made up their mind to the imposition of a fixed duty, why do they not state the amount of it to the House? Why do they not explain the principle and the calculations upon which it is to be founded? You invite us (addressing the Treasury Bench) to go into committee on the application of an hon. member, to whose views you are altogether opposed. The President of the Board of Trade, who I presume to be your organ on this occasion, says, "Let us go into committee, and we shall have so many various plans, that we cannot fail to find one which will suit us. "The smallest contribution will be thankfully received." Was it ever known on such an important question as this, one so engrossing to the public mind, so exciting to a large class of the population of the country, that a government should propose to us to go into committee, rejecting the opinions of the member who proposes it—and withholding from us the slightest indication of the course they mean to take in that committee? I could have understood them had they said, "This question is of paramount importance, and it must be settled; we therefore come on the authority of a united cabinet, and settle it we will." I could have understood them, if, on the other hand, they had declared, that there was no prospect of the settlement of the present question, that they looked upon continued agitation on the Corn-laws to be a great national evil, that it was their wish to calm rather than disturb the country, and that they would not therefore enter into a fishing committee, that they would not bait with delusion, in the hope of catching a Corn-bill. This course, also, I could have understood; but the course taken by the government is inconsistent with its duty and authority; it prolongs agitation without affording the prospect of settlement. No doubt a committee on the Corn-laws is a necessary form, before any practical measure could be proceeded with. But it is a mere form. Whoever advises it, should have made some advance towards the solution of the great difficulties which environ the consideration of the question. What is the amount of fixed protecting duty to which the agriculture of this country is entitled? He must have revolved in his mind, whether on the same principle on which a protecting duty on import is imposed—there ought not to be a corresponding drawback on the export of British corn—not a bounty—but a drawback, equivalent to those special burdens upon agriculture, to countervail which the import duty would be imposed. He must well have considered, whether the indiscriminate admission of foreign corn at a fixed duty, to be determined irrevocably beforehand, might not, in very productive seasons at home and abroad, pour into our markets such a glut of foreign produce, as completely to derange all agricultural speculations. Above all he must have considered, how the fixed duty is to be maintained in the seasons of deficient supply, and threatened famine—whether it is to be enforced at all hazards—whether it is to be relaxed under certain circumstances, and if so, by what authority, and on what conditions it shall be relaxed, and, after relaxation, reimposed. But these are considerations, if not subordinate, still subsequent to the fixing of the amount of the fixed duty. By what rule shall that amount be determined? I have read all that has been written by the gravest authorities on political economy on the subject of rent, wages, taxes, tithes, the various elements, in short, which constitute or affect the price of agricultural produce. Far be it from me to depreciate that noble science which is conversant with the laws that regulate the production of wealth, and seeks to make human industry most conducive to human comfort and enjoyment. But I must, at the same time, confess, with all respect for that science and its brightest luminaries, that they have failed to throw light on the obscure and intricate question of the nature and amount of those special burdens upon agriculture which entitle it to protection from foreign competition; and I not only do not find in their lucubrations any solution of the difficulties, but I find the difficulties greatly increased by the conflict of authorities. After reading Adam Smith's doctrine concerning the rent of land, I find that Mr. Ricardo pronounces it erroneous, and that he totally differs from Adam Smith, as to rent forming one of the component parts of the price of raw produce. Adam Smith thinks, that the value of gold estimated in corn will be highest in rich countries; Mr. Ricardo, on the other hand, that it will be low in rich, and high in poor countries. Mr. McCulloch discusses the question whether there are any peculiar burdens on agriculture. He observes that tithes, land tax, poor and other rates, are said to be such; and says as to tithes:—"Two different opinions have been advanced. Dr. Smith contends, that tithes are paid out of rent, and have no influence on the price of corn. Mr. Ricardo contends, that the amount of tithe occasions an equivalent rise in the price of corn."

Mr. McCulloch declares, that neither the one opinion nor the other is perfectly correct. I turn to the acute and valuable work of Colonel Torrens, treating expressly on the foreign corn trade, and the protection of home produce, and hope to find some reconciliation of the differences of those who had preceded him—some preponderance, at least, of agreement which may lead to a safe conclusion. But, alas! I learn from Colonel Torrens, "That Adam Smith is fundamentally wrong in stating that corn has a real value which is always equal to the quantity of labour which it can maintain."

Perhaps Colonel Torrens harmonises with the French economists. Far from it. He says:—"That the doctrine of the French economists, as to the degree in which the cost of food influences the value of the manufactured article, is fundamentally erroneous, and cannot, in any possible state, be conformable to fact."

Does he concur with Mr. Ricardo, or Mr. M'Culloch, or Mr. Malthus? Quite the reverse. He says:—"Mr. Ricardo and his followers are quite wrong as to the doctrine of rent. That it is self-evident that Mr. M'Culloch cannot be right, in the opinion that the value of the farmer's capital rises in the same proportion with the value of the raw produce he brings to market. Not content with one refutation, he gives a second of the doctrine of Mr. Malthus, that the labourer is benefited by the high value of the articles composing wages."

The very heads of Colonel Torrens's chapters are enough to fill with dismay the bewildered inquirer after truth. They are literally these:—

"Erroneous views of Adam Smith respecting the value of corn.

"Erroneous doctrine of the French economists respecting the value of raw produce.

"Errors of Mr. Ricardo and his followers on the subject of rent.

"Error of Mr. Malthus respecting the nature of rent.

"Refutation of the doctrines of Mr. Malthus respecting the wages of labour."

Perplexed by these conflicting authorities, finding, as we proceed, our path more intricate and obscure, we turn for relief to her Majesty's government in the hope that from the eminence on which they are placed they will be able, by their superior sagacity, to illuminate the darkness and unravel the intricacies of our ways. But we turn in vain. They give us no comfortable assurances. The light they have, if any there be, they studiously withhold from us. They invite us to follow them, and yet they are the very men who have warned us to distrust the guides to whom they would commit us. Can we forget the letter of the noble lord (Lord John Russell), addressed to his constituents, cautioning them against the party—"Who wish to substitute the corn of Poland and Russia for our own; who care not for the difference between an agricultural and manufacturing population, in all that concerns morals, order, national strength, and national tranquillity; with whom wealth is the only object of speculation, and who have no more sensibility for the sufferings of a people than a general has for the loss of men wearied by his operations."

The noble lord admits the letter, but claims for himself the privilege of changing his opinion. I concede it to him in the fullest extent; but then the noble lord always contrives to leave upon record so terse, so epigrammatic, so admirable a vindication of his old opinions, that he makes it difficult for his admirers to follow him at once into the adoption of the new ones. The noble lord in his speech last night referred to an anecdote told of the great ornament of English art (Sir Joshua Reynolds), who, after reviewing the productions of his earlier years, turned away from them with a candid expression of disappointment, that as life advanced, he had improved upon them in so slight a degree; and the noble lord congratulated himself that he should escape, by timely change of opinion, the mortification of a similar avowal. Now the lapse of time may have given to the noble lord more comprehensive views as a statesman, it may have matured his powers as a debater—but his lot as a painter is unquestionably the same with that of the great head of his profession. The graphic fidelity of his earlier sketches will never be surpassed, and when he reviews the gallery in which they are arranged he must turn away from the contemplation of them with the mortifying confession that the pencil of his maturer years has produced nothing to compare with them. Whatever be the department of art which he has selected, whether historical, when he vindicates the revolution of 1688, and justifies the Somerses and the Russells for their hatred of papal intrigue and influence—whether fanciful, when in defence of Old Sarum he likens the reformer to the foolish servant in the story of Aladdin, who deceived by the cry of "new lamps for old," exchanged the "old lamp with magical powers for the burnished and tinsel article of modern manufacture;"—whether in the humbler department of portrait he sketches the political economist—[Mr. Hume, Oh! oh!]

I am not surprised at the interruption, for you sat for the likeness, for the faithful resemblance, of the harsh, cold-blooded economist, regarding money as the only element of national happiness, feasting his eyes upon Poland in the background, able, even "with her wretched ploughs, and wretched men and wretched horses," to drive us from the cultivation of inferior soils. No, sir, the noble lord has produced nothing since so happy as these vigorous and spirited designs—and when he now invites us to follow a political economist, can he be surprised if we are haunted by the recollection of the portrait which he himself drew, and the warning which he gave us to beware of trusting the original? If her Majesty's government, on their responsibility as a government, with a distinct declaration of their principles, and a full explanation of their views, were to call upon us to reconsider the corn-laws and to remove the obstacle to the importation of foreign corn, we should be placed in a different position from that in which we now stand. Even then, while we might respect their motives, and the manliness of their course, we should pause. We should tell them there were higher considerations involved than those of mercantile profit. We should doubt the policy of making this great country more dependent than it is on foreign supplies. Admitting that the extension of intercourse, by the reciprocation of benefits and the sense of common interests is a great guarantee for peace, still we should not implicitly rely on its efficacy. We should remember that within our own short experience the insane ambition of a single man, bent upon our destruction, had for many years overruled all the impediments which the love of gain, or the prosecution of peaceful industry among millions of men, could offer to his reckless course. We should find, even in the present state of the world, in North America, in Spain, in the Gulf of Mexico, ample proof that the interests and the influence of commerce will not always ensure the peaceful arbitration of differences. Could you prove to us that the true principles of mercantile dealing required us to purchase corn in the cheapest market, and to withdraw the capital which has fertilized the inferior soils of this country, for the purpose of applying it to the rich but unprofitable wastes of Poland—still we should hesitate. We should remember with pain the cheerful smiling prospects which were thus to be obscured. We should view with regret cultivation receding from the hill-top, which it has climbed under the influence of protection, and from which it surveys with joy the progress of successful toil. If you convinced us that your most sanguine hopes would be realized—that this country would become the great workshop of the world—would blight through the cheapness of food, and the demand for foreign corn, the manufacturing industry of every other country—would present the dull succession of enormous manufacturing towns connected by railways, intersecting the abandoned tracts which it was no longer profitable to cultivate—we should not forget, amid all these presages of complete happiness, that it has been under the influence of protection to agriculture, continued for two hundred years, that the fen has been drained, the wild heath reclaimed, the health of a whole people improved, their life prolonged, and all this not at the expense of manufacturing prosperity, but concurrently with its wonderful advancement. If you had called on us to abandon this protection with all the authority of an united administration, with the exhibition of superior sagacity, and triumphant reasoning, we should have been deaf to your appeal; but when, inviting us to follow you, you present nothing but distracted councils, conflicting colleagues, statements of facts not to be reconciled, and arguments leading to opposite conclusions, then we peremptorily refuse to surrender our judgments to your guidance, and to throw the protection secured to agriculture by the existing law into the lottery of legislation, in the faint hope that we might by chance draw the prize of a better Corn bill.

After another adjournment the House divided: Ayes, 195; Noes, 342; majority against the motion, 147.

UNITED STATES—BOUNDARY QUESTION.

MARCH 27, 1839.

In a conversation, originating with Sir S. Canning, as to the state of our relations with the United States, and as to the negotiations pending for the adjustment of the boundary question,—

SIR ROBERT PEELE said, that as parliament was now about to adjourn for several days, he did not regret that some hon. member should have thought it right to make inquiries of her Majesty's government on the great question of the disputed boundary between our North American possessions and the United States. He was sure the House would agree with him in thinking, that upon the present occasion the right hon. gentleman who put those questions had done so in a temper which showed no inclination to throw any impediments in the way of bringing the matters in dispute to a satisfactory conclusion. No one could feel more fully than he (Sir R. Peel) did, the inconvenience which must arise to any government from a premature demand for papers, or from entering into any discussion respecting a course, which, at a moment like the present, they intended to adopt; for he felt, that in making their defence upon any charges which might be brought against them, ministers would labour under the disadvantage of not being able to produce all the documents that might be necessary, lest their disclosure should be prejudicial to the public service; he should, therefore, not pursue the matter further than to say, that he fully reserved to himself the right of hereafter discussing whether her Majesty's government, after rejecting the award of the King of Holland, and after having discovered, that our Canadian subjects had been exposed to apprehension and to danger—he repeated, he should claim for himself, at a future time, the right to consider whether the responsible advisers of the Crown had shown sufficient energy and decision in their attempt to bring this matter to an issue. Limiting himself, then, for the present, to this single remark, he could not at the same time help saying, that if there were any document which could possibly be called for, and the production of which was not liable to be objected to on the part of the government, as raising any impediment in the way of a satisfactory settlement, he confessed he should have thought, that that document was an old map, dated in the year 1755—a map drawn at a time when no differences could exist between the United States and this country. If that map had any bearing on the question, he did hope that the right hon. gentleman would persevere in his motion. If the map were not in existence, no jealous feeling need be excited, and he hoped if it did exist, that the particular map which had been moved for, and no more recent map, would be laid upon the table of the House. It might be, however, that there were some well-founded objections to the production of the map which did not strike his mind. If the greater caution of the right hon. gentleman suggested any to him, and that he felt unwilling to press his own friends on the other side of the House, he too highly estimated the right hon. gentleman's circumspection not to treat it with respect; but if there were no substantial objection to their seeing the old map, he hoped that it might be produced.

Sir C. Grey was sorry on so important a question the attention of the right hon. baronet had been so distracted. He had never said the map was not in existence, and any hon. gentleman who went to the British museum could see it there in eight sheets.

The conversation then dropped, and the House adjourned till the 8th day of April.

GOVERNMENT OF IRELAND.

APRIL 15, 1839.

In the debate on Lord John Russell's motion, calling upon the House for an expression of its opinion relative to the administration of affairs in Ireland,—

SIR ROBERT PEELE spoke as follows: I do not regret that I have given to the noble lord, by declaring, antecedent to the present debate, the amendment which I meant to move, the advantage of which he has largely, but not unfairly, availed himself of—commenting on the terms and purport of that amendment. I consider that I made no concession; that I deprived myself of no advantage, by not concealing the terms of the amendment until the moment of submitting it to the House. I felt that the propositions contained in it are so consistent with good sense, so founded in justice, that I willingly granted that opportunity for comment, which an early declaration must give. I sought to conciliate no support. I sought not to exclude the support of any man, who, differing from me in opinion, might yet think the amendment justified by truth and by reason; and I did not attempt so to frame it, as to conciliate those from whom on most questions of policy I widely differ. Sir, I was advised not to introduce the name of the House of Lords, because the name would raise opposition from those gentlemen of extreme popular opinions, who are necessarily opposed to the House of Lords. I was asked to move for a committee on the state of the nation, as a plan more captivating to many, than any other I could adopt, but I refused either proposal. In this great crisis—for great it is, when the House of Commons is called on to make a partial declaration of confidence in government, and to seek (as I think) an unjustifiable collision with the House of Lords. I endeavoured, in framing my amendment, to consider nothing but the considerations of equity and reason, and I felt, that although a majority might trample on that amendment, it could not extinguish its vitality and living principles. Such were the motives which actuated me in framing the amendment which I mean to submit for the approbation of the House. And now I will appeal to the House, whether it be right at this moment, to ask the House of Commons for a partial declaration of confidence in one branch of public government, in one branch of the legislature, amid the difficulties that surround us? Are you justified in seeking a collision with another branch of the legislature? These are the questions you have to determine—and I now say beforehand, that if in arguing them, through the strength of my conviction, or betrayed by the hastiness of debate, which it is difficult, when the conviction is strong, utterly to restrain; if I introduce any language better fitted for the acerbity of party contention, than the gravity of this great occasion, I make at once a preliminary apology for the introduction of such language. Sir, to me this introduction of an abstract principle on the subject of Ireland—the introduction of it by the noble lord—the introduction of it in the month of April—may awaken reminiscences of former years, and the results of former motions. I may not be able to administer so far the oblivious antidote of which the noble lord has spoken, as entirely to forget the abstract resolution of 1835, moved in April of that year by the noble lord; but this I can undertake to do—I can raze from my mind and memory any feeling of animosity on account of that resolution. And, although I shall refer to that resolution, as one of the instances of the impolicy of such proceedings, I shall prove, I hope, that I am not labouring under any of those irritating feelings which the most generous minds may imbibe in the heat of political conflict.

Sir, I have two propositions to submit to the House in support of my resolution, and in opposition to that of the noble lord; and I will attempt in my argument to keep as closely as possible to the principles involved in them. My propositions are these—First, that it is not fitting or suitable to the character or functions of the House of Commons, to make abstract declarations of opinions with respect to the public policy of the government, unless under particular and special circumstances, and cases of emergency. That is my first proposition. My second is, that my objection to abstract declarations of opinion are infinitely aggravated when they are sought as causes of unjust conflict with the other branch of the legislature. If I establish either of these, I have, as it appears to me, a conclusive argument against the proposed resolution of the noble lords, and all I ask is, an indulgent hearing, while I attempt by argument to support them. I say, in the first place, that a declaration of confidence in the executive government on the part of the House of Commons, ought neither to be asked for nor given, except in extreme cases. Confidence ought rather to be inferred from the general support the House gives the executive government, from the manner in which it deals with the legislative measures proposed by government, than from any abstract declaration of opinion. There are, I admit, occasions, which may justify a government in calling for such declarations; but they are rare, and extremely rare, when the House of Commons should select one particular branch of the public policy of government, and, passing by all other branches, mark with approbation that detached and single portion. By taking such a course, you will lead the House of Commons into great embarrassment. It is difficult to conceive any executive government which does not adopt some branches of policy not entitled to support. It is difficult to conceive a government without some error; and a partial approbation, or condemnation, leaves the public at a loss to know whether or not the government possess the general confidence of the House. In fact, a pronounced approbation of a single portion of policy, implies a disapprobation of all which is not mentioned; and you may make it impossible to form a government, if you persist in this course. Instead of gathering from the general support of the House, a conviction that the government merits, and therefore receives, the confidence of the legislature, the public will require a declared approbation of every part of its policy, and will require that approbation to be renewed every time any part of its policy is questioned; you will thus paralyze the whole administration. You will make it impossible for the government to move without continual votes of approbation of every part of its policy. I say, therefore, and every one will admit, that there ought to be some strong foundation for calling on the House of Commons for an approval of one part of your policy. Still it may be possible that partial declarations of confidence may be justified. They may have this advantage, that by limiting them to a single branch of policy, you obtain a clear and explicit definition of the principle, and a clear exposition of the practice of which you mean to approve. But if you commit this double error, that you take a single branch, and have not the courage and the manliness to declare the principles of the policy which you ask the House of Commons to approve of—if you do not tell us clearly the period when that policy has been in operation—if you do not make it explicit, beyond all doubt, what are the measures, and who are the men, you ask the House of Commons to approve of, then, you are involving the House in a false position, and establishing a precedent as fatal as any ever adopted. Is not your resolution open to this objection?—is it not partial and unsatisfactory in its construction? Is it not vague and indefinite? You ask me to approve of the principle that has guided the executive government of Ireland—but the executive government means her Majesty's government generally. You cannot separate the executive government of Ireland from the cabinet which presides over all our affairs. You cannot pay a compliment to Lord Normanby, and to the noble lord opposite (Morpeth), without paying it to all the members of the executive. Do you recollect the case of Lord Glenelg last year? Do you recollect that when it was proposed last year, to pronounce a censure upon that branch of your administration over which that noble lord presided, you declared that it was impossible to separate an individual member of the government from the rest of his colleagues. If you have forgotten, I will remind you of the circumstance. Why, Sir, it is but rarely we can relieve the severe performance of our duty by the exhibition of romantic and chivalrous affection; but I must say, there was something most gratifying, when the attack was made by the hon. member for Leeds, on the noble lord's colonial administration, there was something delightful in the feeling of public devotion and private affection, which made the entire cabinet rally round Lord Glenelg, and cheerfully offer him their support. That feeling was a just one, so far as this, that a man more amiable in private life, more desirous of efficiently performing his public duty, a man who showed greater ability in debate, or conciliated a greater degree of good-will, even in opponents, never existed than Lord Glenelg. I am quoting this instance to show, that if censure cast upon an individual member of the administration is to be construed as a censure upon the government, a compliment to the executive government of Ireland is a compliment to the cabinet generally. I remember how the noble lord, the Secretary of Foreign Affairs, rushed forward on that occasion. Never, since the days of Nisus and Euryalus, was greater or more affectionate zeal exhibited:—

Nec potuit: cœlum hoc et conscia sidera testor:
Tantùm infelicem nimiam dilexit amicum.”

The noble lord said, “Did the hon. baronet suppose that the present cabinet either would or could remain in office, if one of its members were to be driven from it by a direct vote of censure of that House? Why, if they could be so base and dishonourable, that House would never permit a set of men to retain their places, who had allowed one of their number to become a ‘scapegoat to save themselves.” Those were the words used by the noble lord, who was determined not to incur the reproach levelled by the sarcastic moralist at the quondam companions of the “ poor sequestered stag,

That from the hunter's aim had ta'en a hurt,” “ When most invectively he passeth through The body of the country, city, court.”

Lord Glenelg was not to be

Upon that occasion the government did present an instance of generous devotion which is rarely seen; but it established the principle, that the act of one part of the government is shared by all. But if that principle be just, so when a compliment is proposed to a particular branch of the administration, you cannot exclusively appropriate that compliment to one department, but the whole administration must participate in it. This, then, is a compliment sought to be paid to the executive government of Ireland. Do you mean, then, to extend that approbation to the course of legislative policy which the government has pursued with reference to that country? Do you mean to say, that in paying a compliment to the principles which have pervaded the executive government of Ireland, you cordially approve, in respect to legislation, of the language of this resolution? What, then, becomes of the forty-six gentlemen who followed the hon. member for Sheffield last year, in denouncing the government for the course which they had pursued in reference to legislative measures for Ireland? Is, then, this vote of partial approbation not to be construed as extending to the legislative policy of the government, and is it to be confined solely to the administration of the affairs of Ireland? Is this to be your vote, in contradiction to what you assume to be the censure of the House of Lords—an assumption of which I utterly deny the justice? Finding yourselves, as you say, censured by the House of Lords, you come forward, and ask the House of Commons, in opposition to the House of Lords, to approve of your conduct; but you are not even explicit enough to tell us for what period you demand approbation. No; what you ask is, that “the House approve of the executive policy which has guided the executive government in Ireland of late years.” I will not trouble the House with voluminous quotations from writers, to show you the various periods to which the term “late years,” has been applied, but merely assert, that it has been applied to every number of years from two to one hundred. But will the House of Commons not require any further specification of the period to which the resolution applies, than is to be found in the expression of “late years?” Now, I ask you this distinct question, and I hope the noble lord opposite will interrupt me by answering it. Do you mean to include the administration of Lord Grey, Lord Wellesley, Lord Anglesey, and Lord Plunket, in your vote of approval—or, do you mean to deliver up these noblemen to the obloquy which has been cast, in certain quarters, on their administration of Irish affairs? Do you mean to institute an invidious contrast between the government of Lord Grey and Lord Melbourne—or to have Lord Normanby complimented at the expense of Lord Anglesey? If you include Lords Wellesley and Anglesey, how is it possible for those to join in the vote, who were formerly so loud in censuring these noblemen—who declared them unworthy public confidence, and stigmatized their whole course of conduct as marked by hostility to Ireland? If you mean to exclude them, I ask you, why you have not had the manliness to say so? Why do you not say, that Lord Melbourne's government commenced in 1835; our approbation, therefore, is limited to the same period, and applies exclusively to that government? But, no. You evade that difficulty—you are unwilling to make the invidious contrast between Lord Grey and Lord Melbourne, or between Lords Wellesley and Anglesey on the one side, and Lord Normanby on the other; and in calling on the House of Commons to sanction and approve your policy, you cover your meaning under the convenient generality, that it is the policy adopted of late years. But probably you take the more generous course, and you do mean to include Lord Anglesey and Lord Wellesley in your vote of approbation. I infer that, indeed, from the speech of the noble lord; because the noble lord stated, obscurely indeed, and rather by insinuation than in direct terms, that Lord Wellesley had not been quite so successful in conciliating public opinion as Lord Normanby, but he had been beset by great and peculiar difficulties. Well, then, do you exclude Lord Wellesley, or do you not exclude him, from your vote of approbation for his administration of the executive in Ireland? Mind, merely executive, for the legislative function is entirely omitted in this motion. That you include him, would be of course the generous reply. Well, then, you include him. But if you include him, you must include me. This makes a great difficulty. For when you ask me for a vote of approval of the conduct and principles by which the executive government of Ireland has been guided of late years, you leave me in great doubt, intimately connected as I myself have been with the executive government in that country of late years, whether you mean to approve and sanction my conduct or not. I suppose, of course, you mean to exclude me from this agreeable course of your approbation. That I take for granted. But if you mean to include Lord Wellesley, how do you manage to exclude me, for five years, from the year 1822 to the year 1827, I had the honour and satisfaction of acting, in conjunction with Lord Wellesley, in the government of Ireland? There was no difference of opinion between us in relation to Irish policy, and the difference which led to our estrangement, was in no manner connected with Irish affairs. I acted with Lord Wellesley as Lord-lieutenant, and with Lord Plunket as Attorney-general of Ireland; and if either Lord Wellesley or Lord Plunket disapproved of my principles of government in Irish affairs, I ask you to call on them to show, why they did not separate themselves from me. Again, I repeat, that the disunion which took place between us, was not on the point of executive administration in Ireland. I acted, also, with Lord Melbourne, who was Chief Secretary for Ireland when I was Secretary of State. I presume that Lord Melbourne, in the executive administration of affairs in Ireland, has been acting on the same principles of late years as those on which he formerly acted. Again, therefore, your approbation extends through him to me. No agreement of principles on the administration of the law, and on the executive affairs in Ireland, could be more cordial, than the union which existed between Lord Melbourne and myself, whilst Lord Melbourne was Secretary for Ireland, and I was Secretary of State. My separation from Lord Melbourne did not arise from any difference in our views with regard to the administration of affairs in Ireland. From what period, then, do you date your approbation of Irish policy? Perhaps you will say, from the commencement of Lord Grey's government of 1830. Is it so? We were then excluded from power. You brought forward the Reform Bill, and we ceased to exercise any direction over the Irish government. Is it, then, from 1830 that you date your approbation? Perhaps you will not date it from so long a period. Is it, then, from 1834? Will you date it from the period of Lord Grey's retirement from power, and your separation from my noble friend, the member for Lancashire, and my right hon. friend, the then member for Cumberland? Is it so? Well, let us take it from 1834, still you must include me. You make no exception. You say, that the principles which of late years have guided the executive government in Ireland are entitled to public approbation; and, taking the most limited and restricted period, namely, from the year 1834, the government over which I presided comes in for its share. I say, with the noble lord, we must have something definite and precise. We cannot praise two governors of Ireland, acting on different principles—we cannot praise Lord Haddington and Lord Normanby. No; but you evade the difficulty; for, if you take your stand from the year 1834, when Lord Grey retired from power, yet still Lord Haddington administered the executive in Ireland during the government over which I presided, and you make no exception, but merely ask the sanction and approbation of the House of Commons for the policy pursued in Ireland of late years. Why, if you do not mean to include our policy, why do you not say so—why not state explicitly what are the principles which you ask us to approve, and what is the period of time during which those principles have guided the administration of the executive in Ireland. Is it fair—is it decent, to call on the House of Commons for an abstract declaration of approbation of certain principles of government, and yet neither define those principles, nor state during what period they have been in operation? Now, what are those principles which we are called on to approve? If you say, they are the principles which have governed Lord Normanby and the present administration in their administration of affairs in Ireland, I shall still object to the sanction you ask for on account of the indefiniteness and vagueness of the resolution. And if this be really what you do mean, why have you not the courage and manliness to say so? Why do you not tell us why you exclude the Marquess of Anglesea—why you exclude Lord Wellesley—why you exclude Lord Grey's government? At least, it may fairly be supposed, from the language of your resolution, that it extends to the period, and to all governments since 1830. I say, then, if so, the ground on which I dissent from this resolution is on account of the vagueness, and indistinctness, and the indefinite nature of the principles, for which it asks our sanction; principles, neither expressed in the resolution itself, nor to be inferred from any period named in it as the period of their operation. I come now, sir, to the second point. I ask the question, whether you are justified in entering into collision with the House of Lords?—for mark, it is collision, this proceeding means nothing less—and that it is a collision, is the impression which has prevailed generally throughout the country, and is, indeed, a very natural construction of the noble lord's proceeding. For the noble lord, the very day after the vote of the House of Lords, came down to the House and gave notice of this motion; and what was the comment made on it in Ireland? It was in these words—"This is a manly course; this is seeking collision with the House of Lords." Now, Sir, the entrance into collision with one of the constituted authorities of the state is no light matter. It will be well for this House to consider maturely what are the instruments, or means, which they have in their power to carry on such a contest, as well as what consequences are likely to come from it. It is incumbent upon us, before we enter on this conflict, to ask ourselves, whether there is any justification for the collision we are about to begin. Now the professed justification seems to be, that the House of Lords appointed "a Select Committee, to inquire into the state of Ireland since the year 1835, in respect to crime and outrage, which have rendered life and property insecure in that portion of the empire." This, then, is the foundation for the projected collision. Now, Sir, how does this House stand in relation to the other House with respect to the legislative measures affecting Ireland? Is there so extensive a difference, as to render a collision likely with respect to legislative measures? On the Poor-law bill the two Houses have come to a concurrence; on the Tithe bill the House of Peers has concurred with the House of Commons; on the Municipal Corporations bill a difference has hitherto prevailed. But you do not seek for the elements of quarrel, surely, in the acts of last session? You profess your proceeding to be founded solely on the appointment of a committee of the House of Lords, which you consider (and indeed it is necessary for your argument) and construe into a vote of censure on the government. As far as legislative proceedings are concerned, you have not a pretence for a quarrel with the House of Lords; for with reference to them during the present session, not one communication has taken place between this House and the House of Lords. And the single act from which you have a right to infer any thing of the intentions of the House of Lords is this:—You asked the House of Lords, on the first day of the session, to reply to a paragraph in the speech with respect to municipal corporations; and in the Address which the House of Peers presented to her Majesty, they said, "We concur with your Majesty, that the reform and amendment of the municipal corporations in Ireland is essential to the interests of that part of the United Kingdom." You may have thought it discreet to introduce such a paragraph into the Queen's speech, knowing, as you did, the opposition which was formerly made to your views on that point; and, indeed, I myself should have much difficulty in pronouncing such a reform to be so "essential;" but the House of Lords, be it remembered, at your suggestion, reviewing the conflicts that had taken place, yielded to your views, and adopted them in their address. So far, then, as we know of the intentions of the House of Lords with respect to legislative measures relative to Ireland, still pending, there appears to be nothing on which to found the slightest pretence for the collision sought. The sole cause assumed for the collision is, that the House of Lords have appointed a committee to inquire into the state of Ireland, since the year 1835, in respect of crime and outrage, which had rendered life and property insecure in that part of the empire; and which appointment the noble lord, in the course of his argument, assumed to be a virtual censure on her Majesty's government. I deny that it is a censure, or can be considered as tantamount to a censure. The first question that arises, then, is, whether the appointment by the House of Lords of that committee be a vote of censure, or not? And I ask you to listen for a brief while to the argument, by which I shall endeavour to prove that such an assumption is not a fair one. The noble lord said, not exactly that it was a vote of censure, but that it was prima facie a censure. Now, I can understand what a prima facie case means; but I do not exactly understand what is meant by a prima facie censure. There may be grounds for it, but the noble lord's expression, as applied to the vote of the House of Lords, I do not exactly understand. But is the appointment of a committee by the House of Lords, a vote of censure on the government, or not? I deny that it is, or that it is to be considered in that light. It may be a questioning of their policy, or rather an appearing to question their policy; but to justify the noble lord, it is requisite that they should adopt some far less equivocal course. For have we, I ask, never appointed committees to inquire into the state of Ireland? And did we consider such an appointment as tantamount to a vote of censure—did we consider that, by so doing, we were paralysing the functions of government? Why, in 1824, Lord Althorp proposed a committee to inquire into the state of Ireland, and the motion, as amended by my right hon. friend, was agreed to, and a committee appointed to inquire into the state of that country, and more particularly as to the circumstances which led to the disturbance that prevailed in that part of the empire. The inquiry was a large one. The acts of the government, its conduct and policy, came into question, though the inquiry was limited to that part of Ireland in which disturbances had prevailed. When Lord Althorp moved for that committee, it was not contended that the functions of government were incompatible with the appointment of such a committee. It lasted two years, every subject was inquired into, and though the Catholic question was carefully excluded from the report, every practical subject relating to the functions, and operations, and policy of government, and the administration of justice, was inquired into—not merely the administration of justice, but the prerogatives of the Crown, and the exercise of the prerogative of mercy itself. How, then, can the House of Commons, with the example before their eyes, an example so complete, where the committee had powers so extended, and yet where no one ever ventured to assert that those powers were incompatible with the exercise of the functions of government—how can we, with any consistency, consider the appointment of this committee by the House of Lords as a vote of censure, or make it a ground for coming into collision with that House? There is another instance to which I will refer. In 1827 the noble lord himself moved the appointment of a committee—a select committee—to inquire into the cause of the increase in the number of criminal convictions in England and Wales, and empowered the committee to report their observations thereon. That committee was appointed in 1827, by the noble lord. Now, were not the functions of justice, and the administration of criminal justice, brought under the inquiry of that committee? But was that appointment considered by the House of Commons as a vote of censure on the government? Did the House express any surprise at the government continuing to hold the reins of office after such a vote? Certainly not. With what justice, then, can we now place on this vote of the House of Lords a construction, which we never placed upon our own votes, and rush into collision with them on a mere matter of assumption and interpretation? Well, Sir, in the year 1832, another committee was appointed. The noble lord may, perhaps, say, that there was no occasion for the committee appointed by the House of Lords—that the committees of 1824 and 1825 had exhausted the subject. This, however, is quite a different argument. The noble lord may contend, that we have had inquiry enough—that inquiry has been exhausted, and I admit it to be an intelligible ground of objection to inquiry on his part, but no ground for this motion. I protest, Sir, against entering into a contest with another branch of the legislature, because they do not happen to entertain the same opinion as the noble lord. If they do not agree with this House that the committee of 1824 and 1825 was sufficient, we have no right to resent this expression of their opinion by a vote, such as that which the noble lord asks at our hands. But, in 1832, this House, at the instigation of the noble lord's colleagues, the member for Dundee, and paymaster of the forces, who was not satisfied with the committees of 1824-5, who did not think inquiry into fresh crime exhausted, appointed another committee. Sir Henry Parnell moved a resolution, which I ask you to compare with that of the other House now in question:—"May, 1831.—Sir H. Parnell moved for a committee to examine into the state of the disturbed counties in Ireland, into the immediate causes which have produced the same, and into the efficiency of the laws for the suppression of outrages against the public peace."

Now, suppose the House of Lords had abandoned their own words, and taken those of Sir Henry Parnell's motion, would you have abandoned your objection? The words I have just read were the words proposed by a member of her Majesty's government itself, and yet you now come forward to ask us to resent a motion which does not go so far as that of Sir Henry Parnell's. Sir Henry not only sought to investigate the disturbances, but to inquire into their causes. I will venture to say, that if any member of the House of Lords had made that motion, the arguments that have been used here to-night would have been doubly enforced, and it would have been said that such a resolution would do nothing less than point at her Majesty's government as the cause of disturbance and crime. These committees, however, were matters on record; they were acts of the House of Commons itself; and, with these acts before them, the noble lord and the government challenges the right of the House of Lords to inquire into the state of crime in Ireland, and holds that the claim to exercise that right was tantamount to a vote of censure upon the executive government of Ireland. I cannot forget that there are in the House of Lords members of her Majesty's government who have not denied the right of the House of Lords to inquire into the state of crime, and who, if they had considered the phraseology of Lord Roden's motion so objectionable, might have taken a different course from that which they had in this discussion pursued. Why did they not say, "We consider the words so equivocal, that though you disclaim, if you are sincere, all intention of conveying a censure on the government—though the Duke of Wellington may deny that this resolution is tantamount to censure—yet we will test your sincerity, and propose the extension of the inquiry to the year 1832?" If in the words, "which have rendered life and property insecure," you feared was conveyed an insinuation that they were rendered insecure by the acts of the government; why did they not move an amendment in some such terms as these:—"With respect to such crimes and outrages as have rendered life and property insecure?" If, either in the language of the resolution, or at the period at which it fixed the inquiry, you, after the disclaimer of the Duke of Wellington, apprehended an implied vote of censure, why not have moved an amendment in the terms of the motion in the House of Lords—a legitimate and proper course, instead of letting it pass without moving an amendment, and then availing yourselves of it as a pretext for collision with the House of Lords? Have you no example of this course before your eyes? When, last year, a committee was appointed to inquire into the appointment of sheriffs, a subject ten times more objectionable than an inquiry into crime, you assented to the principal of the motion, and, only objecting to the limitation of the term over which the inquiry was to extend, you extended the time thereof, and precluded the possibility of the appointment of the committee being construed into a vote of censure. Why not have acted in the same way on the present occasion? Why not have come down to the House of Commons with a motion for a corresponding inquiry, and, by so doing, have prevented all possibility of the inquiry in the Lords bearing a criminatory character? Or, if there were any crimination to arise, to extend that crimination to others. I wish now you would extend that inquiry. I wish now—now, when I have heard myself charged with fostering a petty spirit of Orange domination—I wish now, you would appoint a committee which should commence, not with the year 1835, but with the year 1834, or with any other year you may please to name, and which shall subject my acts and my correspondence to investigation; and I tell you at once that I will not shrink from such an inquiry. But the question now is, why, instead of asking for a collision with the House of Lords, amidst the difficulties that surround you, do you not take the course with respect to the committee on crimes and outrage, which you took with respect to the appointment of sheriffs, and strip the appointment of the committee of all criminatory character, by extending the period of inquiry, so as to include the acts of other parties? If the House of Lords did appoint the committee, supposing that there was something that induced it—not censure—but the allegation of a prima facie case of inquiry, can we reasonably turn round and blame the House of Lords for entering into the investigation? Least of all, was it to be expected, that when such charges were made, the Irish government should have refused inquiry, and expressed great indignation at its being instituted. The course which I now take is in conformity with the course I have always taken. I do not, on account of any inquiry that may be made into crime in Ireland, or any amount of crime that may be proved to exist there, in order to make out a prima facie case for inquiry, charge that crime on the government. I have too much experience in matters relating to Ireland to say to the Irish government, that because there is much crime, therefore you have encouraged crime. I will not visit you on this account with a vote of censure, but I think there is ground for inquiry. This is the view, Sir, in which this resolution of the House of Lords must be regarded—this is the spirit in which it was passed. But, because I do not censure, I am not, therefore, to assent to your motion of approbation. I suspend my opinion. The resolution of the other House is not a vote of erimination; but I suspend my judgment till the result of the inquiry be known. I cannot accede to your resolution, and I will not meet it with a vote of censure—because, as I have not the information which may, or may not, result from the inquiry, that course might be unjust. But something I must say for the House of Lords. If that House did appoint a committee, it was not very extraordinary, after the manner in which they had been taunted by members of her Majesty's government. Can any man have been prepared for the strain of indignation which has been lavished on the devoted heads of the members of the other House of parliament, taking into account what has been said on the subject by the noble lord himself, who seems to have first done much to provoke an inquiry, and who now chooses to consider it in the light of a vote of censure? I thought the noble lord himself was bursting for inquiry, and how the noble lord, if he remembered his own words, can—I do not wish to use any expression that may be personally offensive, or calculated to excite acrimony, and, therefore, changing the expression I was about to use for one somewhat milder—how the noble lord can have the astonishing boldness, after the language used by him in reference to the House of Lords, now to turn round on them, and invoke a collision, I really cannot comprehend. Some gentlemen met in Dublin, in 1837, and came to a certain number of resolutions, condemning, in the strongest manner, the government of Ireland. Upon these resolutions, which were twenty-three in number, the noble lord commented, in the speech made by him on the introduction of the Irish Municipal Corporation bill, and when inquiry was in the far distance, no man ever appeared more anxious for it than the noble lord—no man ever so boldly challenged the parties to come forward and submit those charges to the test of investigation. The words of the noble lord were memorable. The noble lord said, “it was the same miserable monopolizing minority;” (this was on the 7th of February, 1837, and he presumed the noble lord meant that the minority then was not formidable on account of its numbers—was not formidable on account of its boldness)—but the noble lord thus taunted them for the course they had taken:—“It is the same ‘miserable monopolising minority’ which has not dared to bring forward any charge in parliament against the present administration in Ireland; but which has met and passed certain resolutions, containing charges highly criminal of Lord Mulgrave—charges which, if true, would insure the noble lord's instant dismissal. And although parliament has now been assembled for a week, and although members of both Houses were present at the meeting in Ireland * * * not one of them has yet ventured to give any notice that he will bring before parliament those high crimes and misdemeanours.” * * *

Why, Sir, when we were forbearing, this was the manner in which the noble lord taunted us. But did the noble lord mean to refer to the House of Commons only? No doubt he meant to say, that with the Commons originated impeachment, and therefore inquiry. But the noble lord would not stop there. Oh, no, he did not give us the opportunity to escape—he cut off our defence, and plainly told us, “It may be said, although it would be a weak and a miserable argument” (the noble lord is fond of the term miserable—he thought us miserable in a minority, and it seems that our arguments showed the misery of our situation):—"That in this House no one is willing to bring forward the subject, as no one would venture to encounter the strength of the support which his Majesty's ministers have received from the majority in this House. This, I say, is a miserable argument. * * * But is there not another House of parliament, where this subject could be brought forward? What is the power of the opponents of his Majesty's government in that House? * * * Why do these gentlemen shrink from going before that House, and bringing forward these charges? They have brought forward matters, impeaching the conduct and derogatory to the character of the Lord-lieutenant of Ireland, and yet they dare not bring his conduct before parliament? It may be that, after all, they feel that, whatever their majority may be in the other House of parliament, it is not a majority for such purposes. It may be that they feel that a majority of the other House of parliament will not sanction such accusations. But they should at least have the candour and frankness to let this be known."

This was the language of the noble lord opposite. Now, suppose the House of Lords, in answer to this challenge, had said, "Let the charge be brought forward and we will hear it, and proceed to condemnation without inquiry," could you have been more indignant in your language in such a case than you are now? Yet you taunted them to come forward—you taunted these gentlemen to prefer their charge, but you were not visited with censure: they asked for inquiry, and now you say that inquiry is tantamount to censure, and endeavour to escape inquiry by provoking a collision. When, therefore, I compare the committee appointed by the House of Lords, with the committee you yourselves appointed—when I compare the language you held, challenging inquiry, and complaining of condemnation without inquiry, I do not believe that you will stand justified by the calm and deliberate sense of the people of England in the course you are now taking. Why, is there nothing improved in the state of Ireland? the noble lord may say. To that I answer, is there nothing in the state of Ireland to justify the House of Lords in instituting an inquiry into crimes and outrages endangering life and property? The state of Ireland may be improved—that remained to be shown—but, at all events, the House of Lords has the admission of the fact on which they ground their inquiry from the highest authority—from the authority of the Solicitor-general for Ireland, who said, at the opening of the special commission at Clonmel:—"I am personally a stranger to your county; but the perusal of the calendar of prisoners, and the informations on which they were committed, demonstrate to me, whatever may be the issue as to the guilt or innocence of the accused, that there can be no doubt of the lamentable fact, that in no place where the law of England extends is human life less regarded than in the county of Tipperary. It may be some palliation of the crime, but it is a melancholy one, that in many of the cases where life has been sacrificed in this county, it resulted from hasty ebullition of human passion, or in sudden affairs between factions in the county, in which parties have mingled in deadly conflict, for the gratification of a wild spirit of clanship. Unhappily, there is another class of homicide that calls for the urgent interference of the law, and which has not the miserable palliation which I have mentioned belongs to the former class, and which does not result from hasty conflict, or the accidental consequences of a chance blow, inflicted in a moment of excitement. But, gentlemen, we are compelled to say, that, in many instances, they are the result of deep-laid conspiracy, that calls for blood and assassination."

This, then, fully established the fact, that in no place where the laws of England extend is human life less regarded than in the county of Tipperary. The state of Ireland may be improved—the general state of Ireland may be better than it was—but when you, a government, make the admission—when you say, by the mouth of your own Solicitor-general for Ireland, that, "in no place to which the laws of England extend (he might have said in no place of the civilized world,) is human life less regarded than in the county of Tipperary;" can you be surprised—have you any reason to be astonished—that the House of Lords should desire to make inquiry into the causes which have led to this deplorable state of things, and seek to ascertain why human life in that country is so utterly disregarded? Are you surprised that, when the House of Lords sees one of their own members, living on the borders of that county, murdered at his own door in open day—and when that House finds the causes of that horrid murder yet undiscovered, the murderer yet untraced, the dreadful act still unpunished, are you surprised, I say, that they should try to come at the real facts of the case, by instituting an inquiry which must have, among other objects, the investigation into the causes why the detection and punishment of that foul murder have not ensued? But you object to this inquiry, because of the individual who moved it. Is that a reason for doing so? If the inquiry be necessary, should it be silenced simply because the person who moves it is objectionable to you? What has the House of Commons to do with names or persons? Why should we oppose ourselves to a thing, good in itself, and having truth for its object, because a person who we may not like moves it? A person may be alluded to in a debate, and a name may be used in support of an argument; but the graver and wiser rules of the House forbid our consideration of things in reference to persons, and confine us to the consideration of them on their own merits. To call, then, on the House of Commons to condemn the inquiry set on foot into the causes of crime in Ireland, simply because Lord Roden has been the mover of it, is as contrary to the practice of parliament, as it is alien to all reason and justice. Now, let us suppose a case in point, a parallel case. I will suppose, for instance, that a member of the House of Commons, professing what are termed liberal opinions, has been murdered in the open day at his own door; I will suppose him to have been, at the time of the murder, engaged in planning improvements in the condition of his tenants, and generally benefitting, by his residence and expenditure, the whole neighbourhood; I will then suppose the House of Commons, naturally and very properly excited at this appalling outrage—at this dreadful calamity—propose to institute an inquiry into the causes which led to it; and, finally, I will suppose that the House of Lords institute some proceedings analogous to those contemplated in the noble lord's resolution, questioning our right to make that inquiry, on the grounds that some allegation had been made that a liberal member of the House of Commons, professing extreme opinions, had proposed it. Now, let us suppose this case—then let us ask ourselves a single question: What would the House of Commons have said of the House of Lords in such a case? What judgment would it pronounce upon this proceeding? And yet, invert the instance, and it is the position in which the resolution of the noble lord seeks to place us. We do not deal out equal justice to all parties. We know full well that if such a dreadful calamity as this had befallen one of our own members, and if the House of Lords had the indecency—I say the word—of resenting our proceedings in consequence of it, there would be no limit to our just indignation, and no end to the clamour we should rightfully raise against them. And yet, what is the course which it is now proposed we should pursue towards the House of Lords, in a case precisely similar? The very opposite of that which we should prescribe to them to pursue towards us under such circumstances. Sir, the House of Commons should pause before it proceeds farther in this matter. What is the next step to be taken, I will now ask, should the resolution of the noble lord be affirmed by the House? When you contemplate entering into collision with the other branch of the legislature, you should not only be acquainted with all the probable consequences of the act, but you should also be prepared to meet them. Will you call on the House of Lords to rescind their resolution? To effect any purpose, it is inevitable that you should do so. If you do not do so, what do you gain by your proposition? If you do, what are likely to be the consequences? The noble lord has said, that there are precedents for the course he has proposed to the House, and he has quoted only one to sustain him. Differences on legislative proceedings afford no precedents for the present case, as between the House of Lords and Commons, because they have no application to the point at issue. When a legislative difference arises between these two branches of the legislature, it is settled by conference: you invite the Lords to a conference—you state your reasons—you perhaps hear theirs; you regret the difference, and one or the other abandons the point—setting aside the question altogether. This constitutes no precedent which can apply to the case now before us; not even the noble lord himself will say it does. “But then,” says the noble lord, “there is a precedent, and I have it to show the House.” Now, what is this precedent? I ask the House of Commons to refer to it, not as a rule to guide their conduct, but as a beacon to warn them off a dangerous course. What is the precedent paraded by the noble lord, and how does it avail him? It is connected with "the Scottish plot" of 1703. In that year, suspicion having fallen on Simon Lord Lovat, that he held correspondence with the French government, and the court of James II. at St. Germain's, he was accordingly arrested. If I recollect right, a person of the name of Boucher, who was in the service of the Duke of Berwick, was apprehended at some place on the coast of Kent or Sussex, as privy to that correspondence. He was taken into the custody of the Crown; but the House of Lords, being jealous of the loyalty of the minister of the Crown, desired to have the examination of this individual themselves. The House of Commons resented this assumption of what subsequently turned out to be only a just right. But there is no analogy between that case and the case now in question. The House of Commons objected to the claim of the House of Lords for the transfer of the examination of persons accused of treasonable practices from the Crown to themselves. They said it was arrogating a jurisdiction on the part of that branch of the legislature, to which the Lords had no rightful title; and they protested against it as partial. But even then the House of Lords were right. I said in the outset of these observations, that the House of Commons should look at this precedent in the light of a beacon, to warn them from their present course, not as a guide to follow. In the space of five minutes I think I shall be able to prove that I advised rightly. Observe, that this is the only precedent which the noble lord could find, though no doubt he has been neither inactive nor idle in searching for them. But to what sore shifts must the noble lord be driven when his only precedent—the only precedent on which he can rely—is one which derives its authority from an act of the high Tories of that day? This is the account given of the struggle on that occasion between the House of Lords and the House of Commons, by the best Whig authorities. I thought, when the noble lord quoted the case, I recollected some omission; and, now that I have it all before me, the House will see that I had no especial cause to be surprised at the noble lord having touched but lightly on some parts of it. Here is the entire statement of that quarrel, as given by Bishop Burnet in his "History of his own Times." "The complaint of the Commons," he states, was—"That when persons suspected of treasonable practices were taken into custody by her Majesty's messengers, in order to be examined, the Lords, in violation of the known laws of the land, had wrested them out of their hands, and arrogated the examination solely to themselves."

The historian then continues:—"The Commons were in an ill-humour against the Lords, and so they were glad to find occasions to vent it. They thought the Lords ought not to have entered upon this examination; they complained of it as a new and unheard-of thing. In an address to the Queen, they said it was an invasion of her prerogative.

"This was a proceeding without a precedent. The parliamentary method was, when one House was offended with any thing done in another, conferences were demanded, in which matters were freely debated.

"Tindal says, that it was an amazing thing to see a House of Commons affirm, in so public a manner, and so pointing, that the Lords taking criminals into their own custody, in order to examination, was without warrant or precedent, when there were so many instances fresh in every man's memory. But it was entirely owing to a party pique. The Tories, who were the strongest in the House of Commons, laying hold of all opportunities, both to ingratiate themselves with the Queen, and to oppose the Whigs, who had the majority in the House of Lords."

Just substitute Whigs for Tories, and the picture will be complete as of the present day. But Burnet then goes on thus to describe this proceeding on which the noble lord so firmly relies:—

"The Commons continued to protest, but the Lords' committee went on with their examinations, and concluded with voting that there had been dangerous plots between some in Scotland and the courts of France and St. Germain's.

"This being concluded, they made a long and vigorous address in answer to that which the Commons had made against them.

"They observed how uneasy the Commons had been at the whole progress of the inquiry into this matter, and had taken methods to obstruct it all they could. The Lords took not the examination to themselves, so as to exclude others who had the same right, and might have done it as well as they if they had pleased."

In a former address the Lords had observed—"No House of Commons, till now, has given countenance to the dangerous opinion which does so directly tend to the rendering all ministers safe from the examination of Parliaments; and we are persuaded no House of Commons, hereafter, will assent to such a motion, because they are not easily wont to part with a power they have assumed: and it is certain that they have several times taken upon themselves to exercise an authority like that which they have so severely reflected on in this Address."

The noble lord quoted the Commons' Address, but he omitted to quote the Address of the Lords, in answer. Why he did so is obvious; it would not suit his purpose. I do not know who was the high Tory author of the Commons' Address; but I will tell him, on the authority of the historian from whose work he has extracted this matter, who was the author of the Address voted by the Lords:—"These addresses," says the historian, "were drawn up by the Lord Somers, and were read over and critically considered by a few Lords, of whom I had the honour to be one."

"This, with the other papers that were published by the Lords, made a great impression on the body of the nation, and gave rise to very unfavourable contrasts between the conduct of the Lords and Commons."

Now, this is the Scottish case of 1703, on which the noble lord relies for his precedent; and this was the result of the unjust attempt on the part of the House of Commons to question the undoubted rights and privileges of the House of Lords, by seeking a collision with it on such unwarrantable grounds. But, perhaps, the noble lord will still say that, whatever may be the terms of the motion which he condemns, there was a lurking intention evident on the part of the leaders of his political opponents, to take a covert and secret advantage of the government of which he is a member, by its means, and to involve them in its consequences without their knowledge or concurrence. Sir, I entirely disavow such an intention on my own part, as well as on the part of those with whom I act. I disavow it, Sir, on my own part, and firmly believe, that there was not the slightest desire to take advantage on the part of any one with whom I am politically connected. And this I can safely say, as the leader of a party, that I had not the least inclination nor wish to do so. Indeed, nothing surprised me more, than to learn the next morning after the motion had been made, that there was so much importance attached to it by her Majesty's ministers, and that they had made it a vital question, by which to stand or fall. And I will freely admit, though I am perfectly well aware that I cannot lay claim to any great share of astuteness in making the admission, that hearing this fact, of the importance of the motion, and the decision of the government respecting it, I went at once to the Duke of Wellington's, and to the house of my noble friend near me (Lord Stanley), to consult with them on the subject, and ascertain their opinions as to the best course to take in reference to it, but found them both absent from town on the momentous occasion, the former having that morning gone to Hampshire, and the latter to Lancashire. Need I say, after this statement of the fact, that there is no probability in the supposition, and no truth in the assumption, that we attached any importance, beyond that which it was intrinsically entitled to, to the motion of the Peers? Neither need I argue, that if we had such intention as that which we are charged with entertaining towards the government, this could have been the case. I hope I have no occasion to say any more, either in disavowal or dis-proof of the allegation, that the leaders of the political party opposed to the noble lord, had the slightest intention, in the motion of Lord Roden, of taking a covert or secret advantage of the government to which he belongs. There was a desire to have a full inquiry, and as far as I know, there was no desire that it should be preceded by a vote of a censure character. The noble lord has spoken of the committee as improperly constituted, and certainly produced a great effect, a very great effect on the benches behind him, by descanting on the unfairness of the committee appointed by the House of Lords, which he so energetically denounced—"Lord Roden," the noble lord said, "had constituted it so partially as to place on it thirteen of his own supporters and only five of his opponents." And this, as I said, produced a great sensation among those hon. gentlemen behind the noble lord. But what are the real facts of the case? Where the noble lord got his numbers I do not know, nor can I tell by what process he obtained them in the proportion of five to thirteen; but this I do know, that when I read the list of names appointed to that committee, which I now hold in my hand, the House will concur with me in opinion, that, however far the noble lord may see, he has certainly not the faculty of seeing double. Indeed, he would rather seem to have the opposite faculty—that of diminishing, instead of increasing, for his friends are ten in number, not five. I shall, however, read the names, and the House can then judge for itself. They are—Lord Plunket, Lord Cloncurry, Lord Glenelg, Lord Hatherton, Lord Carew, and the Marquess of Lansdown, Viscount Duncannon, the Marquess of Normanby, Lord Gosford, and the Duke of Leinster. These ten names, all those of staunch liberals be it known, may be disproportionate to the number of names on the opposite side of the question. With that proposition I shall not deal now; but let us not leave this House with an impression that the noble lord's statement is correct, and that there are only five liberal members to thirteen of opposite opinions on the committee. Sir, I have now attempted to establish two propositions, and I hope I have succeeded. The first, that partial approbation should not be given to a government by the affirmation of an abstract proposition of confidence on the part of the House of Commons, except on very rare occasions; and, secondly, that a collision with the House of Lords on the present question is unjustifiable, and therefore unwise and improper. But if I rested there, at that point, I should, perhaps, be charged by the other side of the House with shrinking from my duty, in not detailing the grounds on which I found my own resolutions and oppose those of the noble lord. In my preliminary resolutions, those who approve of the policy of the government towards Ireland may concur. They may also join with me in deprecating a collision with the House of Lords. I shall conceal nothing when the time comes; and if the noble lord should then call on me, I shall explain every thing to him in connection with those resolutions. But I will perform my duty as relates to the resolution of the noble lord. To that I shall say no; and I shall now state my grounds for so doing. The noble lord's resolution asks me to approve of "those principles which have guided the executive government of Ireland of late years," and calls on me to express an opinion on the expediency of persevering in them. I shall say nothing of the remainder of the resolution, of the "effectual administration of the law," and of "the general improvement of that part of the United Kingdom." Nay, I shall consider it, if you please, as a direct and positive approval of the government of Lord Normanby. I do not desire to censure Lord Normanby. It cannot be expected that I should praise him; but censure him I will not. I shall, in what I have to say, simply state the grounds on which I say "No," to the resolution of the noble lord. I am asked to approve of the general policy of the government, as applied to that part of the United Kingdom called Ireland. Now, how I or the House of Commons can be expected to approve of any particular line of policy pursued by a government—how we can be called on to affirm any laudatory proposition to that effect, without having any special intelligence on the subject, in absence of all information as to the results of that policy, is more than I am able to comprehend. And if the House of Commons shares in my inability of comprehension, and will permit me to do so, I shall assign my reasons for thinking that it would be very unwise of them to accede to the noble lord's proposition. In this process we come, in the first instance, to the effect of this policy on the country to which it has been applied. And here I take leave to say, in the outset of my investigation into it, that nothing can give me greater pain than to be obliged to condemn the conduct of Lord Normanby. I have known Lord Normanby for a long period—from his very early youth I have known and esteemed him; and though I may not be entitled to call him my friend, I rejoiced, in common with all others who shared his acquaintance, in the development and expansion of those shining abilities and great natural parts with which he is unquestionably endowed. I believe, like Lord Glenelg, that the noble lord has displayed great official aptitude, and has conscientiously discharged his duty; and that, though he has not conciliated his political enemies in his public career, he has not alienated a single public or private friend. Sir, I wish the noble lord had not confined himself to the conduct of Lord Normanby, while in Ireland; but had entered on the broad principles of general government. If, however, I am asked on what principles that country should be governed, I can have no hesitation in answering the question. In the first place, I say that the government should be perfectly impartial as regards the administration of justice—for to withhold justice on any grounds is to withhold the right; and it should be freely and equally dispensed to all, of every class, sect, and condition. [Mr. H. Grattan: You did not act on that principle.] If the hon. member will have the goodness to permit me to proceed without interruption, he shall have ample opportunity of answering or refuting my position at a future period. Sir, I think, also, that the royal prerogative of mercy should be carefully exercised and cautiously extended. As I said before, I look upon its exercise as a strictly judicial proceeding, and, therefore, I consider that it should be administered as a judicial act alone. All considerations of personal feeling, political interest, or party advantage, should be entirely disregarded in dealing it out; and it should be exercised, as the laws are, with caution and with judgment. I say, then, that as the law has made all men equal in that country—equally qualified all classes, and made them eligible for office under the government, the Crown should not create any disqualification, on the ground of religion or politics, or make a man's religious opinions a bar to his advancement or promotion to place. But I make this exception, in accordance with the view of the noble lord, that those who participate in the same opinions as you do in religion and in politics, should have the preference. And this is what I complain of in the noble lord and those who support him. He takes this liberty to himself, and very properly, of preferring his friends, and he complains of the right, which he unquestionably has in that respect, being impugned; yet, because I acted on the same principles, precisely the same, when I was in office, he charges me with injustice, partiality, and the encouragement of Orangeism. He does not do me the justice he claims for himself. I never taunted the noble lord with his choice of Roman Catholics to fill situations under the government, because they were either adverse to me in religious opinions, or because they were his political friends and supporters. What I charged him with was, that by selecting certain persons to fill situations of trust under the Crown, he gave encouragement to societies whose objects were adverse to the law, these persons being members of them. And, therefore, I must be understood to mean, when I say that religious or political opinions do not necessarily disqualify a man for office, that one's own friends should naturally be preferred. I say this, also—I say, that I cordially adhere to the resolution of 1836, to which I subscribed, respecting Orange societies in Ireland. I care not whether, in saying so, I provoke opposition from persons who conscientiously believe, that Orange societies differ essentially from all others, or approval from those who hold contrary opinions. I adhere, I say, to the terms and the spirit of the resolution of 1836.—“That an humble address be presented to his Majesty, praying that his Majesty be graciously pleased to take such measures as to his Majesty may seem advisable, for the effectual discouragement of Orange lodges, and generally of all political societies, including persons of a different religious faith, using secret signs and symbols, and acting by means of associated branches.”

I adhere to this resolution, I say, but I go even further; for I think that the Crown ought, in cases to which the law cannot reach, discourage by the strong expression of its opinion, all processions, and manifestations of party spirit, which could have the effect of wounding the feelings of others. But while I hold this doctrine as regards Orange societies, I also hold that the government should act impartially with regard to other societies. For while I adhere to the resolution of 1836, I also agree with the address of 1834—that document which, at the instance of the noble lord, and his colleagues, it was my duty to present to the Crown. These are the words of that address:—“We fully participate with your Majesty in the feelings of deep regret and just indignation with which your Majesty has seen the continuance of attempts to excite the people of this country to demand a repeal of the legislative Union. We thank your Majesty for the renewed assurance of your Majesty's final and unalterable resolution, under the blessing of Divine Providence, to maintain this bond of our national strength and safety inviolate, by all the means in your Majesty's power, and we assure your Majesty, that in the support of this determination your Majesty may rely with confidence on our zealous and effectual co-operation.

“We fully concur in the opinion of your Majesty, that the practices which have been used to produce disaffection of the State, and mutual distrust and animosity between the people of the two countries, is chiefly to be attributed to the spirit of insubordination, which, though for the present, in a great degree, controlled by the power of the law, has been but too preceptible in many instances.

"We are convinced that to none, more than the deluded instruments of the agitation thus perniciously exerted, is the continuance of such a spirit productive of the most ruinous consequences; and your Majesty may rely upon our united and vigorous exertions, in conjunction with all the loyal and well-affected in aid of the government, to put an end to a system of excitement and violence, which, while it continues, is destructive of the peace of society, and, if successful, must prove fatal to the power and safety of the United Kingdom."

Sir, I take both propositions, and I cannot hesitate to express it as my firm and unalterable conviction, that the government which discourages Orange associations is under an equal obligation to discourage other societies and associations which have for their object a "pernicious agitation," which indulge in frequent references to physical force, which produce "excitement and violence," and which, "if successful, must prove fatal to the power and safety of the United Kingdom." Even though they have no secret signs or symbols, still it is the duty of the government to discourage them; such being their proceeding, such their object, and such their probable result. I speak not of coercion laws—I allude not to punishments; I speak alone of the interposition of the authority of government by a strong manifestation of opinion on the subject; and I may add, that if it was right of the noble lord's administration to dismiss my hon. and gallant friend behind me (Colonel Verner) from the commission of the peace, for proposing a certain toast at a convivial party, it would have also been right if the government which did it had omitted to make some appointments which they have since made, and if they had broken others which are in being. Maintaining, then, these opinions, I shall not conceal that I think all the acts of the government should be always consistent with the maintenance of the Established Church in Ireland. When the noble lord declared that, although the Presbyterian Church in Scotland might have some connection with the State, yet there was something in the peculiar tenets and observances of the Roman Catholic Church which precluded a similar connection, the noble lord has arrived at the same conclusion as myself—namely, that the maintenance of the Established Church in Ireland is in accordance with the qualifications annexed to the Act of Union and to the Catholic Relief Bill. The noble lord does not, I presume, withhold his assent from the proposition, that an equality of civil and religious liberty in Ireland ought to be preserved, consistently with the maintenance of the Established Church in its rights and privileges. I have stated my opinions frankly and freely. They may offend persons of extreme politics in various parties. I care not. If the hope of attaining to political power was based upon the contrary, and if a return to it was only on the condition of opposition to the Established Church of Ireland, fully and freely would I abandon that hope, and altogether discard the desire it might have given rise to. I must now tell the noble lord the reason of my opposition to Lord Normanby's government. As I said before, I propose no censure on it; but I try it by no test which I am not satisfied to have applied to myself. I am as ready to submit the acts of my own government to inquiry, as I am to investigate the acts of the government of which that noble lord was the executive officer. But I cannot give the policy of the noble lord's administration my approval. That I tell you candidly. I tell you, however, with the same candour, that I am no less disposed to praise than blame, where it is due; and that where approbation is merited, it will not be withheld by me. I think, for instance, that he is entitled to praise in respect of the disposal of the ecclesiastical patronage in Ireland; that is, as far as I can judge from the reports which have reached me up to this time. But I think, that he is entitled to condemnation for other things. This is the ground on which I withhold my consent to your motion. I cannot say, that I believe you have acted with impartiality in Ireland. I cannot conscientiously say, that I consider you have taken all the steps which you ought to have taken, and should have taken, to discourage associations adverse to the peace of the country, because promotive of agitation and discord amongst its inhabitants. I am sorry to be obliged to revert to such subjects; but the noble lord is alone to blame for it. He challenged me to do it, and I may not refuse him. I cannot say, that I think the conduct of Lord Normanby, with respect to the exercise of the royal prerogative, entitled to my confidence. I do not accuse him of exercising it corruptly, with unworthy motives, or for improper purposes; but I do say, that in my opinion, the manner in which he remitted several judicial sentences in Ireland, in 1836, was anything except calculated to promote "the effectual administration of the law," or bring about "the general improvement of that part of the United Kingdom." And, if I think, as I have stated I do, that the extension of the prerogative of mercy, should be a judicial act, and not a matter of public display for public applause, I cannot think, that that noble lord acted rightly in extending it in the peculiar way he did, in various places in that country. The number of cases to which it was extended is not at all of the importance which the noble Lord (J. Russell) would fain make it; it is the nature of these cases, and the manner in which mercy is extended to them, which gives importance to this part of the subject. One case of mercy ill-applied, or improperly exercised, might paralyze the whole course of justice more than a thousand not liable to these objections. The noble lord says, that there were only seventy cases, and that they were spread over a period of 145 months' imprisonment, as if that commutation or confounding of time could in any way affect the question. It reminds me of the argument used by two travellers, who having nine miles to walk, calculated that it was only four miles and a half each. Such, in effect, was the argument of the noble lord, as far as that subject was concerned. Sir, I cannot conceive that the public service required such a demonstration as was made by the Lord-lieutenant of Ireland, when travelling through it shortly before his vacation of that office. The impression was created in the public mind, that the remission of the term of imprisonment in numerous instances, was a sort of ornament to a Lord-lieutenant's progress. Such a display would have been misplaced in any country, however light the offences, or however long the imprisonment of the criminals might have been, and was most indefensible in such a country as Ireland. Whatever were the causes of offence, or however just was the mercy extended to the prisoners, if considered under other circumstances, I ask, was it proper that the prerogative of mercy should be extended as it was in the county of Sligo? Taking an account of the progress, from a paper favourable to the government, I find it stated, that the Lord-lieutenant was followed into Sligo by a retinue of 40,000 people—that, in fact, the whole road from Collooney to Sligo, was one living mass. The passage in the newspaper was to this effect: "we have often said, that in no county of Ireland was there more striking patriotism than in Sligo; and our observations have been confirmed by Lord Mulgrave's reception. Never before was there such a display. Lord Mulgrave was followed into the town by at least 40,000 persons. We never before saw such a concourse. On his arrival at the court-house, the doors were found to be closed, although they were the doors of his own court-house, or of the Queen's, whose representative he is. He had to enter into his own court-house by the back way. The populace, however, soon burst open the gates, and possessed themselves of the court, where, to their credit, they behaved themselves as if the judges had been there. Lord Mulgrave then went to the gaol, when he liberated some persons who were confined for minor offences." Is this, I ask, the mode by which the law was likely to be held in respect in Ireland? Is this the mode of administering the law there, which is to be taken in proof of the goodness of the executive government? I know of nothing, among such an excitable people, more calculated to injure or weaken a government than this; and on this ground, therefore, do I arraign the executive government of that country, or, at least, dissent from the approbation which the noble lord seeks as a sanction for its proceedings. But this is not the only ground. I differ from the noble lord, in relation to this part of my argument, on another ground; although, if I may rely on the assurance of the noble lord, we agree in the principle involved. Sir, the noble lord has declared his enmity against Orange associations, and against other associations, also, whose existence he declaims against as subversive of order, and on all accounts most desirable to have suppressed. But does this declaration agree with the conduct of government respecting those who are known to have taken the most prominent part in the propagation and maintenance of such associations? Here, or in Ireland, can the character of the government be safely staked by the noble lord on the grounds of its consistency with respect to those associations? I strongly dissent from such an assumption. Sir, there now sits by the side of the noble lord, an hon. gentleman, whose ability and general conduct I will not touch in the slightest degree. His talents are of sufficient eminence to entitle him to advancement, if their estimation were not weakened by his political tendencies. But I do quarrel with the government of Ireland for seeking out the decided supporter of an obnoxious association to fill an office of much delicacy and importance. The noble lord has stated, and I have no doubt truly stated, the confidence he had in the hon. and learned gentleman to whom I allude (Mr. Pigot). And, referring to the connection of that hon. gentleman with the general association, the noble lord has told us, that the association was dissolved before the hon. gentleman was made Solicitor-general. But what proof is this that the government is guided by the principles that its members profess? It was notorious, that the hon. gentleman had been a member of that association, and an active and zealous one too. And yet, an appointment was given to the hon. gentleman, of peculiar trust and delicacy; one, indeed, which implied and required the consultation of the holder, and his advice and assistance, on the suppression of those very associations which the hon. gentleman had supported, and which the noble lord condemns. Sir, the proof of the connection of the hon. gentleman with the association, and the corroboration, if any were wanting, of the extreme want of caution and consistency of the government in promoting him to such an office, under the peculiar circumstances of the case, is contained in a report of the proceedings of the association, at a meeting which was occupied chiefly in discussing what had recently taken place in the Court of Exchequer in Ireland. A list was produced to the meeting of those counsel on the liberal side of politics who had signed tithe declarations, on the plea side of the Court of Exchequer; and with reference to the name that stood first on the list, Mr. Redmond said, "it was a fact, that at the commencement of the association, that gifted individual had given all the aid of his sensible and powerful mind in its formation, and in advancing it to that proud and permanent station which it held at present. He had proved himself one of its most useful, most active, and most zealous supporters." That gentleman was Mr. Pigot. Sir, I will now test the sincerity of the assent, as the noble lord assents to my proposition, that the Protestant Church should be retained as the Established Church of Ireland. I will test by the acts of government, the professed desire of its members, that the Church of Ireland should be sustained with all her rights and privileges, and the test I apply is a declaration, reported in a paper favourable to the government, as having been made by a noble lord, who is a member of her Majesty's household—a declaration, tantamount to a desire for the entire destruction of the Church of Ireland. The noble lord to whom I allude (the Marquess of Headfort), a Lord-lieutenant of an Irish county, and one of her Majesty's household, has publicly declared his opinion, that no permanent improvement can be expected to take place in that country, as long as the Irish Church Establishment exists. At a public meeting in Ireland, he moved a resolution to this effect:—"That it is impossible to expect peace in this country while the present Church Establishment is suffered to exist." The terms of the resolution are not given; but this is stated to be the gist and substance of it. The declaration made by the noble lord was, that he thought it just that the Protestant should pay tithes, but that the Roman Catholic should cease to pay it. Now, seeing the connection of that nobleman with the government, and that no expression of dissatisfaction followed the declaration of his opinion, I say I cannot confide in the sincerity of the noble lord's declaration in favour of the Established Church, and I have strong grounds for dissenting from the approbation of the conduct of the government which this House is called upon to confirm. Sir, I have now assigned the grounds for my not concurring in the resolution proposed by the noble lord. The noble lord has said that the course of my proceeding would rather require that I should move the previous question—that it is a reason for doing so. It may be so. As I have already said, I move no vote of censure. It would be inconsistent with my course to move a vote of censure. It is more consistent with my views, to ask the House to pause, and to suspend their judgment until they have obtained further information. But, if you say that I ought to affirm an express assent or dissent, then I tell you at once, that for the reasons I have assigned, and with the explanations I have given of my opinion as to the principles on which Ireland should be governed, I will not hesitate to say—No! to your resolution. I have now done; and I thank the House for the attentive hearing it has accorded me. I have attempted to show that a partial declaration of opinion on the part of the House with respect to the policy of the government is not to be justified, and that a collision with the House of Lords cannot be in justice maintained: at the same time, I have not shrunk from declaring to you why, upon Irish grounds, I cannot assent to express an approval of your Irish policy. Should you—the House—think it fit to pronounce a judgment without inquiring, you will do so. If you agree with Mr. Burke, that the peculiar functions of the House of Commons are to exercise a strict control over all the acts of the executive and judicial magistracy, you will pause before you pronounce an opinion. If on looking at the increase of crime in Ireland, and above all, at those most discreditable documents—the reports of the inspectors of prisons and of the clerks of the peace—you think it fitting to declare, that the administration of the law has been effectually provided in Ireland, or that the due execution of it has been advanced; if, with these documents, relating to the same offences, and to the same period of time, but showing an extraordinary difference in amount of crime—the returns of the inspectors for the year 1837 declaring that 14,804 persons were committed, while the returns of the clerks of the peace, for the same period and same offences, state that there were 27,300 persons committed, being a difference of 12,000—if, with these disagreeing statements, and upon these discrepancies before them, the House of Commons will undertake to pronounce an opinion with respect to the administration of the law, they may unquestionably do so; but I ask, how, with any regard to consistency in your proceedings, you can venture to pronounce an opinion upon the subject? The noble lord may talk of the character and dignity of the House of Commons; but it would be neither consistent with its character nor with its dignity to make any declaration as to the state of crime in Ireland upon such data as these. With respect to a collision with the House of Lords, I ask, whether it is for the public interest that any such collision should take place? Looking at the state of this country, and looking at the condition of affairs abroad, was there ever a period in which it was of more importance to maintain harmony between the different branches of the constitution? Do you think, looking at the proceedings in the north of England, you are promoting the cause of tranquillity and the public interest, by holding up the House of Commons and the House of Lords as being at variance? Above all, if these considerations do not move you, I implore you earnestly, but respectfully, to consider, what is due to your honour and to your own character. I implore you not to enter into a premature resolution without the necessary information to guide you; nor to make abstract declarations of opinion upon partial branches of policy, unless you feel confident that there is some absolute and overruling necessity; above all, I ask you not to enter into a collision with the House of Lords, unless you feel justified that there is good cause for collision, and unless you have well considered the consequences of such a proceeding. That great poet, to whom I have already alluded, and whose writings are full of more lessons of practical wisdom than the writings of any uninspired writer, has given advice with respect to entering into quarrels, and, although given to an individual, may be equally profited by a public and national body—

“Beware Of entrance to quarrels; but being in,
Bear it that the opposer may beware of thee.”

You are about to commit a double violation of that precept. You are about to enter into a quarrel, hastily and unwarily; and you have proved that you are about to conduct yourselves in it in a manner that will insure neither terror nor respect. While you are on the threshold of that quarrel, and can still recede, I entreat you to pause. I entreat you, as you value the character of the House of Commons, believing in my conscience that you have no superfluous authority, and desirous as I am that you may maintain every privilege that belongs to you, and that your authority over the people may be preserved intact, with these feelings, I conjure you to reserve the manifestation of your displeasure for some occasion, when, cheered by the sympathies of the people, and confident in the righteousness of your cause, you may be enabled to assume a part, and to speak in accents better suited than the present resolution is, to the offended dignity of the House of Commons. The right hon. baronet concluded, by moving the following amendment:—

“That, on the 13th day of March last, a motion was made in this House for the production of various documents connected with the state of Ireland in respect to crime and outrage, including communications made to the Irish government relating to offenders connected with ribandism, and all memorials, resolutions, and addresses, forwarded to the Irish government by magistrates, or other official persons, in respect of crimes and outrages committed in Ireland, and the answers thereto.

"That the period included within the returns so called for, extends from the commencement of the year 1835 to the present time; and that the motion made for the production of them was assented to by this House, no opposition to it having been offered on the part of her Majesty's government.

"That, on the 21st day of March last, the House of Lords appointed a select committee 'to inquire into the state of Ireland since the year 1835, in respect to crime and outrage, which have rendered life and property insecure in that part of the empire.'

"That, in consequence of the appointment of such committee by the House of Lords, it has been proposed, that this House should resolve, 'That it is the opinion of this House that it is expedient to persevere in those principles which have guided the executive government of Ireland of late years, and which have tended to the effectual administration of the law, and the general improvement of that part of the United Kingdom.'

"Resolved, That it appears to this House that the appointment of a committee of inquiry by the House of Lords, under the circumstances, and for the purpose above mentioned, does not justify her Majesty's ministers in calling upon this House, without previous inquiry, or even the production of the information which this House has required, to make a declaration of opinion with respect to one branch of the public policy of the executive government, still less a declaration of opinion, which is neither explicit as to the principles which it professes to approve, nor definite as to the period to which it refers; and that it is not fitting that this House should adopt a proceeding which has the appearance of calling in question the undoubted right of the House of Lords to inquire into the state of Ireland in respect to crime and outrage, more especially when the exercise of that right by the House of Lords does not interfere with any previous proceeding or resolution of the House of Commons, nor with the progress of any legislative measure assented to by the House of Commons, or at present under its consideration."

On the fifth night of the debate the House divided, government obtaining a majority of 22.

JAMAICA GOVERNMENT BILL.

MAY 3, 1839.

The order of the day having been read for going into committee on this Bill, Lord John Russell moved that the Speaker do now leave the chair.

SIR ROBERT PEEL had hoped that the House might have been spared the necessity of the present discussion, and that they might have come to some arrangement with respect to the government of Jamaica, without any party conflict, or even any serious division of opinion as to the course which it might be advisable to pursue. He had the strongest impression that it was desirable to exhaust every alternative, before proceeding to the forfeiture of the constitution of that important colony, or to the suspension of the system of representative government, and establishing a despotic and arbitrary power in place of that liberal system which had prevailed for upwards of 150 years. He thought, also, that in the event of the necessity for interference being demonstrated by proofs, too unequivocal to be called in question, it was of the utmost importance that the measure to be adopted, in consequence of the continued refusal of the local authorities to exercise their power, should be sanctioned by as strong and as unanimous a concurrence of public sentiment in this country as it was possible to obtain. It was from these joint impressions, of the expediency of postponing the application of absolute suspension till every other alternative had been exhausted, and, if it should at length be inevitable, of the expediency of supporting the measure by the almost unanimous voice of parliament, that he had ventured to make a proposition to her Majesty's government on this subject. It might be that from his imperfect acquaintance with the West Indian colonies, from the absence of the slightest interest with regard to them, and from his want of local knowledge, he overrated the magnitude of this question. He was sure he took a view of its magnitude, different from that which was taken by her Majesty's government, and he had been led to form different conclusions. He had not heard any message delivered to the House respecting Jamaica. He had heard that night a message from the throne, suggesting the union of the Canadas, but he had heard no message lamenting the necessity, but recommending the measure, of suspending the constitution of Jamaica. Nay, he had heard it proposed that the House should depart from the ordinary forms of conducting business, in respect to this measure, and that, the notice having dropped on a preceding day, from a failure of making a House, leave should be given, as a matter of course, to bring in the bill. These circumstances led him to suppose that he formed a different estimate of the importance and magnitude of this question from that which was formed by government. There were other reasons, he confessed, than the abstract consideration of the merits of the question, that led him to a conclusion adverse to abrogating the constitution of this colony. The precedent of Canada, last year, when the House felt themselves under the painful necessity of suspending in that country a popular form of government, was not, in his opinion, an example to be followed, so that the House should, in the very next session, present themselves to the world as compelled to suspend another popular form of government in Jamaica. If, having in one year suspended a popular form of government in the North American provinces, they were, in the very next year, to adopt a similar measure towards the most important of the West Indian colonies, it might seem to be a practice of the parliament to suspend a constitution every session. He would have the House to bear in mind, that the parties with whom they had to deal, had had no notice of this proceeding—that the colonists were up to this hour entirely unaware of the heavy penalty about to be inflicted upon them. He had thought, in considering the possibility that extreme measures might ultimately be forced upon us, that if we had recourse to them after full notice and warning to the colonists, after enabling them to become acquainted with the accusation preferred against them, the infliction would then be more conformable to our sense of justice. Having most carefully examined the papers bearing on this subject, which had been laid before the House, and having re-examined them since the first occasion, he declared with perfect sincerity, that he did not think the House was justified in passing this measure, or that there was any vindication in equity and justice for the course they were about to pursue. He agreed with Mr. Canning, that it would be indeed unwise in the House to abdicate its right of control over the colonies. He agreed with Mr. Canning in the sentiments expressed by him in the following passage, in the year 1824:—"I shall be asked, what are the intentions of the government as to those colonies; by what means is it intended to bring them to reason, and induce them to adopt the views and second the determinations of parliament? There are three possible modes in which parliament might deal with the people of Jamaica. First, it might crush them; by the application of direct force, we might crush them with a finger. Secondly, we might harass them by fiscal regulations and enactments, restraining their navigation. Thirdly, we might pursue the slow and steady course of temperate but authoritative admonition. Now, if I am asked which course I would advise, I am for first trying that which I have last mentioned. I trust we shall never be driven to the second; and with respect to the first, I will only now say, that no feeling of wounded pride, no motive of questionable expediency, nothing short of real and demonstrable necessity shall induce me to moot the awful question of the transcendental power of parliament over every dependency of the British Crown. That transcendental power is an areamum of empire, which ought to be kept back within the penetralia of the constitution. It exists, but it should be veiled. It should not be produced on trifling occasions, or in cases of petty refractoriness, or temporary misconduct. It should be brought forward only in the utmost extremity of the State, where other remedies have failed, to stay the raging of some moral or political pestilence." He could not say that he thought the utmost extremity of this State had arrived; he could not say, looking at the papers laid before the House, that there was any vindication for bringing from the penetralia of the temple, the transcendental power to which Mr. Canning alluded. He begged the House to consider the nature of the measure they were now asked to pass, and the society to which it was to be applied. He wished he could impress them with his own conviction of the deep importance of this question, of the dangerous consequences that would probably follow the double precedent they were now about to set, and the general uneasiness that would be caused in other colonies. He wished he could only impress the House with half the force of his own conviction, and then he should at least insure himself a patient and attentive hearing. The enacting clauses of this bill were contained in two pages; it was a brief and compendious measure, and wisely so; for, first, the necessity of the case might absolutely require, if they were determined to pass this law, that they should take such extraordinary powers; and, secondly, the bill was neither more nor less than a bill for the establishment of a complete despotism. It would establish the most unqualified, unchecked, unmitigated power that was ever applied to the government of any community. He presumed they were not yet arrived at the period when there would be no permission granted to discuss possible abuses of power. It was not sufficient to tell him, that the powers intrusted would not be abused. They ought, in determining a constitution for another people, to consider, not what were the lucky accidents by which tyranny might be averted, but what were the guarantees which the people could have for protection against injustice and oppression. He wished not to be chargeable with the slightest exaggeration in describing the nature of the provisions of this bill; but he asked, was there any Crown colony, not having a charter, and governed by absolute power, that was subject to such regulations as would be established by this measure? Had they ever treated with so much severity a conquered colony, amidst the first heat of animosity after the contest? Some precautions had generally been taken to maintain the existing laws, and the rights and privileges of the inhabitants, but in this case every such precaution was neglected. Ministers took for the Crown the course of appointing councillors, without the slightest reference to the wishes of the governed; they gave to the governor and council unlimited power, without the least check on its exercise from any local authority, enacting, that whatever law they chose to pass, should endure for eighteen months without control. They had passed an act last session, suspending the constitution of Canada. In that case, distinct notice had been given; the supplies had been refused for several years, contrary to what was looked upon as an implied contract; resolutions had been passed, warning the colony of what they might expect; and at length a bill was passed. But had they applied to that colony, then labouring under the ills arising from rebellion, such a measure as they now proposed for Jamaica? Not at all. There was not a word in the preamble of this bill, as to the intention of government in passing it; but in the preamble of the Canada bill, it was distinctly stated, that the measure was intended to enable parliament to frame another constitution, based on popular principles. The plea on which they rested their justification for suspending a popular form of government was, that the measure was only to be temporary, and that its powers were necessary to enable them to restore, in an improved shape, the ancient constitution of the colony. The preamble of that bill contained this recital:—"And whereas it is expedient to make temporary provision for the government of Lower Canada, in order that parliament may be enabled, after mature deliberation, to make permanent arrangements for constructing anew the government of the said province, upon such a basis as may best secure the rights and liberties, and promote the interests of all classes of her Majesty's subjects in the said province." There was not a word of such intentions in the preamble of the present measure, and could they affect to be ignorant, that part of the support given to this bill, was founded on the hope, that the bill would be of permanent duration? He knew they professed that the bill was to be only temporary; that five years had been originally fixed as the period of its duration, and that a proposal might be made to curtail the term: but were they not aware, that there were some men who gave their support to the bill, in the hope that this temporary eclipse of public liberty would not be permitted to expire, that the dismal twilight would continue after the two years or the five years had elapsed, in the belief, that when the light of representative government should once be extinguished, there was no "Promethean heat that could that light relume." He did not think that speculation extravagant; he did not think they would find it so easy to re-establish a popular form of government, or that they now foresaw all the consequences that might result from this. Could they believe it possible that the colony would tamely acquiesce in this treatment, would submit with perfect cheerfulness and satisfaction? Was it in human nature to do so? Could they hope it, after the demonstration of public feeling on the part of those connected with Jamaica? Did they think it likely, that three salaried commissioners sent from home could govern to the satisfaction of the colonists? They gave by this bill unlimited power of taxation, while professing to hold that people should not be taxed without their own consent. They abolished the representative body, which had hitherto possessed the power of imposing taxation, and transferred that power of taxation to a governor and council, appointed without the slightest reference to the feelings and wishes of the colonists. He saw something like an incredulous smile upon the countenances of ministers; but could they deny, that there was no limit to the power of taxation granted to the colony, or to their power of making laws? Suppose this council met with opposition, could not they at once suspend the Habeas Corpus Act? The press of the colony seemed tolerably violent, as far as he could judge. Suppose that it should persevere in using inflammatory and exciting language, and that the council should think its freedom incompatible with the safety of the new government, why might they not at once abolish it? They might tell him, that the council would not do this; but was he not at liberty to argue on the possible abuses of arbitrary government? He defied them to show him any security against those abuses, any protection for the liberty of thought. There was no constitutional security, none except what might be found in the good-will of the parties exercising this power. A guarantee against undue oppression was provided for the rebellious colonists of Canada, but no limits were set to the powers that might be called into action against the people of Jamaica. In the case of Canada, it was provided that the council should have no power to impose any tax, duty, rate, or impost, by any ordinance, save only so far as any such tax or impost, payable at the passing of the act, might thereby be continued. It was carefully provided, that the colonists should not be exposed to the evils of oppressive taxation; the council was debarred from increasing the public burdens. They gave no such security to Jamaica. In regard to personal liberty, to property, to the imposition of taxation, the power they took was perfectly unprecedented. Was he in error as to the nature of the provisions which it was intended to pass into a law? There was not a word in the preamble, of the ultimate intentions of the Imperial legislature—not a word, in the enacting part, of check or control. And now, what was the society to which this bill was to be applied? To understand this part of the question clearly, the House must bear in mind, that Jamaica represents one-half of the possessions of the British Crown in the West Indies; they were about, therefore, to suspend the constitutional government, to establish despotic authority, over one-half of the West India colonies. He was taking the whole of our colonies in that quarter of the world, those in South America as well as the islands. Let not hon. members, let not the House think, that the precedent of this bill for suspending the constitution of Jamaica, and establishing arbitrary authority, did not apply to other of our colonies in those quarters—to British Guiana for instance. Let them not think, that it did not apply except to a small portion of colonial community. He would show them, that the bill would apply to one-half of the population of the West Indian and South American colonies, and also to one-half of every thing that constituted the value of those colonies to Great Britain. The white population of Jamaica, was equal in numbers to one-half of the whole white population of the British colonies in the West Indies and in South America. The whole public revenue of the West Indian colonies was £540,000; the revenue of Jamaica alone amounted to £300,000, being more, as the House saw, than one-half of the whole. The whole annual expenditure of those colonies was £551,000; the annual expenditure of Jamaica reached £300,000. These statements greatly underrated, he believed, the importance of Jamaica, as exhibited by the amount of its taxation and expenditure; but if the bill passed into a law as it stood, the whole of this taxation would be raised by the new council, consisting in part of the stipendiary servants of the Crown. The whole of the expenditure, also, would take place under their direction. Again, the value of the imports of the British colonies in the West Indies and in South America, in 1838, amounted to £5,806,000. The value of the imports into Jamaica, in the same year, was upwards of £3,000,000. The amount of the total exports of the West Indian and South American colonies in that year, was £9,932,300; the amount of exports from Jamaica, in the same period, was calculated at £4,000,000. He had therefore shown, that Jamaica represented one half the trade, one half the revenues, and one half the population, of the West Indian and South American colonies. So much for the importance of Jamaica, as a colony. Next, he would entreat the House to recollect what was the nature of society there—what the character of the people they were about to submit to this extraordinary experiment. It was true, that the black population outnumbered the white; indeed, that the numbers of the white population were as nothing almost, when compared with those of the black; the power of the government was unlimited, if they chose to appear there as upholding the cause of the black population. They had the power. But he need hardly appeal to the generosity of her Majesty's government, or of the House, to enforce the consideration, that, though they had the power, they were not relieved from the duty of claims, that in point of constitutional right, ought not to be dismissed without ample consideration on the part of the British House of Commons. But there was another point, in his opinion, of great importance; it was impossible to hear the proposal now made on the part of her Majesty's government, without recollecting the circumstances of former conflicts and struggles on the part of this country with her colonies. There might be a great difference on many points between the situation of the United States, at the period referred to, and Jamaica now, in respect of their relations as colonies with this country. The extent of the power exercised by the mother country in the two cases might be very different; the power which we exerted in the island of Jamaica now, might very greatly exceed that which Great Britain exercised over the North American plantations in the year 1774. The power of the mother country might be different, but he entreated the House not on that account to permit itself to disregard some similitudes which certainly existed between the things. He wished hon. members, and especially he wished that the members of her Majesty's government, would read again Mr. Burke's speech on his resolutions for conciliation with the colonies, and especially what Mr. Burke then said in recommendation of conciliatory measures; he wished, too, that they would consider how far that similarity between the two cases which he (Sir R. Peel) had suggested, and which they would do well to bear in mind, had a real existence. Mr. Burke said, that there was exhibited on the part of the colonies a disobedient and intractable spirit; at least, he admitted the fact: and, no doubt, one of the difficulties with which the Imperial government had to contend, in reference to her colonial policy, was to maintain popular government consistently with the peculiar situation of those countries as colonies; they had to contend with the difficulties in administering government which the use of popular assemblies must needs carry along with it; but her Majesty's ministers must have been aware that they had difficulties, which were inseparable from administering government in conjunction with popular assemblies, to contend with, and that they ought to foresee and provide for those difficulties; and it became, therefore, the more important and indispensable, that they should exhaust every possible device of careful and honourable policy before they resorted to the adoption of an extreme measure like this. Mr. Burke enumerated "six capital sources," as he called them, of dispute:—"From these six capital sources—of descent, of form of government, of religion in the northern provinces, of manners in the southern, of education, in the remoteness of situation from the first mover of government—from all these causes, a fierce spirit of liberty has grown up. It has grown with the growth of the people in your colonies, and increased with the increase of their wealth—a spirit that, unhappily, meeting with an exercise of power in England which, however lawful, is not reconcilable to any ideas of liberty, much less with theirs, has kindled this flame that is ready to consume us."

These were the six capital causes; and he entreated the House to consider how far these six capital causes, or sources, were in operation in the colonies at the present day. Let the House and her Majesty's government consider whether none of these were in action at present. Did the cause of descent operate nothing at all? If the descent of the original colonists of the North American provinces from certain classes of Englishmen operated, in 1774, to make them the more impatient under the restraints of arbitrary government, how was the colony of Jamaica differently placed, which owed its colonization by British subjects to the conquest that was made of it by the arms of Cromwell, and whose first English population was composed of those who, disgusted with the excesses of the civil wars, there found a refuge? A similar cause, therefore, of disobedience, operated there in respect of descent, as was in operation in the North American colonies, when Mr. Burke spoke. But, perhaps, it might be thought, that the circumstance of this being a population of slaveholders made a complete distinction, and rendered them more easily governed. According to Mr. Burke, it did not. For while he represented that, religion formed one of the causes of the refractory spirit of the northern provinces; in the south, where the same principles were not in existence, there was still a cause at work—namely, manners, which, in this respect, he considered as supplying the place of religion, as far as regarded the spirit of reluctance to submit to arbitrary rule, and he spoke of the colonies of Virginia and the Carolinas then, as Jamaica now, slave-holding colonies, but without intimating, in the least, that he thought, that because the people of those colonies were slaveholders, that they were on that account the more easily governed. He said, “There is, however, a circumstance attending these colonies which, in my opinion, fully counterbalances this difference,—namely, religion—‘and makes the spirit of liberty still more high and haughty than in those of the northward. It is, that in Virginia and the Carolinas they have a vast multitude of slaves. Where this is the case in any part of the world, those who are free are by far the most proud and jealous of their freedom.’ ‘Freedom is to them not only an enjoyment, but a kind of rank and privilege. I do not mean, Sir, to commend the superior morality of this sentiment, which has, at least, as much pride as virtue in it; but I cannot alter the nature of man. The fact is so; and these people of the southern colonies are much more strongly, and with a higher and more stubborn spirit, attached to liberty, than those to the northward. Such were all the ancient commonwealths; such were our Gothic ancestors; such, in our days, were the Poles; and such will be all masters of slaves who are not slaves themselves. In such a people, the haughtiness of domination combines with the spirit of freedom, fortifies it, and renders it invincible.”

The House might despise the sentiments; but, as Mr. Burke said, it was human nature, and with that nature the House had to deal. So far, therefore, the cases of Virginia and the Carolinas were, he conceived, not so very far different from that of Jamaica. Then, with reference to the distance from the home government, Mr. Burke said—“The last cause of this disobedient spirit in the colonies is hardly less powerful than the rest, as it is not merely moral, but laid deep in the natural constitution of things. Three thousand miles of ocean lie between you and them. No contrivance can prevent the effect of this distance in weakening government. Seas roll, and months pass, between the order and the execution, and the want of a speedy explanation of a single point is enough to defeat a whole system.”

They had all that difficulty and inconvenience in the case of Jamaica; three thousand miles of seas roll between her and Great Britain, and interpose numberless difficulties in the way of carrying on the government of the country, by an administration at home. When Charles II. came to the throne, or shortly after, in 1661, he gave Jamaica its first regular form of government. The House of Assembly, however, was not established until a period a little later. A governor and council governed the colony. This form of government became subsequently unpopular in the island; but, in 1661, in the midst of the first burst of loyalty which spread throughout the nation and its dependencies, Charles II. provided that the legislative authority should be vested in the governor and council of twelve, and that the members of it should be chosen by the Crown. A few years afterwards, the House of Assembly was constituted. In 1678, began a series of attacks on the privileges of that House of Assembly, by the then ministers of Charles II., which were completely repelled and rendered nugatory, by the firmness and the perseverance of the Assembly. But, let the House remember, a Chatham had not then spoken about the right of imposing taxes on the colonies; the American revolution had not taken place; popular principles were not so well understood then as now; yet Charles II. and his ministers failed in their attempts on the liberty and constitution of Jamaica. He mentioned this, for the purpose of warning hon. gentlemen opposite, that though it was true the negro population greatly exceeded the white population in numbers, they might expect to encounter greater difficulties in administering the government of Jamaica from home, than the power of so limited a place might suggest. No doubt her Majesty's government would have facilities for carrying the measure into operation. Doubtless the masters would be powerless, if the government declared themselves the protectors of the negroes. But let not the government suppose that Jamaica was an isolated case; let them not suppose, either, that he said this in a minatory tone; but what he meant was, that the effect of proclaiming to Jamaica the principle adopted in this measure, and the spirit which that principle, in his opinion, was calculated to evoke in Jamaica, was not likely to be bounded by the limits of that island, but might be expected to extend to the other West-Indian colonies. If there was any document which, more than another, would clearly show this, it was the address of the assembly of St. Christopher's, which he would quote, that the House might see the possibility of the case of Jamaica attracting sympathy on the part of other colonies, which sympathy was not at present expected to arise, when the new form of government should have come into operation in that island. The House of Assembly of St. Christopher's, not at all foreseeing this measure, but speaking solely of their own affairs, said, in an address to Lord Glenelg—"In conclusion, we firmly assure your lordship, that we shall use all constitutional and legal means for the defence of our best rights. We know that we are weak and poor, and form a very insignificant portion of the empire; but this very inability to stand alone against power, will procure us defenders amongst those of the British parliament who shall consider our cause a just one, and therefore we feel strong in our weakness, and rich in our poverty. We assure your lordship, that we will proceed cautiously and temperately, but, at the same time, with firmness and perseverance, to uphold our chartered and constitutional rights. That we will not tamely surrender, or consent to be robbed, without resistance, of our own, or the rights of our constituents. Trifling as our privileges may appear to your lordship, they are here held dear and sacred, and the loss of them would be severely felt."

This had no reference to the pending measure; but whenever a knowledge of that measure should reach the West Indies, let not the government flatter themselves, that the feeling of indignation would be confined to the Island of Jamaica. A sympathy would be excited throughout the West Indian possessions of the Crown, which, in his opinion, it would not be in human nature to withhold, unless it manifestly appeared, that justice was on the side of the parliament and government of Great Britain. The measure, in his opinion, if it passed in its present shape, would certainly excite a degree of sympathy which, it would be found, would greatly obstruct the success of the new plan of government. Her Majesty's government might bring forward their three new stipendiary councillors, who might be, for any thing he learned from the bill, three aides-de-camp of the governor, and enable them, if they pleased, to exert a power of unlimited taxation; but, if they persisted in this, did they really flatter themselves that they would have the quiet acquiescence of the people of Jamaica in the measure? Did they recollect the act of 1774, for the better regulating the government of the province of Massachusetts Bay? Did they recollect the recital of that act? "Whereas taxation by the parliament of Great Britain, for the purpose of raising revenue, is found by experience to occasion great uneasiness in the minds of his Majesty's subjects in his provinces (Massachusetts), this is to declare, that the King and Parliament of Great Britain will not impose any future tax or assessment for the purpose of raising revenue?"

Did they remark, that the bill took the whole executive power out of the hands of an existing popular governor, and placed it in the hands of a governor and councillors? Did they recollect this? If they referred to the eventful history of that period, could they fail to remark how singular it was, that a bill proposed in the present reign should so nearly resemble the "Act for the better regulating the government of the province of Massachusetts Bay?" But let them remember, that a time came when the parliament of this country was obliged to give in its formal renunciation of the asserted right of taxation, and a solemn declaration followed, stating, that it was necessary and expedient to repeal the act for the better providing for the government of the province of Massachusetts Bay, which was the model on which the present measure for providing for the government of the island of Jamaica was founded. Surely, these considerations ought to have considerable weight with the House, which could scarcely hear them, without conceding that they ought to have some influence. The House could not consider the origin of the people of Jamaica; they could not consider the history of the conflicts and contentions which had passed between the home government in Charles II.'s time and the House of Assembly of Jamaica; they could not consider the natural repugnance of Jamaica, and of all colonies, to be taxed by the mother country, or by any other than their own representatives, without feeling, that they ought to pause before they made any return to any of those measures to which he had alluded as having been adapted to the North American colonies. The state of the society to which this measure was to be applied, suggested many important considerations; but if there was any one thing which could aggravate the danger and inconvenience to be apprehended from the passing of such an act, more than another—arising, he meant, from out of the measure itself, it would be, to pass the measure on false pretences. If there was any one thing which could tend to diminish the authority of parliament, and lessen the veneration felt for the mother country—if there was any one thing which would go to make a precedent of colonial legislation full of danger to all time to come, that thing would be, and that danger would immediately arise, if they were to pass a bill of this kind on false grounds. He could conceive reasons of public convenience strong enough; he could conceive the occurrence of circumstances imperative enough, to make it necessary to suspend for a time the constitution in a British colony; but if he found that course necessary, his advice to her Majesty's government, or to any government, would be, on their bringing forward a measure for that purpose—"By all means, for the sake of reconciling it to the people, put forth none but your real reasons for proposing the measure." When his noble friend near him proposed a measure for the abolition of slavery in 1833, he (Sir R. Peel) could conceive it possible that it might have been suggested to him, "We are about to make an experiment, the issue of which is necessarily uncertain. We are about to abolish slavery; we are afraid that the measure may call forth local uneasiness; we have no assurance that an Assembly which was calculated for a state of slavery, may not be found unfit to conduct the government where all are to be free. We think that something ought to be done to suspend for a time the functions of the House; we call upon you to relieve the local authorities from the burden of carrying the emancipation into effect; we will take upon ourselves the whole responsibility; we are determined by a general measure to suspend all the West Indian governments, in favour of the liberated class; we are determined, in expectation of the inconvenience and uneasiness which may arise to the colonial governments, to take their duties on ourselves." Such, he could imagine, might have been the tone of the suggestions made to his noble friend at the time when the measure of negro emancipation was yet untried. But that experiment had been made. Freedom had been established, slavery was abolished, and they had not proposed any general measure for the protection of the negro; they did not feel satisfied of the incompetence and unfitness of the local governments to administer their local affairs; that was not the ground on which they rested. Because, if they rested their justification of this measure upon that ground, Jamaica and Barbadoes ought to be subjected to the same measure. They might say, also, that there was a great experiment about to be made in Jamaica. They might say, that the negro population, although they had acquired freedom, had not acquired a right to the elective franchise. They might say, that although the result of the experiment of abolition had exceeded their most sanguine hopes, yet still they were desirous to provide, by the supreme authority, for the admission of the negro population to civil and political rights. If these were the reasons for this bill, they were as applicable to the other colonies, unless they knew of something peculiar in the constitution of Jamaica. But, granting that there was something peculiar—that there was something that made it wise to undertake the solution of this question—why, if this were the true reason that suggested this act, why not put it in the preamble, and tell the grounds on which they rested? He was not aware whether that danger existed which some gentlemen seemed to apprehend. It had been suggested—for the purpose, doubtless, of conciliating support for this act—that it was desirable for the protection of the negroes. If that were true, let it be told. Why not say that they thought there was so much of irritation, that the House of Assembly was unfit to legislate in this particular, and let them know what limitation was to be put upon the precedent they were about to set, and what justification there was for this act? There might be danger existing—he could not say, from any communications he had had with those who were intimate with the West Indies, that they appeared to apprehend danger to the extent that some seemed to think. The elective franchise in Jamaica was exercised by those who held a freehold of the value of £10 a year currency, or £7 sterling, or a leasehold of the yearly value of £50. Freedom was now established in the island; there was no distinction known, in the eye of the law, between black and white; the black man had a perfect right to be elected to the House of Assembly, and there were in the assembly eight coloured persons, and he rejoiced at it. He thought this was perfectly right, that the negro population should exercise their legitimate rights, but that they could do according to the existing law. The existing law provided that there should be no distinction between black and white; therefore, upon the possession of the necessary freehold, the negro was entitled to the franchise. Did they apprehend that the franchise was too limited or too extensive? As to its being too extensive, no man could exercise the franchise till after he had obtained a freehold, and he could not think that the negro, by his industry, would be admitted in such numbers as greatly to endanger the white population. Then, with reference to the House of Assembly: what was the amount of the qualification of a member of that house? The amount was £300 a-year, or freehold property of the value of £3,000. It did not appear to him that the negro population would exercise immediate control over the constituent or representative body, but they were entitled to freedom and the franchise under the existing law. The late secretary of the colonies suggested that some restrictions should be put upon the franchise—for instance, that the negro should be entitled to exercise the franchise only, in case he was able to read and write. He would not discuss this. It might be very proper that some restrictions should be imposed; but surely these restrictions, fortified by the authority of parliament, the House of Assembly would impose, and would not be disinclined to impose. Why, then, was it necessary to exert the supreme authority of the State to impose any qualification with regard to the franchise? If that was the reason for which this bill was to be passed, let it be distinctly avowed. But the reason that was avowed, was of another kind. He had a right to judge of the bill by the reasons he found alleged in the preamble, and it would be perfectly consistent in him to reject the bill on the ground on which it was proposed to pass it; and yet if he were told, that for public considerations intervention was necessary, it would be perfectly right for him, before he assented to the bill, to demand what pretext or justification there was for it; and if he thought that justification was not well founded, it would be perfectly right in him to refuse to assent to the bill. He had a perfect right to refuse to take into consideration those collateral reasons that might be suggested as the real vindication of this measure. He took it for granted that the House would agree with him, that nothing could be so injurious to their character, nothing so fatal to their authority, as assigning false pretexts for passing a bill. He thought the House would agree with him, also, in thinking, that in a measure of this extreme importance the real cause of passing the bill ought to be stated. He came then to the consideration of whether or not the preamble contained a vindication of this measure. It said,—“Whereas the House of General Assembly of the island of Jamaica, having been summoned to meet on the 17th of December, 1838, to make, constitute, and ordain laws, statutes, and ordinances, for the public welfare and good government of the said island, and having met in pursuance of such summons, did then resolve, that unless certain conditions should be complied with, to which it is not expedient that parliament should accede, they would abstain from the exercise of any legislative function, excepting such as might be necessary to preserve inviolate the faith of the island with the public creditors. And whereas it has thus become necessary that temporary provision should be made for making, constituting, and ordaining, laws, statutes, and ordinances, for the public welfare and good government of the said island; be it therefore enacted,” &c.

That was the whole of the preamble. That was the vindication of this measure. There was not a word of the general unfitness of the local assembly to legislate. There was not a word as to the peculiar circumstances of Jamaica with respect to the elective franchise, to call for the temporary application of the supreme authority. There was merely an allegation that the House of Assembly had refused to perform their legislative functions. Ministers professed to regret the necessity which gave them the opportunity of proposing this measure; and so far from thinking the local assembly disqualified—so far from its being a subject of exultation, that they had found a good reason for getting rid of them, they appeared to consider it a source of mortification and regret that they should be obliged to resort to this measure. He came next to the consideration of this important question. Was there a sufficient vindication for the suspension of the legislative functions of the House of Assembly stated in the preamble of the bill? Her Majesty's ministers said, that it was not merely on account of the refusal of the House of Assembly to consent to the prison act, and the act for the emancipation of the negroes, but on account of a long-continued series of misconduct, and their refusal to co-operate cordially with the home government, that this measure was necessary. That was one of the reasons assigned. Now, would the House hear him for one moment? The House of Assembly was absent. The House of Assembly was not aware of the indictment that was preferred against them. He would summon some witnesses to appear on the part of the House of Assembly, in order to prove that the alleged continuous misconduct on the part of the House of Assembly, was utterly inconsistent with their past conduct. He had public declarations that were made with respect to the conduct of the House of Assembly. He would summon no witnesses whose testimony was liable to suspicion. The witnesses he would summon should be the ministers themselves, and the governors of the island. The period over which the allegation of refractory conduct extended, dated from the passing of the slavery emancipation bill, in the year 1837—from the latter end of that year. He proposed to divide this period into two, because in the latter part of the period—namely, the period that had elapsed from 1837 to 1839—there had been two new causes of dissension, namely, the precipitate termination of the apprenticeship, and the passing of the prisons' bill. Let the House see how the House of Assembly had acted, to the latter end of the year 1837. He wished he could append to this bill for the destruction of the constitution of Jamaica, the declarations that had been made up to the year 1837, with respect to the conduct of the House of Assembly. The emancipation act was passed in the year 1833. Parliament met in the year 1834, and the Speech from the Throne contained this passage:—"Of the measures which have, in consequence, received the sanction of the legislature, one of the most difficult and important was the bill for the abolition of slavery. The manner in which that beneficent measure has been received throughout the British colonies, and the progress already made in carrying it into execution by the legislature of the island of Jamaica, afford just grounds for anticipating the happiest results."

He would begin with 1834, at that period when a great change in the state of society commenced in Jamaica; and yet, in 1834, the House of Assembly of Jamaica was selected by the Crown for special approbation in the King's Speech, on account of the progress already made in carrying into execution the Slavery Abolition Act. In 1836, the Marquis of Sligo relinquished the government of Jamaica, and he found that, on relinquishing the government, his last despatch to the Secretary of State, dated August 23rd, 1836, contained the following passage:—"In making to your lordship my usual report on the state of the island, the last that in all probability it will be my duty to make in the character of the governor of this colony, it is my pride and satisfaction to say, that I leave the administration of affairs in the hands of my successor in as satisfactory a state as can be well imagined."

A new governor succeeded in 1836; and he would read an extract from his despatch, dated the 8th November, 1836; but first he would read a passage from the new governor's speech to the House of Assembly. The address of the governor (the present governor) on that occasion, was as follows:—"I have not forgotten, that Jamaica set the first example in speedily and laudably giving effect to the wishes of the Imperial parliament, in the furtherance of emancipation, and I feel under great obligations to them for their conduct on this occasion."

Had they been cajoling the House of Assembly? Were not these honest compliments? They were upon record—those compliments were upon record. He would, however, read the despatch of the Governor to the Secretary of State; and before doing so, he would observe, that there was no necessity for cajolery between the Governor and the Secretary of State. To the Secretary of State he would at least write his honest opinions. It might be said, "Oh, we used very civil terms to the House of Assembly; for although we utterly disapproved of their conduct, we endeavoured to coax them into compliance with our wishes; we were therefore particularly civil to them; unfortunately these civilities are upon record; they appear contrary to our acts, but we can pick out other messages in which we blamed this very body; we were not sincere in those expressions of approbation; we did this from good motives, but we never gave them the slightest credit for their acts; unfortunately, these things are upon record in the papers presented to the House; the declarations of our approbation compared with our acts." But what said the governor of Jamaica, in his despatch to the Secretary of State—and here let him remind the House, that this was not addressed to the House of Assembly—it was addressed, as he before said, to the Secretary of State, and purported to give an account of the dissolution of the Assembly. On the 4th November, 1836, the governor, in proroguing the House of Assembly, said:—"He acknowledged with great pleasure the ready attention which they had given to all his suggestions, and that he was happy to bear testimony to the zeal with which they had applied themselves to the public business, and he could not omit expressing his gratification at the friendly understanding that appeared to animate them upon all occasions during the session."

The preamble of this bill ought to have run thus:—"Whereas compliments have been passed by the governor to the House of Assembly, and whereas those compliments were never intended, and whereas therefore they ought not to be pleaded as obstacles in the passing of this bill:"—let them have this inserted, in order that posterity, looking at their compliments and their acts, may say, that never were enactments so inconsistent with, and so contradictory to their declarations and assurances; and let posterity see what were the grounds of continued misconduct upon which the people of Jamaica had forfeited their constitution. On the 13th of March, 1837, the governor, not addressing the House of Assembly, not cajoling them by compliments, but writing to the Secretary of State, said:—"I enclose for your lordship's information a printed copy of the law, relative to classification, by legal enactment, of the apprenticed population. The chairman of the committee appointed to bring in this bill, communicated with me freely with respect to its details, and, at my suggestion, one or two clauses were struck out, which appeared to me to militate against the provisions of the Imperial Abolition Act."

And what said the Secretary of State on the 1st of May, 1837?—"It has been very gratifying to me to learn by this despatch the successful result of my recommendation, and your efforts to introduce a classification which will effectually obviate the confusion and discontent which might otherwise have prevailed at the expiration of fifteen months from the present time. In this result, I gladly acknowledge one of the beneficial consequences which have followed from the friendly understanding which has prevailed between yourself and the House of Assembly."

If her Majesty's ministers really felt, that all this time the Assembly was utterly unworthy of confidence, why talk of the friendly understanding that prevailed, and the good consequences that resulted from it—if they felt, that that friendly understanding existed only in appearance, and that the House of Assembly was guilty of hollow pretences, and was utterly unworthy of confidence? The government disapproved of the act of classification afterwards; but they did not find out the objections to it till after the lapse of four months, and accordingly, on the 1st of September, the Secretary of State wrote a despatch, recalling the expression of approbation; but still, in the previous May, the opinion of the Secretary of State was, that that bill was one of the beneficial consequences that followed from the friendly understanding that prevailed between himself and the House of Assembly. Was it possible—and let them recollect, that he was only speaking up to May, 1837, when the Secretary of State and the Governor distinctly declared the existence of a friendly understanding, which was attended with the most beneficial consequences—was it possible to assent to a declaration, that even up to that period there had existed nothing of a good understanding? How could they do it? He came, then, to the 24th of October, 1837, which brought him down to the end of the first period. On that occasion the governor, on addressing the House of Assembly, said:—"On my first meeting the legislature, I brought such subjects to their notice as I considered of paramount importance, and I had the satisfaction of witnessing last session an anxious desire on your part to improve the condition of the negro population. Frequent experience in your local affairs has not diminished my confidence on that and other subjects, particularly that you will receive from me, with your usual liberality, such suggestions as I may have to offer to you for the improvement of the future interests of the masters and apprentices."

Was this truth, or was it not? Had the governor witnessed this anxious desire, or had he not? If he had not witnessed it, was it wise to state that he had? And, if he had witnessed it, let him ask how could they propose this bill in 1837, and with such a declaration on record, how was it possible to consent to the passing of this bill now? He dared say, that her Majesty's ministers might produce other despatches conflicting with those; but what would that show? Was there not upon the public records of parliament this testimony, that, up to the year 1837, the House of Assembly had been guilty of no act that warranted the House of Commons in suspending their constitution? He would now take the other period that had elapsed between the close of 1837 and the present time. He did not appear as the advocate of the House of Assembly. He would not recede from any one expression he had used respecting their conduct. He regretted deeply the course they had taken; nothing could be more unwise. He thought it would have been infinitely better if they had performed the duties, and cordially co-operated in the furtherance of that great experiment, which the people of this country had a right to see fulfilled. He said again, he did not stand there as the advocate of the House of Assembly. He blamed their language—he blamed their acts; but the question the House had to consider was, whether that language and those acts justified the House in suspending the constitution of Jamaica, and placing the liberties and properties of a whole people under the arbitrary control of a governor and his council. He foresaw the time might occur when they would wish that they had attended to his suggestions. He wished that they should pause—that they should remonstrate—that they should see what could be effected by time, that great assuager of human passions as well as of human woes—that they should give the House of Assembly time to reflect upon their conduct, and to become convinced of the impropriety of the course they had adopted. If they had made but one overture of peaceful adjustment, and failed, he had promised to them his cordial support in carrying out any measure which the exigency of the case might then require. But the government had not acted so; they had assumed the case at its utmost extremity of difficulty, and had proposed a course which would place the Assembly more in the right, and ourselves more in the wrong, than at the outset. For his own part, he thought that it would have been better that the government had not passed the Prisoners' bill at the end of a session, and under the circumstances that they did; but that they should have expressed their decision of the necessity for a general legislation upon this subject for all the colonies alike. They should have done this, and sought, as far as possible, to conciliate the local legislature, and explain the urgency of the case; and, failing in this appeal, much of the present difficulty would have been obviated, and the public mind prepared for, and reconciled to, the steps which circumstances might render necessary. Nay, more, he had said, that if delay would, in the present case, be dangerous, if it was absolutely necessary to do something to meet the present difficulty, he would assent to any measure which might be absolutely necessary to carry on the government of the colony. These were the proposals which he then made to her Majesty's ministers, and deeply did he regret that, although he doubted not with the best motives, they had refused to entertain them. But as the government had refused to accede to these terms, he now felt bound to state the grounds upon which he should refuse to assent to the course which they now proposed. As he said before, he thought it impossible, after the admissions made by the government in their despatches, to establish any case of misconduct on the part of the Assembly, warranting such a strong measure as the present, up to the period of October, 1837. He came now to consider what had taken place since 1837. Since that year, two important measures had been passed, the one abolishing or curtailing the apprenticeship system by two years, and the other the Prisons' Act, which had more immediately led to the present rupture. Now, with respect to the first measure, what had occurred? In 1833, the parliament of this country provided that the apprenticeship system should continue till the year 1840, partly to enable them to pass certain measures which would become necessary under the altered condition of the colonies, and which they had omitted to provide for in the act of emancipation, and partly as a compensation to the West-India proprietors in aid of the £20,000,000, granted as a consideration for their pecuniary loss. In the year 1838, a great ferment took place in this country, accompanying a demand for the curtailment of this apprenticeship system. The government determined to resist this demand, and they did so successfully. But on what did they found this their resistance, but on the simple fact, that the national faith was pledged to the arrangement which had been previously entered into, and that, so strongly did the government feel the obligation of that pledge to be, that they would abdicate their functions rather than yield to public clamour in a demand so obviously in violation of public faith? The motion was, nevertheless, carried against the government, and then they came down and made a motion, which was carried, rescinding the former resolution. But although the government would not consent to this proposition, the curtailment of the apprenticeship system was effected by the local legislature of the island. Now, the Assembly of Jamaica did so from one of two causes, either through fear, or from motives of generosity. Let the government assume of these grounds which ever they pleased. If it were from mere generosity and philanthropic feeling on the part of the legislature of the island—from a desire to terminate the evils of slavery, and ameliorate the condition of the black population, to the sacrifice of some private interests and rights—if this were the incentive to the act, then he thought that it was one which called for and deserved some show of generosity—some conciliatory allowance on the part of the government whose views they had so far endeavoured to meet. But suppose the other alternative to be true, and that they had yielded to the pressure of public opinion, and the severe apprehension of not being able peaceably to maintain their rights and property under other terms. What had the State done in return? It had made no equivalent for the sacrifice; it had declared it would make none. He was ready to grant that it was through the influence of fear that the Assembly had abolished the apprenticeship system; but if so, might not some allowance be fairly made for the irritation naturally occasioned by such a forced abandonment of individual interest, which the government had already said the national faith was pledged to? If, on the other hand, it was from mere motives of generosity that this measure was passed, had not the Assembly a fair right to appeal for some share of generosity from the government in return? You might not admire the chivalrous feelings under which the measure was adopted; but, at least, you should make some allowance if, on coming to the adoption of it, the Assembly indulged in some irritable language which might not strictly be justifiable. He now came to the Prisons' bill. Coincidences were sometimes unpleasant, but, in the present case, he could not avoid referring to some which suggested themselves in a very marked manner. On the 16th of July, the government received an account of the fact, that the colonial legislature of Jamaica, by its own act, had terminated the apprenticeship system at a much earlier period than it was originally limited to. He would beg now to read to the House the terms in which Sir Lionel Smith communicated this important event to the government of this country, in a despatch addressed to Lord Glenelg, dated 16th June, 1838. Sir Lionel Smith says:—"I have the sincere satisfaction to acquaint your lordship that I this day assented to an act which has passed the Council and Assembly, for the total abolition of the pradial apprenticeship on and from the first day of August next." "I anticipate the happiest results from this event towards all classes of her Majesty's subjects." "I beg to enclose your lordship the Act passed on this occasion, which I hope may be found sufficient to secure the rights of the labouring population in their free condition, and to protect the aged, diseased, and infirm. I have, further, the honour to transmit a copy of my speech, by which I prorogued the session to the 17th of next month."

On the 15th of June the governor prorogued both houses of the legislature, which had so conducted themselves as to call forth this address from him:—"Gentlemen of the Council,—Mr. Speaker, and Gentlemen of the House of Assembly,—I congratulate you and the whole country on the Act for the abolition of the apprenticeship from the first of August next, and most fervently do I hope that it may insure to the colony those advantages which equal liberty under wise laws has ever been found to produce." "I am happy that I can now grant you a recess, as I am most anxious that you should, by returning to your homes, be enabled to make such arrangements as may give encouragement to the industry of the free labourer, and by your example, prepare all ranks to meet the approaching change in a spirit of kindness and mutual good-will."

The governor then added—"It will, I am convinced, prove a source of lasting satisfaction to you, that this final declaration of unrestricted freedom has been the act of the legislature of Jamaica; and I cordially thank you for the great boon it confers upon those whose former condition has long been the cause of painful discontent both here and in the mother country."

Here the governor, in permitting the members to return to their homes, says, he does so, that they may "be enabled to make such arrangements as may give encouragement to the industry of the free labourer," and he assures them that "it would prove a source of lasting satisfaction to them, that this final declaration of unrestricted freedom had been the act of the legislature of Jamaica." This despatch was, as he had said, received on the 16th of July, 1838, and on the very next day the government presented to the House of Lords the bill, which was subsequently passed, for regulating the prisons in our West-India colonies. This was on the very day after the receipt of the intelligence that the legislature of Jamaica had passed the act for abridging the apprenticeship. The answer of the House of Assembly to the opening address of the governor, seemed as if they had anticipated some interference with them by parliament, for they say:—"On receiving the despatches alluded to by your excellency, we shall proceed, in the critical posture in which the island is placed, to give to the momentous matters submitted to us our most serious consideration. Jamaica does, indeed, require repose, and we anxiously hope that, should we determine to remove an unnatural servitude, we shall be left, in the exercise of our constitutional privileges, to legislate for the benefit of all classes, without any further parliamentary interference." He repeated, that on the day after the receipt of the governor's despatch, conveying the intelligence that the legislature of Jamaica had passed the act curtailing the apprenticeship by two years, and putting an end to it altogether by the 1st of August, 1838, ministers presented the Prisons' Regulation bill to the House of Lords. He did not know whether Captain Pringle's report was then printed, though he believed not, but on that he laid no stress. Now, he was ready to concede that the Prisons' bill was a wise measure, and necessary for a general system of prison regulation in our West-India colonies, and that it was right to pass it, and to adhere to it; but at the same time, he could not help calling attention to the unfortunate coincidence, that this measure was proposed by the government at home, upon the very day they had received the intelligence of the House of Assembly having parted with a part of its compensation for the loss of their slaves, at the same time expressing a hope that the legislature of the colony would, in future, be "left in the exercise of their constitutional privileges, to legislate for the benefit of all classes, without any further parliamentary interference." When this fact was considered, did it not, he would ask, form a good ground for overlooking the irritation of the House of Assembly on learning the proceedings in the Imperial parliament? He again declared, that he did not stand there as the advocate or defender of the conduct of the House of Assembly on that occasion. He would admit it to be foolish and unjustifiable; but let him ask, was the course pursued by the government such as at all tended to conciliate the legislature or the people of Jamaica to the Act sent out to them? Even the manner in which the Act was made public, was enough to add to the irritation which its enactments created. The governor proclaimed the Act, and that proclamation was the first intimation which the House of Assembly got of this law, which they were thus called on to obey. The governor subsequently summoned the Assembly, and in his opening speech said not one word about this Act, but merely said, that he had some important despatches to lay before them. The measure, he would admit, might be a good and necessary one, but he would put it to the House, whether the more wise and prudent course would not have been to communicate it in a manner which would have tended to conciliate the Assembly to it? It might be said that there was no precedent for such a course, but neither was there for the Prisons' Bill itself; and as there was none, it would have been wise and prudent to communicate it in a conciliatory manner. What was the course adopted with respect to the bill in Barbadoes?

The governor there sent a message to the House of Assembly—he spoke only from the information derived from a Jamaica paper. In that it was stated, that Sir Eyan McGregor, the governor of Barbadoes, did communicate the nature of the despatches he had received to the Assembly. He informed them of the nature of the bill that had come out—that it had been passed by the Imperial legislature for the general assimilation of prison discipline in the West-India colonies, but that it would not be drawn into a precedent, and that he hoped it would not give rise to any jealousy on the part of the local legislature. That was a prudent and a conciliatory course, but nothing of the kind was done in Jamaica. These, he again said, were matters which should be taken into consideration in looking at the subsequent conduct of the House of Assembly. He repeated, that he did not stand there to vindicate that conduct. He was far from being satisfied with it, or with the spirit which the Assembly had manifested. (Cheers.) He understood that cheer; but hon. members must admit that there was a vast difference between disapproving the acts of the Assembly, and consenting on such grounds as had been stated—on such grounds as the preamble of this bill had put forth—to wrest its long-enjoyed constitution from an old and valuable colony. He would contend, that on such grounds as the preamble set forth, they could not support this bill, and on that ground he could not support it. What he said was, that the preamble of this bill did not support its provisions, and upon that ground he should refuse it his assent. He thought that the House of Commons should not be too prone to resent expressions of jealousy, or any ebullitions of anger in other legislative bodies. He thought that they should have some feeling of sympathy for a popular body, whose jealousy had been excited by acts of interference on the part of the executive power. It was no reflection on themselves to admit it, but admitted it must be, that it was an inseparable condition in the institution of popular assemblies, to be prone to breaking out in excesses; but if they were to be too keen in repressing each of such ebullitions, as it occurred, would they not run the risk of finally destroying altogether the constitutional principle to which those popular bodies owed their existence and their value? And he thought that this House should be the last of these popular assemblies to be too ready in resenting the excesses of others. One fortnight had scarcely elapsed since this House resented a supposed interference, not with its privileges, but with its expressed opinions, by the House of Lords. The House of Commons fancied it saw, in some proceedings of the House of Lords, an interference with its expressed opinions—its adopted course of policy—and therefore it came forward, ready to mark its indignation at the supposed encroachment, and manifest its jealousy of its privileges. That was their last act in reference to the House of Lords. What was to be their next? They were now to approach the House of Lords, and to ask them to punish the refractory Commons of Jamaica. Jealous and vigilant in the assertion of its own privileges, if the House of Lords appointed a committee to inquire into the state of Ireland, which, in fact, was no infringement of the privileges of the Commons, but, at most, contrary to its expressed opinions, this House then agreed to a resolution to express its indignation at such a proceeding, and so justify every popular assembly which might form itself after our mode. The House of Commons, concluded the right hon. baronet, which, on the 22nd of April, had shown its great sensitiveness at what might even remotely affect its rights, now turns on another popular assembly, moving, it was true, in a smaller orbit, but gravitating to a common centre, and for language and conduct which might find an excuse in our example, calls on the House of Lords to help it in crushing, for a time at least, that refractory Assembly. The roof of this House had scarcely ceased to ring with the loud assertion of the rights and privileges of a popular assembly, when we are ready to go up to the House of Lords, and present to them the House of Assembly of Jamaica as a nuisance which ought to be abated. We call upon them to help us to abolish for a time that Assembly, and enable the Lords of Jamaica to tax the people of that colony without representation. “Don’t be alarmed,” we say to them, “Don’t feel any jealousy—don’t fear any abuse—you may depend on the Lords of Jamaica for taxing the people. Popular assemblies are dangerous things: we pray you, therefore, to help us to enable them to exercise all the powers of the government without the intervention of popular representation.” Is the House, I ask, prepared to take this course? If it is, it will place itself in a most strange position, which may end in placing some of its own dearest privileges in jeopardy. And let me say that, if you are extreme to take amiss all intemperance, every violent expression, every act of indiscretion, on the part of a popular assembly—if you have no fraternal sympathy with other representative bodies—if you are ready ‘to pluck out the moat from your brother’s eye, but consider not the beam that is in your own,’ I still should hope that the example which you are about to set will never, under any future circumstances, be pleaded in derogation of your own privileges; and that you may escape that fate yourselves, which, however, would not be unjust; for, remember, that ‘with what judgment ye judge, ye shall be judged, and with what measure ye mete, shall it be measured to you again.’”

[The result of this division led to the resignation of ministers, and Sir R. Peel’s accession to office. In consequence, however, of her Majesty’s unwillingness to accede to the changes suggested in her Majesty’s household, Sir Robert Peel and his colleagues were necessitated to tender their resignations, which were accepted, and Lord John Russell again resumed the reins of government.]

PRIVILEGE.—STOCKDALE v. HANSARD.

The order of the day for the consideration of the report of the committee on printed papers having been read, Lord John Russell moved the following resolutions:—First, “That it is the opinion of this House, that under the special circumstances of the case of Stockdale v. Hansard, it is not expedient to adopt any further proceedings for the purpose of staying the execution of the judgment.” And secondly, “That this House, considering the power of publishing such of its reports, votes, and proceedings, as it shall deem necessary or conducive to the public interests, an essential incident to its constitutional functions, will enter into the consideration of such measures as it may be advisable to take, in consequence of the recent judgment of the Court of Queen’s Bench, for the maintenance and protection of that power, so soon as the committee shall have made that full and complete report on this important matter, which they have declared it to be their intention to make in the commencement of their second report.”

SIR ROBERT PEEL, even had he not been so directly appealed to by the hon. member (Mr. Hume), would have felt it necessary to give his opinion on this question to-night, because he did not shrink from maintaining the opinion he had given in committee. He had advised the committee to the best of his power, and he should advise the House to the best of his power, and without any of that apprehension of the consequences which some hon. members had shown. The hon. gentleman had challenged him to prove, that his present course was not inconsistent with his recorded opinions. On the 30th of May, 1837, he (Sir Robert Peel) was a party to the following resolutions then agreed to by the House:—“That the power of publishing such of its reports, votes, and proceedings, as shall be necessary, or conducive to the public interests, is an essential incident to the constitutional functions of parliament, more especially of this House, as the representative portion of it. That, by the law and privilege of parliament, this House has the sole and exclusive jurisdiction to determine upon the existence and extent of its privileges, and that the institution or prosecution of any action, suit, or other proceeding, for the purpose of bringing them into discussion or decision before any court or tribunal elsewhere than in parliament, is a high breach of such privilege, and renders all parties concerned therein amenable to its just displeasure, and to the punishment consequent thereon. That, for any court or tribunal to assume to decide upon matters of privilege, inconsistent with the determination of either house of parliament thereon, is contrary to the law of parliament, and is a breach and contempt of the privileges of parliament.” These were the resolutions agreed to by the House. Shortly afterwards, the hon. and learned the Attorney-general brought the subject of the petition of the printers under the attention of the House, and what were the opinions then given? [Mr. O’Connell: Hear.] It was very well for the hon. and learned gen-gentleman to exclaim "Hear, hear!" but what was the course that he then pursued, and what was the language then used? He agreed to the appeal then made; and he then stated that they could, so far, make a very favourable case, and that they should stop short as regarded further proceedings. This was the opinion that he then gave. He had not heard without great regret the opinion of the Attorney-general, that it was advisable, on account of the technical and legal difficulties which would accompany any other course of proceeding, to direct the servants of this House to plead to the actions that had been brought against them. He had hoped that this House possessed sufficient power to vindicate, by its own exclusive authority, without the aid or recognition of any extrinsic jurisdiction, their privileges, which are absolutely essential to the performance of its proper functions, and even to its existence as an independent branch of the legislature. He was aware of the precedent for pleading furnished by the case of Bardett v. Abbott; but as the result of the proceedings in that case was a distinct confirmation, by the highest judicial authority, of the exclusive right of the House of Commons to judge and decide in matters of privilege, he had hoped that that precedent rather supplied a reason for the assumption by the House of Commons of the jurisdiction which it admitted to exist, than a rule for the repetition of the course which was then followed. These objections were made by him at the commencement of his speech, and he found that at the conclusion of it he made the following remarks:—"By the course recommended by the Attorney-general, that they, by the instruction to their officers to plead, virtually submitted a decision on their privileges to a court, the head of which had already given an adverse decision with regard to them. If that decision be confirmed, their next step would be an appeal to the House of Lords; and thus the transfer to a co-ordinate branch of the legislature, of that exclusive jurisdiction to which they laid claim for themselves in matters of privilege. He had every confidence that justice would be done according to the law and constitution of the country; but believing that the privilege of free publication was essential to the proper discharge of their functions, he could not, without anxiety, see it made the subject of litigation." Several gentlemen expressed their opinions on this subject, and there was a considerable difference of opinion as to the course which it was most advisable to pursue. Among others, the noble lord (John Russell), after stating that he agreed in most of the arguments advanced by him, stated that "he did not agree with him in thinking, that they should not allow the parties to plead; he added, that he did not think that, by so doing, the House would thereby be surrendering the power and authority which, in the second resolution, it claimed the right to exert." On that occasion, he was supported in the view that he had taken by several hon. members, and, amongst others, by a high authority. He alluded to the hon. gentleman who spoke last, who had now charged him with inconsistency, and with not having pointed out the results that were likely to follow the course they were then about to take. He had not only done so, but it was also clear that the hon. gentleman himself had seen before him all that was likely to follow, for he thus concluded his speech, in such peculiar language and phraseology, as he did not attempt to rival him in. The hon. member then said, "the truth was, that this was an attempt to drag them through the mud in a very unpleasant manner." Here then it appeared, that the hon. member having been dragged through the mud, now came forward, and shook his muddy locks at him, and asked, "Why did you not tell us of the probable result, as you state that you anticipated what would follow, if the steps were taken that had been pursued?" Again, the hon. and learned member for Newark, who had drawn up an able report on this subject, and who had been a most consistent supporter of the view that he had taken of the subject, said:—"To revert, however, to the question, what would be the position of the House if the plea were overruled. His opinion was, that the House would be placed in a situation of the greatest difficulty. If the Attorney-general appeared in the case, and argued the matter on the part of the House, undoubtedly it would be something like a submission. All the courts were bound to acknowledge the privileges of that House; but if the case were argued before the Court of Queen's Bench, the court might determine against the House. He would recommend the attorney-general, therefore, not to argue the question, but to submit it to the court, and ask for judgment. If the court pronounced judgment against the resolution, then this House should take up its proper ground, and honourable members who would not stand boldly forward in defence of their privileges, could not stand up for any other. Honourable members should be enabled to leave to their successors the privileges which they themselves had a right to enjoy." He thought that it would have been infinitely better, if they had acted on their resolution, and committed the first person who had infringed the privilege of that House. Another course that they could have pursued was that defended by his hon. friend the member for Oxford, and other hon. gentlemen. The third course was that recommended by the hon. and learned the Attorney-general, and which had been followed. They did plead, or allowed their officer to plead, and all the points of that plea had been overruled by the court, and the decision had been against them. And what would be the state of public opinion on the subject? The public opinion would be, that they had asked the Court of Queen's Bench to give its decision on this question, involving these privileges:—that the House would have availed itself of that decision, if it had been favourable to its views; but now that it was against them, if they took the course that was recommended by the right hon. and learned gentleman, it would be said, that having submitted your case to the court, you would have availed yourself of the judgment, had it been in unison with your opinions, but as it was adverse, you refuse to abide by it. Instead of holding the court and tribunal guilty of contempt that had given this decision, and to which the House had allowed the appeal, it was proposed to proceed against the ministerial officer, who was to be placed in this anomalous situation—that if he levied, in conformity with the decision of the court, that House would commit him for a breach of its privileges; and if he obeyed that House, and did not levy, the Court of Queen's Bench would commit him for disobedience. It would be more consistent with the boldness of proceeding which had been recommended, if they held that the court and tribunal had been guilty of contempt, and to commit them if they persisted, instead of proceeding against the ministerial officer, who was bound to obey the orders and decisions of the court. It was a bad and dangerous example to set, to direct the ministerial officer not to obey the law of the land. What was the course that the House had pursued? It submitted to the tribunal; the House had the power of stopping the proceedings at once, by telling the individual who was plaintiff in the cause, that he had no right to go to any other tribunal than that House, as it was the only judge of matters involving its privileges, and that if he persisted, he would be committed for contempt. The House, however, allowed and instructed its officer to plead, and directed counsel to appear for him before the court. The Attorney-general appeared and argued the case, for three days, in the most able manner. You allowed the court to consider the case, and to believe that you submitted the matter to its decision, and that you was a willing party before it; and, in confirmation of this view of the case, he would ask, how did the Attorney-general conclude his speech to the court? Why, in a manner to confirm such an opinion in the minds of the judges. The hon. and learned gentleman concluded in these words: "My lords, for these reasons, I pray judgment for the defendants." It was proposed, however, that the officer who acted for the sheriff of London should be committed if he levied the execution. Was this the proper step to take after the course the House had allowed to be pursued? As regarded his opinion on the subject-matter under consideration, he had no hesitation in saying, that he believed that its privileges were essential to the usefulness of parliament, and he did not think that they could sit with honour or advantage to the country for a single evening without them. If they might be questioned in the Court of Queen's Bench, there was nothing to prevent their being questioned in every subordinate court of judicature in the empire. If they allowed it to be supposed that any court could determine on what occasions their privileges were justly exercised, they only held their privileges by sufferance, and they had better attempt to suspend the exercise of their privileges than attempt to exercise them at all. He trusted that it would not be supposed that he would hesitate to give his opinion on this subject, or that he was not prepared hereafter to take the necessary steps for vindicating the privileges of that House; but he would not mix up that question with another, totally separate and distinct, and encumber it with an act of injustice to an individual. They should also consider whether they presented the best ground in thus refusing their submission to the decision of a court of law, to which they had apparently presented their case for decision. The report stated that it was the duty of the committee to submit a practical question to the House, of which the decision could not be postponed, and that they had not yet prepared a full and complete report on the subject. It would be some time before this report was ready, but what was the situation in which the House had placed itself? He believed, that out of the House, nine men out of ten were under the impression that the House of Commons had opened a shop for the sale of parliamentary papers, and that this proceeding arose out of that circumstance. It might appear to be equally open to objection in public opinion, to give permission to open a place for the sale of those papers, as having directly done so themselves. Whether this had misled the public mind or not, he would not say. The question, however, was—whether, in the present imperfect state of information, and notwithstanding the feeling which he thought prevailed on the subject, it would be wise and expedient for them to direct the sheriff not to enforce his writ and execution in this case. If the House determined on resistance—if it determined that the process of the court should not be executed—if they pursued this course, did they not decide practically on all the points of the case, and even on those on which the public mind was not prepared for such a decision? If a similar case occurred to-morrow, he would recommend that the House should deal with it without hesitation, and determine that, as a case involving its privileges, it should not be submitted to a court of judicature. In such a case, there would be a proper exercise of the authority of the House of Commons when it committed for contempt. Such an opinion was laid down by Mr. Justice Littledale in his judgment, and it strongly confirmed the view which he originally took of the subject—namely, that if they did not resist the proceedings in the first instance, they would find great difficulty in doing so after they had allowed their officer to plead to the action. The learned judge says, “There is no doubt about the right, as exercised by the two Houses of Parliament, with regard to contempt or insult offered to the House, either within or without their walls; there is no doubt, either, as to the freedom of their members from arrest, nor of their right to summon witnesses, to require the production of papers and records, and the right of printing documents for the use of the members of the constitutional body, and as to every other thing which may appear to be necessary to carry on and conduct the great and important functions of their charge.”

He would, therefore, say, do not disregard public opinion on this or other similar constitutional subjects, but take care that, in your proceeding, you have that most powerful sanction. The hon. gentleman who moved the amendment said, that he was satisfied that any person who was at all acquainted with the subject, and that all classes of society, would coincide with them in an attempt to vindicate and maintain the privileges of that House. He did not think that the proceeding which the hon. gentleman had proposed was the right mode to be adopted. It was, however, of immense importance, that any erroneous impression that had been produced on the public mind should be removed, and that it might be shown that the maintenance of the right was essential for the public welfare. He should be sorry if they persisted in calling the sheriff of London before them, and committing him, as they would be bound to do; for they might depend upon it, that, next week, they would have to call the judges of the Queen's Bench to their bar. He would, however, proceed with the opinion of Mr. Justice Littledale:—“In the case of commitments for contempt, there is no doubt but the House is the sole judge whether it is a contempt or not, and the courts of common law will not enquire into it. The greater part of these decisions and dicta, where the judges have said, that the Houses of Parliament are the sole judges of their own privileges, have been when the question has arisen upon commitments for contempt, and as to which, as I have before remarked, no doubt can be entertained. But not only the two Houses of Parliament, but every court in Westminster Hall, are themselves the sole judges whether it be a contempt or not; although, in cases where the court did not profess to commit for a contempt, but for some matter which, by no reasonable intendment, could be considered as a contempt of the court committing, but a ground of commitment palpably and evidently unjust, and contrary to law and natural justice. Lord Ellenborough says, that in case of such a commitment, if it should ever occur (but which he says he could not possibly anticipate as one likely to occur), the court must look at it and act upon it as justice may require, from whatever court it may profess to have proceeded.”

Was this opinion shared by the other judges? The House might, he thought, reasonably rely on this being the case. He should, therefore, prefer fighting the battle as an original question of contempt; and if, for the future, any proceedings were taken in consequence of any publication, that they should not allow their officer to plead. On these grounds he cordially concurred in the motion which had been proposed by the noble lord. He could not agree in advising them to commit the sheriff—he could not advise any further application to the court—he could not advise an appeal to the Exchequer Chamber, or to the other House—he thought, that the better course would be, as they had gone so far, was to acknowledge the proceedings that had occurred, and allow, in this instance, their officer to submit to the sentence. He could not go further until he saw clearly the steps that it would be necessary to take. He knew that a number of actions stood at their door for the proceedings that it was essential for them to take; but he thought that they could rely for the future on their resolutions, and on the dicta of the judges, as to the jurisdiction of the House. This was the course open to them, and was the best, in his opinion, that could be pursued. The noble lord said, that he should propose that the House should pledge itself to the consideration of the subject at the earliest period, and to take such steps as to prevent a recurrence of a similar proceeding to the present. In the balance, therefore, of inconveniency, and looking to the apparent submission of the court, he thought that it would be wiser to submit to the court in this instance, and to take steps to prevent, for the future, any matter of the kind coming under the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench, or any other court. They should also take care to show to the country, that the maintenance of their privileges was absolutely essential to their existence, and to the discharge of their functions as the representatives of the Commons of England. With these feelings he would only add, that it would be absolutely necessary, within a very few weeks, to determine how they should proceed, and what steps it was expedient to take.

The first resolution was agreed to by a majority of 18, and the second by a majority of 97.

EDUCATION.

JUNE 20, 1839.

The order of the day for the resumption of the adjourned debate on National Education having been read,—

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, I shall not be sorry to escape from the discussion of some topics which have been adverted to in the course of the present debate, not because I undervalue their importance, but because I consider them much too important for discussion in a popular assembly. Neither will I undertake to defend every opinion which has been advanced in the course of the debate. I mean, (said the right hon. baronet,) that I shall confine myself to the consideration of the practical merits of the proposal on which we have to decide, rather than to the consideration of the speculative opinions which may have been advanced by the hon. member for Newark, or others. If I did enter, at this time of night, into the discussion of such speculative opinions, involving so many various considerations, do I not know I should be imitating the example of hon. gentlemen opposite, and diverting the House from that which is the practical question now under debate; namely, whether or not it would not, on the whole, be best, that the noble lord's motion be acceded to, and the Crown addressed to rescind the order in council, by which the committee of education had been appointed? That is the practical question to be decided this night, and I give my hearty concurrence to the motion of my noble friend, and will not follow her Majesty's government, and other gentlemen on the ministerial side of the House, who have been anxious to shrink from the consideration of the merits of the proposed plan. I object to the scheme of the government on three or four distinct grounds. In the first place, I object to the course adopted of calling on the House to decide so important a question as this, laying the foundation of a system of national education, by a single vote. The right hon. gentleman opposite has quoted some former votes, by which sums of money were placed under the control of the government, without asking for the opinion of the House of Commons. Does it follow, then, that because the House, upon contested points, has adopted such a course, that it must now decide the whole question of national education for England by a single resolution? If this does follow, then I advise the House to beware of the next concession it makes—for, if slight analogies are to be hunted out for the purpose of calling on the House, in consistency, to adopt a principle supposed to be similar to that which the House had before adopted, the concession it might now make will, at a future time, be appealed to, for the purpose of justifying still greater concessions; and the House, if it makes any objection, will then be told, that it came too late, for on this very night it ought to have been urged. The noble lord says, that the scheme for the inspection of schools was only under consideration, and asked whether we object to the distribution of the money by what was called the committee of privy council? What was the original proposition of the noble lord? That five of her Majesty's servants should form a committee for the consideration of all matters affecting the education of the people. What, if I had proposed such a scheme in 1835, what would the dissenting bodies of this country have said to it? Do you not think it would have provoked their apprehension and alarm? Would you not have called upon me to respect the feelings of the Dissenters? Would you not have said, that their alarm was justifiable? Well, then, if the members of the establishment feel similar alarm at the proposal now made; if they think that it was not fitting that a committee of the privy council, excluding every member connected with the Church, should be formed, and that it is in principle open to objection, then I say, that the question assumed a new character, and that it was not proper to decide upon it absolutely by a single vote taken in one night with a narrow majority. According to the reference to former concessions, her Majesty's government are, by this measure, laying the foundation of an extensive scheme of national education. The next step they take may be at a great interval from the present. But if her Majesty's ministers can now appeal to the vote for Irish education, or to the speech of my noble friend (Lord Stanley), with respect to admission of Dissenters to the Universities, in justification of their present proceedings, and if they feel warranted in calling upon the House to assent to this scheme in consequence of the concessions already made, I can well foresee that, three years hence, they may be able to say, that the scheme now proposed and assented to, was only laying a foundation for a general scheme of education, and that those who permitted that foundation to be laid, had no right to object to any extension of it. I object to this committee of privy council, which is to superintend all matters affecting the education of the people, being exclusively composed of members of the executive government. It is not a committee of the privy council, as my noble friend has called it; it is a committee of the executive government of the country, and that executive government had other duties to perform, and other interests to consult. That executive government may feel it to be its bounden duty to make great concessions for the purpose of retaining their offices. I will give them the benefit of supposing that they may think it necessary to continue in office, not from any unworthy or interested motives. They may feel it a paramount duty to remain in office in order to support the prerogatives of the Crown. Their motives may be pure and honourable. But it is not proposed to constitute a board independent of party or of political considerations. The board is constituted exclusively of members of the government, and how do I know that, in order to rescue themselves from the danger of dismissal by this House, they may not, for the sake of so important a public object, make great concessions on the subject of education? They may consider education a subordinate object to that of keeping themselves in office, and keeping out opponents, whose recession to power they may consider dangerous. [Hear, hear.] What guarantee have we that this would not be the case? The very essence of our duties was jealousy of the executive, and we have a full right to consider to what abuses the present proposition may lead? What have we seen happen within the last fortnight? Allowing the motives of ministers to be perfectly pure, have we not seen them resume office, after declaring they had lost the confidence of the House? They justified themselves by pleading the necessity of the case; and may not the same necessity call on them to make concessions on the subject of education? Take the case of the ballot. Last year it was not an open question. This year it was an open question.

Now, why? Not from your abstract conviction as to the merits of the question, but because the concession is essential to your views, with respect to those large and comprehensive interests of the country, which are involved in your maintenance of power. Is, then, the government a body which ought to furnish grants relating to all matters which affect education? An hon. member opposite has bid the government be of good cheer; he has encouragingly told them not to be alarmed, "for," said he, "you have done more to recommend yourselves to the liberal representatives and the liberal constituencies of this country by this plan, than by any other measure which you have brought forward." Is it so? But may not the execution of the measure be as necessary as its proposal? I do not know whether the very same members of the executive government who form the Education Board may not also form a committee to whose efforts may be intrusted the securing of a liberal majority in case of a dissolution of parliament. Supposing, then, it should be suggested by one of the members of this committee, that a concession made by the government on the subject of education to a particular part of the country, would be attended with an advantageous result in case of an election; is it wise to expose yourselves to that temptation? And would it not be wise to have some persons intrusted with the superintendence of education, whose continuance in office would not depend upon a narrow majority in the House of Commons? Remember, however,—and let the Dissenters remember—that if the principle be good for this government, it is good for their successors. If a change of government should unfortunately take place, you have established the principle, that the next government, whatever it may be, will be the body deputed by yourselves to manage the general education of the country. They will introduce their views, also, with respect to the superintendence of education. Suppose, then, that their views should be, that it is not wise that a system of education, so far as the Establishment is concerned, should be carried on, without the supervision of the chief ecclesiastical authorities belonging to the Establishment. Suppose that they should make the Bishop of London, and the Archbishop of Canterbury, both, be it recollected, members of the privy council, members of the committee of the privy council, what objection could you urge against it? I do not know what objections the dissenting body might entertain to such appointments; I am not prepared to say how far the force of newly-formed habits may influence their conduct; but this I will venture to say, that if Lord Liverpool, fifteen years ago, or if I myself, five years since, had proposed that the government should be the body to whom such a power should be granted, and that, by three words, three important words, thirty thousand pounds, which were to be placed without condition or restriction at the control of the executive government—if this had been attempted, then, I say, that whatever may be the number of petitions which have been presented against the plan of the government, the petitions of the Dissenters against such a scheme would have been at least equal to them. You say, that you are responsible to parliament. Responsible to parliament!—Why, how is responsibility to parliament insured, if the measures by which education is to be carried on are to be prepared and executed without the consent of parliament? You constitute yourselves a committee to superintend the education of the people of this country, in consequence of a solitary vote of the House of Commons. This board is constituted of persons upheld by a parliamentary majority of ten votes. Another may succeed it, supported by a majority of twenty-one votes, a majority, too, which this year granting £30,000, may next year grant £80,000 for the education of the people. I say, then, that this is an objection which I feel to the government plan, and that it is an objection which ought to be felt, not only by the Dissenters, but by the Church of England. The right hon. gentleman, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, is fond of quoting opinions, backed always by high authority, but he does not tell us the names of the individuals from whom they proceed, till he imagines we are all ready to assent to the propositions laid down. Now I will imitate him. I will read opinions given by two grave authorities; I will conceal their names; I will not tell you whether they come from high ecclesiastical authority, or whether they were pronounced by persons holding strong conservative opinions. You shall have the opinions themselves. The noble lord took a different course from the right hon. gentleman; he quoted Paley and Fenelon, and told us so, but I shall follow the example set by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. These opinions were not delivered at a very remote period. I am constantly told that I am behind the spirit of the age, and I suppose that the charge is true; for I find that if I take up the position which her Majesty's government took up last year, and hope for some expression of gratitude from them for adopting their sentiments, I find myself, I say, exposed to a raking fire from them, and attacked on all sides for my illiberality. The first I will read is this:—"With this difference of opinion on the subject, he confessed he did not see, until there was more likelihood of agreement among the leading persons who were in favour of the general education in this country, that it would be a good plan to establish a general commission or board by the government, because, whatever board might be constituted would create a jealousy on the part of all those who were opposed to them." The other opinion I shall read, is this: "That the interference of government, by appointing a commission or board of education in the present state of the question, would create great jealousy among all parties, and would be injurious to the purpose of education itself. He therefore hoped the motion of his hon. friend would not be persisted in." These opinions were expressed by the noble lord, the secretary for the Home department, and by the right hon. gentleman, the Chancellor of the Exchequer. They were delivered last year, upon the subject of appointing a board or commission of education. Is not this a board of education, which you are about to appoint, and can you resist voting for the motion? I see the noble lord opposite making great protestations against this proposition, but what it is founded on I cannot guess. You objected to the appointment of an education board, on account of the then excited state of the public mind. Oh! I see the difference. The public mind is now so calm. No jealousy is now felt on the subject of education, and the suspicions and apprehensions which were formerly excited, have since been entirely soothed by the particular plan which her Majesty's government have proposed. I object to the plan on another and a distinct ground. Now, observe, I do not maintain this position, that the Church has any right to interfere with the religious instruction of all the children educated in these schools, and I never understood my noble friend to say so. I understood my noble friend to say, that in the case of the established religion, education was intimately connected with it, and he referred to the authorities, that of Lord Holt having been quoted among the feudal authorities, not to show what it was contended he wanted to show, that the Church had a right to exercise control over Dissenters, but that it was entitled to have some share in the national plan, in so far as the education of members of the national church was concerned; and this suggestion on the part of my noble friend, hon. gentlemen opposite have found it more convenient to misrepresent than to answer. I disclaim, therefore, any intention to demand for the Church Establishment the right to interfere with the religion or the other institutions of those who are dissenters from its doctrines. This, however, I claim for the establishment, that no system of national education shall be founded, which studiously excludes from the superintendence and control of education, given to the children of the establishment, the dignitaries of the Established Church; and if such a proposition be disagreeable to the feelings of the members of the establishment, I say that it is a violation of those feelings to ask them to contribute to a scheme of education, conducted under the superintendence of a board from which those dignitaries are to be excluded. Will the noble lord tell me what is his definition of an establishment? The noble lord had quoted Paley. Did the noble lord mean to say that he agreed with Paley? For my own part, with respect to members of the Established Church, I beg to say, that in any system of education to be adopted, if you mean to uphold the principles of the establishment, you ought not to exclude from the control of the system of education those who were of the greatest importance. If the object of a church establishment be the instillation and communication of religious knowledge, do you think it wise to establish this principle, that the education of children of tender years should be separated altogether from doctrinal instruction in religion? On what ground will you exclude members of the establishment from constituting a part of the board, so far as the instruction of children is concerned? Do you think that it was proper to hold out to the rising generation, that in their education all religious instruction should be excluded? and do you hope to fit them to become good members of the establishment, if in the system of education for them the doctrinal part of religion shall form no part? This is a most grave question, whether it be considered as producing harmony or not, in relation to giving the people a system of joint education upon the principle of the noble lord. Some time ago, I certainly did foresee that great advantages might arise in Ireland, under the peculiar circumstances of the people there; that there was some chance of soothing the excitement which prevailed, by making some concession on this point. But when the system of education was adopted for Ireland, every effort was made to avoid that circumstance being made a precedent; it was particularly explained, that the proposition which was made was only acceded to under the peculiar circumstances of the case, and the concession was only made because it was considered that it would contribute to the welfare of the people in their after life. I confess, however, that subsequent reflection has led me to entertain at least great doubts on this point. So far as the institutions of the establishment are concerned, I have come to this opinion, that it is infinitely better that they should be doctrinal institutions; and I think, that the House should not shrink from its duty in educating the people in the principles which they themselves support, whereby they are much more likely to make them good members of the church and of society, than if they brought them up shrinking from the maintenance of those doctrines which they would be afterwards told they must support. I very much doubt whether we shall promote future harmony by giving them together secular instruction, and then handing them over to their separate religious teachers, who will convey information to them upon the particular creeds which they support on particular days. If I were a member of a different establishment, I should prefer giving a child of mine general instruction only, telling him, at the same time, that religion should form the basis of his education, and should be closely interwoven with it, to consenting to exclude the principles of religious instruction from the daily course of his education in the school in which he should be brought up. But with respect to the Established Church, I hope, that rather than consent to any plan from which ecclesiastical authority is excluded, it would separate itself altogether from the State on this point; that it would take the education of the people into its own hands—that it would not shrink from insisting on the publication of its own peculiar doctrines, but that it would demand that the highest respect should be entertained for its power, by its being inculcated in the minds of children that religion formed the basis of all education. I very much doubt whether the principles of the Christian faith being thus inculcated among children, as good a chance of harmony would not be secured, as by telling them that religion was an open question, and that each of them was to be instructed by a minister of his own creed, on a certain day set apart for that purpose. Ample reference has been made to the state of religious instruction in the United States. Hon. gentlemen, who had very extensive information in reference to Prussia and the United States, had spoken upon the subject, and had more particularly quoted the cases of New York and Massachusetts. As in Prussia, the principle had been abandoned; for the hon. and learned gentleman had distinctly declared, that the Prussian government had abandoned the attempt of uniting children in a system of secular instruction only, and of giving them separate religious instruction upon such creeds as they might be disposed to follow. I have attempted, from that interest which is necessarily taken upon this subject, to gain some information with respect to the success of the plan adopted in America, and it appears to me that this was very like the plan suggested by the noble lord. A general religious instruction,—that was to say, that the children should be instructed in the general interests of Christianity, and that on certain days they should be instructed in their particular creeds. I hold in my hand the second annual report of the Massachusetts board of education, published at Boston, and bearing date the 14th January, 1839. It sets forth the principle which is embodied in the legislation of the Commonwealth on the subject of school-books, and which provides, that “school committees shall never direct to be purchased or used, in any of the town schools, any books which are calculated to favour the tenets of any particular sect of Christians;” and in another place, “the principles of Christian ethics and piety, common to the different sects of Christians, will be carefully inculcated, and a portion of Scripture will be daily read in all the normal schools established by the board.” Now, this is your plan. How does it work there? What says the secretary in his very able report? It is impossible that any man can be more desirous of its success. Yet here is his testimony of the result. He says—“In my report of last year I exposed the alarming deficiency of moral and religious instruction then found to exist in our schools. That deficiency, in regard to religious instruction, could only be explained, by supposing that school committees, whose duty it is to prescribe school-books, had not found any books at once expository of the doctrines of revealed religion, and also free from such advocacy of the 'tenets' of particular sects of Christians, as brought them, in their opinion, within the scope of the legal prohibition. And hence they felt obliged to exclude books, which, but for their denominational views, they would have been glad to introduce." I beg to know how the noble lord could evade this in his plan? It would not exclude the existence of scruples among any denomination of religious Dissenters. It would not heal the differences of opinion entertained by the ministers of religion, according to their several and peculiar professions. The report further says:—"Of course I shall not be here understood as referring to the Scriptures, as it is well known that they are used in almost all the schools, either as a devotional, or as a reading book." Now, I beg the noble lord to consider whether this system, which has so operated in America, is not founded upon precisely the same principle as that upon which the plan of her Majesty's government was framed. It is a system, not excluding the Scriptures—allowing the Scriptures to be read, but not allowing them to be taught upon the principles of any church—permitting them to be used for the purposes of instruction, but leaving it to the ministers of the various religious denominations, to teach the children in accordance with their particular religious views. What says the secretary, to whose report I have already referred, as to the working of that system? Why, he said, that there is "an alarming deficiency of moral and religious instruction." That is just the result which I anticipate from the system suggested by her Majesty's government, as applied to the habits and modes of thought of the English people. "If you were to adopt such a system, not making education in the principles of faith the basis of instruction in this country, you will find it extremely difficult to establish that sound, moral, and religious knowledge, which can only be founded upon our conviction in early years, that religion is the first object of instruction." That is the second ground upon which I object to the plan proposed by her Majesty's government, namely, that as far as the children of the establishment are concerned, I think it wholly unwise to exclude the direct superintendence and authority of ecclesiastical authorities. I think that those authorities ought to be brought forward distinctly, for the purpose of superintending a plan of education in the principles of the establishment. I object also to the plan of her Majesty's ministers upon the very grounds upon which it has been supported by some of its advocates, which, as my right hon. friend has justly observed in the course of the debate, are grounds directly inconsistent with the maintenance of a religious establishment. No answer has been given to that argument. If you are under an obligation, as you say you are, to teach the children of those who dissent upon the grounds which you allege, namely, that you fight with Roman Catholic sinews, and support your system with Unitarian gold—if that be the ground upon which you are bound to educate the children of Dissenters, in the first place let me ask, why you shrink from educating them in the tenets of their particular faith? If that be your ground—that you take their gold and make use of their strength—how do you answer this question? Why are you not bound to provide them the means of religious worship in accordance with their several creeds? Where do you propose to draw the line? You profess to draw a line, but do not tell us where it is to commence. All your supporters, indeed, do not draw a line. The hon. and learned gentleman opposite, and I must say I think he is the only one who foresees or avows the consequences to which the government plan may lead, is prepared manfully to contend for them, as consequences which it is desirable to obtain. The hon. and learned gentleman, if I understood him, maintains this proposition, that if you call upon the Jew to contribute to the exigencies of the State, the Jew has a right to call upon you for the maintenance of his religion.—[An hon. member: But not to education in his religion.] Not to education in his religion! How do you draw the distinction? If you call upon the Jew to contribute to the education of the children of the establishment, why may you not call upon the members of the church to contribute to the education of the Jew? You say, that you do not decide against him—that you do not object to his religion; and I understood the hon. and learned gentleman distinctly to say, that he foresaw the consequences to which the ministerial plan would lead—namely, that as all would contribute to the support of it, so all would have a right to call upon the State, not only for the tolerance of their religion, but for contributions to maintain it. The third question I have to put to the government is this—Do you believe, that any good will arise from the establishment of such a system as you propose? If you tell us that it is necessary, that a board should be formed which should have the public confidence, why did you not describe it in such intelligent and distinct terms, as to prevent the misunderstanding and the alarm, I think the perfectly justifiable alarm, which has sprung up in every part of the country in reference to your proposition? If you have so imperfectly described your views with respect to the construction of the Board of Education, that throughout the country you have awakened an almost universal apprehension in the minds of the religious public, do you believe, that any system of instruction, superintended by such a board, would be likely to have the confidence of the great body of the people? Was there ever a scheme of education propounded in this country which met with such universal opposition? What answer do you give to the quotations which, in the course of this debate, have been made from the views of the Dissenters with respect to your plan? [Mr. Hawes: I have presented a petition in favour of the plan from the Protestant Dissenters.] The hon. gentleman says he has presented a petition from the particular body to which I refer; and, if so, I have no doubt that it was in accordance with the opinions expressed in their resolutions, advertised, I believe, on the 15th June; and, in referring to them in his speech that evening, the hon. member for Lambeth had described them as the greatest friends of civil and religious liberty, although not of the three exclusive denominations; he spoke of them as a most influential body of Protestant Dissenters; and what do they recommend to the government? Why, Sir, they advise the government, as a general rule, to apply any further parliamentary grant in the same manner as those that have been previously made. That is, in the support of the National School Society, and the British and Foreign School Society? They do not wish you to relax from the rule you have yourselves abused, but to extend it still further. But, Sir, there is another means of testing the opinions of the country on this question, and particularly so those of the various denominations of Protestant Dissenters—by the expression of their disapprobation or favourable consideration of the plan by petitions. What number has been received against the scheme? The hon. gentleman opposite stated, that 1,650 petitions had been presented in opposition to the government plan; but this included them only up to a certain period. And here, Sir, I may say, that from those who are usually foremost in this House to claim attention to the expression of popular opinion, there has been a great inclination to treat the petitions against the scheme with disrespect. But, if any petitions have been alluded to on the other side which were of a favourable nature, the same influence has been exercised to enhance their importance, and claim for them the especial respect of the House. But, Sir, the number mentioned by the hon. member presented against the government scheme, the number of 1,650, form but little better than one-half of the total received up to the present moment. Sir, I assume the real number at not less than 3,050. Do you think it likely, that 3,050 petitions would be produced, by the mere exaggeration of religious feeling? It would be most absurd to suppose it even. But as the hon. gentleman opposite has referred to other petitions, let me now ask what is the number of the counter-petitions received—of those favourable to the government scheme? Sir, against the scheme there have been 3,050 petitions presented; in favour of it we must deduct 3,000, rather than pretend to the semblance of equality, and declare the net number at 50. You told us last year (addressing Lord J. Russell), that you could not see how such a plan could be a good one, or how the constitution of such a board of education could do otherwise than lead to great jealousy and dissatisfaction. I have respect for your character as prophet—but, having had your worst apprehensions confirmed, I should have been glad to have seen that you had the manliness to admit it. I beg to ask what possible inducement, other than religious motives and conscientious objections to the plan, could lead the Wesleyans to resist it? The Wesleyans say, that if their conscientious objections could be removed, they have a greater chance of benefiting by your plan, than if a return were made to the principle of last year, under which they were excluded altogether. The Wesleyans could receive nothing from the British and Foreign Society, they could receive nothing from the National Society. A plan for a grant has been proposed, in which the Wesleyan Methodists may participate; yet they choose this very time to come forward and renew their opposition to it. The Wesleyan Methodists have been treated like children. When they came forward in support of the anti-slavery question, and so strongly advocated the abolition of the Slave-trade, then credit was given them for the highest discretion and for the purest motives; but now that they come forward to oppose the government scheme of education, although it is impossible that they can be influenced by any but the purest motives, they are designated as the victims of credulity and misapprehension, and their zeal is attributed to any motives rather than those by which I conscientiously believe they are actuated. It is clear you cannot pretend that your plan is approved of; and, I ask you, why you do not withdraw it, and return to the system you adopted last year—the system first recommended by Lord Althorp? Why, I ask, should you discourage local contributions? Why should you, in this case, forsake the application of your own voluntary principle? Why should you deny the prayer of the 3,050 petitions? In short, what better can you do than rescind the order in council, and return to the rule you have already acted upon? Don't believe, however, that your measure will give universal satisfaction. I will again refer to the report of the United States of America, which is an excellent authority, to show how such a system will be likely to work in England. The right hon. baronet read the following passage:—

“It seems that one William G. Griffin, with others, felt aggrieved at the practice which obtains, in some common schools, of ‘praying, singing, reading the Bible, and other religious exercises;’ and therefore ‘prayed the legislature to enact a law prohibiting the practice, in such schools, academies, and seminaries of education, as receive aid from the public treasury.’ In recommending that the prayer of the memorialists be not granted, the committee go into a discussion of the subject, which is remarkable for its clearness, candour, and cogency of reasoning, and such as must more than satisfy, we should suppose, every reasonable mind.

“The public schools established by law are supported by a state fund, and by taxation upon the property of the people. These schools are open to all, although none are obliged to send their children to them. But, says the report—

“It is to these schools, as we are to suppose, that the children of the petitioners are accustomed to resort, and in some cases it is fair to presume that it is found exceedingly inconvenient, perhaps impossible, for these parents to furnish their children with the means of instruction any where else. They are, therefore, obliged to resort to these schools, or take the alternative of keeping their children in utter ignorance; and it is under these circumstances that they come before the legislature with the complaint, that, on resorting to these schools, they find there a practice introduced—that of indulging in devotional exercises—which they deem highly offensive and objectionable. The grounds of objection to this practice, as far as we can gather them from the memorial, are two:—

“1. That the Christian religion is thus supported or aided at the public expense.
 “2. That the rights of equality and rights of conscience are thereby invaded, inasmuch as the unguarded minds of their children are thus exposed to be contaminated.”

Such being the operation of the system in America, let not her Majesty's ministers flatter themselves that they can give universal satisfaction. Unless in your scheme you limit religious education to the mere reading of the Bible, and exclude every thing bearing upon the doctrinal altogether, you cannot otherwise respect the religious scruples of others; and I can see no means of escape from the dangers and difficulties by which the question is in every position beset, but by her Majesty's government consenting to rescind the order in council. Sir, I object to the plan of the noble lord on these distinct grounds. First, that if it were the feeling that such a Board of Education should be appointed—and the reverse is the case—it should not be appointed in the manner proposed, by a single vote of this House. My next objection is, that any such Board of Education should be so constituted as to be exclusively formed of her Majesty's ministers. Thirdly, I object, in reference especially to the children of members of the Established Church, that there should be an entire exclusion of the ecclesiastical authorities, who are properly placed in charge of the religious education of the community; and lastly, because there has been presented against the scheme, petitions, unequal in number, in purity, and for the disinterestedness of the views of those who present them; and because a temporary success, if the scheme were carried by a small and scanty majority, so far from advancing the cause of sound religious instruction, soothing animosities, and allaying discord, would be but the commencement of a new religious struggle of the very worst nature, and in the very worst arena in which, in this country, such a struggle can be carried on.

The House divided on the original question, that the Order of the Day for a committee of supply be read:—Ayes, 280; Noes, 275: Majority, 5. Committee of Supply postponed.

GOVERNMENT OF LOWER CANADA.

JULY 11, 1839.

Lord John Russell having moved the Order of the Day for going into committee on this bill,—Sir William Molesworth moved as an amendment, “That it is the opinion of this House, that every consideration of humanity, justice, and policy, demands that parliament should seriously apply itself, without delay, to legislating for the permanent government of her Majesty’s provinces of Upper and Lower Canada.”

SIR ROBERT PEELE should first address himself to the resolution which had been moved by the hon. baronet, as an amendment to the House going into committee on the Canada bill. The principle of that resolution was to declare, on the part of the House, that considerations of humanity, justice, and sound policy, demanded that parliament should apply itself to legislate for the permanent government of the provinces. He (Sir R. Peel) must, in the first place, observe, that he held himself entirely free from any responsibility whatever as to delay; that whatever responsibility the hon. baronet might impute to him in future proceedings, he felt himself absolutely free from any responsibility as to the past. At an early period of the present session, he had asked the noble lord whether he intended to proceed to legislate practically for the government of Canada this session, and the noble lord answered that such was his intention. A few weeks after this, he again put the same question to the noble lord, further asking him, whether before Easter the House would have an opportunity of seeing the legislative measure by which it was proposed to provide for the future government of Canada, and he received an assurance that it was intended to submit such a measure before Easter. He had at the same time intimated his strong opinion, that unless the proposed measure was in the hands of the House before Easter, the opportunity of legislating on the subject this session would be altogether lost, and the session would pass over without any thing whatever having been done. He had no hesitation in stating, that could he have foreseen that the intention of legislating for Canada would have been abandoned, he would himself have submitted to the House some proposition, in order to bring this question to some practical issue. It was not, however, till a very advanced period of the session, that he understood from the government that they had abandoned all hopes of legislating on this subject. The hon. baronet asked him (Sir Robert Peel) to discard all party considerations, and to consult only the interests of the provinces. This was what he had always proposed to do; but he doubted whether, if he were to concur in this resolution at this season of the year, he should not be considered as abandoning this principle of conduct. The resolution of the hon. baronet meant, that the House should in the present session apply itself to legislation on the subject: the words of the resolution were “without delay.” But if we were prepared on the 11th July to legislate for Canada in the present session, why go through the form of this preliminary resolution? Why not proceed at once to the consideration of some practical measure? If the resolution merely went to pledge the House to proceed with this subject in a future session, it seemed to him superfluous; for he (Sir Robert Peel) was distinctly of opinion, that the House would altogether neglect its duty if it permitted the beginning of the very next session to pass over without taking some decided steps for settling this question. The hon. baronet had offered no explanation of what he proposed to do. In asking him (Sir Robert Peel) to pledge himself to co-operate with him in legislating for the permanent government of Canada, the hon. baronet had, in the course of his speech, given him very little practical assistance towards the forming a judgment upon the point. The hon. baronet had laid down no practical principles, had stated no conditions on which union was to be effected. He (Sir Robert Peel) considered it essential, that a full statement should be made from the opposite side of the House of what they proposed to do for the settlement of this question. If it was seriously contemplated to adopt a union of the provinces, let them have the measure with full and distinct explanations of all the details, and also with some assurance that it would be satisfactory to the people of the Canadas. If her Majesty's government declined the duty of legislating on the subject, no one else could at present take it up. No one not having access to official sources could acquire the requisite information. What means had he (Sir R. Peel) of ascertaining how for the present circumstances and feelings of the Canadians were favourable to this measure? He wished, indeed, that the advice he gave three years ago on this subject had been taken—to go into a committee of the whole House, for the purpose of inquiring and ascertaining what were the wishes and sentiments of the people of Canada with respect to a union of the provinces. Unless her Majesty's government gave the House the means of judging of this question, by making those inquiries which were necessary—unless they, on their own responsibility, placed upon the table a plan with details matured and considered, there could be no reasonable hope of effecting any thing during the present session. He could not, therefore, concur with the hon. baronet. He repeated, that he thought this the most difficult problem to solve that had ever been submitted to parliament. They had difficulties of a conflicting nature to reconcile. But their first step was to look those difficulties fairly in the face. It was not by vague discussion and talk about the necessity of a settlement or the policy of a union, but by really considering the great questions before them with a view to an immediate measure. He agreed in the principle that we ought to maintain the Canadas. He thought that if Canada were adverse to the connection with this country, that it would be almost a hopeless task to legislate. But the Canadas had declared their firm allegiance to their present sovereign, and their attachment to the British connection. They had proved, by an exhibition of the greatest courage and fortitude, and by the endurance of the severest suffering and injustice, their determination to maintain that connection. He did not consider, therefore, that it would be compatible with the true interests or the honour of the country, looking at its extensive colonial dependencies, to abandon that connection, even if it could be supposed unfavourable to its pecuniary interests. He believed that the glory and strength of this country would be extinguished, if from any paltry considerations, or from timidity, they should reject the offer of that gallant people, who told us that they were ready to run all hazards to preserve their connection with us, and to maintain the integrity of the empire. At the same time, it was impossible to overlook the tremendous responsibility which rested upon them in legislating for the government of that colony, and in providing that it should be effectual for the maintenance of domestic peace, and for defence against foreign attack. They were bound to provide that the government of that country should be constituted on a principle which would enable them to maintain British supremacy. That government should be further constituted, not with a view to the benefit of the country, but for the advantage of the colonists. Whatever the pecuniary interests of this country might be, he (Sir Robert Peel) thought that the government of the colony should be conducted with a regard to the welfare of, and, as far as possible, in conformity to, the wishes of its inhabitants. That was the only way in which the connection could be secured. But, undoubtedly, there were the greatest difficulties in attempting the formation of any such government. They had, as an hon. member had observed, two peoples, speaking different languages, with different customs and laws, and it was necessary to ascertain what was to be the security under any future government for that party who should be in the minority. Some hon. members in that House, perhaps, might have implicit faith and confidence in the wisdom of a majority; but he had not, and he thought that, immediately after the forcible suppression of an insurrection, there was still less ground for confidence in the wisdom and moderation of a triumphant party. He was well assured, that it was an absolutely necessary precaution, with a view to rendering Canada a thoroughly British colony—with a view to the introduction of British laws, and to the continued maintenance of British supremacy—that they should take some effectual guarantee that the present majority in one of the provinces, when by a union it should become a minority, should not be exposed to injustice. They were bound, as he said before, to make their legislation such as the Canadians could not complain of. Now, the religion of Lower Canada was the Roman Catholic. All the securities for the maintenance of that establishment must continue. Further, they must be perfectly certain, whatever might be the modification of the elective franchise in which the united government was to be founded, however property and numbers might be blended in the new representation, that effectual securities remained against any such preponderant influence as might counteract the intentions of the British parliament. The government having considered these points, must either propose some scheme of settlement, founded on extensive inquiries, and a knowledge of the feelings and wishes of the inhabitants of the colony, or parliament must, for the present, abandon the task of legislation. The hon. gentlemen opposite seemed to think that the period for a union was already past. The impression on his mind seemed to be, that it would not be safe within any definite period. Upon this point, he (Sir R. Peel) must say, that if he had only the French Canadians themselves to deal with, he very much doubted whether it would not be their interests to continue, for some time to come, under a strong but just and lenient government, such as at present existed. To bring them at once into close connection with a population opposed to them in feelings and prejudices, was a step which he for one did not feel confident would be of much advantage to their interests. But he must consider, on the other hand, the interests of the British population in Lower Canada. They had been faithful to the British Crown, and there was no reason why they should be subjected any longer than was absolutely necessary to a government which was in principle despotic. They had also to consider the necessity of affording to Upper Canada those facilities for carrying on her commerce, of which she had been hitherto deprived. Upper Canada was very fairly entitled to the navigation of the St. Lawrence. These were points which imperatively called for a decision; and he would repeat to the hon. baronet, the member for Leeds, that it was not by vague general assertions of the advantages of a settlement, but by going into those real difficulties, and propounding measures for overcoming them, that any thing practical could be done. He now came to the speech of the right hon. and learned gentleman opposite (Sir C. Grey). The right hon. and learned gentleman undertook to convince him (Sir Robert Peel), that he was entirely wrong in thinking that they had made no advances towards a settlement. But what was the right hon. gentleman's proof? The first advance, in his opinion, was the establishment of a despotism—of a strong and arbitrary government. But how far this helped them to a settlement, he (Sir Robert Peel) must confess he did not think the documentary evidence in existence, even including the fruits of the right hon. gentleman's own labours as a commissioner—was sufficient to enable them to ascertain. In saying that he did not see a prospect of a satisfactory settlement, he was not denying the necessity of the present measure, to which he was giving his support; but he denied that the mere establishment of arbitrary power in Canada was an advance towards a settlement such as would give future satisfaction to the colony. He thought, indeed, that the right hon. and learned gentleman must be himself of this opinion; for the only satisfaction he afforded them was, that, after having been tossed so long by the tempest, they were at length happily settled upon a rock. The utmost consolation which the right hon. and learned gentleman could give was, that they had escaped the perils of shipwreck by being fortunately cast upon a rock in the midst of the ocean—rather a poor comfort to afflicted mariners. But the right hon. and learned gentleman professed to lay down the principles by which parliament should be guided, and then he proceeded with a series of truisms, which were as applicable to any case or country as those which were under consideration. The right hon. and learned gentleman's first principle was, that the governor should observe the laws. Who doubted it? The governor ought not to outstep the limits of the law. He fully admitted it; but he did not see how it was more applicable to Canada than to any other country, or how it gave the least advance towards a settlement. The right hon. and learned gentleman proceeded to his second maxim, and said it was peculiarly necessary to Canada to make property secure. He did not see that the attachment to property was peculiar to Canada. He did not think that there was any people who did not feel that the first bond of civilized society was the sacredness of property. He did not see the peculiar applicability of this principle to the case under consideration, unless, indeed, the right hon. and learned gentleman intended some covert allusion to the bill before the House, to which it would be, in some degree, pertinent. Perhaps they ought to understand him as saying, not "avoid taking the property of the Canadians," but "take especial care that you do not shake the feelings of the Canadians, either by interfering with the tenures of their property, or by subjecting them to taxation, in the imposition of which they have no voice." If that was what the right hon. and learned gentleman meant to say to them, he (Sir Robert Peel) must say, that he entertained sentiments very much in accordance with those of the right hon. and learned gentleman. Another suggestion of the right hon. and learned gentleman was the establishment of municipal institutions. Admitting the practical benefits which such a measure was calculated to produce, he did not see how it was likely to contribute much towards carrying into effect the union of the provinces; but, taking it for as much as it was worth, he thanked the right hon. and learned gentleman for this his only practical suggestion. A fourth suggestion of the right hon. gentleman was, the establishment of a sort of ad interim government for the two provinces. The right hon. and learned gentleman proposed that the legislative council of Upper Canada, should confer with the governor and special council of Lower Canada in matters of joint concern. He did not think that such a proposition would be very agreeable to the House of Assembly of Upper Canada. He did not think that a popular body would be content to give over to a provisional government—wholly irresponsible government—its most important functions. He considered that this suggestion might be fairly considered to counterbalance the advantage of the other about municipal institutions. He therefore thought, that the speeches of the hon. gentleman who had addressed the House, did not, any more than the documentary evidence in existence, afford them any assistance in determining upon immediate measures. He had adverted to the suggestions of the right hon. and learned gentleman who had promised to find out the practical course to be pursued, and he must say, that, considering the right hon. gentleman's great acuteness, legal knowledge, and experience, a more sorry entertainment than that with which he had treated the House he had never met with. It was impossible for him to support the motion of the hon. member for Leeds. If they were prepared for legislation during the present session, let them proceed to it at once. But, if they could not legislate until next session, let them not fetter the House with any pledge at present. He was perfectly ready to admit, that he thought the affairs of Canada ought to be an object of paramount concern to parliament in the next session; but he would not imply so much distrust in parliament as to pledge it now for the next session. Before the House proceeded with the consideration of the clauses of the bill, he wished to make some observations with respect to the general character and operation of the measure. This would be a much better course towards her Majesty's government than entering into discussion upon mere details, without any preliminary discussion upon the general scope of the measure. In fact, there had not as yet been any explanation of the particular object of the bill. He certainly thought, from the declaration of the government, that it had been intended to extend the period of the existing bill for a short time, on account of some difficulties which it was anticipated might arise suddenly upon the expiration of the act of 1840. He thought that some additional powers would have been given to the governor and special council—the want of which at present threw great obstacles in the way of certain local improvement. He thought, too, that since, in consequence of the clause introduced into the act of last year, preventing the provisional government from altering any law of the Imperial parliament, considerable practical embarrassment had been found, that such an extension of power would be given to the provisional government as would enable it to preserve the public peace, and to repel aggressions. He had no hesitation in saying, that he should be prepared to give her Majesty's government any of these powers for which ground should appear, or any which could be shown to be absolutely necessary for the maintenance of the public peace, or the effectual repression of insurrection. He would now examine the bill before the House more particularly, and consider it under three different heads. First, with respect to the duration of the present measure. He certainly was glad to find that it was not intended to extend the duration of the act of last year. The act of last year would expire on the 1st November, 1840. He was glad to find that her Majesty's government did not at present consider it necessary to renew it, but were content to propose its renewal, if it should appear necessary, during the next session. The present bill did not provide for the extension of the period for which the provisional government was to endure. Unless renewed in the course of next session, the act of last year would expire on the 1st November, 1840. But the bill before the House proposed that the ordinances of the provisional government, which would, under the existing act, expire in 1842, might, under certain circumstances, have a more permanent duration. No change was to be made in the period for which the provisional government itself was to exist, and this part of the bill was not intended to be altered. It was proposed that the ordinances of the provisional government should have, in certain cases, a longer duration than 1842, but not that there should be any extension of the period during which that government itself was to continue.

Lord J. Russell, if it had been proposed to go on with the bill for the union of the provinces during the present session, they should also have to extend the duration of the provisional government to January 1842.

Sir R. Peel was correct, therefore, in supposing that although an indefinite duration might be given to the ordinances of the provisional government—that government could not exist beyond the 1st of November, 1840, without the further intervention of parliament. The second point to which he wished to call the attention of the House, was the third clause in the bill. That clause contained much more extensive powers of taxation than he thought were at present contemplated by the House. First, let the House consider the restrictions upon the taxing power which were imposed on the provisional government itself. By the act of last year, the governor and special council had not the power to impose any tax or rate, save only as far as concerned the continuance of any tax or rate payable within the province at the time of the passing of the act. The bill before the House proposed to repeal the restrictions imposed by the act of last session, and to permit the levy of any tax or impost within the province to any amount, without any restriction, excepting that the proceeds of such tax should be applied to local improvements within the province, and this provision—"That no such new tax, rate, duty, or impost, shall be levied by, or made payable to, the receiver-general, or any other public officer of her Majesty's revenue in the said province; nor shall any such law or ordinance as aforesaid, provide for the appropriation of any such new tax, duty, rate, or impost, by the said governor, either with or without the advice of the executive council of the said province, or by the commissioners of her Majesty's treasury, or by any other officer of the Crown."

He begged to call the attention of the House to this point. They removed the restriction, namely, that no tax should be imposed by the governor and council, except the continuance of an existing tax, and they gave the governor and special council power of unlimited taxation for local improvements. Observe, too, how indefinite the terms were. The bill gave a power to the governor and council to raise taxes "for carrying local improvements within the said province, or for the establishment and maintenance of police, or other objects of municipal government." What were the objects of municipal government? Under these vague terms, every expense of a domestic nature might be included. He could understand that the police of Montreal or Quebec might be defective, and that there was no power at present to apply a remedy. And if the government had specified matters of this kind, he (Sir Robert Peel) would not have refused what might be asked as a cure for the evil, if the necessity for it had been made out. The course which the government ought to have pursued was, to give a distinct enumeration of the objects for which this power of taxation was required. He would not then have refused it, if they succeeded in showing its necessity. The right hon. gentleman opposite laid upon the table of the House in the last few days, a report of the council of Lower Canada, in which some approach was made to such a specification. The report says—"That the governor and special council should be empowered to impose taxes for purposes altogether local, such as the maintenance of a police force, the lighting and paving of streets, and for otherwise improving towns and villages, and to increase or reduce local rates already existing; and further to pass ordinances for the under-mentioned purposes, viz., for the inspection of produce, and to impose rates of inspection; for authorizing companies or individuals to construct railroads, canals, bridges, and other internal communications, and to impose tolls and rates of transport thereon; for the borrowing of money for internal improvements, on the security of the revenues of the province."

The bill for the union of the provinces, also contained a specification of the power to be exercised by the municipal authorities. From these different sources they might gather what was meant by municipal objects; but there was no precise definition of the phrase; and there was a bill now under the consideration of the House which, if it became law, would very much extend the meaning of municipal objects. The bill to which he referred, proposed to give to town-councils the power to raise money, not only for ordinary municipal purposes, but upon agreement of two-thirds of the council to raise money for the public benefit of the borough, and the inhabitants thereof, by levying a rate on the inhabitants. Municipal objects might, therefore, have a very extensive meaning next year, and there would be no restrictions whatever on the power of the governor and council to raise money, on the ground of effecting local improvements, and promoting municipal objects. In another point of view, the governor and council would still be prevented from appropriating to the public service more than was appropriated in 1832, or about £40,000; but they would have unlimited power of taxation for local improvements and municipal objects. He must repeat, that he was perfectly ready to consider any bonâ fide improvements or municipal objects that might be specified, but he objected totally to this unlimited power of taxation. He was also ready to enable the provisional government, by the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act if necessary, to maintain internal tranquillity, and to put down insurrection. But it was absolutely necessary to define and limit the power of taxation. Lord Durham, who felt the necessity of some power of taxation for local improvement, proposed that an ordinance proposing a tax should have no force until laid before parliament. He would ask, whether this clause gave the power to the provisional government to incur debt for the promotion of internal improvements? If so, it might not only tax the colony to an indefinite extent at present, but mortgage its future revenues; and the new municipal institutions that were to be created, would find it their principal business to raise funds to pay the interest of the debt so incurred. It was impossible that parliament could contemplate giving a power of this kind. He could not undertake to amend the clause, but as it now stood he must oppose it. He would give the provisional government the power that might be necessary to prevent the obstruction of public improvements, to maintain the authority of the Crown, and repress insurrection—but he must contend for a limitation of their discretionary power over taxation. So much with respect to this point. He now came to the fourth clause, which gave most extensive power. He did not know whether he comprehended the general powers that were given by this clause; but he found, on referring to it, that there was a power given "to repeal, suspend, or alter, any provisions of any act of Parliament of Great Britain, or of the Parliament of the United Kingdom, or of any act of the legislature of Lower Canada, as then constituted, repealing or altering any such act of Parliament." Let them know exactly the position which was established by this clause. He did not apprehend, that greater power was to be given to the governor and special council than the colonial legislature previously had; but in the original act, granting power to the legislature, there was superadded this restriction, that they should not have the power of repealing or altering any act of the British Parliament. In repealing this restriction, was an unlimited power given, or was it only given to the extent which the original legislature had? Did they, for instance, intend that the governor and special council should have the power of dealing with the tenures of land? If it were fitting to give the power of dealing without limitation with the tenures of land, surely that was establishing a strong presumption, that the governor and council might be safely intrusted with the general administration of the province. He could not help thinking, that it was the original intention of the government to propose some limitation on this subject. He found, by a cautious note in the margin, that this power of altering the law of tenures was expressly limited to the enfranchisement of the Montreal district: he hoped that every gentleman would read this marginal note, and he would find, that it was not intended that the governor and special council should have a general power of altering the law of tenures. This was another proof, that matters of this sort were not prepared with that care which they required. He admitted, in a spirit perfectly fair, that he would not withhold this power if they showed him, in a special case, like that of Montreal, an opportunity of effecting a great public good with the good-will and consent of all parties, which, if deprived of this power, they could not effect. He would vote for granting that power in that special case, or in any other special case of a similar nature; but to alter the whole law of tenures, after the speech of the right hon. and learned gentleman, showing the connection of the Roman Catholic religion with property, he was not prepared; and he asked, therefore, was it right to give to a governor and special council an unlimited power of altering that law? He would make no objection with respect to the duration of the present law. That law would expire in 1840; but if he were convinced of the necessity of renewing that law, he would consent to a short renewal. As the law stood, the power of the present government would expire in 1840. He must say, therefore, that he did not think it prudent to give to the governor and special council the unlimited power of taxation which the third clause gave, or those extensive powers of altering the law which were given by the fourth clause. It was said, that in consequence of the restriction imposed on the provisional government by the clause, commonly called Sir William Follett's clause, the power of suspending the Habeas Corpus Act was not given. There were doubts on the subject. How would the clauses of the present bill solve those doubts? Why not specify the nature of the doubt, and provide a distinct remedy? The governor and council had no higher power than the colonial legislature had. Had the legislature the power of suspending the Habeas Corpus Act? Was it perfectly clear, that the colonial legislature ever passed a law to suspend the Habeas Corpus Act? [The Attorney-general, It was done in Upper Canada.] With respect to the power itself, he was ready to assent to it; and, as far as he could ascertain from the last accounts that had reached him, he entertained doubts whether, in the present state of the colony, they ought to refuse to the government of it, into whosoever hands it was committed, full power to maintain the authority of the British Crown, and to provide for the security of its subjects. He had stated the grounds on which he had objected to those clauses of the bill giving unlimited powers of taxation and legislation, and he had thought it right to state his view of the general operation of the bill before going into committee. He would not undertake the modification of those clauses according to his own views, not having that information which was absolutely necessary to undertake that task; but he trusted that government would—and he could not help thinking, that it would be the sense of the House that the government should—taking all the powers that were necessary for all specified local improvements, and for maintaining the public welfare, impose some limitations on the extensive powers that were proposed to be given by this bill.

The House divided on the original motion: Ayes, 223; Noes, 28; majority, 195. The House then went into committee.

UNIFORM PENNY POSTAGE.

JULY 12, 1839.

On the motion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the order of the day for receiving the report of a committee on the Postage Acts, was read. On the question that the report be received, Mr. Goulburn moved a series of resolutions to be substituted in lieu thereof.

SIR ROBERT PEEL observed, that it was one of the inconveniences attendant upon this question, that the House was called upon to take a part in a discussion which commenced at eleven o'clock, and if he had been inclined to take any party advantage, nothing could have been more easy than for him to have objected to proceeding with the question at so late an hour. He confessed he was surprised to hear the right hon. gentleman (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) affect astonishment at the novelty of the course which he had taken. Was he bound to state every objection that he had to offer the other night? He had stated no objection to the principle of the resolution; quite the reverse. What he had said was, that there was an insuperable objection, with a deficiency of nearly £1,000,000, to pledging the House irrevocably to this measure, at this period of the session, and without being acquainted with the whole details of the proposed measure. What was there in the amendment which was inconsistent with that objection? Was it not an objection, that the plan proposed that large discretionary powers should be confided to the government? Was it not a novel proposition when a measure was brought forward, to take the consideration of its details out of the hands of parliament, and to devolve that responsibility upon the government? He would remind the House also, that the proposition now made, was contrary to the recommendation of the post-office committee; for they recommended that the postage should be reduced to the uniform rate of 1d., whenever the revenue would bear it. The right hon. gentleman had said, that he would only ask for discretionary powers for the government until the next session of parliament. But was this the language of the resolution? The resolution which they were about to affirm was no devolution of a temporary authority, and if the right hon. gentleman meant to tell the House that this was merely an experiment, he had himself urged the most fatal objection to the scheme that could be brought forward; for if it were merely an experiment, it would be far better to wait till the next session, and then, after drawing its own conclusions as to the probable loss which the revenue would sustain, the government might, upon its own responsibility, ask the House of Commons to take into consideration the interests of all parties affected. The great objection to the resolution was, that with a deficiency of revenue, amounting to nearly £1,000,000, they were about to incur the hazard of further loss, to the extent of £1,500,000. There had been a deficiency in 1837, there had been a deficiency in 1838, and an increased deficiency in 1839, and yet a proposal was now made to incur the hazard of a further deficiency of £1,500,000. The right hon. gentleman had said that the remission of the tax would be of general utility. Was this to be the general principle on which the remission of taxation was to be conducted? Was it only to become necessary to raise an outcry for the abolition of some particular tax, to have it taken off, with a pledge that parliament would make good any deficiency which might be occasioned by its remission? This was just the course which was pursued by the National Assembly of France. They repealed every obnoxious impost, and placed the deficiency under the safeguard of the national honour, and they repelled, with indignation, the intimation that the public credit might not be safe under such protection. This was the course which the right hon. gentleman now took, and this was the precedent which he proposed to follow. But was there no other tax which pressed generally upon the public? Had they heard nothing about the window-tax? Had nothing been said about the repeal of the duty on soap? Would not the cause of morality and cleanliness be advanced if the soap-tax were repealed, and parliament were to pledge itself to supply the deficiency which might be thereby occasioned? Surely, if the principle was a just one, it ought to be applied in all cases. This was the first time that parliament, whether a reformed or unreformed parliament, had taken such a course. Men of all parties had hitherto agreed upon maintaining the public faith with the public creditor. In 1833, when Lord Althorp was left in a minority on the question of repealing the malt-tax, he applied to him (Sir R. Peel) the next day, for his support to a motion for rescinding the resolution upon which he was defeated, and he told him, that although it was a very strong measure, he would give him his support. Now, what were the principles which were laid down upon that occasion—principles which he hoped would not now be departed from? Lord Althorp threatened his resignation if he did not succeed in rescinding the resolution. He had heard a sneer from the opposite side of the House upon the measures which might be taken by the successors of the present government in office. He would remind them of what had been done by their predecessors. It was well known that the fate of his (Sir R. Peel's) administration in 1835, depended upon the vote of the House of Commons on the malt-tax. He had, notwithstanding, resisted the repeal of the malt-duty, and being supported by many of his political opponents, he obtained a triumphant majority. The government might depend upon the same results, if they took the same course. There was no exception in point of principle in favour of post-office duties. He would take as taxes equally objectionable, the post-horse duty, and the tax upon stage-coaches. But what said the noble lord, the Secretary for the Home Department, in 1833, when Lord Althorp proposed to rescind the resolution for repealing the malt-tax? [Murmurs.] Really, if the House was to commence a discussion of this kind at eleven o'clock at night, after a protracted debate on another important question, they ought at least to afford him a patient hearing, and if they refused it, they could not blame those who proposed an adjournment. Let hon. members listen to the doctrines laid down by the noble lord, and they would benefit by them. The noble lord said, that the proposition of the hon. member for Lincolnshire, to commence the financial year with a deficit of £1,000,000, was one which he trusted no House of Commons would ever act upon, and which no minister should ever sanction. The noble lord had deprecated beginning the financial year with a deficit; but we had actually now a deficit of £1,000,000, and we were called upon to risk another 1,500,000. The right hon. gentleman, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, then Secretary to the Treasury, said on the same occasion, "Let a saving be first effected, or let a substitute be first provided, and then remit your taxes; but beware that you do not, by a rash proceeding, place the service or the engagements of the country in jeopardy." The right hon. gentleman seemed to be so sensible of the continued applicability of these principles, that in the course of his speech, devolving his duty upon the shoulders of members on the opposition side of the House, he said, "Do you propose any tax which will amount to £1,500,000 as a guarantee for the loss which may be sustained, and I will support you." Now, he apprehended, that this was rather the duty of the right hon. gentleman. Why did he shrink from the performance of his proper functions, and content himself with the pleasing duty of remitting taxes, while he left it to the opposition to find the substitute which he admitted to be necessary? The right hon. gentleman consoled the House by referring them to the pledge. Now, if he (Sir R. Peel) was perfectly certain that parliament was determined upon making this experiment, he should infinitely prefer, looking at the interest of the public creditor, that there should be no pledge at all. If the House were to give a pledge, that after the next session of parliament, or any other definite time, they would supply any deficiency which might then have arisen, the pledge would be of some service. But that was not the pledge for which the government asked. The pledge was simply to make good any deficiency in the revenue which might be occasioned by the adoption of the present plan. This was merely a vague general obligation to make good the deficiency at some future time. The author of the plan, Mr. Rowland Hill, whose remarks it was impossible to read without being prepossessed in his favour, admitted that the post-office revenue might suffer, but added, that a great stimulus would be given to commerce, which would be a benefit to other sources of the revenue. But who was to determine what benefit was received? Again, a member who had given the pledge for which the government asked, might notwithstanding say, when called upon on a future occasion to redeem it, that he had only pledged himself to make good the particular deficiency caused by the post-office reductions, and although there might be a loss on the revenue derived from the post-office, other branches of the revenue might have received an equivalent compensation, and therefore, that he did not conceive himself bound to make good his pledge. According to the views of one hon. gentleman, who was a great friend to the measure, the full effect of the plan could not be ascertained for three years. How, then, could they say that any deficiency had been occasioned by the alteration, till the plan had been brought into full operation? Let nobody ask for the remission of any particular tax in the meanwhile, for it would be impossible to say whether it could be taken off or not. There were other objections to this particular pledge. The parties who were eventually taxed to supply the deficiency, might urge that they did not object to taxation for a supply of a general deficit, but that they did object to being taxed to make good a deficiency in the post-office duties, because they had not received a corresponding benefit. Now, he would ask the right hon. gentleman what tax he thought of imposing? There was now a deficiency in the revenue for three years of £1,800,000, and next year there would be a deficit of £1,000,000, without taking into consideration the estimate made by Lord Ashburton; so that there would be a fourth year of deficit. Now, what tax did the right hon. gentleman opposite propose? The right hon. gentleman had said, that there was a difference between political and financial considerations; but could the right hon. gentleman propose the imposition of any tax which would not involve high political considerations? At all events, with a deficit of £2,000,000 in five years, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, whoever he might be, would be called on to provide a remedy. The right hon. gentleman sought to pledge the House to provide the deficiency which it was admitted would follow the adoption of this plan; but he failed to name the tax he had in contemplation. His (Sir R. Peel) belief was, that if it was intended to redeem the pledge, the House would pledge itself now, if it adopted the resolution of the right hon. gentleman to a property tax; and looking at the state of the public interests, and at the high scale of taxation upon articles which were the elements of manufacture and great consumption, possibly a property tax might be the wisest to be resorted to in such a case. But would the House do so in order merely to raise one or two millions of money? Was it not better to leave the matter unembarrassed by parliamentary pledges, and trust rather to the general sense of parliament, to take such a course as the public interest required? He should on these grounds refuse the pledge. The right hon. gentleman might, if he thought proper, throw on him (Sir R. Peel) the odium and unpopularity of defeating his measure; for that he absolutely cared nothing; but in a matter of this importance, he would rather relinquish public life, and this arena, in which he had combated for thirty years, than he would give his consent to the course of proceeding now proposed. He should co-operate with no hon. member opposed to him in politics to defeat the plan. If hon. members of different politics to himself, joined with him in rejecting the present proposition, he should not reject their aid, but he should reject the plan, not from objections to the plan itself, but because the pledge by which it was accompanied was indefinite, discretionary, and almost unintelligible. He trusted that the House, comparing the advantage with the disadvantage, considering that this plan was first opened in the budget the other night, and that the House was now, on the 12th of July, discussing a mere resolution, and that no bill on the subject had yet been introduced—remembering that they had not been afforded an opportunity of consulting their constituents—remembering, also, that the government had not yet made up their minds on the question as to what description of paper was to be written upon, or upon the question involved in the two words new to the language, viz., repayment and postpayment;—looking to all these circumstances, he trusted the House would not leave these matters to any department to determine them. Was it fitting that the Treasury should have the right to determine, without appeal to parliament, whether or not any single paper-maker should have the monopoly?—was it fitting for the House now to agree to that part of the measure, which might involve the interests of the paper-makers generally? He would not anticipate or suppose any abuse of the power; but he claimed for parliament the right to consult those of their constituents whose fortunes were involved in the matter. Would such a course be a good example to set at the latter end of July? It might be fancied that at present there was a popular clamour, which left no option in the matter; but, in his opinion, in one month the public would think it better that the government should afford them and their representatives an opportunity of considering the subject, by postponing it to an early period of the next session. He had heard with much pleasure, in the course of the debate which this evening had taken precedence, an assurance given by hon. members on all sides of the House, that whatever alterations they might seek to make in the constitution of the country, still they were determined to maintain the public credit. He was gratified to hear, that though parliaments might be made triennial, that universal suffrage might be admitted, and the vote by ballot introduced, still every hon. gentleman who had spoken in the debate to which he adverted, had expressed his determination to keep the credit of the country inviolate. Should it then be said, that the parliament, at the end of a session, with a deficit in the revenue of £1,800,000 in three years, and of £1,000,000 in the present, with no possibility of a decreased, but rather with a chance of an increased expenditure, to answer the necessities of the public service, bequeathed to its successors the example first, of divesting itself of its proper function, and committing the fortunes and interests of the manufacturers to the control of one department of the State; and, secondly, in the existing condition of the public revenue, for the first time, also, set the example of a government not providing for the maintenance of public credit, not resisting the demand for a removal of taxation, not making those who were to reap the benefit feel the pressure of an immediate substitute, but setting the example of conciliating public favour by the indulgent task of remission, and contenting themselves with an unintelligible pledge, that parliament would provide a compensation for the deficiency in the revenue which they were about to create.

The House divided on the original question: Ayes, 215; Noes, 113; majority, 102. Report agreed to.

POSTAGE DUTIES BILL.

JULY 22, 1839.

In the debate on the second reading of this bill,—

SIR ROBERT PEEL said: I will in the first instance refer to two or three minor points which have been alluded to on the assumption that this bill will ultimately pass into a law. Assuming that to be the case, I do not concur with my hon. friend, the member for the University of Oxford, (Mr. Goulburn,) that it would be desirable that the members of this House should retain their parliamentary privilege of franking. I think, if it were to be continued after this bill came into operation, that there would be a degree of odium attached to it which would greatly diminish its value. The reason for keeping it up will, in a great degree, expire with the passing of this bill; for when members of parliament can receive their communications for a penny each, it will not be necessary to preserve the privilege of franking. With respect to official franking, whether the bill pass into a law or not, some alteration would be advisable. So far as the measure is an experiment, I concur with the right hon. gentleman opposite, that new regulations ought to be adopted. I think it would be advisable to require, that each department should specially pay the postage incurred in the public service of the department. If every office be called on to pay its own postage, we shall introduce a useful principle into the public service. There is no habit connected with a public office so inveterate or so difficult to be laid down as the privilege of official franking. But the benefit of adopting a new principle will be this, that the man who, acting on a uniform practice, and who, from the force of an established habit, would not refuse to frank a packet of letters for a friend, would refuse to take eight or nine shillings out of the public coffers by conferring a similar obligation under the new system. Of late years a very great extension has taken place in the practice of official franking. Indeed, within the last two sessions, a great increase has taken place in the number of persons admitted to frank, and this bill convinces me, that it would be advisable to take this privilege under some new regulations. With respect to the privilege enjoyed by members of the House of transmitting without restriction voluminous documents at the public expense, I certainly think that this is a privilege liable to very great abuse. It is monstrous, that a member of parliament may send 150 volumes of parliamentary papers of the present session, and two hundred volumes of a former session, through the post-office, without any restriction or any charge. I apprehend that the advantage of this privilege is very much overrated, and I am sure that it acts very unequally. I am sure that there are many members of the House who would object to send packages in this way through the post-office. I am sure that there are many members of the House who would shrink from the exercise of such a privilege. With respect to the particular regulations to be adopted, I will not now offer any opinion, but some regulations are undoubtedly desirable. I am convinced, that if the 653 members of the House were to send the whole of the blue books received during the session through the post-office, it would be attended with the greatest inconvenience to that department, and I shall concur in any regulation that may appear calculated to control that privilege within proper limits. There might still be the permission to purchase the papers at the public office in the usual way; but if every person can procure these books at a very cheap rate, I see no reason why the public should be called upon to pay the charge of sending them through the post-office. I stated on a former night, that, having deliberately protested against this measure, I should not think it necessary to meet its further progress with any vexatious opposition. I am not surprised, that my resistance to this measure has been ineffectual. I know very well, that whenever the Chancellor of the Exchequer declares himself in favour of the remission of any tax, all resistance to such remission becomes vain. I know very well, that if the Secretary of the Home Department were to declare, that the disturbers of the public peace were to be kept free from any control or interference, we could expect nothing but to have the country overwhelmed with confusion and disturbance. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has control with respect to taxation, and when he declares his intention to remove a tax, all resistance must prove unavailing. I stated that, in the present circumstances of the public revenue, I objected to increase the risk, and I think that the right hon. gentleman has given me a very ample vindication of the course I have pursued. The right hon. gentleman says, that he wishes that more time had been given for consideration, and that he might have full means of estimating the loss of revenue. The right hon. gentleman admits, that he ought not to have brought forward the subject without the calmest consideration. Suppose that the right hon. gentleman had asked time for that, and had asked the House to consent to a postponement till next session, and that notwithstanding he had been overborne by the sense of parliament, in that case, the responsibility would rest upon the House, but at present the responsibility rests with the right hon. gentleman himself. The right hon. gentleman will succeed in carrying his measure, for it cannot be effectually opposed. I think, however, that in opposing this proposition, I have done right; and I am desirous that the public opinion shall be pronounced on my conduct, not now, or in two months after the passing of this bill, but on the day when parliament must either abandon its pledge or be called on to make good the deficiency. The whole pledge amounts to this, (and it is contained in the preamble,) that parliament will make good any deficiency that may occur. That is the whole amount of the pledge. There is no enactment, no recital in the preamble of its nature, or the extent to which it is to go. Now what passed the other night? My objection was, that no one could fix the time at which parliament would be called on to redeem the pledge. The right hon. the President of the Board of Trade, acknowledged that there would be a considerable deficit, a thing always to be deprecated in a great commercial country, and stated that in the next session we shall be called on to redeem our pledge, and to fix a new tax to supply the deficiency. That was the only distinct intimation we had of the time when the redemption of the pledge will be required. When the right hon. the Chancellor of the Exchequer says, that his present conviction is, that parliament will redeem the pledge, he should bear in mind the reservation with which many hon. gentlemen on his own side of the House accompanied it. The hon. member for Greenock says, that he will cheerfully bear his part in supplying the deficiency; but I do not understand him to construe his promise as the Chancellor of the Exchequer construes it. I understand him to say, that if eventually there shall appear a great deficiency, he will then consider the means of replacing it. Then the hon. member for Bridport means to redeem his pledge, not by taxation, but after the reduction of postage shall have had what he considers to be a sufficient time for fair trial, he will consent, not to reduce taxation, but to endeavour, by some new arrangement of the revenue, to give such a stimulus to commercial industry as will, after another lapse of time, make up the deficiency. Sir, I have before expressed my apprehension that, without reference to the post-office, there must be a continued and increasing deficit in the revenue, and this apprehension has been confirmed by what I have heard this evening. I have heard that government, feeling themselves bound by an imperative sense of duty, propose to make an addition to our regular force of 5,000 men, which will incur an expense of at least £150,000 a-year. We also hear of measures for the establishment of a rural police throughout the country. There may be necessity for both these measures—I say not one word as to their policy. The circumstances must be grave indeed which call on government to submit them to the House; but what will be the effect of those measures on the revenue of the country?

Shall we be able to meet this increase without reference to the post-office? I fear, on the contrary, that the deficit now existing will be increased, and that next year it will be much greater than at present. But I will not overrate these difficulties. I do not deny that great social and commercial advantages will arise from the change, independent of financial considerations. Even if the scheme had not been proposed, I think the evidence which has been laid before the committee would warrant a considerable reduction in postage. I think we should have made the experiment of a partial reduction. It has been said that the principal advantage of this measure will be felt by the commercial interests. If so, it will only be a greater recommendation to me; for, whenever commercial intercourse is facilitated, the result must be the general benefit of the country. The change must also in its extent contribute to the improvement of the lower classes, although I think that the probable benefit has been greatly overrated. I think that at least we should have had an opportunity of getting at something like the exact extent by which the correspondence of those classes would be increased before we proceeded to legislation. We might, for instance, ascertain what is the extent of the correspondence of soldiers and sailors, who, at present, have the advantage of a penny postage. It would be a matter of great importance, in fact, a material element in the consideration of this question, to ascertain to what extent those parties have availed themselves of these advantages. You should recollect also that the abolition of the parliamentary privilege of franking will in itself limit the correspondence of the poorer classes, because that privilege is often at present used for the benefit of those who cannot afford even a single penny. Thus, there is an advantage of sending a letter without any charge, for which even the general reduction to one penny will not compensate. I do not state this as an objection to the measure; I merely state it as a reason for thinking, that you have rather over-estimated the advantage which the poorer classes will derive from the change. Well, Sir, supposing there is a great defalcation in the revenue, by what new tax would you propose to redeem your pledge? You remit this tax on the principle that all high taxation is impolitic; for that reason you reduce the postage from 6½d to 1d.; but on what article will you increase the taxation? I look through the long list of malt, hops, candles, coffee, &c., and I ask on which of them you expect to raise a tax of two millions a-year? Can any man deny that there will be enormous difficulty in subjecting any of these articles to a new duty? All the advantages obtained for correspondence will not diminish the objections to whatever tax you may propose. I say, then, that I do not deny the advantages that will result from the remission of this tax, for there is no tax the remission of which would not be of benefit to the community. There is, for instance, the tax on internal communication, the repeal of which would redress a balance of injustice, because in that part of the country in which there are no railways, and is therefore cursed with imperfect communication, there is a charge on posting of twopence a-mile, whereas, in those parts traversed by railways, while the people have every facility of travelling, they are free from charge. Why, no one will attempt to deny that the abolition of this tax would be a general benefit; but we are precluded from the consideration of that claim by the pressure of the postage measure. The Chancellor of the Exchequer will not listen to any proposal for reduction of taxation until this is disposed of. For my part I do not say that, in the present position of our finances, I will not vote for any reduction of taxation. I attach so much importance to the preservation of public credit, so certain am I that, at a general election, the present measure might serve as a precedent for a government to court popularity, by proposing to reduce a tax, throwing the task of supplying the deficiency on their successors, or trusting that some future parliament will redeem the pledge of the one now sitting, that I shall not give this measure my support. Sir, I have been taunted with making this a party question, but I came down here to-night prepared to adhere to the engagement I entered into on a former stage of the measure—to content myself with entering my protest against the principle. However, if my hon. friend is determined on dividing the House—although, as the sense of the House has already been so fully expressed, I think it unnecessary to press it to a division—I shall certainly vote with him. However, my own intention is not to trouble the House with any harassing opposition, but to content myself with the protest I have already entered.

Bill read a second time.

PETITION OF MESSRS. HANSARD.

AUGUST 1, 1839.

On the motion of Lord John Russell the House proceeded to the consideration of the petition of Messrs. Hansard.

The noble lord then proposed the following resolutions:—"That Messrs. Hansard, in printing and publishing the report, and the minutes of evidence on the present state of the island of New Zealand, communicated by the House of Lords to this honourable House, on the 7th of August, 1838, acted under the orders of this House; and that to bring, or to assent in bringing any action against them for such publication, is a breach of the privileges of this House."

"That Messrs. Hansard be directed not to answer the letter of Mr. Shaw mentioned in this petition, and not to take any steps towards defending the action mentioned in the said letter."

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, that when the question was last under the consideration of the House, a proposal was made that they should take a course which would be tantamount, if resistance were offered, to committing the sheriff for levying the fine that was inflicted by the Court of Queen's Bench. He opposed that course, thinking upon the whole that, having permitted the Attorney-general to appear, and having apparently submitted the question to the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench—and the court having decided against them, and the sheriff, who was a mere ministerial officer, being bound to obey the orders of that court—he thought it would give rise, not only to inconvenience and misconception, but also to injustice, if they inflicted punishment on the merely ministerial officer, after they had, by their own voluntary act, become parties to the proceeding. But he had previously said, that he had heard with regret that authority was given to the Attorney-general to appear, and further, that the sole ground on which he consented to forbearance on the part of the House, was on account of the peculiar course they had adopted—on account of their having apparently submitted their privileges to the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench; but he then advised, if the case should again occur, that they should take another course: that they should not allow the Attorney-general to appear and apply to the Court of Queen's Bench for judgment, but that they should assume to themselves the vindication of their own privileges; but that was a course which appeared to him to have received the sanction of the Court of Queen's Bench, in the decision it had come to in the case of Stockdale v. Hansard. He there found it laid down by the Lord Chief Justice—"The Commons of England are not invested with more of power and dignity by their legislative character, than by that which they bear as the grand inquest of the nation. All the privileges that can be required for the energetic discharge of the duties inherent in that high trust, are conceded without a murmur or a doubt."

He then asked this question, whether, upon a matter of privilege, an inherent high trust, they should permit the Messrs. Hansard to attend before another tribunal, to determine upon this matter of privilege? His hon. friend near him (Sir Robert Inglis) said, that there would be some difficulty in this question, since they had only the power to commit to the end of the session. If that were a fatal objection to the exercise of this power, it was an objection that would apply to all. Their proceedings would be entirely paralysed if, because their duration was not so complete as that of the Court of Queen's Bench, they were never to exercise their powers. They might as well abdicate their functions altogether. What was the argument? that because their powers were not so enlarged, or complete, or permanent, as those of other bodies, that, therefore, they were to determine never to exercise any of those powers? He could not give up the advantage which they possessed in the case of the New Zealand inquiry, because if they were prepared to relinquish their privileges in this case—if they were prepared to permit Messrs. Hansard again to appear before the Court of Queen's Bench, because the case was so strong that it must be determined in their favour—it would be appealed to as a precedent, and it would be said hereafter, "Now, you must submit, because here is a case in which you did submit, and defend the question." It was impossible, he conceived, that they ever could have a case at all corresponding to the present; and if, therefore, they were to abandon their privileges in this case, they must completely and permanently abandon them. What was the case? An inquiry was conducted in the House of Lords. The House of Lords attempted to take a course which was suggested to this House that they ought to take, namely, they should not give the names of the parties examined; and the House of Lords, therefore, excluded the name of Mr. Polack, and contented themselves with giving his initials. They gave his initials J. S. P.; and they stated that those initials referred to a person who had appeared as a witness before the House of Lords. Now there was no witness who had the initials J. S. P. except Joel Samuel Polack; indeed he was the only witness whose name began with a P.; it was clear, therefore, that Polack was the man referred to. Now the inquiry was instituted, not in order to enable the House of Lords to determine what course they should pursue in some particular case, but to enable parliament to determine what policy it might be prudent to pursue with respect to the colonization of a great island. The inquiry would be perfectly useless, if the House of Lords were the only parties to know the facts. The evidence would be a perfect mockery, if it were communicated solely to the members of the House of Lords, and the members of the House of Commons. The question here involved was, would they encourage emigration or not? If they did not, let those parties who were desirous to emigrate know what the evidence was on the subject, how was it possible that they could attain their object? This was the report of the House of Lords:—"That it appears to this committee, that the extension of the colonial possessions of the Crown is a question of public policy, which belongs to the decision of her Majesty's government; but that it appears to this committee that support, in whatever way it may be deemed most expedient to afford it, of the exertions which have already beneficially effected the rapid advancement of the religious and social condition of the aborigines of New Zealand, affords the best present hopes of their future progress in civilization."

Two objects were here referred to, the advancement of civilization, and the mode of establishing civilization by promoting emigration. How could they promote that object, except by making known the result of their inquiries? How otherwise could they encourage emigration? How could they say to parties desirous to emigrate, "We are willing to encourage you, but we must withhold all the information we possess; we have large volumes printed containing information, but we are prevented by some rule of law from communicating it to you." The evidence of Polack had a most important bearing on the hopes, and interests, and fortunes of emigrants. He did not know whether Polack volunteered as a witness; he could only say this, that Mr. Polack did appear as a witness. He thought the following answer of Polack most important:—"How would colonization prevent wars between the natives?—By employing their minds and their bodies; by Europeans settling between them; by Europeans taking up the slaves as farm servants. The slaves of New Zealand are very impertinent; they are given to invention and lies, and those are things which cause more wars between the natives than any thing else."

Polack also states another circumstance most important, but of no value unless it was published:—"Has the native population decreased?" he was asked, and he answered,—It has. Do you account for that chiefly by war?—No, I think the principal cause is infanticide. I have seen many women who have destroyed their children either by abortion, or after their birth, putting them into a basket and throwing them into the sea, after pressing the frontal bones of the foreheads. Why have they done that?—I have had conversation with them upon it. I saw a girl one day, and knowing she was pregnant, I said, 'Where is the child?' The answer was, 'Gone.' 'Gone where—where is it gone to?' 'I killed it,' was the answer, with the greatest apathy."

This was a most important statement. A man going to settle in this place would ask what was the character of the natives, what were their feelings respecting land and the tenure of land? And the answers would be of no use whatever, except those who contemplated emigration. How, then, was it possible that they could conduct such an inquiry with any advantage, if the Court of Queen's Bench had a right to restrain them from publishing the evidence to the world. Polack again states this, which appeared to him rather extraordinary, and which it was important for emigrants to be informed of. "Do you think any attempt to unite different tribes in one, and to put a stop to their wars, would meet with success?—That never can be done. Oil and water will not amalgamate. They visit one another?—Yes. During those visits they live on good terms?—Yes; they will absolutely fight against their own party in favour of the people they may reside with. Sometimes their superstitions occasion a great many wars; for example, if a pig passes over a cemetery there is a war immediately. Giving up the pig will not renew former amity; there must be war. If a man happen to put his pipe at the top of an old rush-house, which no person would live in, war ensues; and enmities arise from the most trifling things possible. They are children on that subject."

Now, supposing an emigrant were desirous of going to this colony, would he not be most desirous of knowing the state in which the people were, the way in which they lived; and would he like to be involved in contentions in which he had no particular interest, or to find the prosperity of the colony impeded by the contentions of the natives? But another witness was called, and he was rather surprised at his evidence, for he stated that he knew ——— in New South Wales; that he should not designate him a respectable man; and that he would not believe him on his oath under any circumstances. Was it important that parties intending to emigrate should or should not know this? What would be the position of the Imperial parliament if they encouraged parties to emigrate upon testimony of this kind, and withheld the testimony affecting its credit of which they were in possession? He referred to this for the purpose of showing how impossible it was to maintain the distinction, that they should receive this information in their capacity of the grand inquest of the nation, that that information should be confined to themselves, and that it should be burned when they ceased to exist. As to the question of publication and sale, if there was any one point more clear than another it was this, that whatever moral responsibility the sale might impose, yet, in a legal and technical point of view, it made no difference. Sale was no necessary element in a court of law in order to determine the question of publication. He, therefore, did not think that his hon. friend (Sir R. Inglis) could safely rely upon the distinction between this House and the House of Lords, because the courts of law had distinctly decided that there was no difference whatever. The fact was, that publication by order of the House of Commons made it privileged. What course were they, then, to follow? The privilege of publication would be of no avail whatever, unless it was one by which the community would be served. He did not say, that in every case they were to give cognizance of their papers to the community at large, but there might be cases in which it was absolutely necessary that the community at large should have all the information they could give; and the only point was, whether they were to exercise their discretion in determining whether the case was fit for publication or not? If they permitted this to be determined and decided upon by any other body, they became an inferior authority in the State. He did not contend for unrestricted publication of every thing; all he contended for was, that of all such information as they were in possession of, which they thought ought to be communicated to the public generally, they only should determine upon the policy of that publication; and when they had determined to make such publication, no extrinsic authority should exercise jurisdiction over their acts. The immediate question was, what the House should do? Ought they to instruct Mr. Hansard to plead to the action? If so, they had the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench already against them. Ought they to admit that the House had been wrong? In that case they must abandon altogether and for ever the right of publishing their proceedings. The course proposed by the noble lord appeared to him to be one tempered with great moderation, by not proceeding directly upon the resolution of 1837, but again giving notice to the world of its existence. Having once tried the case in a court of law, hoping to have a decision in favour of the privileges of the House, and having been disappointed, they now intended to be the judge of their own authority, and to punish those who would attempt to interfere with it. There might be a case in which the authority of the House might still be resisted; but the public would now generally become convinced, that these privileges were not exercised for the personal gratification of the members of this House, but they were intrinsically interwoven with their public functions, and absolutely essential to the discharge of them. The noble lord proposed to proceed in a manner which should subject to punishment, as for high contempt, any one presuming to dispute these privileges. The judges had admitted that this House was in the possession of every power for the vindication of its privileges and the due exercise of its functions; and that if it were to commit a person for contempt of those privileges, no court would take cognizance to relieve the party. He would read the opinion of a high judicial authority, who said, that, "in case of committals for contempt, no doubt the House of Commons was the sole judge of the cause, and that no court of law could inquire into it." He (Sir R. Peel), therefore, had been from the first of opinion, that the most proper mode for the House to have proceeded in was, to interpose its authority at once on the first symptom of the contempt; but, as a different course had been adopted in the earlier stages of the case of Stockdale v. Hansard, he had not thought it advisable to interfere, after once having submitted as it were to the authority of the court; but now, having once gone before the Court of Queen's Bench, but without success, he did not think that any one would say that in the present case they would be proceeding with undue arrogance, or without due and sufficient cause, if they gave a distinct notice, that whoever attempted now to dispute this privilege should be punished as for a high contempt. He thought that in so doing they would have the public with them; and even if they had not, they would have the satisfaction of knowing that they had done their duty, and had endeavoured to preserve the privileges that were vested in them for the benefit of the people of England.

PRIVILEGE—STOCKDALE v. HANSARD.

JANUARY 16, 1840.

Lord John Russell presented a petition from Messrs. Luke and James Hansard, the printers to the House, by which it appeared that certain goods, their property, had been taken, in consequence of their acting in obedience to the orders of the House. The petition having been read, was ordered to be printed, and taken into consideration on the next day.

Lord John Russell then moved "That John Joseph Stockdale, the plaintiff, be called; next, Thomas Burton Howard, his attorney in the case, then the sheriff, under-sheriff, and deputy under-sheriff, together with the bailiff who acted in the case." The noble lord concluded by moving "That John Joseph Stockdale be summoned to the bar on the following day."

SIR ROBERT PEEL said that it was important the House should clearly understand the position in which they stood with respect to this question, not that he meant thereby to bind their judgment, but because it was necessary that they should be aware of the course which they themselves had taken. In the year 1837, a committee was appointed by that House, composed of many of the most eminent legal authorities in it; that committee united the hon. and learned member for Edinburgh (the Attorney-general), Mr. Sergeant Wilde, his hon. and learned friend the member for Huntingdon (the Attorney-general under the late government), and his hon. friend the Solicitor-general under the same government. That committee, with one exception, came to the unanimous opinion that the House had the privilege, and that it was the sole judge of its own privilege. When that report was made by the committee, the House of Commons confirmed it by resolution. A second action was then brought by Mr. Stockdale, and certainly to his regret an appearance was entered to the action. He thought that it would have been better for the House of Commons at once to have assumed the vindication of its own privileges, and not to have permitted them to be adjudicated upon by any court of justice. He admitted, however, that it was a question of great difficulty, and he deferred to the Attorney-general, who thought it better to plead to the action. That step he owned, he regretted at the time, and he even then predicted what would be the result. The question then arose, whether, having pleaded to the action, the House ought to prevent the execution of the judgment, and he had concurred in opinion with the noble lord opposite (Lord John Russell), that having submitted to the arbitration of the Court of Queen's Bench, there would be some inconsistency and some injustice, when that court had decided against them, in opposing the execution of the judgment. So great, however, was the eagerness then on the part of House to vindicate their privileges, that there was great difficulty in inculcating forbearance upon that occasion. Notwithstanding the agreement of the chiefs of the opposite political parties in the House, the milder course was only carried by a narrow majority of twenty-two. The numbers were—188 to 166; so difficult was it, after hearing the speech of Mr. Sergeant Wilde, to persuade the House not to proceed to the immediate vindication of its privileges. In the course of the last session the damages were paid, he would not say with the consent, but without the opposition of the House. After all the discussion he was persuaded, and he had fully predicted, that there would arise a difficulty in the course which had been adopted. Their printer then received a notice from an attorney acting for a person named Polack, that notwithstanding the resolutions of the House, he was determined to bring an action against Messrs Hansard, and it became necessary to determine what course the House would pursue. The noble lord opposite thereupon proposed the following resolutions:—"1. That Messrs. Hansard, in printing and publishing a report and minutes of evidence, on the present state of the Islands of New Zealand, communicated by the House of Lords to this House on the 7th of August, 1838, acted under the orders of this House; and that to bring or assist in bringing any action against them for such publication, would be a breach of the privileges of this House; and 2. That Messrs. Hansard be directed not to answer the letter of Charles Shaw, mentioned in their petition, and not to take any step towards defending the action with which they are threatened in the said letter."

These two resolutions were carried, with a full knowledge of all that had previously taken place, by a majority of 120 to four. After the termination of the session, Mr. Stockdale, being aware, as they were all aware, of the incompleteness of the powers of the House, brought another action against Messrs. Hansard—a third action, for the publication of the very libel which had been the subject of the preceding action.—Messrs. Hansard did not rely on what the House had done in the case of Polack, although the principle laid down in the case of Polack was precisely applicable to the case of Stockdale. Messrs. Hansard applied for advice to the highest authority in that House, they applied to the Speaker, and the Speaker, concluding that the House intended to abide by the principle which had been laid down in the case of Polack, and which was carried by the majority of 120 to four, naturally and justly advised Messrs. Hansard not to enter an appearance to the action. Messrs. Hansard acted upon that advice, and Messrs. Hansard (their officers) had been subjected to the penalty of £600 for acting under the authority of the Speaker intermediately; but, as it appeared to him (Sir R. Peel), really under the authority of the House. If the House had received the same notice in the case of Stockdale as in the case of Polack, could there be a doubt that they would have affirmed the same principle? He begged them, therefore, to consider the position in which the House of Commons was placed. What was the course, then, that the House of Commons ought to take with regard to this action? And he only regretted that the legal difficulties opposed to the course proposed had not been stated months ago, before this action had arisen, and that they had been reserved for the moment when they were called upon to perform their duty. What then was the course suggested? Should they abandon their privileges? If they permitted the sheriff to pay Stockdale the damages which the jury had awarded, what would be the next step? They could not prevent Stockdale from instituting another action, if they once admitted, that one of their officers was liable in any court of law to an action, civil or criminal, for performing his duty to them. He apprehended that such would be the natural consequence, unless they took notice of the present proceeding. Had they any privileges? Were they the judges of those privileges? Those were the questions. Had they any privileges? His noble friend (Viscount Mahon) said, that in times gone by their privileges had been abused. That might be, but that was not the question here. Had they any privileges, and if they had, who were the judges of them? His noble friend admitted one certain privilege, the privilege of publishing for the use of the members of the House; that was a great concession for his noble friend to make. Who, then, were to be the judges of the exercise of that very privilege? He took the concession that they possessed the privilege; who were to judge of its exercise? He presumed that his noble friend would admit, that if the privilege was to be available to the House, the House must judge of its exercise. He assumed, that this was the only privilege they possessed. Of what avail would it be, unless the House were exclusive judges of the proper use? Suppose the Queen's Bench should say, that they had improperly exercised this privilege which his noble friend admitted they possessed, what course would the House take? Suppose they should proceed by resolution to declare that the House had the privilege and that they themselves were the exclusive judges of their privileges. These resolutions would be condemned as impious and heretical, and some one might declare, that he did absolutely abhor, detest, and abjure the impious doctrine that a resolution of the House of Commons can contravene the law of the land. That disclaimer was equally applicable to the resolution enforcing the privilege which his noble friend admitted they did possess, as to the resolution on the privilege of publication. There were no means of enforcing any privilege except by resolution. If the Queen's Bench should disregard their resolution by giving damages against them, how were they to proceed except by committing the sheriff or other ministerial officer? His noble friend said, that they had added the power of sale to their old privilege. He was ready to admit, that the use of the power of sale had raised some prejudice against them in the public mind. He thought, that it was difficult to persuade the public, that there was not a material distinction between the two kinds of publication. It might be a question of policy whether they should adhere to the sale, but it could be a question of policy only, and did not enter into the present discussion. Observe, the Queen's Bench had determined that, as far as legal considerations were involved, the question of sale did not arise. It might be said by his noble friend, that it was desirable to revert to the state of things which formerly existed—to revert to the same state as they were in seven or eight years ago. If they did this to-morrow, how would it affect them with respect to the case of Stockdale? He presumed, that the court of Queen's Bench lived in a higher atmosphere—that it was above being affected by any prejudice which might exist in the public mind—and that it would determine the question as one of principle; and it was not clear that the court would enter upon its consideration, not as to whether they thought the House had acted unwisely, but as lawyers—so that if they gave up the sale, it would not be admitted that the Queen's Bench had no right to question their privilege. And what was the present publication? It consisted of inquiries into the state of gaols. It was proposed to introduce some new regulation to cure the abuses existing in prisons. As an instance of these abuses, it was stated that the prisoners were in possession of publications which, pretending to be scientific, were calculated to injure the minds of the prisoners. If this were true, was it not a material fact? His noble friend, said, that they might make a publication of the fact for their own use. Had his noble friend considered the difficulty of confining it to their own use; had he considered the difficulty of not communicating it to their constituents? If a member in possession of such papers should in any manner communicate their contents to any other person, the question would immediately arise; if the Court of Queen's Bench should determine that the member had been a little too free in the use of his papers, even by communicating them to a constituent, the very question which they had now to consider would then arise. Therefore, his noble friend's doctrine that the House might publish the papers for their own use, unless he would also admit, that the House were to be exclusive judges of the exercise of their own privileges, would be of no avail. If he admitted the question of a conflicting jurisdiction, the present question would arise. Therefore, if they felt that they had inadvertently committed themselves by their proceedings, if they felt that upon the whole it would be the wisest course to recede, however painful it might be, they ought to withdraw from a justification of their own proceedings. But he (Sir R. Peel) firmly believed, that this privilege of publication was essential to the House in order to enable it to perform its duties. He did not conceive, that they could act as a House of Commons unless they had the power of publishing; not only for their own use, but for the information of the public, what they considered necessary. He had discussed the subject in the belief that to the House of Commons the power of publication was necessary. For instance, they had the power of addressing the Crown for the removal of a judge. They might be called upon to decide a question which the House of Commons had been called upon in former times to decide, the succession to the Crown. How could they address the Crown for a removal of a judge for misconduct, without first satisfying the public mind that their decision upon such conduct was correct? Could it be possible for the House of Commons to set aside the claims of a Duke of York, without convincing the public mind that danger existed if he should ascend the Throne? There were, therefore, many questions of legislation on which it was essential that the public mind should be informed, as well as the members of that House, and he must maintain, that the power of publication was necessary for them as a House of Commons. Then it had been distinctly admitted by the judges that whatever functions were necessary for the House of Commons in the performance of its duty the House of Commons did possess. He believed, that the privilege of publication was necessary to enable the House of Commons to discharge its duties, and as at present advised, he was ready to take the step which the noble lord opposed. At the same time he was quite aware of the imperfection of the power which they possessed. He was aware that their power was perfect only whilst Parliament was sitting. Here was an instance of the imperfection. Mr. Stockdale waited till after the Parliament was up, and then instituted the present action. The natural presumption had hitherto been, that the courts of law would assist the House under such circumstances, but a case had unfortunately arisen in which the House was deprived of that assistance. When they were deprived of the assistance of the courts, they were forcibly reminded of the imperfection of the powers of the House. His hon. and learned friend, the member for Liverpool (Mr. Cresswell), had asked why they did not commit the judges? There were professional and technical matters with which he was unacquainted, but it might be improper to commit the judge, and the proper course was to commit the ministerial officer. They should strive, as far as they could, to prevent the recovery of these damages, and he thought, also, that the analogy which had been drawn with respect to the courts of law was in some respects supported by the view which he had taken upon the subject. He would ask the House to suppose a case. Let them suppose that the Court of Queen's Bench should persevere in issuing a process in opposition to an injunction of the Court of Chancery. This would be a case of conflicting jurisdictions which the law could not foresee, and what would be the course to be pursued by the Court of Chancery? Would they commit the judges of the Court of Queen's Bench? He thought that they would not, but that they would direct their offensive proceedings against the officer of that court. He was always ready to admit, that the efficacy of proceedings of the kind now necessary to be taken, consisted in unanimity, or rather in the prevailing and general determination of the House to enforce its privileges. With regard to the measures which must be taken to rescue parliament from its present position, he was not prepared to give any opinion on that point. That something must be done he fully believed, and he was convinced, that there must be some arrangement made with respect to the insufficiency of their powers in reference to the courts of law, because it was perfectly evident, that during the recess, when the House was not sitting, those powers were incomplete. He would not give any opinion as to the course which was proper to be pursued, but he would point out, that the sheriff had expected that they would endeavour to maintain their own privileges, and had given them an opportunity of interfering—that he had believed, that they possessed strong feelings on this point, and that they would, therefore, interpose their authority in reference to the subject. They were bound then to assist that officer as far as they could; and admitting, as he did, that their powers were incomplete, he yet hoped that they would exercise them to the fullest extent, and he should most sincerely regret any interruption which might have the effect of thwarting them in the object which they had in view. Whatever might be the result of this case, however, he must express his firm belief, that the privilege of free publication was essential to the performance of their duties as a deliberative assembly, and as one of the branches of the constitution of this country.

On a division the numbers were:—Ayes 286; Noes 167; majority 119.

On the resolution that the sheriffs be called to the bar, Mr. F. Kelly moved as an amendment, that they be ordered to bring with them all writs, rules, and other authorities, under which they might have acted.

Motion as amended agreed to.

JANUARY 20, 1840.

The Order of the Day for taking the petition of Messrs. Hansard into further consideration, having been read, and a petition from the plaintiff, John Joseph Stockdale, who was then in the custody of the sergeant-at-arms, having been presented, read, and ordered to be printed; Lord John Russell moved a resolution to the effect, that the amount of the levy (£640) being then in the hands of the sheriff of Middlesex, he be ordered to refund that amount forthwith to the Messrs. Hansard.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, he thought it would be conceded to him, that if he adhered to the opinions heretofore given by him; or rather, if he persisted in the course which, up to that hour, the House of Commons had taken, he could have no motive whatever but a conscientious one. There was no particular claim upon him, on the part of the present House of Commons, if he looked to the mere merits of the existing institution, that should induce him to come forward in its defence. That House had reposed no confidence in him, and it therefore had no claim upon him, except that which was imposed by a conscientious sense of duty. If mere party considerations could influence him, he would have ranged himself with those with whom he had uniformly acted, rather than with a party with whom he had a temporary, but very short agreement, and whom he should, with perfect cordiality, in the very next week, vote to be utterly unworthy of his and the public confidence. He said, therefore, that if he did deviate from the course which the majority of his hon. friends were inclined to take, it could be from nothing but a sense of that duty which he owed to his country. He would not say, indeed, that there was any deviation on his part; on the contrary, he considered that it was an adherence to the principles of those with whom he uniformly acted. Last session a case exactly parallel occurred—the memorable case of Polack. When Polack gave notice that he meant to bring an action against Mr. Hansard, the House resolved, by the greatest majority he ever remembered in this House—a majority of 120 to 4—that Mr. Hansard should not plead. Yet the House considered Polack guilty of a breach of privilege. Therefore he was acting, not only in conformity with his own opinion, but likewise in conformity with what he had a right to presume was the almost unanimous opinion of the House of Commons. He would state to the House the grounds upon which he had arrived at his opinion, and with the utmost admiration for the ingenuity of the arguments which had been brought forward in this debate, in order to show the difficulties with which they were surrounded, and the imperfection of their powers, yet, let him be permitted to say, that throughout the whole of that exhibition of ingenuity, he had not met with one practical position. Now, he would endeavour to state what the position of the House was, and what were its powers. They should hear from him nothing of technicalities. He would, in the plainest and simplest manner, in the plainest and simplest terms, for the sake of giving them every advantage and defence against sophistry, state the grounds of the opinion he had come to. He invited them to consider—to minutely examine that opinion, and the grounds upon which he had formed it; and, if by practical arguments they could remove his doubts, and effect his conviction, they should have his vote. Sir (continued the right hon. baronet), I maintain, in the first instance, this position—that whatever privilege is necessary for the proper and effectual discharge of the functions of the House of Commons, that privilege the House of Commons possesses. My second position, Sir, is this—and it is in strict logical sequence—that this particular privilege of free publication, not liable to be questioned in any court of law, is absolutely necessary. That is my second position. My third position is this: We have no security for the proper and effectual exercise of that special privilege, unless we are enabled by our own declared power to vindicate it. Sir, I rejoice that an opportunity has been afforded for most maturely considering this question—I rejoice for the sake of proving that we are not influenced by factious motives—that we are sincerely desirous of opportunity for mature reflection, that this interval has been suffered to elapse. Sir, I have spent that interval, not in endeavouring to fortify and confirm my previous opinion by reading over the authorities of those who have struggled on behalf of the privileges of the House of Commons; but I have passed it reading over those eminent judicial authorities which are in favour of the opposite position—I mean the judgments of those learned persons who decided the case in the Court of Queen's Bench ; and, Sir, I must say, that I have retired from the careful perusal of those important documents, with the full and perfect conviction that the powers and authorities claimed by the judges are inconsistent with the privileges of this House ; and that the judgment they come to is at variance with their own principle. I refer you to my Lord Denman's judgment itself for proof of that assertion, for he admits most clearly and distinctly the position for which I contend—that, if this privilege be necessary for the proper performance of our functions, then we possess it. Lord Denman says, "That parliament enjoys privileges of the most important character, no person capable of the least reflection can doubt for a moment. Some are common to both Houses, some peculiar to each ; all are essential to the discharge of their functions. If they were not the fruit of deliberation in Aula Regia, they rest on the stronger ground of a necessity, which became apparent, at least as soon as the two Houses took their present position in the state."

He says further, "The Commons of England are not invested with more of power and dignity by their legislative character, than by that which they bear as the grand inquest of the nation. All the privileges that can be required for the energetic discharge of the duties inherent in that high trust, are conceded without a murmur or a doubt. We freely admit them in all their extent and variety."

He likewise says—"The proof of this privilege was grounded on three principles ; necessity, practice, universal acquiescence. If the necessity can be made out, no more need be said ; it is the foundation of every privilege of parliament, and justifies all that it requires."

Now, therefore, he (Sir Robert Peel) anticipated no answer to his first position, because he had the distinct admission of that which he must consider as a hostile and disinterested authority, that if the privilege be necessary, that House possessed it. He agreed with Lord Denman that they could prove no prescription. But Lord Denman himself had admitted that on the very same ground on which they claimed this privilege of free publication, rested also the privilege even of freedom of debate. He therefore said, that free discussion within those walls rested upon the acknowledged necessity of such a privilege, and upon nothing else. He was not certain that if they were compelled to abandon the privilege of free publication, they had any security for the continuance of the privilege of free debate. Lord Denman also had said, that the privilege of free debate had been denied when members began to speak their minds. Lord Denman says, "Thus the privilege of having their debates unquestioned, though denied when the members began to speak their minds in the time of Queen Elizabeth, and punished in its exercise both by that Princess and her two successors, was soon clearly perceived to be indispensable, and universally acknowledged."

Then he had no prescription to plead in favour of free debate—Queen Elizabeth had denied it—James had denied it—Charles had denied it—but the privilege of publication rested upon the same indisputable ground of necessity, acknowledged by the judges to prove the existence of the privilege of free speaking. Now, there was no power possessed by the Court of Queen's Bench in this respect, that was not only possessed by every manor court, and borough court, and hundred court ; therefore it followed that that privilege of free publication, if they were not able to maintain it themselves, was liable to be questioned, not only by those high and eminent legal authorities, for whom he had unfeignedly the highest respect, and concerning whom not one expression of his should be inconsistent with the most perfect reverence. His object was to show, that the privilege of free discussion rested upon the same foundation as that of free publication—namely, acknowledged necessity. He wished to show also, that that privilege of free debate had been questioned, not only by sovereigns in the exercise of arbitrary and despotic powers, but also that the Court of King's Bench itself had in other times denied, not only the right of free publication, but also the right of free debate. He would prove that there was a time when the judges of the Court of King's Bench solemnly denied the House of Commons that privilege. The case occurred in the year 1628, when the Court of King's Bench, and the Court of Star Chamber, both declared that they were perfectly competent to take cognizance, after the prorogation of parliament, of speeches made by members during its sitting, and they imposed fines of £2,000 and £3,000 on members for speaking their sentiments of the ministers of state. In the year 1640, the House of Commons, twelve years afterwards, protested against that decision; and in the year 1657, the Houses of Lords and Commons, not by law, but by resolution, determined that the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench was illegal. The resolution of the Lords and Commons was, that the judgment given in the Court of Queen's Bench was an illegal judgment, and against the freedom and privilege of debate. They relied on an act of parliament which passed in the reign of Henry VIII., commonly called the "Act concerning Stroud;" but the judges said that was a private act of parliament relating to Stroud alone, and refused to take cognizance of it, and decided that they were perfectly cognizable of the acts of members charged with no other offence than speaking too freely in parliament: therefore, the privilege of freedom of debate did not rest on judicial authority. Charles I. also expressly denied the privilege to exist. On the point of the privilege being necessary, he might rely without further citation of authority. Then, was the privilege of free publication necessary? Was it necessary for what Lord Denman called the "energetic" discharge of their duties? What was the nature and character of their duties? What were the universal doctrines held with respect to them? Not that they were bound implicitly to obey the commands of their constituents; but what constitutional writer ever doubted that there ought to be a general sympathy between the constituent body and the representative? Could they hope that in these times the mere unexplained votes which they gave would meet with unquestioned acquiescence? Was it not important that the public mind should be enlightened by their acts? What was the meaning of the right of petitioning? Was it meant, that they who should have that right should be utterly ignorant of what they petitioned about? Was it right that they should have imposed on them the obligation of petitions coming from vast bodies of men in utter ignorance of the main facts about which they petitioned? What great legislative act that had been passed by parliament for the last fifty years, had not been passed mainly from the influence of public opinion bearing upon the House of Commons? Take the abolition of slavery. Did they believe that slavery ever could have been abolished unless they had published to the world the evidence of the abuses and horrors of slavery? He would also ask this question, in connection with another of their functions; would they have succeeded in persuading the people of England to pay twenty millions of money for the abolition of slavery, unless they had imbued the public mind with the deep and perfect conviction that such were its abuses—such its unjustifiable character—that a moral stigma and degradation would attach to the nation unless it were put an end to? Could it be asserted as the shadow of an argument, that they had a right to impose a pecuniary burden of twenty millions, and yet be unable to say, "We will tell you the grounds and reasons for this imposition?" Would they answer him that? As it was, the twenty millions had been called for, and the people were convinced that, great as were the financial embarrassments of the nation, it was for the honour and glory of England that the sacrifice should be made. Could they have hoped that their call for this sum would have been willingly and cheerfully responded to and obeyed—that you would have carried with you public opinion, and made the impression you wished upon foreign nations—if the people had been allowed to believe, as it had been industriously striven that they should, that the condition of a slave in the West Indies was preferable to that of a labourer in England? The noble lord, the member for Northumberland, had referred to the slave trade, but he would cite a still stronger case than that instanced by the noble lord, and he would then ask, whether the slave trade would have been abolished if the public mind had not been correctly informed on the subject? Evidence was taken before the privy council on the subject, and was published to the world in 1788. In 1789, when Mr. Wilberforce brought forward the question, he had to struggle with the impression that had been produced by that evidence upon the public mind favourable to the system. He asked for a committee to remove the impression that the delegates had made. He would read to them the evidence which had been given, and the evidence which had been given to rebut it. Mr. Norris, one of the Liverpool delegates, had given this account of the middle passage:—"The apartments of the slaves were fitted up for their accommodation as much as circumstances would allow. The right ankle of one was connected by a small manacle to the left of another; and, if they were turbulent, they were also confined by irons to their wrists. They had several meals a day of all the luxuries that Africa provided, with African sauces, and another meal of pulse; after breakfast they had water to wash themselves with, while their apartments were perfumed with frankincense and lime-juice. Before dinner they were amused, singing and dancing were promoted, and games of chance were furnished them."

Mr. Wilberforce felt what would be the effect of these false statements of the facts of the case, and felt that, until the impression made by these statements was removed, the continuance of the slave trade would be inevitable, for it would be supported by public opinion. He invoked the assistance of the House of Commons first to remove the film from the public mind by hearing counter-evidence; and in that counter-examination it appeared, that the meal of pulse, of which Mr. Norris spoke, was a meal of horse beans. "'The song and the dance,' said Mr. Norris, are promoted.' Mr. Wilberforce said, it would have been more fair if he had explained in what way they were promoted. The truth was, that, for the sake of exercise, these miserable wretches, loaded with chains, and oppressed with disease, were forced to dance by the terror of the lash, and sometimes by the actual use of it. 'I,' said one of the evidences, 'was employed to dance the men, while another danced the women.' What, then, was the meaning of the word 'promoted?' And it might be said with respect to the African sauces being provided, and all the delicacies of African luxury, that it was proved in evidence that an instrument was sometimes carried out in order to force the slaves to eat. That was evidence how much they enjoyed themselves. As to their singing, what should they say when told that their songs were those of lamentation on departing from their native land, and that while singing, they were always in tears, so much so, that one of the captains threatened one woman with a flogging, because her song was too painful for his feelings!"

Such was the counter-evidence that had been produced; and could it be said, that every slave-captain whose cruelties had been denounced, would have had a right to take proceedings in every court of quarter-sessions in the kingdom against the House of Commons? Then, again, with respect to abuses in India. Did the House believe, that Warren Hastings would have been impeached—that the abuses in that part of our possessions would have been controlled, had it not been for the publication of evidence? What would have been said if, when Mr. Dundas, before the memorable impeachment of Warren Hastings, brought his folio volumes before the House, and moved for the appointment of the Indian committee, if the doctrine had been maintained: "No abuse relating to India must be brought forward, because every person concerned or implicated would have his right of bringing an action of libel, and that he had as much right of bringing his action against the printer of this House as against any other individual?" Again, did the House believe, with respect to the proceedings in the case of the Duke of York, that the people and the military would have acquiesced in the temporary suspension of a favourite commander-in-chief, and a Prince of the blood royal, if it had rested upon the mere declaration to them, "We petition for the removal of this illustrious individual, and yet we cannot tell you the reasons for our proceeding?" It appeared to him, that it would be a suspension of all their powers and functions as a legislative assembly, unless they were to retain this important and indispensable privilege. There was no one question of great public importance, which, as far as he recollected, had not been carried in the first instance by the free publication of the proceedings of parliament. Free publication tended not merely to increase the facilities of effecting great democratic changes, but might often be absolutely necessary to enable those who were adverse to such changes being made precipitately, to gain that influence upon the public mind which was favourable to their views, and to be obtained only by the diffusion of correct information. Therefore upon the second point—that the privilege of free publication was necessary for the proper discharge of the functions belonging to the House of Commons—whether he looked simply to the act of legislation, or to the power of the House to inquire into the conduct of the trustees of official authority, or to the grant of immense sums of the public money for the purpose of wiping out a blot upon the national honour, he could not conceive how a legislative act of great importance could be passed—nor how the conduct of an official authority could be inquired into—nor how the public could be reconciled to the payment of enormous sums of money, unless the House were enabled, and enabled at its own discretion, to enlighten the public mind without the fear that its officers should be punished. He therefore came to the conclusion upon this second point, that the privilege of free discussion was necessary for the "energetic discharge of their duties." He now came to the third point: Had they sufficient security for the proper exercise of that privilege and the continuance of it, unless they could vindicate it by their own laws? Here again he referred in the first instance, not to the opinions of the House upon the point, but to the opinion of the judges; and he found, that the judges admitted, that the House of Commons had the privilege of publishing for the use of its own friends. That privilege was conceded to them. He found too, that the hon. friend who spoke last was disposed to contend for the existence of this amount of privilege. Let him ask, then, how was the House to maintain it? The judges admitted, that they had the privilege of publishing for the use of their own friends. On what security did that privilege stand? Supposing the judges questioned it? Should the House plead? If they pleaded and were overruled, were they to submit? If they did not submit, what should they do? When were they to interfere? When were they to take steps to maintain it? Here was an acknowledgment of privilege to a certain extent: suppose it were questioned? Suppose it to be brought under the cognizance of one of the courts of law? the judge admitting the privilege to a certain extent might still impose a limit upon it: he might say, "Here is a publication which the House of Commons is privileged to print, but at the time that it was ordered to be printed, or during the time that the matter to which it relates was discussed, all the members of the House were not present; many of them even were not in town; therefore I really do not see the necessity for printing 658 copies. I think, that the number of copies ordered to be printed ought to be restricted to the number of members who actually attended." Suppose again, the judge or judges were to say, "It is very true, that the Scotch judges are in the habit of taking home a large number of papers to consider at their leisure; we will concede to you, the members of the House of Commons, who have been constant in your attendance, the same right; but we doubt the propriety of extending it to those members who are absent from town." Supposing such a ground to be taken, what were the House of Commons to do? Should they acquiesce? Should they say, "The law is supreme—privilege shall not be opposed to law?" They might say that on precisely the same ground as that upon which they were now called upon to acquiesce in the amendment of the hon. and learned gentleman. The question was whether the privilege of the House of Commons was a part of the law of the land? It was conceded that the privilege of the House was a part of the law; but then it was said, that the judges were the only interpreters of it. No resolution of the House, it was said, could contravene the law of the land. But he was assuming the case of a privilege which the House actually possessed being attacked by a court of justice, and in such a case he inquired, "How is the House to proceed to vindicate its privilege?" Should they acquiesce in the decision of the court of law; or, feeling the necessity of resistance, should they determine to oppose it. If they determined to resist, could they do so in any other mode than that which they had adopted in the present instance? They first of all presumed that the court of law would be in their favour; therefore they pleaded; subsequently, finding that the court was adverse to them, they determined in the second instance not to plead. Discovering in the end that the court was still against them, the question was whether they were tamely to acquiesce in a decision which would be fatal to a privilege which other judges had admitted; or whether, in the last resort, they should come forward and say, not that they would increase a power that could in any sense be deemed unnecessary, but that they would omit no opportunity of marking their sense of a privilege which they were admitted to possess in their own inherent right, and that they would not fail to exhaust every method of defending and maintaining it? For his own part, he thought that the latter was the only proper and becoming course for the House to pursue. Because, even if they should ultimately fail, and be called upon to consider other alternatives, they would then at least stand in this less humiliating position—that they had not tamely submitted nor lightly abandoned a privilege which they felt to be essential to the proper discharge of their functions as a legislative body. No, the duty of the House was to fight the battle to the last;

and then, if they were ultimately overcome, they could appeal with a good grace to the authority of the state for that permanent protection which the law as it now stood would not afford them. He could not conceive what other course the House could pursue in a case where one of its undoubted privileges was assailed. But supposing that they were to recede upon that occasion—supposing that they were to acquiesce in the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench, he could not convince himself that, by such acquiescence, they would get themselves out of the difficulty. He took the position of the highly respectable judicial authorities who had decided against the House in the present instance; and he found that while they admitted that the House had the privilege of publication for the use of its own members, they still fettered the exercise of that right with such restrictions as would inevitably tend to bring the House in conflict with the courts of law. Upon this point he wished the House to remember that the question of the sale of parliamentary papers was entirely beside the subject. He begged hon. members not to allow their minds to be influenced by any consideration of that question in connection with the point he was bringing under their notice. He prayed them not to be guided in their decision by any sort of prejudice on account of their being sellers of books. That was a question still open to discussion, and he reserved to himself the right of hereafter determining whether, in prudence and policy, it might not be well for the House to rescind the order authorizing the sale of papers. That, however, was a question entirely independent of the point now under consideration; and he would quote high authorities to show that it was so. Lord Denman says: "In the first place I would observe that the act of selling does not give the plaintiff any additional ground of action or redress at law beyond the act of publishing. The injury is precisely the same in its nature, whether the publication be for money or not, though it may be much more extensively injurious when scattered over the land for profit."

So that the House would not advance one single step in point of law if they were that night to resolve that the order authorizing the sale of papers should be rescinded. He was perfectly ready to admit that, by rescinding the order, they would remove some unfavourable impressions in the public mind as to the right of sale; but they were now in collision with a court of law, and he was showing, upon the authority of Lord Denman, that that collision could not be avoided, even if the order authorizing the sale of papers were at once rescinded. As he had already stated, the judges admitted that they had the right of publication for the use of their own members. Now, if that meant any thing at all, it meant that a publication made for their own use was a privileged publication. It could have no other meaning. But were they to acquiesce in the construction which the judges had put upon the law? If they did so, he thought they would at once be involved in enormous difficulties. Take, again, the instance of the £20,000,000 voted for the emancipation of the negroes, and suppose this case:—He, as a member of the House of Commons, was in possession of all the papers relating to that matter. He had the despatch of Mr. Huskisson relating to the cruelties practised upon female slaves—he had all the evidence which had operated to remove from the public mind the prejudices that had previously existed in favour of slavery—he was in possession of all the facts which had brought the House properly to appreciate the horrors of slavery, and determined them to pass a law for its abolition. He had voted for the grant of £20,000,000, by which the emancipation of the slaves was accompanied. He returned to his constituents, and was questioned by them as to the voting of so large a sum of the public money. According to the construction put upon the law by the judges in the present instance, he, under such circumstances, though he was permitted to possess the evidence himself, would have no right to make it known to his constituents in order to justify his vote, or to explain the grounds upon which he had assented to so large an expenditure of the public money. Questioned upon the hustings by his constituents—having the volume of evidence in his hands—himself possessed of all the facts which induced him to regard the horrors of slavery as an intolerable evil, and a blot upon the honour of the nation—still, according to the construction of the judges, he was not at liberty to refer to one single page of the privileged volume, nor to adduce from its contents one single fact to explain his vote, and satisfy the minds of his constituents. For it was expressly laid down, apparently by the concurrent authority of all the judges of the court, that he, though possessed of these papers for his own use, was not entitled to disclose one title of their contents to any other person. Mr. Justice Littledale says—"It is said that it is proper that the members of the House should have the right to send copies of all the parliamentary papers to their constituents, to justify themselves in case their constituents should find any fault with their conduct in parliament. If the member whose conduct is blamed by his constituents wishes to vindicate his conduct, he may send what parliamentary papers he pleases, provided they do not contain any criminatory matter of individuals."

Observe, that restriction involved the whole case. The decision of the court did not turn upon the point that he (Sir R. Peel), as a member of the House of Commons, had no right to instruct Mr. Hansard to publish certain papers; but the judges expressly declared it to be their opinion, that the publication which he possessed as a member of the House, was privileged only for his own use, and that he had no right to send it to his constituents to justify his conduct, unless it happened to contain no matter criminatory of individuals—a privilege hardly worth contending for. Mr. Justice Littledale continued his judgment in these terms:—"I think it can never be considered as justifiable in a member of parliament to publish defamatory matter of other persons to justify his own conduct in parliament."

Then he could not publish any matter of accusation that might be made in the course of a parliamentary inquiry against a public officer. He (Sir R. Peel) as a member of parliament had power to address the Crown for the removal of a judge who might be a most popular man, and of very commanding influence in the country.

He might exercise his privilege of petitioning the Crown for the removal of such a man, but he was not at liberty to say a word as to the grounds upon which he did so, lest he should disclose defamatory matter against him. Mr. Justice Patteson entertained precisely the same view; but he would refer again for a moment to the opinion of Mr. Justice Littledale, who said:—"The privileges of parliament appear to me to be confined to the walls of parliament for what is necessary for the transaction of the business there, to protect individual members, so as that they may always be able to attend their duties, and to punish persons who are guilty of contempts to the House, or against the orders and proceedings or other matters relating to the House, or to individual members in discharge of their duties to the House, and to such other matters and things as are necessary to carry on their parliamentary functions, and to print documents for the use of the members. But a publication sent out to the world, though founded on and in pursuance of an order of the House, in my opinion become separated from the House; it is no longer any matter of the House, but of the agents they employ to distribute the papers; their agents are not the House, but in my opinion they are individuals acting on their own responsibility, or other publishers of papers."

What a mockery was this! The Speaker, in the exercise of an admitted privilege, ordered Mr. Hansard to do a certain act, which could only be done out of the walls of parliament, and the moment that Mr. Hansard set to work to execute that order, the privilege of the House was lost, and its agent liable to be punished by a court of law. If that were so—if that were the conflict in which they were next to be engaged, it was plain that they would very shortly be involved in a situation of as much difficulty as that in which they now stood. Was it fitting, then, that they should acquiesce in the construction which the judges had put upon the law? Mr. Justice Patteson went, he thought, one step further either than Lord Denman or Mr. Justice Littledale. Mr. Justice Patteson said:—"It is said, that if papers, however defamatory, must needs be printed for the use of the members, as it is plain they must, and the point is not disputed, their further circulation cannot be avoided; for what is to be done with the copies upon a dissolution of parliament, or upon the death or retirement of a member? The answer is obvious: the copy of such defamatory matter ought to be destroyed, as it can no longer be used for the purpose for which it was intended; or at all events it must not be communicated to others."

Now he would take the case of the last Speaker of the House, Lord Dunfermline, who had probably retired with a large mass of parliamentary papers; if Lord Dunfermline made use of any one of those papers he would be liable to an action of libel. Lord Dunfermline's papers—the papers which had accumulated on his hands while he was Speaker of the House of Commons, were now no longer privileged; they lost their character of privilege as soon as the noble lord ceased to be a member of the House of Commons. And Lord Dunfermline would be responsible, not only to the Court of Queen's Bench, but to any court of quarter-sessions in the kingdom, if he presumed to make use of any one of those papers. Suppose, again, that a member of the House should die possessed of a great number of these papers. Suppose, for instance, that he should leave behind him the whole of the parliamentary papers upon the subject of the foreign slave trade, in which his hon. friend the member for the University of Oxford took a warm interest. Those papers were full of libels upon individuals—libels upon persons in this country—libels upon foreigners. Now, if after the death of the member, these papers should obtain any kind of circulation, or should simply pass from the deceased member's library into the possession of any other person not a member of the House, he (Sir R. Peel) apprehended that, according to the construction put upon the law by the judges, any foreigner whose conduct was reflected upon in any part of these papers would have a right to bring an action for libel, and to recover damages. What was to become of the bookseller who should happen to sell any of these papers? The moment that the member died, the papers ceased to be privileged—who then would dare to touch them? No man could presume to do so; no man could take them to himself; or, at all events, no man could undertake to sell them without rendering himself liable to an action. Mr. Justice Patteson further said, “Whether any individual member might or might not be justified in communicating to some person out of the House defamatory matter printed for the use of the House, I cannot pretend to say. Probably, upon any such question arising, the decision will be with a jury.”

Therefore he contended, that if the House were to acquiesce in the decision of the court, that the publication for the use of members was privileged; but that the use of the publication by members for the information of their constituents, subjected them to an action of libel; if the House acquiesced in that decision, he (Sir R. Peel) maintained that the functions of the House of Commons, as a branch of the legislature, would be paralysed; they would at once become unfitted for the due discharge of their duties as the representatives of the people and the framers of laws, unless indeed they were to act upon ignorant first impressions, instead of upon those sound opinions which resulted from inquiry and the dissemination of correct information. He came now to a part of the question upon which much ridicule had been thrown—namely, that the House of Commons was the judge of its own privilege. Upon that point he should refer not to the authority of members of the House itself, although he might quote the opinions of many of great eminence, but to the dicta of the highest judicial authorities, who at different times had been called upon to deal with the question as it arose in the courts of law. He would show that the doctrine, that the House was the judge of its own privilege, much as it was now sneered at, was a doctrine that had received the sanction of the highest judicial authorities in the land. The Attorney-general, in his very able speech, had referred to many of those learned and eminent authorities, but with the permission of the House, he (Sir R. Peel) would refer to a few more. Mr. Justice Wright held this doctrine:—“The House of Commons is undoubtedly a high court; and it is agreed on all hands, that they have the power to judge of their own privileges.”

In Murray's case, a writ of Habeas Corpus was applied for to bail a person committed for contempt by the House of Commons, and refused,—Mr. Justice Wright observing, that it never could have been the intent of the Habeas Corpus Act to give a judge in the court power to judge of the privileges of the House of Commons. Mr. Justice Dennison held precisely the same doctrine. Both those learned judges expressly admitted not only that the House had power to commit for contempt, but that it was the judge of its own privileges. What did these learned judges mean when they made that admission? And how could their opinion upon these points be made to correspond with the doctrine now laid down—that the House of Commons upon this matter of privilege must submit to the superior authority of the courts of law? Chief Justice De Grey held that the law of parliament was the law of the land. “When the House of Commons,” said he, “adjudge any thing to be a contempt or a breach of privilege, their adjudication is a conviction. This court cannot take cognizance of a commitment by the House of Commons, because it cannot judge by the same law; for the law by which the Commons judge of their privileges is unknown to us. Courts of Justice have no cognizance of the acts of the Houses of Parliament, because they belong ad aliud examen."

Mr. Justice Gould concurred in the opinion expressed by the chief justice. Mr. Justice Blackstone also held, that the House of Commons was the only judge of its own privileges. In Crosby's case, Mr. Justice Blackstone said, that—"Holt differed from the other judges on the point of the House of Commons being the only judge of its own privileges, but that the courts must be governed by the eleven, and not by the single one."

It was, perhaps, unnecessary to detain the House by referring to other authorities. It was enough to state, that the doctrine that the House was the only judge of its own privileges, absurd and ridiculous as it was now held to be, was a doctrine which in the best times of legal and judicial learning had received the sanction of the highest judicial authorities. He must say further, that fortified by such authorities, he could not consent lightly to abandon a privilege which he believed in his conscience they properly and rightfully possessed—which he believed to be essential to the maintenance of their usefulness, and which he could not hold to be secure if every court, from the Queen's Bench down to the lowest tribunal, civil or criminal, in the country, could entertain an action for libel brought against an officer who had only obeyed the order of the House. The judges in the present instance said, that the Speaker of the House of Commons was free from question, and that a court of law would not interfere with him. He asked why they did not interfere? Upon what statute was the Speaker's indemnity founded? Was not the Speaker's right, the Speaker's privilege, as much interfered with if the poor instrument employed to execute his order, in the performance of that duty, were liable to be dragged into court, and to be ruined by actions at law? Was not the Speaker's right, or the Speaker's privilege, as much interfered with by such a proceeding as if the effort were made to bring him into court himself? Whilst such a state of things was allowed to continue, it was a mere pretence to say that the Speaker's right was respected—an idle mockery to contend, that the Speaker's authority was not wholly disregarded. I do not conceal from myself, said the right hon. baronet in conclusion, the fact that we have great difficulties to contend with. It is with pain I come to the determination of entering into a contest with the courts of law. You may tell me, that there are processes by which the payment of the money may be ultimately enforced in the courts. I admit the strength of the reasoning, and the authority conveyed by the experience of those who urge such a view, but this I say, with a perfectly safe conscience, that every instrument which the ordinary principles of the constitution sanction, an overpowering sense of duty urges me to use, before I seek for the solution of our present difficulties in the surrender of our privileges. An attempt to remedy this evil by legislation may be made only when the other means within our power are exhausted. I have heard it said, that the House of Commons has not that influence on the public mind that it once had, and that we look in vain for the sympathy of the public in our attempt to vindicate our privileges. That may be. The prediction so confidently made, that the great measure for altering the constitution of this House would conciliate public opinion, may be unfounded. I was no party to that change. I confess I expected its failure. It may be, that we are inferior to the great men who have sat within these walls in former periods. But I say, if by our inferiority, and degeneracy, we have prejudiced the character of the House, and diminished its influence with the public, we ought not to make that a reason for depriving it of that essential power which inheres in so noble an institution. Whatever may be our inferiority, we should feel we are but the tenants of a day—the fleeting occupants of the noble fabric, and the very circumstances of our tenure form additional reasons why with a kind of filial reverence we should prevent, if we can, a permanent injury from being inflicted on it during our temporary occupancy. But I say more, that no public object can be gained by the mutilation of our privileges. If you can once show a chasm in the building, and can say, "there once stood the House of Commons," depend upon it the void will be filled by a combination of turbid elements, acknowledging no respect for authority, observing no reverence for prescription, usurping the powers of the other branches of the legislature, and defending the possession of those powers by means worthy of such usurpers. Sir, I shall conclude my vindication for having so long occupied the time of the House by an extract from a speech delivered by Mr. Crewe at an early period of our history, when the liberties of the House of Commons were threatened. Mr. Crewe, in encouraging the House to preserve its privileges, said in simple but emphatic language:—"I would not have spoken about our privileges, if the thing questioned were only matter of form, and not of matter; but this is of that importance to us, that if we should yield our liberties to be but of grace, these walls that have known the holding of them these many years, would blush; and therefore we cannot, in duty to our country, but stand upon it, that our liberties and privileges are our undoubted birth-right and inheritance."

The resolutions were carried by a large majority, and the Sheriffs having declined to accede to the wishes of the House were given into the custody of the Serjeant-at-arms.

JANUARY 22, 1840.

The Order of the day having been read for the further consideration of Messrs. Hansard's petition, Lord John Russell moved, "That the attorney to the action, Thomas Burton Howard, be called in."

Sir Edward Sugden moved as an amendment, the addition of the words, "to be forthwith discharged."

SIR ROBERT PEEL assured the hon. and learned gentleman (Mr. Sergeant Talfourd) that it was not inconsistent with the sincere respect which he entertained for his character or talent, if he suggested to him that the more appropriate occasion for the speech he had just delivered, would have been on the night preceding the last, and immediately after he had made his speech. The question now being exclusively whether Thomas Howard should be called in, the hon. and learned gentleman had taken this opportunity of answering a speech which had been made on a night when he himself was present listening to the debate, and when the debate did not conclude at an hour which precluded the House from listening to any answer; but two days afterwards the hon. and learned gentleman made a speech, and inflicted on the House the painful task of listening again to him. For himself, he deemed it consistent with the principles he had ever professed, if he attempted to obtain for all the great institutions of the State the privileges which they possessed. The question here was, whether the House of Commons was entitled to a privilege which he believed to be essential to the due performance of its functions; and he believed that he was adopting the true Conservative policy if, under the impression that the claim was well-founded, he attempted to maintain those privileges. When had he shrunk from his duty when any attempt had been made by the House of Commons to encroach on the privileges of other bodies? When such attempts had been made upon the privileges of the House of Lords, or the privileges of the Crown, he had ever stood forward boldly to resist the attempts. That course he had pursued, that course he would continue, if he believed that any attempt were to be made to rob the House of Commons of any privileges to which he conscientiously believed they were entitled from long prescription, and which were required by necessity. In this case, as in the other cases, he had acted upon the same principles; he had attempted stare super vias antiquas; and he had attempted the vindication of the privileges of the House. It might be said that he had alleged the tyrant's plea—necessity. He had quoted the opinion of Lord Denman. Lord Denman had said, that if the privilege were necessary, it could be justified; and if he could show that this privilege were necessary for the energetic performance of their duty as a House of Commons, Lord Denman had granted that the House of Commons possessed it. He had then attempted to show, taking it for granted that what Lord Denman had stated was true, what he conceived to be strict logical deduction, first, that this privilege was essential to the energetic performance of their duty, therefore that they were in possession of it, and that they had no guarantee for its continuance, unless the House could vindicate its privilege itself; and, in taking this course, he thought that he was only giving effect to the resolutions to which the House of Commons had itself come. Was the hon. and learned gentleman aware of the resolution to which the House of Commons had come? If the House of Commons had changed their opinion, if they had altered their views, let them state it; let them rescind their resolution, but let not the hon. and learned gentleman accuse him of absurdity, if he presumed that resolutions carried by a majority of 120 to 4, and which were unaltered, continued to be the opinion of the House. On the 1st of August last, the House of Commons had had read to them the resolutions of 1837. [Mr. Sergeant Talfourd : I was not here.] That was what he complained of. Here was a great constitutional question to determine, a difficult point of law, in which the House was to come to an opinion as best it could, and till the House made an alteration in its resolutions, which embodied its opinions, he presumed that to that opinion they adhered. But the two resolutions of 1837 were read. Sir Frederick Pollock, Sir William Follett, the Attorney-general, the late Solicitor-general, indeed all the great legal authorities in the House were placed on the committee, selected to consider this great constitutional question; that committee sat to consider the question, and concurred in those resolutions. Was there one dissentient voice? There was one, for whose character he (Sir R. Peel) entertained the highest respect; but he was not a lawyer—it was his hon. and learned friend, the member for the university of Oxford. The House confirmed the resolutions by a large majority, and in 1839 it acted on the precedent of 1837. There had been ample time for revision. Why had not the hon. and learned gentleman warned them of their danger? Why, when he saw that the House could not maintain the privileges, why did he not ask them to rescind the resolutions—why did he not give them timely warning that they could not be maintained? Would it not have been a wiser course to have at that time given this warning, rather than to say, when they were called upon to adhere to the engagements which had been made, and when they were called upon to act upon their own resolutions, that they should shrink from their duties? Two years had passed, and there then came in 1839, after the House had had ample time for deliberation, and to determine upon its resolutions, a person who wrote to say that he intended to bring an action against the printer of the House of Commons for the publication of a libel. The resolutions of 1837 were read. The petition of the Messrs. Hansard was read, and the House of Commons resolved that Messrs. Hansard, in printing and publishing a certain report and minutes of evidence, acted under the orders of the House, and that “to bring, or assist in bringing, any action against them for such publication, would be a breach of the privileges of the House;” and it further resolved, “That Messrs. Hansard be directed not to answer the letter of Charles Shaw mentioned in their petition, and not to take any step towards defending the action with which they were threatened in the said letter.” The House passed these resolutions by a majority of 120 to four. He then looked at the minority. They were persons who, in their individual capacities, were entitled to every consideration; but why—after maintaining the two actions when the House was menaced by an action from Mr. Polack—why did not some legal authority join immediately in resisting the course that was proposed? How did it happen, after all that had passed—after the action had been decided against them without pleading; after, in the second action, they had pleaded and failed, when the question was what course the House should take in the third action, that the House of Commons determined that it would be a breach of privilege to institute such an action, and that they afterwards resolved that Messrs. Hansard should not plead to it? How did it happen that the four men in the minority against those resolutions were only Sir Thomas Acland, Mr. Benjamin D’Israeli, Mr. Thomas Duncombe, and Mr. Wood, the member for Middlesex? Not one legal authority in the House of Commons joined in the vote against those resolutions. He must say that he thought it rather hard that the hon. and learned gentleman should attack him, an unprofessional man, for acting as he had done, on what seemed to him to be the privileges of the House, when he had reason to believe that he had with him the almost unanimous opinion of the House, as tested by that vote. He thought that it would have been the more proper and the juster course, if the hon. and learned gentleman had attended upon that occasion, and then given the solemn warning which he had now offered. He confessed to the hon. and learned gentleman, notwithstanding the eloquence of his observations, that he differed from the hon. and learned gentleman. He confessed that the tendency of that speech did not diminish his apprehensions of the consequences which would have arisen from an immediate acquiescence in the right which was claimed by the courts of law; for the hon. and learned gentleman had censured him, not for any disrespectful allusion to the judges, but because he had in the kindest—in the most respectful, and in the most delicate manner, ventured to give some opinion on the decision the judges had given—the kindest, the most respectful, and most delicate manner; and yet such was to be the parliamentary subserviency to the courts of law, that even in that kind and respectful, and delicate manner, the questioning of the judgment could not be permitted. What did he question? Had he not said, in the first instance, with regard to any observations he might make on the judges, that he would not be disrespectful? Did he not say, however strong were his feelings—did he not make a preliminary apology—that if he said one disrespectful word, he would regret it? Why did he refer to their judgment? To show that acquiescence, on the present occasion, would not ensure absence of collision; for although the judges had admitted that they had a right to publish their proceedings for the use of the members of the House, yet, if the members disclosed any one of the papers which was thus entrusted to them, that an action might be maintained against them. He had quoted the opinions of Mr. Justice Littledale, and of Mr. Justice Patteson; the opinion of Mr. Justice Littledale, to show that although a member might be entitled to papers, yet that he had no right to circulate any defamatory matter; and of Mr. Justice Patteson, to show that the only means left to the member to prevent an action, was to burn the papers, and he had done so, to point out the extent and the character of the claim that was made. Did he not attempt to show that if a member had voted £20,000,000 for the abolition of slavery, an action might be brought against such member if he attempted to disclose the grounds on which such grant was made? Might he not also have stated that the House of Lords were liable to action for the transmission of their own papers to the British Museum. If this doctrine were founded in law, a member would be unsafe in almost every act that he performed. Was it not legitimate to show the courts of law that the House was the exclusive judge of its own privileges, and that if the claim of jurisdiction over their privileges, which was now first brought forward, were allowed, it would not extend alone to the Court of Queen's Bench, but that every court in the kingdom that had competent jurisdiction to maintain an action for libel, had the same power as the Court of Queen's Bench? Therefore, if the law, as it was laid down by the Court of Queen's Bench were correct, every member that justified his vote of £20,000,000 for the abolition of slavery to his constituents, and who explained to them the grounds of that vote, would be liable to action or indictment, not only in the Court of Queen's Bench, but in every court of inferior jurisdiction that was competent to entertain an action or indictment. Was not that the law as it was laid down? Was not that the principle contended for by the judges? Did he not say that? Did he not say that if the Queen's Bench entertained the question, other courts might? And did not that court say, that a publication to members might be privileged, but that they were not privileged to make any communication of the contents to their constituents? They did. He got that from the hon. and learned gentleman. If that were so, then if parliament were not sitting, and a member should communicate to his constituents the evidence which led him to vote £20,000,000 for the abolition of slavery, that member, parliament not being sitting, would be liable to an action for libel in every borough court, and in every court of quarter-session in the kingdom? Did this not follow from the decision of the judges? If it did, would not the hon. and learned gentleman admit the propriety of the privilege for the right performance of the functions of the House? And, if this communication were just and proper, was not a case of necessity made out? Would the hon. and learned gentleman say, that the House of Commons, and that the members of the House of Commons could properly discharge their functions, if they were subject to this liability of prosecution? Would the hon. and learned gentleman tell him if the responsibility placed by the judges of the Court of Queen's Bench applied to the circulation of evidence? If, so, he would take the ease of Kenrick. Could not the evidence even be shown to a friend? Did the hon. and learned gentleman admit that? If he did, the hon. and learned gentleman admitted that the Chief Justice of the Court of Queen's Bench himself was liable to an action. If that class of publications were not privileged—if the papers against the Judge Kenrick were not privileged, then an action might be brought by that judge against another judge for reflection cast upon his character. Lord Denman himself moved that that evidence be printed. At that time the practice of sale did not exist, but the matter of sale did not interfere with the right, or make any difference. Did the hon. and learned gentleman think that it was consistent with the energetic performance of his functions as a member of the House of Commons, when Lord Denman was asked by his constituents why he moved an address for the removal of a judge, if for the vindication of that motion, he would be liable in every court of quarter-sessions in the kingdom for the publication of a libel? Would not such a consequence follow from the judgment now given? Had he not, then, reason for believing that this privilege was essential to the due performance of their functions as members of the House of Commons, and that it would be an unjust interference with the performance of their duty to render them liable to any action or indictment for attempting to justify that performance to their constituents. Those were the points on which he wanted an answer. Those were the points he had never heard answered; and he must confess, with the utmost respect for the judges, when they told him that members of parliament might have the right of printing and publishing for their own use, but that they could not circulate defamatory matter without being liable to an action for libel, that if such were the law, rather than permit the authority of the House of Commons to exist upon that foundation, he for one would abdicate his functions. He for one would not submit to the performance of his public duty, if he thought that he could not justify his conduct to his constituents, without being liable to an action in every borough court and court of quarter-sessions in the kingdom. He held that that was the law as now laid down. If the hon. and learned gentleman denied it, let him show where the authorities interfered with it. If the members of that House were to incur that responsibility, if the members were told they were liable to an action, it would be impossible for them to perform their duty; and he believed, that it would be better to have no popular assembly whatsoever as a constituent part of the constitution, than to have existing a popular assembly calling itself by the name of a popular assembly, and having the semblance of a popular assembly, and yet deprived of those privileges which were necessary for the performance of its duties. The whole question, in point of fact, was whether it was the law of England that a publication made by order of the Speaker of the House of Commons, and printed under the authority of the House, and printed by the printer of the House, was a privileged communication or not? Would the hon. and learned gentleman maintain the doctrine as it was held by the judges? If not—and he must observe that he had not heard a single lawyer maintain it, although it had been maintained by his hon. friend the member for Oxford—if there was not one lawyer who upheld it—did the hon. and learned gentleman seriously believe that if the publication of papers for the use of members were privileged, that the privilege of publication as regarded others could be denied? If that were so, could he be surprised at the consequences which must follow from the opinions of the judges. And he confessed that he was unwilling to trust this or any other of their privileges to any exclusive jurisdiction, or any exclusive power. He had admitted that the conduct of the sheriffs was entitled to all praise; that they had given their evidence with great candour, but nothing could be more injurious than that, in consequence of the personal conduct of individuals, however unexceptionable it might be, they should take no steps against them. No court would have the power of discharging its duty unless it discarded the first strong impulses of humanity. But, if a consideration of humanity were a legitimate appeal, what appeal was there for Mr. Hansard? Suppose, Mr. Hansard in addressing the Chief Justice of the Court of Queen's Bench, had said "I am only a subordinate officer, exercising no discretion upon this matter, depending for my bread upon obedience to the orders of the House of Commons. I have received the orders of the Speaker of the House of Commons for what I have done; why do you strike at the mice and the small deer? There are, I will not say the wild beasts of the forest, but much higher authorities than myself; under their direction I have acted, they are responsible for the orders they have given; don't drag me, an unfortunate officer, to prison, don't make me responsible, but attack the Speaker of the House of Commons, and the House of Commons, under whose authority I acted, itself." What answer would the Lord Chief Justice have given, supposing Mr. Hansard had presented a petition, and said, "Do not make me liable, don't aneree me in money, don't imprison me in body, but attack the Speaker of the House of Commons?" Would not Mr. Hansard show by such a statement and such a petition that he was morally exempt from blame, and that there could be no greater hardship than to amerce him in money, or to imprison him in person? But he would have been imprisoned notwithstanding. If a return had been made by the sheriffs of nulla bona, would not a certain writ, called a writ of capias ad satisfaciendum, have been immediately issued, and would not Mr. Hansard have incurred the very fate which the sheriffs have now incurred? Would not Mr. Hansard have been committed? That was what reconciled him to do an act which was most revolting to his own feelings—that was what reconciled him to the committal of an act of individual injustice, which nothing in his opinion could justify, except that it was his firm conviction that there were no other means of vindicating the House of Commons; and he assured the hon. and learned gentleman that nothing but the intimate conviction that the vindication of their own privileges by their own authority was absolutely necessary for the maintenance of those privileges, would induce him to take this step. He confessed he did feel a difficulty after taking the step which appeared to him to be necessary, and when his opinion had undergone no change, in shrinking from the use of any and every instrument which the law and the constitution had placed in his hands. He did not deny that ultimately it might be impossible to succeed, he had never denied that the powers of the House were imperfect. Had he not said, that the courts of law would, as he had assumed, have assisted the House in its privileges? But when it had been proved, that the courts took a different view, and would take from them, and not assist them in the vindication of their privileges—when he saw this, though he did not deny that their privileges and their powers under the constitution were incomplete, though he did not then deny that they might be obliged to resort ultimately to some other authority; yet, at the same time, he would not refuse to exercise any power which, as he believed, the law and the constitution gave him, and it would be a consolation to him, if they should be driven to resort to legislation, that he had not lost or compromised the exercise of any less important privilege, by shrinking from his duty, or by abandoning the use of any power which he believed the constitution of the country gave to that House.

In reply to a remark by Mr. Darby, Sir Robert Peel said, that he would at once freely enter into an explanation of his conduct, if the House would accede to him the opportunity of doing so; and he thought that when he had done so the House would agree with him that there were some certain subjects upon which it was of importance that the country should be enlightened. The hon. and learned member said that it was highly important that the country should be enlightened upon this subject. Why that was the main ground of his previous argument, and, if it was necessary that a person in his position, honoured as he was by the confidence and support of a great body of gentlemen, should declare his opinions in that House, it was still more desirable that they should be fully explained to the country at large. He was not there as the lukewarm advocate of the privileges of the House. All the vocabulary of abuse heaped upon the supporters of those privileges last night by the hon. and gallant member for Donegal made little impression on his mind; and all he asked for now was permission to exercise the privilege of explaining his conduct, and he thought that he should convince his hon. and learned friend, the member for Sussex, of the danger of making imperfect quotations. The hon. and learned member said that he did not charge him with inconsistency; but even if he had done so, he begged to assure him that that would not have altered the feelings of friendship which he entertained for him. Now, he would proceed to the speech of June 17, 1839, and he wished every hon. gentleman who should be similarly charged would be able to give such a refutation to the allegations made against him. In June, 1839, they were discussing what they should do in the case of "Stockdale v. Hansard," the Attorney-general having pleaded to the action. He had said that his advice had not been acted upon, for that he had advocated the committal of the plaintiff in the action, and then, after having referred to the case of "Burdett v. Abbott," he went on to say, "What was the course the House had pursued? It submitted to the tribunal. The House had the power of stopping the proceedings at once by telling the individual who was plaintiff in the cause that he had no right to go to any other tribunal than that House, as it was the only judge of matters involving its privileges, and that if he persisted he would be committed for contempt. The House, however, allowed and instructed its officer to plead, and directed counsel to appear for him before the court. The Attorney-general appeared and argued the case for three days in the most able manner. They allowed the court to consider the case, and to believe that they submitted to its decision, and that they were a willing party before it; and, in confirmation of this view of the case, he would ask, how did the Attorney-general conclude his speech to the court? Why, in a manner to confirm such an opinion in the minds of the judges. The hon. and learned gentleman concluded in these words,—‘My Lords, for these reasons I pray judgment for the defendants.’ It was proposed, however, that the officer who acted for the sheriff of London should be committed if he levied the execution. Was this the proper step to take after the course the House had allowed to be pursued? As regarded his opinion on the subject-matter under consideration, he had no hesitation in saying—(now here was his inconsistency)—that he believed that its privileges were essential to the usefulness of parliament, and he did not think that they could sit with honour or advantage to the country for a single evening without them. If they might be questioned in the Court of Queen’s Bench, there was nothing to prevent their being questioned in every subordinate court of judicature in the empire. If they allowed it to be supposed that any court could determine on what occasions their privileges were justly exercised, they only held their privileges by sufferance, and they had better attempt to suspend the exercise of their privileges, than attempt to exercise them at all.”

“If a similar case occurred to-morrow, he would recommend that the House should deal with it without hesitation, and determine that, as a case involving its privileges, it should not be submitted to a court of judicature. In such a case there would be a proper exercise of the authority of the House of Commons when it committed for contempt.”

He could not see, then, how he was chargeable with inconsistency. He would fairly own, however, that such a question as that would have little weight with him, for he had no hesitation in declaring that he was not always to be haunted with the ghost of Hansard, and that if he saw the importance and necessity of a change in any case, not involving any great question of principle, he should have little difficulty in adopting it.

The House divided on the amendment, that Mr. Howard be discharged:—Ayes 92; Noes 210; majority 118.

Mr. Howard was then called in and examined, and after expressing his regret at having incurred the displeasure of the House, was reprimanded by the Speaker, and forthwith discharged.

PROVISION FOR PRINCE ALBERT.

JANUARY 27, 1840.

Lord John Russell moved that the sum of £50,000 be granted, as a provision to Prince Albert, to commence on the day of his marriage to her Majesty, and to continue during the life of his highness.

Mr. Hume moved as an amendment that the grant be £21,000; which was negatived.

On the original question being again proposed, Colonel Sibthorp moved as an amendment that the grant does not exceed £30,000 per annum.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, he never would shrink from giving his vote upon this, or upon any other occasion; but he did not know that he should have risen to address the House, if it were not for the insinuation of the noble lord—an insinuation introduced so unnecessarily, so unjustly, and so contrary to all parliamentary rules and principles—so unworthy too, as he thought, of the situation which the noble lord occupied, both as a minister of the Crown, and as leader of the House of Commons. What right had the noble lord to make the insinuation that he had done? Supposing that he had said, that the noble lord’s motive in proposing such a grant as £50,000 was owing to his base subserviency towards the Crown—supposing he had said that which was perfectly irregular, and which would be perfectly unjust, he thought, he would have been told at once by the Speaker, that he had no right to go on imputing motives. Thus, he thought, that it would be base and unworthy of him to be influenced at all by the events of last May; but he also said it would be as unworthy as it would be cowardly in him to shrink from the performance of his duty, from the fear that such a motive would be imputed to him. He said that it would be puling, effeminate delicacy in him, if he acquiesced in a vote which he felt to be wrong, because he feared some hon. gentleman opposite might have said, "you are acting from a spiteful recollection of the events of last May." He did not vote for the smaller sum, on the ground that had been taken by hon. gentlemen—he did not adopt now a course which he had constantly rejected—namely, in considering the grant, taking into his calculation how many families might be supported by it. He did not give his vote on account of the temporary distress that prevailed; nor because financial difficulties were felt, for he believed that this great country was rich enough, and powerful enough, to make a proper allowance for the consort of the sovereign. He introduced none of these invidious topics—he felt that what he did might cause temporary displeasure; but he was conscious that he consulted the permanent interest of the Crown, and that the vote he gave was consistent with liberality towards the Crown, and with justice towards the people. He who acquiesced in a vote which he felt could not be vindicated, was not a true friend to the Crown. He was a much greater friend to the Crown, who saved it from the unpopularity of an extravagant vote. So much then for his duty towards the Crown, and now, as to the position of the House of Commons, and the position of parties. He said, that the great political interest of parties was to be maintained, and nothing in the present state of public feeling could be so ruinous to both parties, as if there were a contest between as to which of them would show the greatest liberality in such a vote. It might promote the temporary interest of a party; but any fear, or any shrinking from that which they believed to be their duty would do more than anything else to ruin the character of the House of Commons. His hon. friend was not to be provoked by the example of the noble lord. His hon. friend had given notice without the slightest communication with him. He had heard the speech of the noble lord's explanation of the expenses of Prince Albert before he intimated how he intended to vote. He did not exactly understand what was the motion of his hon. friend; but he thought that £30,000 during the life of her Majesty, by way of a privy purse, would be a just and liberal grant. He thought, also, that £30,000 to Prince Albert, in case of his surviving her Majesty, and there being no issue, would be a just and liberal provision. But he thought, that if Prince Albert survived her Majesty, and that there were heirs to the Crown, the grant ought to be £50,000; but then he also said, that if Prince Albert was the father of a numerous family, and expenses thus fell upon the Prince, he for one would vote that which would be becoming to the father of the royal family. He did not know that his hon. friend proposed so to limit the vote; but then he should not be ready to increase the vote until Prince Albert had given a guarantee to the people of his permanent residence in, and attachment to the country. He grounded his vote upon a consideration of the reasons of the case. The noble lord had insinuated that some disrespect would be shown to the Crown unless he and others acquiesced in the proposal of ministers. Supposing that the noble lord said, that he called upon them to act upon precedents, and that he considered the precedent of Queen's Consort to be strictly in point, why, then, did not the noble lord propose £50,000 a year and £100,000 afterwards? Why not appeal to their respect to precedent, as binding on them in this case as in that? Supposing that the noble lord had made that proposal, and that they should pursue the course adopted with respect to Queen Adelaide—that is £50,000 first and £100,000 afterwards—would they not have a right to oppose such a proposal without any disrespect to the Crown? The cases of precedent then failed. They were not bound by precedent—not by strict and literal analogy; but then an appeal was made to the reasonable analogy of the cases cited by the noble lord. Could the noble lord deny, that, as far as the public money was concerned, no provision was made for Prince George during the lifetime of the Queen? The noble lord said that there was special pleading upon this point; but he mentioned, on the contrary, that it was strictly correct and proper argument. The Queen (Anne) came into possession of the hereditary revenues, the same that had been enjoyed by Queen Mary and King William. The marriage had taken place before she ascended the throne. Parliament made no increase, but a provision was made by the Queen out of those revenues, to which the Queen was unquestionably entitled, supposing that no marriage had taken place. Parliament provided for the case of Prince George surviving the Queen, merely at the close of his life, and when there was little chance of his surviving her, and then in case he did survive her, it granted to him £100,000 out of the public revenue. Let the House bear this in mind. £30,000 granted now, payable for life to the Queen and Prince Albert, in case of his surviving the Queen, was equivalent to the grant of £100,000, payable only in case of survivorship. If they took the value of annuities, £30,000 granted now for life to Prince Albert, was equivalent not to the £100,000 granted to Prince George, but to the sum of £200,000 or £300,000. This would be the equivalent in the contingency of survivorship. He would take the case of Prince Leopold and the Princess Charlotte. They had had a grant of £60,000 to maintain the whole of their establishment. The £30,000 which the Princess Charlotte had before, ceased, and they received £60,000 for the maintenance of their whole establishment, and £50,000 in the event of Prince Leopold surviving. Could any man deny, that the universal voice of the country was, that that grant was too great? Could any man deny that, in case of Prince Leopold going abroad, severing his connection with this country, £50,000 would not have been too much? The almost universal feeling of the country at that time was, that that grant was too great, and in point of fact, Prince Leopold practically proved it, by his relinquishment—his liberal, generous, handsome relinquishment—of a considerable portion of his income. He felt, that the amount was against the opinion of the country. The case of the Royal Family, where £21,000 a year was granted to each of its members to support the whole of their establishments, was a proof that £30,000 was a liberal allowance, such an allowance as he wished to make. He would come, then, to the case of William and Adelaide, which the noble lord said, he relied upon. His right hon. friend (Mr. Goulburn) had maintained, that, in making a grant of £30,000 a year to Prince Albert, they were substantially making the same allowance to the Queen and Prince Albert which had been made to King William and Adelaide. Surely, there was no special pleading in this? If they gave in effect the same amount available for the same purpose, surely it was not special pleading to ask the House to be bound by that fact. The right hon. gentleman, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, had said, that there was a difference in the present case, on account of the pension list, as formerly the surplus of that fund might have been applied to persons that properly fell upon the civil list. That was a perfectly novel argument. When parliament constituted the pension list and reduced it to £1,200 a year, that being the whole fund upon which the Crown could draw for personal services, and the reward of literary merit, parliament never contemplated that the surplus should be made available for other purposes. He must say, after that arrangement with respect to the limitation of the pension list to £1,200 that it was a great abuse of power, if indeed the power existed, to transfer the surplus to defray ordinary expenses. Such a thing ought not to have taken place. The right hon. gentleman, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, seemed to say, that he did not mean that—(The Chancellor of the Exchequer: by the new arrangement, the power was taken entirely away.) How, then, could it any way apply to the marriage of Prince Albert? In guarding against the inference which the right hon. gentleman drew, he had completely proved, that his argument was worth nothing. If parliament, before the marriage, had, by an act, taken away the power of applying this money, what a miserable stress for argument must the right hon. gentleman be in, to come to that House, and contend, that it was a disadvantage to the Crown that it could not now apply the surplus portion of this fund to the civil list? What had the allowance to Prince Albert to do with it, if the legislature had already taken away that surplus from the Crown? and how could the right hon. gentleman contend for an increase of the grant on that ground? What his right hon. friend contended for was, that the portion of the civil list, applicable to the personal expenses of the Queen and Prince Albert would, with the grant of £30,000, amount to the same sum as was granted in the case of King William and Queen Adelaide. The amount of the privy purse was, no doubt, different. £60,000 to the Queen, and £30,000 to Prince Albert, was less than the sum granted to William and Adelaide by £20,000; but, if they took the whole amount of that portion of the civil list which was applied to the establishment, and which went to diminish the expenses of Prince Albert, who would find an establishment provided for him, that he would say would be a legitimate comparison between the amount of the civil list applicable to personal expenses in the one reign and in the other; and he would say, that £30,000 would render the amount equal. The onus of proving, that more was necessary was thrown on the other side. The noble lord the Secretary for the Colonies, said, that the Crown could not apply the surplus upon one head of the civil list to the privy purse. That was a singular contrast to what had been said by the right hon. gentleman, the Chancellor of the Exchequer. That right hon. gentleman had contended, that the Crown had before the power of applying the surplus of the pension fund. That argument, it appeared, was perfectly inapplicable, as the Crown had no such power; but the Crown had the power of applying the savings in those heads of the civil list which referred to household expenses to the privy purse. Consequently the comparison between the total amount of the civil list under the head of the Lord Chamberlain's and the Lord Steward's departments, would not be applicable; and, in his opinion, the sum of £30,000 would give for each reign the same amount. It would also be recollected that the provision for the consort of a King and for the consort of a Queen was necessarily very different. A great establishment, a lord chamberlain, a steward, must be maintained by the consort of the King, as well as by the King himself; but in the case of a Queen Regnant, there was absolutely no necessity for his keeping any establishment at all. The expenses of the stabling department were also much heavier upon a Queen Consort, inasmuch as the establishment must be much larger on account of the necessity of providing carriages and horses for the females of her establishment. On these grounds, having been perfectly unwilling to enter into minute details, thinking that a reference of the subject to a committee, as in 1830, would be a wrong course—forming his calculations on the ground that had been stated by the noble lord himself, that £9,000 only would be required for Prince Albert's establishment, he had come to the conclusion that £30,000 a-year was a just and liberal allowance; and having come to this conclusion, and being perfectly resolved, notwithstanding the unjust imputations which the noble lord had thrown out, disregarding any consideration as to whether he was giving a politic vote or not, he was perfectly resolved not to enter into any unseemly contest about vying in an unjust liberality; he would give the Crown what he believed a liberal and just allowance; but, his duty as a representative of the people, and as a loyal subject of the Crown, could not permit him to counsel the House to make an extravagant grant. I will not (continued the right hon. baronet) condescend to rebut the charge of want of respect or loyalty. I have no compunctions of conscience on that ground. I never made a concurrence of political sentiment on the part of the Sovereign a condition of my loyalty. I never have been otherwise than loyal and respectful towards my Sovereign. Not one breath of disloyalty—not one word of disrespect towards the Crown, or any members of the Royal Family, however adverse their political sentiments were to mine, has ever escaped my lips; and when performing what I believe to be my duty to this House, and my duty towards the Crown, I should think myself unworthy of the position which I hold, of my station as a member of the House of Commons, if I thought that I could not take a straightforward course without needless professions of loyalty, or without a defence against accusations which I believe to be utterly unfounded.

CONFIDENCE IN THE MINISTRY.

In the fourth night's debate on Sir J. Y. Buller's motion, "That her Majesty's government, as at present constituted, does not possess the confidence of this House."

SIR ROBERT PEEL spoke as follows:—I am very confident that there is no gentleman present, however weary he may be of this protracted discussion, that will not admit, that, considering the nature of the motion, and considering the position in which I stand, I have no alternative but to solicit the indulgence of the House. I am confident, moreover, that if I must vindicate myself from some accusations, and must detail my opinions upon many important matters, considering the prominent part which I personally have been made to occupy throughout this debate, that I shall not be charged with any silly vanity, or presumptuous egotism. Two demands have been made by the opposite side in the course of this discussion—the one, that he who is about to give his vote of want of confidence in the government, should specify the grounds upon which that vote is given—the other, that those who, from their position, may be regarded as the probable successors of the government which it is sought to displace, should state upon what principles of public policy they propose to conduct the affairs of this country. The absolute justice of the first of these demands I willingly admit. The other demand, namely, that I should explain in detail my views of public policy, is, perhaps, not equally imperative in point of strict obligation, but it is a demand to which, from considerations of prudence, I shall most willingly accede. I will answer every question that has been put to me upon that point. There shall be no limit to the fulness and unreservedness of the answers which I will give, except your impatience. I know too well the little value that can be placed on that support which arises from misconception of one's real opinions—I have seen too much of magnificent professions out of office, and of meagre performances in—I have had too much experience of solemn engagements, entered into for the purpose of overturning a government, violated when that object had been obtained—I have so little desire to procure a hollow confidence, either on false pretences, or by a delusive silence, that I rejoice in the opportunity of frankly declaring my opinions and intentions on every point on which you challenge unreserved explanation. I proceed, however, in the first instance, to a compliance with that demand which calls upon me to specify the grounds on which I intend, with perfect cordiality, to join in the motion of my hon. friend, and record my denial of confidence in the present government. I withhold my confidence from you on every ground on which confidence can be withheld—I withhold my confidence from you on the results of your public policy—on your own confessions of incompetence—on the testimony of your most valued friends—I withhold my confidence from you on account of the constitution of your government, on account of your measures, and, above all, on account of the principles which you are now forced to avow, in order that you may retain your majority, and therefore your offices. I said, that I withheld my confidence from you on a consideration of the results of your public policy. I will compare those results, not with any remote period, not with the results of Conservative policy; I will compare them with those results of which you must be proud, if you have any recollection of events in which you took a share, and have any respect for the character of those by whose counsels you were then content to be led. In the year 1834, the minister, under whose guidance you carried the Reform Bill, retired from office. I will read to you the account which Lord Grey gave on his retirement, of the condition in which he left the country, and I will compare that condition, so testified by the authority of Lord Grey, with the condition of the country on this day, on which you are urging your claim to public confidence. On the 9th of July, 1834, Lord Grey observed (and mark the contrast in every particular):—"With respect to the internal state of the country, we leave it in improved circumstances—trade in a sound and healthy condition—the manufacturers generally employed, public credit improved, and all interests in a better condition, with one single exception—agriculture; and even the depression of that interest less affecting the tenantry than the landlord, through the reduction of rents. Political and trades' unions have disappeared. We have exerted the ordinary powers of the law for their suppression, and by administering it with a firm hand, the result has been complete success."

That was the testimony borne by Lord Grey to the public acts of that administration, of which Lord Grey, of which my noble friend, the member for North Lancashire, of which my right hon. friend, then member for Cumberland, formed a part, and from which they were compelled, by a sense of public duty to withdraw. You have had an unlimited control, with the exception of about four months, over the affairs of this country since, and I call upon you now to render an account of your stewardship, and to tell me by whose fault it is that this country now presents such a contrast with its condition in 1834. You boast that, since 1834, you have effected many great public measures, that reform has been progressive, that no obstruction has been sufficient to control the steady march of your advance in the career of improvement. How comes it, then, that in 1840, trade should be in an unsound and unhealthy condition?—that public credit should be injured?—that for months your public securities should have been at a discount? Agriculture, indeed, has improved since 1834. Do you take credit for the improvement? Is it owing to your fostering hand—to your manly and decided tone on the corn-laws? How happens it, if Lord Grey had succeeded in dissolving political and trades' unions—if, by a firm administration of the law, he had suppressed the spirit of disorder—if his efforts had been attended with complete success—if you, too, be justified in your boast, that you have advanced in a course of useful reform to an extent which no former government ever went, or could have anticipated—answer me this question—To what is it owing that this country is now convulsed with political disorder, that a spirit of insubordination is spreading far and wide—nay, that rebellion and insurrection are rearing their heads? If the test of good government is the concord and satisfaction of the people governed, can you abide a trial by that test? The noble lord (the member for Northumberland) has said, that he had observed from month to month, that the supporters of the government were gradually falling off. Have not these defections been concurrent with changes in the ministry? with the gradual retirement or expulsion of every minister (with one splendid exception, I admit, Lord John Russell)—of every minister conspicuous for talent, for resistance to restless innovation, for a desire to protect and preserve institutions in Church and State? Let us review the changes in the personal composition of the government since the retirement of Lord Grey. Since the spring of 1834, Lord Grey, Lord Stanley, Sir James Graham, the Duke of Richmond, Lord Ripon, Lord Brougham, Mr. Charles Grant, Mr. Spring Rice, lastly, the noble lord himself (Lord Howick) have separated themselves from you. Step by step these men have been gradually expelled; and for what reason? Because it was necessary to make a sacrifice of them, in order to conciliate parties holding opinions which they could not sanction. I said I was justified in withholding my confidence from you on the testimony of friends most partial to you, and best qualified to judge of your claims to confidence. Why has the noble lord (Lord Howick) abandoned you? Because he distrusts the principles on which you profess to act, and foresees the consequences of the concessions you have made, and will continue to make, to the demands of Radical supporters. And (turning to Lord Howick) do you read us a lecture about withdrawing confidence? What justifies you in your abandonment of your colleagues, but your utter want of confidence in them? You left the government upon public principle. It was no paltry squabble about office; no pique that you or your relatives were not promoted, that induced your retirement. The time was one of extreme difficulty; your colleagues stood in need of every support; and bear in mind the peculiar circumstances under which you had very recently resumed office. You resumed office from an imperative sense of duty, according to your impressions of duty, to protect your sovereign. In this debate you have said, that an unjust and ungenerous attempt was made to control the Queen in respect to a part of her household. My views are totally different from yours. I think a condition was required from me which it would have been humiliating and unconstitutional to assent to. But, assume that you were right and that I was wrong. What overpowering motives for distrusting a government must you have had, that could impel you, amid all the pressing embarrassments of public affairs, when the ministers, the men whom you profess to esteem and love, were tottering from their weakness—when the Queen required protection from “unjust and ungenerous demands”—that could impel you to separate from your colleagues, and to abandon your sovereign? Changes in the government, altering its character, were the ground of your withdrawal from office. The chief addition to the cabinet at the time of your retirement, was the appointment of Mr. Labouchere to be President of the Board of Trade. I was not aware that he held extreme opinions, calculated to increase the discontent and alarm of moderate men. Have the subsequent additions to the government tended to increase your confidence? Has the appointment of your successor abated your distrust? What think you of the lecture on the sacred duty of agitation which has been delivered by that successor (Mr. Macanlay)? No! no! if you have been justified in abandoning your post, in withdrawing your co-operation from colleagues whom you know and esteem, you cannot quarrel with our much fainter demonstration of distrust. I have thus given you the testimony of a partial friend to your demerits—I proceed to redeem my pledge of convicting you on your own confessions. Upon what ground did you retire from office, after having carried your bill for the government of Jamaica? You had a majority of five only on that bill, and you determined to resign office. I presume it was not the increasing difficulties of the country that induced you to retire from the post of danger, that it was the bonâ fide belief, after the decision upon the Jamaica bill, that you did not possess a sufficient degree of public confidence to enable you to administer the affairs of this country. In the debate of the 7th of May, when you declared the grounds of your withdrawal from office, the noble lord, the member for Stroud, and the leader of the House of Commons, gave the following explanation:—"It seems to me that there is no option but to give up the bill which we thought it our duty to bring forward. It is then a question whether, having brought forward a bill of that importance, we shall leave the state of affairs in Jamaica, in the West Indian colonies, and in our colonies generally, in that state in which the ministers of the Crown ought not to be content to leave them. It is obvious that in Jamaica the authority of the Crown will be greatly weakened by a vote of the House of Commons, giving, in effect, and in impression, support to the contumacy, as I must call it, of the House of Assembly against the proposition of the ministers of the Crown."

The Canada bill was pending:—"We cannot," said the noble lord, "calculate on that support which is necessary for the settlement of the affairs of Canada. Therefore, in continuing in the administration of affairs, not having, as we think we have not, a sufficient degree of confidence and support to carry on those affairs efficiently in this House, we should be exposing to jeopardy the colonial empire of this country, many of our colonies being, I will not say in a state of hazard, but in a state of uncertainty, concerning which questions of considerable importance are pending. After the vote of last night, I do not think we are entitled to say, that upon the great and important affairs of the colonies, upon which government is obliged to come to a decision, we have such support and such confidence in this House as will enable us sufficiently to carry on the public business."

It was not, then, a mere personal dissatisfaction with the vote; it was not wounded feelings of honour that induced you to resign; your reason for resigning was, that you were so deprived of confidence and support, that you were placing in jeopardy the best interests of the colonies by continuing in office. What security can you give to those colonies that you are better enabled to administer their affairs now than then? What said Lord Melbourne in the House of Lords? After mentioning a conversation between Bishop Burnet and King William, in which the bishop, after discussing the different forms of government, inquired which his Majesty preferred? was answered by the King, "I know not which may be the best, but the worst I consider to be a monarchy which does not possess the full power and prerogatives of a monarchy."

Lord Melbourne went on to say, in allusion to this conversation,—"I am sure I do not know what is the best ministry, but this I do know, that unquestionably the worst ministry is that which does not possess sufficient of the confidence of parliament and the country to carry those measures which it may think necessary for the public service."

Lord Melbourne did not then draw the distinction which has since been drawn between the responsibility of an administration for executive government and for legislative measures. Lord Melbourne said, that that was the worst government which had not sufficient confidence on the part of parliament and the country to carry such measures through parliament as it thought necessary. The right hon. gentleman (Mr. Macaulay) differs from Lord Melbourne in that respect; he draws a distinction between executive and legislative functions, and offers it in vindication of the government for continuing in office without public confidence. Can you maintain the doctrine that a government is merely responsible for the execution of departmental business? If that doctrine be correct, there may be complete abdication of every legislative function. How is it possible, in a country with a popular form of government—in a country, whose affairs have been administered (as in this country they have) mainly through the intervention of the House of Commons—how is it possible for the government to maintain public respect if it limit itself to the mere discharge of departmental duties? If you exclude legislation from your duties, how would you deal with the case of Jamaica? You felt it absolutely necessary, according to your conception of duty, to annihilate the Assembly of Jamaica, and substitute a despotie for a free government. You clearly thought good executive government in Jamaica impossible without legislative interference. The case of Jamaica is the case of every colony, of almost every function of government. There is scarcely any one of the most important duties of government which is limited to mere administration of departments, and which does not involve duties of legislation as well as of execution. But there is a new resource for an incompetent administration; there is the ingenious device of “open questions,” the cunning scheme of adding to the strength of a weak government by proclaiming its disunion. It will be a fatal policy indeed, if that which has hitherto been an exception—and always an unfortunate exception in recent times, is hereafter to constitute the rule of government. If every government may say, “We feel pressed by those behind us, we find ourselves unable, by steadily maintaining our own opinions, to command the majority, and retain the confidence of our followers; our remedy is an easy one—let us make each question an open question, and thereby destroy every obstacle to every possible combination.” What will be the consequence? The exclusion of hon. and able men from the conduct of affairs, and the unprincipled coalition of the refuse of every party. The right hon. gentleman has said, that there have been instances of “open questions” in the recent history of this country. There have been; but there has scarcely been one which has not been pregnant with evil, and which has not been branded by an impartial posterity with censure and disgrace. He said that in 1782, Mr. Fox made parliamentary reform an open question; that Mr. Pitt did so on the slave trade; and that the Catholic question was an open one. Why, if ever lessons were written for your instruction to guard you against the recurrence to open questions, you will find them in these melancholy examples. The first instance was the coalition of Mr. Fox with Lord North, which could not have taken place without open questions. Does not the right hon. gentleman know that that very fact, the union in office of men who had differed, and continued to differ, on great constitutional and vital questions, produced such a degree of discontent and disgust as to lead to the disgraceful expulsion of that government? The second instance was that of the slave trade; but has not that act of Mr. Pitt, the permitting of the slave trade to be an open question, been more condemned than any other act of his public life? I will read what the most recent historian says upon the subject of that very coalition, and of Mr. Pitt’s conduct on leaving the slave trade an open question. Of Mr. Fox and the coalition it is said—“On such grounds Mr. Fox and Lord North succeeded in overturning the ministry, and took their places, which they held for a few months, when the king dismissed them, amidst the all but universal joy of the country, men of all ranks and parties, and sects, joining in one feeling of disgust at the factious propensities in which the unnatural alliance was begotten—and apprehending from it, as Mr. Wilberforce remarked, ‘a progeny stamped with the features of both parents—the violence of the one party, and the corruption of the other.’”

What is there to prevent me, if such a doctrine were tolerated, from coalescing with the hon. member for Westminster (Mr. Leader) and the hon. member for Cornwall (Sir W. Molesworth) in opposition to her Majesty’s government, from subsequently dividing the spoils of office, discharging the mere executive duties of it, and evading the exhibition of disunion by alleging that parliament was responsible for legislation, and that we had nothing to propose which there was a chance of carrying? What says the same historian of Mr. Pitt, in reference to the slave trade? “These are heavy charges; but we fear the worst remains to be urged against the conduct of this eminent person. No man felt more strongly on the subject of the African slave trade than he. His speeches against it were the finest of his noble orations. Yet did he continue for eighteen years of his life suffering any one of his colleagues, nay of his underlings of office, to vote against the question of abolition if they thought fit. His conduct on the slave trade leaves a dark shade resting upon his reputation—a shade which few would take to be on the first of orators and greatest of ministers.”

The next instance cited by the right hon. gentleman, was that of the Catholic question. I have had some experience of the evils which arose from making Catholic Emancipation an open question. All parties in this House were equally responsible for them. Fox made it an open question—Pitt made it an open question—Lord Liverpool made it an open question—Canning made it an open question. Each had to plead an urgent necessity for tolerating disunion in the cabinet on this great question; but there cannot be a doubt that the practical result of that disunion was to introduce discord among public men, and to paralyze the vigour of executive government. Every act of administration was tainted by disunion in the cabinet. Each party was jealous of the predominance of the other. Each party must be represented in the government of that very country which required above all things an united and resolute government. There must be a lord-lieutenant of one class of opinions, a secretary of the opposite, beginning their administration in harmony, but in spite of themselves becoming each the nucleus of a party, gradually converting reciprocal confidence into jealousy and distrust. It was my conviction of the evils of such a state of things, the long experience of distracted councils, of the curse of an open question as it affected the practical government of Ireland, it was this conviction, and not the fear of physical force, that convinced me that the policy must be abandoned. I do not believe that the making of the Catholic question an open question facilitated the ultimate settlement of it. If the decided friends of emancipation had refused to unite in government with its opponents, the question would have been settled at an earlier period, and (as it ought to have been) under their auspices. So much for the encouraging examples of the right hon. gentleman. They were fatal exceptions from the general policy of government. If, as I before observed, such exceptions are to constitute the future rule of government, there is an end to public confidence in the honour and integrity of great political parties, a severance of all ties which constitute party connections, a premium upon the shabby and shuffling conduct of unprincipled politicians. I give the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Macaulay) full credit for the purity of his own intentions, but without this new doctrine of “open questions” how could you, with your opinions on the corn-laws, on free trade, on the abolition of all protective and restrictive duties, how could you justify your union with the Prime Minister, who does not content himself with mere dissent from your opinions, but who has publicly declared that the measures for which you contend are among “the wildest and maddest schemes that ever entered into the imagination of man?” Again, how can you, who think the suffrage ought to be extended—who think there is no security for the honesty of the elector except in secret voting—who think the duration of parliaments ought to be reduced—who think the Septennial Act ought to be repealed—how can you, with the faintest hope of effectually serving your country, co-operate with the noble lord, who tells his constituents and the world that he considers these very measures, which you deem imperatively necessary, to be tantamount to the commencement of a revolution? The noble lord tells his constituents, after declaring himself in favour of some amendments to the Reform Act, such as a new Registration Bill, and some measure with respect to the payment of rates, “that minor changes such as these, introduced when the public mind is prepared for them, and they have been duly weighed, differ very much from the proposal to found a new reform bill on the basis of triennial parliaments, vote by ballot, and universal suffrage.” (Mr. Macaulay.—I am not for triennial parliaments.) No; but you are for quadriennial: so there is but a year between your measure and that denounced by the noble lord. Thus then the question will stand between two members of the cabinet: one says, triennial parliaments would be pernicious; the other says, quadriennial are necessary for the satisfaction of the country. One says, household suffrage will not only be dangerous and convulsing to the public mind—(Lord John Russell, we believe, made some gesture of dissent.)—Have you heard this night the speech of the hon. member for Dublin, Mr. O’Connell? Did you hear the appeal he made to me? Did you hear him say, that any party which refused to admit to the franchise the great body of the working classes—the real elements of strength in the country—were unworthy the confidence of the country? Does the right hon. gentleman believe, when he shall have drawn his new line—merely admitting to the franchise the £10 householders now resident out of the boroughs—that he will stop agitation? The noble lord would soon convince him that such limited extension of the suffrage would have the double evil of increasing discontent, and compelling further and indefinite changes. But the ballot! the most important of unsettled constitutional questions! how can the right hon. gentleman, who considers secret voting indispensable to the honest discharge of the duty of an elector, how can he act cordially in public life with the noble lord, who considers the ballot pregnant with evil in itself, and entailing what would be tantamount to revolution—namely, household suffrage? How do you meet in the Cabinet to discuss the state of the country totally differing on a great question like this, involving others of still greater magnitude? The right hon. gentleman proclaims the sacred duty of agitation. He says, that no great measure can be carried without agitation. Are these mere clap-traps to deceive the Radicals behind him? If your doctrine be good, do you intend to agitate as a member of the government? You profess to believe in the efficacy and necessity of the ballot, and you say no great question can be carried without agitation. Does your position as a Cabinet minister exempt you from the duty of agitating in favour of the ballot? If you agitate in its favour, the noble lord must agitate against it. Here is the first result of your open questions. How edifying will it be to see the noble lord and the right hon. gentleman, after a conference in Cabinet on the convulsed state of the country, or other arcana imperii, part company at the end of Downing-street, each to carry on his separate system of agitation! Great indeed will be the vigour of your administration, and cordial the concert of your Cabinet. But, suppose you abstain from agitation; suppose, in order to prevent collision in the Cabinet, you never discuss either corn-laws or ballot, or any other of the open questions, what answer will you make to your constituents at Edinburgh? Out of office you declared yourself in favour of these measures,—in office, you repeated the assurance that you were faithful to your principles. From the proud keep of Windsor you proclaimed your fidelity to them, not from the gratification of any vulgar personal vanity, but from the firm resolution that truth should be spoken in high places, and that from the palace of kings the comfortable tidings of Radical reform should be conveyed by a voice of authority. Will it suffice to answer, when your constituents require the fulfilment of your promises, “I gave you no pledges; declarations in abundance I admit, but pledges! I utterly disclaim them.” They will remind you, that they hailed your return from foreign lands to the shores of England,—that they found you panting for distinction, and lifted you through their favour into the councils of the empire. If their native tongue will not suffice for this classic constituency, you have taught them, by reminding me of former reproaches, where they may find, in the passionate exclamations of Dido, the fit expression of their sorrows:—

Nusquam tuta fides!

Nay, they may proceed with the quotation,

Nusquam tuta fides! cjectum littore, egentem
Excepit, et regni demens in parte locavi.

“Shall there be no fruit,” they will exclaim, “of our mutual love, no little Bill, stamped with the image of the father, and reflecting in its face the features of paternal vigour and intelligence?”

Saltem si qua mihi de te suscepta fuisset
Ante fugam soboles, si quis mihi parvulus aula
Luderet Æneas, qui te tantum ore referret,
Non adeo omnino capta ac deserta viderer.

You remain deaf to their entreaties; with all your protestations of fidelity, you have nothing to return but the miserable answer of Æneas, after all his coquetting in the cavern, Non hæc in fœdera veni—I gave you no pledges. The noble lord tells his constituents at Stroud, that the measures to be dreaded, as ending in revolution, are the ballot and its consequence, indefinitely extended suffrage; and he exhorts the inhabitants of Stroud to act on the principles of true Whiggism, and, above all, “not to raise the anchors of the monarchy while a storm is blackening in the horizon." And what does the noble lord do as the fury of the storm increases? He enlists an able-bodied seaman who thinks there is no safety from the storm but in heaving the anchors, and is whistling away with half the crew at work at the capstan. And what is the consequence? The vessel is lost while the officers are squabbling and fighting about the management of it. One insists on remaining at anchor and riding out the storm; the other, on heaving the anchor, and braving the open sea; neither has strength enough to prevail, and amid the distractions of the crew, the gallant ship drags along with imperfect and loosened holding, till she drifts on the obscure and dirty mud bank of progressive reform. So much for "Open questions." I now come to consider the acts of the government, and, in the first place, I will look at the state of the revenue. There has been of late a great excess of expenditure over revenue. Every quarter produced a greater increase in the expenditure, and a corresponding deficit. On the 5th of January 1839, the actual expenditure exceeded the actual revenue by the sum of £345,000, on the 5th of April by £430,000, on the 5th of July by £518,000, and on the 10th of October by £803,000. On the balance of three years there is a deficiency of £3,500,000, comparing revenue with expenditure, and yet in such a state of the finances, the government, for the sake of a little momentary, and only momentary, popularity, consented to sacrifice the revenue of the post-office. I have a right to speak with some authority on this subject. Suppose I had acted in regard to the malt-tax as ministers have done with respect to the post-office. I was in far greater difficulties, as minister, in 1835, than the present government, and more pressing demands were made for the repeal of the malt-tax, than for the repeal of the postage duty. Did I evade the difficulty of forming a united government by making the malt-tax an open question? Did I not forego the aid and co-operation of my noble friend, the present Duke of Buckingham, because I was resolved that the malt-tax should not be an open question, but that the repeal of it should be opposed by the whole authority of government? When my hon. friends saw my determination to maintain the malt-tax, or relinquish office, they consented to support me, and the House, generally, gave me that support, which enabled me to oppose the repeal of the malt-tax by an immense majority—350 to 192. Had this government acted on the same principle, had they told the House that the reduction of the postage duty was a step which could not be taken without extreme danger to the revenue, had they refused to be parties to the reduction, they would have received similar support. They are, therefore, responsible for the results of the measure which they have so rashly and so needlessly adopted against their own opinions. While the revenue is thus diminished, how stand the establishments? What progress has been made in redeeming the magnificent pledges of retrenchment and economy—the flattering promises, that a reformed parliament would secure respect for the government, and peace both at home and abroad, with greatly reduced establishments! What are the facts? In 1835, the expenditure of the army, navy, and ordnance establishments was £11,400,000; in 1836, it was £11,800,000; in 1837, it was £12,194,000; in 1838, it was £12,681,000; in 1839, it was £13,565,000. In the spring of 1835, the present ministers took the administration of public affairs into their own hands—they promised emphatically to secure tranquillity and concord throughout the country by "progressive reform," and declared that the name of England would be so respected throughout Europe, that universal peace could be maintained with diminished establishments. They had, notwithstanding, progressively increased the military establishments of the country; not, as he believed, unnecessarily: he threw no blame upon them for that increase, but let them no longer boast of the blessings of profound peace abroad, and tranquillity at home. There stood the fact, that they had increased the military establishments of this country from 1835, when they were £11,401,000, to the present period, when they were £13,565,000, and this during a time of peace. Do you look to the possibility of a war? What have you done to prepare for it? You blamed the Duke of Wellington, and my right hon. friend Mr. Goulburn, for their financial extravagancies. What did we effect in the three years of our administration? We reduced the principal of the public debt in the short period of the three years preceding the Reform Bill, by a capital of twenty millions; we diminished the annual public charge by one million and a half. This was done in the Unreformed Parliament; this was the work of that government which you said had increased establishments for the sake of patronage and of corruption. What is the amount of public debt now, as compared with the public debt on 5th January 1831, the amount of funded and unfunded debt was £783,000,000. Had it been reduced during these nine years of peace and reform? No! greatly increased. The true test, however, is not the amount of capital, but the amount of annual charge. Has that been diminished? No! increased to the extent of one million. The annual charge of the national debt on the 5th January 1831, was £28,349,000. On the 5th January 1840, it was £29,300,000. So much for your financial administration, and your promises of retrenchment. Let us now consider the state of the country in respect to internal tranquillity, and the contentment of the people. Account to us for the progress of Chartism and Socialism. Lord Grey, speaking in 1834, said that mischievous political combinations were suppressed. Why have they revived and spread to a formidable extent? Because you, the ministers, have encouraged them by your example, by your acts, by your principles of government. You are now encouraging them by your exhortations to agitation. When you make a chartist delegate a magistrate, you offer a direct premium to chartism. You invert the relation of government to the people by acts like these. Instead of being a control over evil passions, and a check upon unruly acts, you make the government and the magistracy the actual fomenters of disaffection and insubordination. It is no excuse that radical corporations have recommended chartists for the magistracy; it is no remedy that you afterwards dismiss them when they disgrace the magistracy by their violent language or conduct. The evil is done when the appointment is made. I do not ask you to suspend the Habeas Corpus act, or to pass coercive laws of extreme rigour; I have every confidence in the power of the ordinary law, when enforced by a vigorous government, commanding the sympathy and co-operation of a loyal people. But you paralyse that law, and alienate that sympathy, when, for the sake of courting popular favour, you lend your sanction to evil principles, by bestowing the favour and confidence of the Crown on those who profess them. You confound and unsettle the public mind when, as cabinet ministers, you exhort to agitation as a positive duty. What right have you to complain of Mr. Oastler? I do complain of him. I have never sanctioned his agitation—I deem it most pernicious. But you cannot so limit agitation that it shall just be subservient to your interests. You can't have agitation on one side merely. The men opposed to you will tell you that the importance which you attach to your purposes they attach to theirs. And the dangerous, and, I think, wicked agitation on the poor laws will be defended on the principles on which you rely. If there be danger in that agitation, why should there not be in yours? Mr. Oastler has excited, it is said, and inflamed the people against the poor-law. Suppose he thinks the poor-law a greater grievance than the want of the ballot. If agitation is allowable to you (Mr. Macaulay), a Cabinet Minister, can you with any consistency denounce Mr. Oastler for the consequences of his agitation? Then, again, take the case of the Socialists. Have you given them no encouragement? Are you aware of the progress of this society? Are you aware of the opinions they profess? This debate commenced by the hon. member for Dublin, asking the Secretary for Ireland “whether Socialism had extended to Ireland?” And this with the view of showing that the good sense and loyalty of the people of Ireland, on the first ingress of Socialism, repudiated and rejected it. A cheer followed this question, and credit was given to the people of Ireland for the effectual discouragement of this system. Are you (the Ministers) entitled to the same compliment? Have you marked your reprobation of the doctrines avowed by the president of this society,—the shameful doctrines, that religion is a fraud, that the right of private property ought to be abolished, and that marriage is an unnatural institution? I don't want you to rush hastily to the prosecution of Mr. Owen; but I do require from you (and there is not one impartial man, of whatever sect or party, who will not join with me,) I do require that the Prime Minister of England shall not present to a Maiden Queen the patron and chief promoter of such doctrines. So much for the president of the institution; now let me put a question to the government, with respect to the vice-president. The vice-president of this institution was Mr. Pare, of Birmingham. In the course of the year 1839 Mr. Pare, being vice-president of this society, the Congress of Socialists came to a resolution, “That it is expedient to address the general convention of the labouring classes now sitting in Birmingham." This address appears to have been presented by Mr. Pare on the part of the deputation who proceeded with the address. He reports to the Congress, "That they were received very courteously, but very cautiously; that Mr. Feargus O'Connor complimented the Congress on being composed of men of high intellect; and he thought the address one which should be answered; that Mr. O'Brien—(Mr. Bronterre O'Brien, I presume,) moved 'That the address be received, and taken into consideration after the simultaneous meetings were over, which were previously agreed upon.'"

Here is proof of the connection between the congress of Socialism and the convention of Chartism. I have it also in my power to prove that the life and soul of this institution, next to Mr. Owen, was Mr. Pare. Now, will the House believe that this vice-president of the congress of Socialism, of that institution which holds that the right to property should be abolished, and that the marriage tie is an unnatural obligation—will the House believe that this vice-president occupies a place under her Majesty's government? The president of the institution was presented to her Majesty. The vice-president holds an office under the government, and what office do you suppose? The registrar of marriages in the town of Birmingham! Now, by whom was Mr. Pare appointed registrar of births and marriages? Birmingham, I believe, is not under the operation of the new Poor-law. If it had been, the guardians of the union would have had the appointment. But Birmingham not being so circumstanced, Mr. Pare must have received his appointment from the authority of her Majesty's government. Is it conformable to the dictates of common sense or common decency, at a time when principles of Socialism are convulsing and disgusting the land, to select for the particular office of registrar of marriages, in such a town as Birmingham, the vice-president of a society which holds marriage to be an unnatural tie? The presentation of the president to her Majesty may have been—it surely must have been—a casual, an unfortunate oversight. Is the appointment of the vice-president an oversight also? If it be, I hold you only one degree less culpable, in the present state of the country, for not ascertaining the principles of the men whom you select for such appointments; and how can you hope to discourage Chartism and Socialism, when you exercise your patronage and authority in favour of those who are their chief supporters? It does appear to me, that a more grievous and wanton insult could not be offered to the females of those religious sects for whose relief the marriage Act was introduced, than the selecting for that particular office the vice-president of a society which holds the marriage ceremony to be an unnatural institution. The office of registrar was held in the same House in which the congress of Socialists met. It is true that Mr. Pare found it necessary to relinquish the office of vice-president of the Socialists; but on withdrawing from that office, he declared he would continue a member of the board, and would devote all his energies to the interests of the society. Is it fitting that such things should be done by the authority of the government,—and can you be surprised at the progress of Socialism, when the chief patrons and propagators of it receive marked encouragement from ministers acting in the Queen's name? Again, have you taken effectual precautions against the overt acts to which the principles of Socialism and Chartism might fairly be expected to lead? You had timely indications of the probable result; there were symptoms which could not be mistaken, that there would be open resistance to the law. In what condition is the militia force of the country? In case of necessity, could it be embodied? Have any steps been taken so to amend the law that the militia force might be available within a short period of the demand for its services? How can you now vindicate your reductions of the yeomanry? You cannot allege unwillingness to employ them as an unsuitable force to maintain the public peace, for you have employed them on every occasion, and have acknowledged the zealous and effectual services they have rendered. You employed them on the occasion of the disturbances at Nottingham, at Bristol, at Birmingham, at Newport. You may allege that you are organising a rural police as a substitute; but surely, in the present condition of the country, it was unwise to throw away, at least to impair an instrument of proved efficacy for maintaining public tranquillity before any sufficient substitute was provided. I will not enter into the great department of foreign policy, for I have yet to answer all the questions that have been put to me as to the principles on which, if in government,

I would undertake to act. But do not construe silence into approbation : I see ample ground both for anxiety and for condemnation in reference to our foreign policy. There is but one remark which I will make. I cannot observe without deep pain, the indications of growing distrust and uneasiness in our relations with that powerful neighbour (France), with whom, for the interests of peace in Europe—for the interests of commerce—of civilization—of humanity, it is so important to maintain, not merely the relations of peace, but those of mutual confidence and good-will. Of course, I speak only of such a maintenance of those relations as shall be perfectly compatible with a studied regard on our part for national honour, and the rights of our own subjects ; but I shall deeply regret if a cordial good understanding between two mighty countries, the relations of which must influence the destinies of the world for good or evil, cannot be maintained consistently with every regard on the part of each for national dignity and national rights. I shall here close my enumeration of the grounds on which I withhold my confidence from the government, and shall now proceed to reply to the several questions which have been put to me respecting my opinions and intentions on various questions of public policy, the chief of which are the following :—The privilege question now pending, the Poor-laws, National education, the Reform Act, the Corn-laws, the Roman Catholic Relief Act, and the government of Ireland. It is said that I cannot venture to declare an opinion on these important matters, without at once exhibiting the divisions and dissensions which are alleged to prevail in the conservative party. But I declare, once for all, that I prefer incurring that danger, to the purchasing of a precarious support by the concealment of my views and intentions. I ask no man to relinquish his own conscientious convictions, in order that he may adopt mine ; but, on the other hand, I will not be the instrument for giving effect to opinions in which I do not concur, and no man shall have a right to upbraid me for having acquired his confidence by a pretended acquiescence in his views, or by a reserve liable to misconstruction. I am taunted with my inability to form an administration concurring with me on the matter of privilege, and able, through the support of its followers, to execute my intentions in that respect. This taunt surprises me. Suppose I could not rely for the support of my views, in regard to privilege, on my general supporters, how would my situation be worse than your own ? I was informed by the noble lord (Lord J. Russell) that without my support he had not the hope of maintaining, through its own authority, the privileges of the House of Commons. I was thanked by him publicly for the efficiency of that support, but especially thanked by him for having refused to make this a party question, and for having left each member to act on his own impressions and conviction. It is found convenient in this debate to take another course, to insist on the necessity of a government united on the question of privilege, and making it a party question, and to reproach me with the defection of my friends. On one account I rejoice in this rather inconsistent and ungrateful reproach. It is an evidence that the present government is united on the privilege question ; that those peers, including the Lord Chancellor, who are members of this government, cordially concur with their colleagues in the House of Commons, and are prepared, if necessary, to maintain in the House of Lords the course which their colleagues have taken here. I see then, (if this be the case, as it must be, after the taunts I have referred to,) the prospect of a solution of our difficulties. Let the Lord Chancellor, after the requisite previous communication to this House, introduce into the House of Lords a declaratory bill, ensuring both for the House of Lords and House of Commons the unquestioned exercise of essential privileges, and supplying the defect and imperfection of our powers to vindicate those privileges, especially during prorogation. The point, however, so far as this debate is concerned, is merely this, that if I should be unable to carry into effect my views as to privilege by the aid of my friends, and should be compelled to presume upon the honest support of my opponents, my position, as a minister, would clearly be no worse than yours. I come to the new poor-law. The leaders of the Conservative party have been accused of giving a lukewarm support to this great change in the social system, and (though we ourselves abstain from exciting the public mind) of having made no manly declarations of opinion in support of the law, calculated to discourage and repress the agitation carried on by others. Nay, I have been distinctly accused of having maintained silence on the subject of the poor-law, for the express purpose of gaining support at the late general election, on account of the unpopularity of the law, and the clamour directed against it. I have disdained to notice these, and all similar accusations of the public press, false and malignant as they may be, in any other place than the House of Commons. I supported the poor-law in parliament when brought forward by a government which I opposed; and, let me add, if we, the leaders of the Conservative party, had followed the examples which we might have found in the conduct of former oppositions—if we had availed ourselves of the unpopularity of the law, and of the facilities it afforded for exciting public discontent, the law could not have passed. I shall continue to support the law; and in saying this, am I making a tardy declaration in its favour? am I justly chargeable with having declined my share of the responsibility attaching to it, or with having sought to profit, for party purposes, by the tacit encouragement of a cry against it? My own election was among the earliest at the general elections of 1837. I had to address my constituents in the open air upon the hustings. Then was the time for reserve about the poor-law, if I had wished to set the example of encouraging agitation for election purposes. Here is the speech which I delivered on that occasion. In the course of it I was interrupted by a cry, “Did not you support the poor law?” (This was my answer.) “There is no question of public concern from which I wish to shrink; and I tell you frankly that I did support the poor-law; and further than that, I admit that my opinion of its leading enactments and provisions is not changed. I did not support it for the purpose of making a reduction in the amount of the rates, which, in my opinion, is one of the smallest parts of the advantage derived from the measure; but because I saw the moral and social condition of the poor gradually lowered by the operation of the old poor-law; and I wanted, by an approved system, to elevate their character and improve their comforts. I wanted to see them raised from the dependent situation of supporting themselves by alms derived from the workhouse to a respectable station, earning their livelihood by their own exertions. These are the grounds on which I supported the bill. I did it out of real friendship for the poor, being convinced that it would secure their permanent interest and improve their condition. If, however, any of its enactments are harsh, I would have them revised and altered. I will not try to throw odium on others by declaring myself hostile to what I have supported. I believe the ultimate operation of that bill will be to raise the character and elevate the position of the poor in the social scale. Objectionable enactments I shall be glad to consider, and make any regulation to secure the comfort and well-fare of the poor.”

I adhere to the opinions I then expressed, and I ask any honourable man of those most opposed to me, whether I could have taken more effectual means of discouraging agitation than by such an address to my constituents, on the eve of a general election, frankly declaring myself in favour of an unpopular law? I am reproached with being indifferent to national education. I am hostile to your system of national education, but a warm friend to an extended education on right principles. I have no new declarations to make on this head; I adhere to the opinions I expressed last year. I would give every aid which the state could give to the extension of education on the following conditions:—that the instruction to be provided for the children of the Established Church should be based, not merely on religion, but on the peculiar tenets and doctrines of the church; that the church should be invited, nay, if possible, compelled, to take its full share in the education of its own flock; that you should not act as if you were jealous of the church in its own proper sphere of duty, as if you merely tolerated the church as an inconvenient encumbrance established by law of which you could not get rid; as if you were ashamed of those doctrines and principles which are the distinguishing marks of the creed which we profess. I would give the church ample means of extended education to all classes on such principles, but not the slightest power to interfere with the instruction of those who were unwilling to accept it, and I would not refuse to those who rejected it, and who dissented from the church, the means of education based on the great truths of Christianity. I would, in short, act upon the general principles on which parliament did act in the years 1836 and 1837. Some members have justified their support of the present government, while they profess no great respect for it, on the ground that the Reform Act would be endangered if those who were notoriously hostile to the act during its progress in parliament were now in power, and there is a frequent attempt at ridicule of the "new-born zeal for reform," and the conversion of former enemies of the Reform Act into cordial friends determined to stand by every enactment of it. This is my case; and yet I see no ground for ridicule or reproach. What inconsistency is there, after a momentous change in the representative system has been effected, at the expense of great convulsion and disorder, in accepting that change as a final settlement, rather than seeking, directly or indirectly, to disturb it at the risk of renewed and more violent convulsion and disturbance, and with every prospect of ultimate defeat? I will maintain the Reform Act:—first, because I think it impossible to revive the system of representation which that act extinguished; secondly, because the professed friends and chief authors of that act are inclined to destroy the work of their own hands, and again to agitate for a new Reform Bill, based on more democratic principles. If I can resist them more effectually by maintaining, not every letter, not every palpable defect in the Reform Bill, but all its main provisions, than by disturbing the settlement which it made, where is the inconsistency in an opponent of the bill, during its progress, becoming a supporter after its enactment? In the progress of this moving panorama of questions, the view is at length presented of the Devonport election and the corn-laws. The Judge-Advocate came down to the House, with his pockets filled with scraps of newspapers, detailing the proceedings of the Devonport election, and the speeches of Mr. Dawson on the corn-laws. The right hon. gentleman inferred that I was a party to the declaration which Mr. Dawson had made on the subject of a modification of the existing corn-laws, and that I had employed Mr. Dawson as a convenient instrument for publicly notifying some change of opinion on my own part. Now, I assure the right hon. gentleman, that when he changed his own opinion on the ballot; when he, who was previously adverse to the ballot, and still doubts its efficacy, found it convenient, at the time of an election at Devonport, to signify to his constituents that he would in future vote for the ballot, I never inferred that his relatives (Lord Grey, or Lord Howick) had changed their opinions on that subject, and had employed his conversion as the signal of their own. I gave him credit for being allowed to exercise his own discretion on a public question, and to act independently without being subject to the control of others. Such, however, is not the indulgent construction which the hon. gentleman puts on the speeches of Mr. Dawson; and it becomes necessary for me, therefore, publicly to declare not only that Mr. Dawson's profession of opinion on the corn-laws was wholly unauthorized by me, but that I never had the slightest communication with Mr. Dawson on the subject of the corn-laws, either previously to the Devonport election or during its progress. Nay, more, I will also publicly declare, that on no occasion have I ever resorted to the paltry device of employing another person to speak my opinions, of putting forth a feeler, (as the phrase is) of making an experiment on the public mind, with a view of ascertaining the policy of maintaining or abandoning any given course. I should have credit for this, I hope, on my simple asseveration; but I will put it beyond all question as to the particular case which has been mentioned, assuring the right hon. gentleman that his surmise that Mr. Dawson was employed by me, in 1828, to indicate a change of opinion on my part on the Catholic question, is as utterly unfounded as his impression that Mr. Dawson's late speeches at Devonport on the corn-laws were made with my sanction or previous knowledge. When I saw, by mere accident, in some newspaper, that Mr. Dawson had expressed an opinion at Devonport in favour of an alteration of the existing corn-laws, and that an inference was drawn from this circumstance that my opinion had undergone a change, I wrote to Mr. Dawson, expressing my regret that he had not unequivocally declared to the electors that he alone was responsible for the opinions he was expressing, and that they were delivered without the slightest previous communication with me. I have not a copy of my letter, but I hold in my hand his reply, which will demonstrate the truth of what I am asserting. It is dated Devonport, 18th of January.—"I have received your letter, which I was unable to answer before, from incessant toil. It gives me great pain to think that you disapprove of any thing I have done. I was surprised to see the manner in which the few words which I uttered upon the corn-laws were taken up by the London press. If I had had any suspicion that my words would have been noticed at all, I should have made it dis-tinely understood that I was expressing my own, and my own sentiments only, but it never occurred to me that such an explanation was necessary. I said generally, that my opinion might put me in opposition to the conservative party, without mentioning any names—a caution which appeared to me sufficient to prevent any misunderstanding—which words, I believe, passed unnoticed by the London press.”

This, probably, will be conclusive as to my responsibility for Mr. Dawson's opinions on the corn-laws. On that great question my opinions remain unchanged. I adhere to those which I expressed in the discussion of last year. I did not then profess, nor do I now profess, an unchangeable adherence to the details of the existing law—a positive refusal, under any circumstances, to alter any figure of the scale which regulates the duty on foreign corn. I did profess, and I now repeat, that I consider a liberal protection to domestic agriculture, indispensable, not merely to the prosperity of agriculture, but, to the general interests of the community—that I think a graduated duty, varying inversely with the price of corn, far preferable to a fixed duty; that I object to a fixed duty, first, from the great difficulty of determining the proper amount of it on any satisfactory data; but, secondly and chiefly, because I foresee that it would be impossible to maintain that fixed duty under a very high price of corn, and that, once withdrawn, it would be extremely difficult to re-establish it. I have reserved for the last place the most important questions of all; namely, those that are involved in the consideration of the Roman Catholic Relief Bill, the policy of maintaining it, the spirit in which, if maintained, it ought to be executed, especially with reference to the administration of affairs in Ireland. The question has been repeatedly and reproachfully put to me out of this House—Do I contemplate the repeal of the Emancipation Act? Do I sanction the proceedings of those who are exciting public discontent with its enactments with a view to the re-imposition of disabilities? Sir, I should be ashamed of answering such questions, of thus implying any doubt as to the stability and permanency of the Roman Catholic Relief Bill. Is there any man living who has greater interest than I have in maintaining that Bill, or who ought to view with greater pain obstacles to its satisfactory and conciliatory operation? Can it be justly required from me to contradict every newspaper report, to disclaim the speech of some utter stranger to me or my opinions, who may choose to declare his belief, that I repent of the part I took in the passing of the Relief Bill? Repent, indeed! My repentance must either be from conviction that my motives were dishonest or corrupt, or that the course I took in 1829 was justified by no considerations of necessity or true policy. As to motives, I may say, without presumption, that I can claim credit for one virtuous act in public life. I can claim credit for having incurred, in the performance of a public duty from which I might have shrunk, not merely obloquy and vituperation, but the heavier sacrifices of the alienation of private friends, the severance of party connections, the interruption of yet nearer and more binding ties. I say nothing of the loss of power. I look with scorn and contempt on the insinuations that, having opposed Catholic Emancipation while it was profitable to oppose it, I became a convert for the sake of retaining office. Who could doubt that the certain consequence of my proposing the Relief Bill must be that which actually followed—the loss of the support of those with whom I had heretofore acted, and the inability to conduct the government? The right hon. gentleman prophesies a speedy renewal of those feelings of dissatisfaction (disgust indeed, was the word he used) with which the Tory party viewed the course which my noble friend the Duke of Wellington and myself felt it our duty to pursue in regard to the Relief Bill. I do not deny the existence of those feelings at that time. They were prompted, I believe, and not unnaturally, less by the decision to which we came, than by the circumstances under which it was our painful duty to act—the apparent reserve which we maintained until the last moment—the apparent distrust of those with whom we had previously cordially co-operated in public life. The events of those days are now becoming matters of history; and I have been supported, through all the reproaches I have endured and the sacrifices I have made, by the conviction that justice must be ultimately done, and that the light of truth will at last dispel every mist, every shade on our character that imperfect knowledge and unjust suspicion may have thrown. Why did we conceal from our friends the course we had determined to pursue? Because we had not the power, consistently with our duty, with our solemn obligations to the Crown, to declare it. Immediately after the session of 1828, my noble friend and I came to the conclusion, that it was impossible for us, as ministers, consistently with our views of the public interests, to continue our opposition to the settlement of the Catholic question. We felt it absolutely necessary that an united government should consider that question, either with a view to permanent resistance, or to early concession; and that we could not advise the attempt to form a government on the principle of permanent resistance. We felt deeply impressed with the belief that, in the state of the public mind, and in the state of parties at the time, that attempt must fail, and that its failure would only serve to aggravate every evil. It is notorious that the Sovereign in whose service we were, whom we were bound to advise, not as party-men, but as responsible ministers, had decided objections to the alteration of the then existing laws. Those objections were not abated or relaxed until a very short period before the meeting of parliament in 1829. It was not until the month of January of that year that we received permission to consider the Catholic question in Cabinet, and, if the Cabinet should be agreed, to tender our united advice as a Cabinet to his Majesty—his Majesty reserving to himself the entire power of acting upon or rejecting that advice. How was it possible for us, under such circumstances, to make any communication to our friends and supporters? My own impression in January was, that I should be permitted to relinquish office, being at the same time prepared, out of office, to make every sacrifice which the resolution zealously to co-operate with my noble friend in bringing this question to a settlement, might have required. I remained in office, because my assistance in office was absolutely indispensable; but so uncertain was I, so uncertain was my noble friend, of the tenure by which we held office, that on the very day before I brought forward the Catholic question in the House of Commons, we actually resigned it. I moved the Relief Bill in the House of Commons on the 5th of March, 1829; but it is the fact, that on the preceding day the Duke of Wellington, Lord Lyndhurst, and myself, after a long interview with his Majesty, at Windsor Castle, felt it necessary, on account of his Majesty's scruples with respect to parts of the intended measure of relief which we deemed indispensable, to tender our resignations of office. Those resignations were actually accepted, and we returned from Windsor on the evening of the 4th March, no longer ministers of the Crown. In the course of the night we were reinstated in office, having received from his Majesty the full authority which we required to proceed with the Relief Bill. Such were the circumstances under which we felt ourselves precluded from entering into communications on the subject of that bill, and of the course we meant to pursue, with a great body of attached friends and supporters, whose confidence and esteem were of inestimable value. There are some, however, who do not question the motives of our conduct in undertaking the Relief Bill, but deny the necessity for the measure. We felt the necessity imperative, not from the dread of violence, not from submission to menace, but from the fact that, in four out of five parliaments preceding 1829, the House of Commons had declared in favour of the measure, and that the influence of public opinion in this country, united with the undivided Roman Catholic feeling in Ireland, was too powerful to be resisted; or made it impossible at least to continue the system of open questions and divided cabinets. If it were no longer possible to maintain disabilities in 1829, surely to dream of imposing them now is among the wildest visions that ever disturbed the imagination. Repeal the Emancipation Bill!—and what next? Will you leave to the Roman Catholics the privileges which they held before the Relief Bill, and independently of it? But those privileges (the elective franchise in particular), and the substantial power which they conferred, were the main instruments by which the Relief Bill was carried. If you are prepared to withhold those privileges (and withhold them you must), the measure you advise is not the mere repeal of the Emancipation Act, but the retracing all the steps of gradual concession for a century back, till you remount to the penal laws, and absolute servitude. Can any man who reflects on the state of Ireland, and on its relation to this country, entertain for one moment so absurd a speculation? Then comes the question,—if the Relief Bill cannot be repealed, in what spirit shall it be executed? Shall it be nominally retained on the statute book, but be defeated, so far as civil office and distinctions are concerned, through the distrust of the Crown? I answer, decidedly not.

And is this answer now extorted from me for the first time? Is it true that I have countenanced, by silence, an opposite opinion? What could be more explicit than the declaration which I made—not in paragraphs of newspapers, but in my place in parliament, in the month of April of last year? I then observed,—“As the law has decreed a civil equality to all classes in Ireland, without reference to religious distinctions, the Crown ought not, by the interposition of its prerogative, to create practically a difference which the law does not recognise. I think the Crown ought to act on the principle of the law, and not make the religious opinions entertained by any man the ground of disqualification for the exercise of civil functions.”

I then claimed for myself what I now claim—the same right which you exercise, and which every government ought to exercise—that of preferring its own friends and supporters to such appointments as imply mutual trust and confidence, and which could not be usefully filled for the public service, without a concurrence in political opinions. But I added,—“I have never taunted the noble lord with selecting Roman Catholics for such appointments. I defy him to produce the instance in which I have sought thus to limit him in the exercise of his patronage.”

I adhere to these opinions; and having avowed them, not once, but repeatedly in parliament, I consider myself relieved from the necessity of recording them, during the recess, in letters to newspapers, or speeches after dinner. I readily subscribe to the position, that the Crown ought to act on the great principle of the law; but, in fully recognising the principle of civil equality as the rule of action for the Crown, I beg distinctly to declare that I consider it an abuse and perversion of that rule to patronise agitators, because they are Roman Catholics. I would place Roman Catholics, in this respect, on a footing of equality with Protestants; and, as I would withhold grace and favour from the Protestant agitator, so would I, without hesitation, withhold them from the Roman Catholic. There is but one qualification which I would place on the principle of civil equality, and that is a qualification distinctly recognised by the law, recognised by every advocate of the Roman Catholic claims; recognised and fully assented to by the Roman Catholics themselves. It is this, that concurrently with the enjoyment of civil privilege by the Roman Catholics, the Protestant Church shall be inviolably maintained as the Established Church, and protected in the possession of its rights and privileges as such. The respected authority of Mr. Grattan was decisive and unvarying in favour of the maintenance of this principle; every bill which Mr. Grattan brought in for the relief of the Roman Catholics recited, almost ostentatiously, in its preamble, the absolute right of the Established Church to protection: his dying declarations were in favour of the combined principle of civil equality, and the maintenance of the established religion in Ireland, as well as in this country. I will concede no support by the concession or compromise of that principle. I am accused, however, of having acted, in respect to the administration of Ireland, on a different system from that which I profess. I have had but a brief connection with the government of Ireland since the passing of the Relief Bill, but is it just to draw an unfavourable inference from the experience of that connection? In 1835, I was called upon to constitute a government for Ireland. Of whom was it composed? Of Lord Haddington, as Lord-lieutenant, an uniform and able supporter of the Roman Catholic claims, and the intimate friend of Mr. Canning; of Sir Henry Hardinge, as Chief Secretary, the friend and relation of the late Lord Londonderry. For the office of Lord Chancellor, I selected the chief ornament of the bar of England, a man conspicuous for the mildness and moderation of his opinions, who, in the course of his short career in Ireland, conciliated the esteem and respect of the bar in that country, and the warm approbation of his political opponents. My Attorney-general had been the Attorney-general of Lord Melbourne; my Under Secretary of State had been his; my Solicitor-general was Mr. Pennefather,—and can any man hear the mention of that name without admitting its claim to honour and respect? What better indications could I give of the intention to govern Ireland with justice, with impartiality, and with kindness, than such appointments as those to the chief offices that constituted the government? You complain of the injustice and absurdity of condemning the existing government of Ireland for trivial acts, such, for instance, as the invitation of Mr. O'Connell to the table of the Lord-lieutenant. Did you extend that forbearance to Lord Haddington's government? Is it not the fact, that the chief, almost the only accusation that you could find to prefer against him was, that some vagabond waved an orange flag in a Dublin theatre over the box of the Lord-lieutenant? Do I make light of the studied exhibition of a flag, if intended as an insult? No; but I complain of the grievous injustice of making Lord Haddington responsible for an act of which he was utterly unconscious, and which he was the first to reprobate. I have done. I have fulfilled the purpose for which I rose, by specifying the grounds on which I withhold my confidence from the present government, and by declaring the course I mean to pursue on the great questions of public policy, on which the public mind is divided. I cannot answer the question you put to me, "What principles will prevail if a new government be formed?"—but I can answer for it, that if the principles I profess do not prevail, of that government I shall form no part. It may be, that by the avowal of my opinions, I shall forfeit the confidence of some who, under mistaken impressions, may have been hitherto disposed to follow me. I shall deeply regret the withdrawal of that confidence; but I would infinitely prefer to incur the penalty of its withdrawal, than to retain it under false pretences, or under misapprehensions which silence on my part might confirm. It may be, that the principles I profess cannot be reduced to practice, and that a government attempting the execution of them would not meet with adequate support from the House of Commons: still I shall not abandon them. I shall not seek to compensate the threatened loss of confidence on this side of the House, by the faintest effort to conciliate the support of the other. I shall steadily persevere in the course which I have uniformly pursued since the passing of the Reform Bill—content with the substantial power which I shall yet exercise—indifferent as to office, so far as personal feelings or personal objects are concerned—ready, if required, to undertake it, whatever be its difficulties—refusing to accept it on conditions inconsistent with personal honour;—disdaining to hold it by the tenure by which it is at present held. Every stimulus to continued exertion will remain. Every distinction that my ambition aspires to will be gained. I shall have the cordial co-operation of many friends whom I honour and esteem, and with whom I have acted from my first entrance into the troubled career of political life; with these friends also, not less honoured and esteemed, who, having made the noblest sacrifices of power and political connection to public principle, have been united with me by an overpowering sense of public duty. Above all other encouragements, above all other distinctions, I shall have the proud satisfaction of acting in entire and cordial concert with that illustrious man on whose right hand I have stood throughout the varying fortunes of the great contests of recent years, who is still devoting faculties, unimpaired by time, to the service of a grateful country, and achieving a reputation as a statesman, not inferior to his pre-eminent fame as a warrior, through the exercise of the same qualities, "rare in their separate excellence, wonderful in their combination," which ensured his military triumphs; the same acuteness, the same sagacity, the same patience, the same true courage, the love of justice, the love of truth, the noble simplicity of mind without fear, and without reproach. Encouraged by such an example, and supported by such aid—holding opinions which I believe to be the opinions of the vast majority of those intelligent and powerful classes which used to influence, and which ought to influence the constitution and the march of governments—the clergy, the magistracy, the commercial classes, the yeomanry of this country,—I can hardly believe that such opinions are incapable of practical execution. But be that as it may, of this I am sure, that they must so far prevail, that he who holds them will be enabled effectually to assist you (the government) whenever you resolve to refuse improper and dangerous concessions; and, if you are inclined to make them, to offer those impediments to your downward progress, which you will call obstructions to public business—which the country will consider the real guarantee that this free and limited monarchy shall not be converted, through the folly or the weakness of its rulers, into an unqualified and unmitigated democracy.

PRINCE ALBERT'S ANNUITY.

FEBRUARY 3, 1840.

Colonel Sibthorp proposed a clause, to the following effect, in Prince Albert's Annuity Bill—That should his highness reside for a less period than six consecutive months in each year within the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, or ally himself in marriage with any other than a Protestant, or himself cease to profess and adhere to the Protestant religion, such annuity shall wholly cease and determine.

SIR ROBERT PEEL:—I am perfectly satisfied of the purity of the motives which have actuated my hon. and gallant friend in bringing forward his present motion, and I think, moreover, that it is consistent with the most perfect respect and loyalty to the Sovereign, to take the course which my hon. and gallant friend has adopted, but at the same time I am bound to say, that I for one, cannot support his motion. Sir, I cordially supported the proposition of my hon. and gallant friend for reducing the grant to Prince Albert from £50,000 to £30,000; not, however, from any mistrust, or a want of confidence in Prince Albert, but because, on looking at the whole of the circumstances of the case, I thought £30,000 the proper sum to be allowed. I stated, then, that £30,000 was a sufficient sum to give to Prince Albert in the event of the death of her Majesty, an event which I, in common with all her Majesty's subjects, should deeply deplore—an event which I do not and will not anticipate—and I still am of the opinion that such a sum is a reasonable allowance to make in case Prince Albert should survive her Majesty. I went, however, further than this, and I said, that, in case Prince Albert should become the father of a family, then I thought £30,000 would be an inadequate allowance, and that I had no doubt, in such a case, the House would be ready to consider the propriety of voting an addition to the £30,000. Sir, it is infinitely better not to show any distrust, and under any circumstances, I said it was not only needful, but wise on the part of this House to evince unlimited confidence in, and a total absence of mistrust towards Prince Albert. I could, Sir, if it were necessary, assign reasons in detail to show that that part of the proviso of my hon. and gallant friend with respect to residence could not be defined, and, in short, that any attempt to define it, would gain no useful object. There can, I think, be little doubt that after his connection with this country, Prince Albert would, in the event alluded to, be most likely to take up his residence here; and hence it is that I beg to suggest to my hon. and gallant friend, that it is perfectly impossible for me to agree with this part of the proposition which he has submitted for the consideration of the committee. The proviso then goes on to state that the annuity shall cease and determine in case his Serene Highness “shall cease to profess and adhere to the Protestant religion as by law established within these realms.” Now, sir, it is not at all required that the consort of her Majesty should profess the religion as by law established in these realms. It is not necessary that he should be a member of the Church of England. That is not an indispensable qualification to enable a foreign prince to become the consort of her Majesty. It would be hard of you to propose to a prince who belonged to another form of Protestantism, that because he married her Majesty, he should become a member of the Church by law established in these realms. I do not know to what peculiar Protestant faith Prince Albert belongs, but suppose him to be a member of the Lutheran Church. That is clearly not a disqualification to his marrying her Majesty; and, if such be the case, would it not be hard to say to him, that, being a Lutheran, you may marry her Majesty, but in the event of her death, you shall not be entitled to your annuity, unless you are a member of the Church as established by law in these realms? I think, Sir, it is not necessary for me to say more on this point, and I have now only to repeat, that I gave my vote for the £30,000, because I did not wish it to appear that we had any want of confidence in, or any mistrust of, the illustrious prince who is about to be so intimately connected with the destinies of this country.

Colonel Sibthorp ultimately withdrew his motion, the clauses of the bill were agreed to, and the House resumed.

PRIVILEGE—STOCKDALE v. HANSARD.

MARCH 6, 1840.

In the debate on Lord John Russell's motion, " That leave be given to bring in a Bill to give summary protection to persons employed in the publication of parliamentary papers,—

SIR ROBERT PEEL was surprised to find that the hon. member who had just sat down (Mr. Gisborne), would not be able to fight under his banner now, in the effort to relieve the House from its present difficulty by means of a legislative measure, because from the very first he had said, that, so imperfect as their powers were to maintain those absolutely essential privileges, he did foresee that they would ultimately be obliged to proceed to legislation. He had said the House ought to support its privileges by all the powers which it possessed; he had at the same time told them that he anticipated failure, but that he considered that no reason why every effort should not be tried to vindicate their privileges. He foresaw that at last they would have to resort to a legislative measure, and he did suggest the bringing in of a bill to settle the question. But an argument was now used, by which it was contended, that if this question were to be settled by legislation, all the other privileges of the House ought to be confirmed in the same manner. Now, he should have no objection to such a course, if he could find a means of defining all the other privileges of the House, but no other privilege was called in question, and he could not anticipate that any other would be called in question. If any other were to be called in question, he should then propose to take such efficient measures as would be adapted to the circumstances. But if he were to attempt to settle the privileges of the House, by Act of Parliament, there would be great danger of omitting some essential privilege in such an enactment, and of thereby implying that no such privilege existed. That was his objection to any attempt to legislate upon every privilege of the House. In assenting to take the course now proposed to be taken, he adhered as strongly as ever to his original opinions upon this subject; he still thought an unlimited power of publication necessary to the proper discharge of the functions of the House; he still was of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench was altogether unwarrantable and irreconcilable with reason, and that it did not at all correspond with the grounds upon which it professed to be founded. He had distinct declarations from his right hon. friend, who had filled the office of Lord Chancellor of Ireland, for whose opinions he had the highest respect, and also from another learned friend of his, for whom he had equal respect, and who was one of the highest and most distinguished ornaments of his profession, not only among those of the present day, but of any time whatever—he had from those hon. and learned friends of his, a distinct declaration, that they thought the House of Commons possessed the right of publishing its proceedings. The difficulties, therefore, that had arisen out of this question, were not to be attributed to any extravagant or unfounded pretensions urged by the House of Commons, but to the judgment which had been pronounced by the court of law. The House was bound not to resort to legislation until it had, in the first place, tried how far the powers which it undoubtedly possessed were sufficient for the vindication of its privileges. And already the House had established one privilege by the course which it had taken. The power of imprisonment for breach of privilege was now established beyond question. They had compelled the court of law to recognize this power, and it was one which, having established, he would go on to exercise, if he did not expect still more effectually to protect the right of free publication by other means. If he failed in the attempt, he did not see that the failure would place the House in any worse situation. Indeed, he doubted whether the attempt and the failure would not fortify the House in the exercise of those powers which it now possessed, which he considered insufficient for the due vindication of its privileges. These powers he considered to be incomplete and imperfect, and their imperfection was the sole reason that induced him to resort to legislation. In the first place, they were imperfect as regarded time, the power of the House being limited by the duration of the session; the law denied the House the power of prolonging the penalty of imprisonment beyond the end of the session; during the recess, therefore, the printers of the House would be liable to be continually harassed by actions at law, and, in consequence of the improvement that had taken place in the forms of pleading, those actions might now be brought to an issue much sooner than they could formerly have been. Now, the House had resolved not to plead, and it could not rely upon the protection of the court; was it then fit or decent that the printer to the House of Commons should, during the recess, be harassed by these proceedings for executing the orders of the House? Was it not a great, a monstrous indignity? He was told the House had a remedy—that it might be adjourned and not prorogued; but was it necessary to deprive the Crown of the great constitutional power of proroguing parliament, in order to protect the printer of the House of Commons against such an individual as had originated these proceedings? Could a greater degradation be imagined to any constitutional authority than that it should be compelled altogether to abandon the power of prorogation, and resort to adjournment, for the purpose of protecting the servant of the House of Commons? What right would the House have to ask the Crown to render permanent the sittings of parliament? It was surely better to resort to legislation, than to such inconvenient expedients as these. His hon. and learned friend, the member for Exeter, had asked, why the House had not appealed from the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench by writ of error? It was indeed said, that a different opinion from that given by the Court of Queen's Bench was now held by the judges; but let the House consider whether, if any change had taken place in the inclination of the minds of the judges, the discussions that had taken place in that House had not contributed to bring about such a change; and then let the House recollect, that the writ of error must have been brought immediately after the second action had been disposed of. He doubted whether the issue of the proposed appeal would, at that period, have been in favour of the House. The expediency of the course that had been taken must be judged by the state of things which existed then, and not by any change which might be supposed to have taken place since. If, then, the House had appealed, and the result of the appeal had been unfavourable, what was to be done? Ought the House to have stopped there, or to have appealed again, and to have submitted their privileges to the decision of the House of Lords? He knew there were many who now found fault with the course which the House had adopted, and advised an appeal to the fifteen judges, but who, nevertheless, recommended the House to stop there, and not to permit the House of Lords, in its judicial capacity, to give the final decision upon their privileges. But it appeared to him that, whatever might now be the result of an appeal to the fifteen judges, there was not, at the time when such an appeal must have been made, sufficient probability of a favourable result to justify the House in taking that course. The power of the House, therefore, according to the existing law, was limited in regard to time. Now, he asked, whether this power, while it lasted, was sufficient to prevent the plaintiff in an action from levying damages? They had committed the plaintiff, the plaintiff's attorney, the attorney's clerk, and also his son; they had exercised the powers which they possessed largely, and without much restriction: but could they practically prevent the plaintiff from getting possession of damages? If they could not, what was to be done? He saw the difficulties that would attend legislation upon the subject, but if, notwithstanding the privileges of the House, every one had it in his power to levy damages of £600, for a libel contained in the papers published by their orders, would they not give parties encouragement to prosecute actions against the printer of the House? He was told he ought to go on in the course in which he had commenced, and he was ready to do so if any effective security could be obtained against the recurrence of such proceedings; but if Mr. Stockdale got out of prison at the end of the session with the £600 in his pocket, he would, in all probability, be very well satisfied with the result. Suppose, in the action now pending, damages were given of fivefold the amount of the former, how could the House prevent the plaintiff from receiving those damages? And then, at the end of the session, what a degradation it would be when the House, after all the proceedings which it had taken, had to vote a sum of £8,000 or £9,000 to defray the expenses of those actions! For the House could never be so unjust as to say to their printer, "Wait till we get the money from the sheriff, and then we will repay you the expenses which you have been put to for obeying our orders." The House could not get the money from the sheriff, and therefore it must be raised by a vote of the public money. In the mean time the servant of the House, an innocent man, was treated like a criminal, his goods were seized, and £600 damages were levied; the loss, indeed, could not be estimated by the mere amount of damages, for the annoyance and anxiety to which Mr. Hansard had been subjected must also be taken into consideration. A vote of public money for such a purpose would surely be a degradation to the House. Well, then, could the House avoid it? Had it any means of escaping from the necessity of such a vote? If it had, well and good; if not, was it not expedient to try whether it was not possible to give efficient protection to their servant by means of legislation? It was said, that by legislating on this particular privilege they would prejudice the rest; he admitted that such an argument was deserving of consideration, but why should not a balance of inconveniences be struck in this case, as in all other human affairs, and why should not the course to be pursued be decided by the result of that balance? It was very well to say the House ought to go on with the conflict, but was not a succession of conflicts with such persons degrading to the House? Was it fit that their time, which belonged to the public, should be wasted, night after night, in such contests? Consider, too, the constitution of the assembly engaged in them; a single judge could effectually enforce and carry out the resolution to which he had come, but, in the House, every act, every exercise of power, must depend upon the will of the majority. That was one of the inconveniences arising out of the constitution of a popular assembly: there would always be a difference of opinion, there would always be some opinion favourable to the party against whom proceedings were taken, and who would be encouraged by such opinions to resist the authority of the House. Thus, a man who could obtain no respect in the circle in which he lived, was raised by his conflict with the House to such an elevation, that his private character and his motives were wholly lost sight of. He was only regarded as the asserter of a great public principle, and found ranged upon his side, men who entertained the greatest contempt for his private character, while men of the highest honour were co-operating with him, and this night after night. He (Sir R. Peel) doubted whether the power of imprisonment which the House possessed was as effectual as it was considered to be; he doubted whether this exercise of it would not involve the House in a series of contests, perhaps interminable. Let them not rely on the effect of committing the first counsel who appeared against them; others would come forward,—for the spirit of party, and the desire of distinction were equally strong with the fear of punishment, especially when the punishment was inflicted in pursuance of what they would consider to be an unjust sentence. He doubted, therefore, whether imprisonment would produce the effect expected from it; but supposing that it would, still, if it were possible to legislate on the subject, consistently with the safe custody of the other privileges of the House, he would much rather make the attempt, than continue to be engaged in these nightly contests. Much, no doubt, would depend upon the form of the measure, but he gave his cordial assent to the proposal to bring in a bill, reserving to himself, of course, the right of expressing his opinion upon its details. He could not think their privileges would be endangered by passing such a bill. Reference had been made to the measure which had been passed to regulate the trial of election petitions; the House, on the occasion of passing that measure, had asked the House of Lords to concur in giving greater powers to the House of Commons; and yet he could not consider that their privileges had suffered any damage by this appeal to the other House, or that their powers were less complete than before. The same course had been previously taken, when the Grenville Act was passed, to remove the great embarrassment which had previously existed in the trial of election petitions, and yet this act had never been considered prejudicial to the privileges of the House. He did not see why any greater prejudice should arise from inviting the House of Lords to co-operate with the House of Commons in passing such a measure as was now proposed. Suppose the House of Lords attached to the bill any unreasonable condition; suppose, for instance, it insisted on an abandonment of the right of selling papers on the part of the House of Commons; it would be perfectly in the power of the House to reject such an addition to the bill, and if it were insisted upon, to refuse the bill altogether, and to fall back on the powers which the House had already exercised, and which would be in nowise injured by such an attempt. They had proved that they possessed the power of committing the plaintiff and the sheriff; why would they not be equally at liberty to do so again, if they failed in their attempt at legislation? If the House could put other powers which it claimed, in the more definite form of a legislative enactment, he doubted whether their exercise would not be rendered more acceptable to the public by the adoption of such a course, and he could not help thinking that the attempt to take such a course on the present occasion would, if the House of Lords refused to pass a proper measure, fortify the House of Commons in the forbearing, moderate, and temperate vindication of its privileges, by such means as it now possessed. He hoped, however, that the House of Lords, seeing the practical embarrassment that had arisen, and seeing that the difficulty that had arisen was owing to no fault on the part of the House of Commons, but solely to the judgment which the court of law had thought fit to pronounce, would give the House of Commons such a measure as would be acceptable to it, and as would enable them effectually to exercise those privileges which were essential to the due discharge of its duties. He at first thought that it would have been better for this bill to have originated in the other House, but he had now changed that opinion, for he did not think that the House of Lords could have originated such a measure, without a previous communication with the House of Commons, and it appeared a more dignified proceeding for the House of Commons to originate this bill, than to ask for a free conference with the other House for the purpose of stating the inconveniences to which the House of Commons was now exposed, and asking relief at the hands of the House of Lords. He very much doubted whether the best course was not to present to the House of Lords such a bill as they considered would be the most effectual for the better protection of the right of publication, and, at the same time, most consistent with the maintenance of their other privileges. On these grounds, which he had always entertained and expressed,—admitting his apprehension that in the result their powers would be found incomplete,—his unwillingness, and he had never disguised it, to proceed to that step which he considered alien to the feelings and spirit of the present age, he meant committing the judges to prison—the unfitting collision between the highest authorities in the State; for after all, the effectual protection of their privileges in this contest must depend on the assistance of the Crown, they must address the Crown, and they must also rely in some measure on another branch of the legislature; yet, believing that, unless something effectual were done, the House would have to enter into contest, not merely with ministerial officers, but into personal conflict with the judges themselves,—believing that public opinion was decidedly in favour of this privilege, that the House of Commons, as the great inquisition of the country, the inquirer into abuses, the detector of corruption, the originator of wise legislation, should not be deprived of powers it had possessed for 150 years, to publish the grounds of its decisions,—believing that sound public opinion, though partially differing as to the best mode of vindicating it, was in favour of the House upon the main question, and he thought it most important, he had never concealed it, that the representatives of public opinion should be backed by that opinion, as to the possession of the privilege,—firmly believing that public opinion, the sound part of it, formed on deliberation, would rather be in favour of permanent assured protection to their officers, by the intervention of the law, than that they should maintain it by what might otherwise be unavoidable,—personal conflict with the judges, thereby setting an example of lowering the authority of the bench, on the respect and veneration for which, depended the best interests of the country;—on these grounds, professing a determination to look narrowly at the provisions and recital of the noble lord's bill, and foreseeing the immense difficulty of practically maintaining their privilege under present circumstances, the sacrifice of public time that must be unavoidable, the constant conflicts between the House and perhaps the lowest member of the community with whom they might hereafter have to deal, he was inclined to think that the wiser course was to submit to the House of Lords that measure which, on the one hand, was considered most likely to give effect to the right of publication, and on the other, not draw into question other privileges which were equally essential to the due discharge of their legislative functions.

Leave given, and the bill brought in and read a first time.

THE CORN-LAWS.

APRIL 3, 1840.

In the third night's debate on Mr. Villiers's motion, "That the House resolve itself into a committee of the whole House, to take into consideration the Act 9 George IV., regulating the import of foreign grain,"—

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, the hon. gentleman had, he thought, mistaken the intention of those on that (the Conservative side) of the House, who had indicated by a cordial cheer, their sincere approbation of the sentiment expressed by him, and he must say, he regretted to perceive that the hon. gentleman, when he uttered that sentiment, appeared so totally unconscious of the appropriateness of it. The hon. gentleman seemed to think that the cheer meant to convey some kind of taunt or imputation on him, for having referred to a dissolution or some other political event, and he said that he thought the period was arrived when those who were entrusted with the functions of legislation and government, ought seriously to consider this question—that there was a great anxiety in the public mind on the subject—that great doubt and anxiety pervaded the public mind; and then, again, the hon. member said, that a period was arrived when those who were responsible for the conduct of the government and of legislation, should seriously apply themselves to this question—that if they preferred the maintenance of the existing law, they should state their determination accordingly—that if they were in favour of the repeal of the Corn-laws, that then they should compose the agitation of the country, by sending forth a measure of repeal; and that, if they were in favour of modification, then that they should, as a government, prescribe the limit and extent of that modification, and convey to the country the impression that the government were united upon that great question, which was now becoming more and more environed by practical difficulties, increased by the apparent discordance of the most important members of the government. The hon. gentleman's remark was perfectly just—so much so, as almost to lead to the inference, that the hon. member was reading an intentional lecture to his right hon. friends around him—that he meant to convey a covert satire on their indecision and vacillation, and to teach them the important truth, that a period had arrived when those entrusted with the functions of government ought to speak some common language on this subject. For how much did it increase the difficulties of this question, when the right hon. gentleman, the President of the Board of Trade, declared it to be his fixed opinion, that it was absolutely necessary to the increase of our exports of manufactures to the continent, that we should take the corn grown on the continent; and when almost on the same day, the First Lord of the Treasury said, "Alter the Corn-laws if you please, but foreign countries will not be induced by it to take your manufactures in greater quantities." Why, when the head of the Treasury department entertained and avowed these opinions, and when the head of the commercial department entertained and avowed opinions that were directly the opposite, was it to be matter of surprise that agitation should have greatly increased, and that the practical difficulties attending the question should have been greatly aggravated? And this it was that caused the sentiments expressed by the hon. gentleman opposite, to have been received with such cordial approbation on that side of the House. His wish was to discuss this great question in no other temper than that which was befitting its great and its extraordinary merits; but, while he did so, he could not but refer to the unfair, to the unworthy artifices that had been resorted to for stirring up the passions of the multitude, and of exciting their temper; but, while he did this, he, at the same time, would not identify with such unworthy advocates of the cause, the great manufacturing interests of the country. He was not one who would depreciate either their numbers or their importance; and he would say, that no indignation that arose in his mind against those who, instead of promoting, were, he believed, really injuring their own cause—he would say, that no indignation with regard to them should prevent him from giving to a subject connected with the subsistence of the people, and affecting the permanent and most vital interests of the country, that calm and that serious deliberation to which it was so fully entitled. He thought, then, that the best course that he could pursue for the purpose of limiting, as far as he possibly could, the observations with which he meant to trouble the House, would be to consider the main arguments which had been chiefly relied upon by those who had addressed them in favour of a repeal of the Corn-laws. He wished to evade nothing; but at the same time, to follow out the desultory details of a discussion which had now continued for three nights, would certainly lead him into arguments beyond the limits which he had prescribed to himself. He wished to state, in the first instance, what it was that he considered to be the main arguments—and he could only say, that if any one suggested to him that he was giving an unfair summary of the arguments, he was perfectly ready to correct it, and to add what to others might appear to be an argument of primary importance. But he thought that he did not state the arguments unfairly, when he represented the sense and purport of them to be this. First, that the operation of the existing Corn-laws had led to a great deal of bullion from the bank, and that a material derangement of the currency took place in consequence in the years 1838 and 1839. Second, that there had been a great fluctuation in the price of corn, caused by the operation of the Corn-laws, deranging commercial speculations, the varying price of grain having a tendency to derange the manufacturing interest. And, third, that the experience of the last year had shown a great depreciation of the manufacturing interest of this country; that there had been a great decline of internal consumption, and a great depreciation of the manufacturing interest, and that the decline in internal consumption, and the depreciation of the manufacturing interest, were to be attributed to the operation of the Corn-laws. He thought that he had thus stated fairly the three leading articles which were mainly relied upon against the present Corn-laws. And now, first, with respect to the derangement of the monetary system of the country, and the drain of gold, and that drain being attributed to the Corn-laws—that a sudden demand for corn had led to an immense importation, and that in consequence of the suddenness of the demand, there was no corresponding export of manufactured articles; that the corn imported had necessarily to be paid for in gold, and that the stock of gold in the bank must necessarily be exhausted. They could not deny that there was a derangement in the course of the years 1838 and 1839; but, then, when it was assumed that the Corn-laws must necessarily be the cause, he denied that inference. He denied that the Corn-laws had caused all this—that they caused that demand for corn which necessarily led to a derangement of the monetary system, and a drain on the specie in the bank. In the first place, the same derangement took place in other countries, where it was impossible that this cause could have operated. The same derangement took place in France. There had been the same derangement in the monetary system; and there had been the same drain for bullion, which involved necessarily a suspension of cash payments, in the United States, under circumstances which showed that it was perfectly impossible that it could be attributed to any cause like the operation of the Corn-laws. It was perfectly plain that those derangements might take place from other causes than the operation of the Corn-laws, and the suddenness of a demand for corn. He said that there had been the very same derangements in this country, when it was utterly impossible that the Corn-laws could have effected them. In 1825 there had been a great derangement of the monetary system—there had been a great drain of bullion, and this country then appeared to be on the eve of suspending cash payments. He was one of those who at that time advised the bank to pay away every portion of its bullion (to its last shilling) before it suspended cash payments. Nothing, in his opinion, could be more destructive to the bank than the suspension of cash payments, and, in his opinion, there would have been less of panic by the bank endeavouring to the very utmost to fulfil its obligations. Such was the condition of the country in 1825, when the state of bullion in the bank led to the greatest alarm. Now, in 1825, it was utterly impossible that the operation of the Corn-laws could have contributed to produce the drain he had spoken of. In 1825 there was no import of foreign corn which could have produced that drain. In 1823, in 1824, and in 1825, the whole amount of foreign wheat imported was 200,000 quarters; and yet it was during that period that the currency had been greatly deranged, and that the drain of specie had arisen. The causes were quite unconnected with the operation of the Corn-law. In 1836 there was the same derangement of the monetary system, and there had been a great drain of specie. In 1836 the drain of bullion was this:—From July 1836, to December in the same year, the bullion in the bank had diminished from £7,362,000 to £4,545,000. Could the Corn-laws have caused that drain? In 1836, there had been no import of foreign corn whatever. In 1833, 1834, and 1835, the total and entire consumption of foreign corn was not 200,000 quarters. The Corn-laws had no operation whatever, and yet there had been a great derangement of the currency, and a great drain of specie. He pushed that argument no further than this—that it could not be asserted with certainty that the Corn-laws caused the late derangement, because he had shown that the same derangement had happened in countries wherein the Corn-laws could not have produced that derangement, and that it did happen in this country so recently as the years 1835 and 1836, when the Corn-laws had nothing to do either with causing a derangement of the currency, or a drain of specie. But then it must be admitted, that in the years 1838 and 1839, there were three concurrent events—there was the derangement in the currency, there was the drain of specie, and there was an immense import of foreign corn; and it was possible that the Corn-laws—he said it was possible that the Corn-laws might have been the cause, in this instance, of that which was attributed in former periods to other causes. He said that it was possible—he knew that it was very easy to assume that they must be the cause. He would be glad that hon. gentlemen who cheered would prove it. He had heard many in this debate make assertions which they had put forward in former debates; but he did not think that he had heard arguments from them, and, therefore, he was anxious to have heard from them something like argument, rather than an inarticulate cheer, as if that could carry conviction to intelligent minds. That the operation of the Corn-laws might have some effect upon the currency, it was impossible to deny. But then the question was, not whether the suddenness of the demand was an evil, of that there could be no doubt; but whether they could take any means of defence against it? It was impossible to deny that it must have a partial effect; but then, seeing that the price of the article, and seeing that the quantity depended as well upon the uncertainty as the vicissitude of the seasons, how could they take any precaution by human prudence or human legislation against the recurrences of sudden necessity. If hon. gentlemen took it for granted that the Corn-laws must have been the cause, he could only say, that he had read with great attention the statements of those who were most prominent in discussing the operation of both currency and Corn-laws, and he certainly did not find that they attributed to the Corn-laws exclusively the derangement of our monetary system, which had, unfortunately, taken place. On the contrary, they distinctly assigned other causes as having had a very material influence in producing that effect. Of course, the parties on whom, in a matter of this kind, he should chiefly rely, were those who now put themselves forward as the most strenuous opponents of the existing Corn-laws, and the advocates of their total and unqualified repeal; and he thought that, when he found them assigning other causes as having contributed to produce the state of things to which he had alluded, he was entitled to attach great weight to their authority. He would mention particularly the president of the Chamber of Commerce at Manchester, who had supplanted the member for Kendal, on account of the unsatisfactory character of the speeches delivered by him last year. Surely no hon. gentleman opposite would contest the authority of the president of the Manchester Chamber of Commerce, the representative commercial body of the greatest manufacturing district in the empire. The president of this body was a gentleman of the name of Smith, a most active opponent of the Corn-laws, and, he believed, the chairman of the convention which was now sitting in London. In the course of this very year, the local body over which that gentleman presided, and himself at the head of it, had come forward, at the same time that they were agitating against the Corn-laws, to give their opinion as to the specific causes of the monetary derangement of the country. He wanted to show hon. gentlemen opposite, that whatever might be their opinions as to the extensive operation of the Corn-laws, the chief agitators against them assigned perfectly different and distinct reasons, combined certainly with that operation, for the derangement of the currency complained of. If he attempted to give a summary of this manifesto, which was a report from the Chamber of Commerce at Manchester, it might be thought that he would present an unfair view of the arguments, and, therefore, he should prefer making use of the summary, given by a gentleman who was also an opponent of the Corn-laws, who had written with great ability on the subject of currency and banking, and whose opinions were entitled to the greatest weight from the respectability of his private character,—he meant Mr. Jones Lloyd. And this was the account which Mr. Jones Lloyd gave of the grounds which the Chamber of Commerce had for impeaching the Bank of England, and the reasons they assigned for the late derangement of the currency, and the drain of gold. Mr. Lloyd states the report to be this:—

“1. That the alternations of excitement and depression in trade since 1835, and especially the events of this character which have occurred during the years 1838 and 1839, are to be attributed entirely to mismanagement of the circulation.

“2. That this mismanagement of the circulation is altogether the result of the improper measures of the Bank of England.

“3. That the cause of this misconduct of the Bank of England is to be found in the undue privileges possessed by the bank; in the available capital on the part of the bank, which renders it impossible for it to conduct its affairs with advantage to the interests of the manufacturing and commercial community; and in the fact, that the power over the currency is vested in twenty-six irresponsible individuals for the exclusive benefit of a body of bank proprietors.”

That, then, was Mr. Jones Lloyd's summary of the reasons alleged by the Chamber of Commerce for the late monetary derangement. Mr. Jones Lloyd stated reasons perfectly distinct from the Corn laws, and he did not make the Corn-laws mainly responsible for the derangement of the currency. Mr. Jones Lloyd said, that the Corn-laws increased the evil; but then that there were other causes not noticed by the Chamber of Commerce which materially increased the derangement, and the principal one was this, that the Bank of England did not exercise, and could not exercise, a control over the issues of joint-stock banks and private banks; that when the bank of England controlled its own issues to act on the exchanges, the tendency of joint-stock banks and of private banks, was not to correspond with that conduct pursued by the Bank of England; and Mr. Jones Lloyd observed, that the Chamber of Commerce in Manchester was in error, not to have noticed that want of control in the Bank of England. He used this language—“But if the management of the circulation has been vicious during 1833 and 1839, who, we must inquire, has been the principal sinner? Look at the returns of the country issuers; you will there observe a progressive and large increase of issues through the whole period; an increase steadily maintained against decreasing bullion, and unsanctioned by any corresponding increase on the part of the Bank of England.”

Mr. Jones Lloyd did not ascribe the evils of the currency to the Corn-laws, but to the manner in which functions that were incompatible with each other were left to the Bank of England. When Mr. Jones Lloyd said this, was he then not justified in assuming, that though the Corn-laws might have aided in the present derangement, yet there were other and more peculiar causes in operation tending to disturb the currency? Nothing, then, could be more unwise than for that House to act on the assumption that the Corn-laws were the entire cause of the derangement. That was the answer he gave to the hon. gentleman who said he was anxious to hear from him, what other cause there could be than the Corn-laws for the monetary derangement of the country. He gave to the question a satisfactory answer, not founded upon any assumption of his own reasoning, but upon the opinions of those who took an active part against the Corn-laws, and who attributed it to the banks and to other causes. It was not then to Corn-laws that they were to attribute it, but to the arrangement respecting the control over the issue. [Mr. Clay—It was to be attributed to both.] He was glad he had been able to get the hon. gentleman to go so far. Upon the previous night, the hon. gentleman had said, the derangement was owing exclusively to the Corn-laws—now he was for dividing the responsibility; perhaps if he (Sir R. Peel) had spoken on Monday night, instead of the hon. gentleman laying the whole blame upon Corn-laws, he would have declared they had nothing to do with it. He did not deny that Corn-laws would aggravate the evil, but he denied that they were the exclusive cause of it. To deny that their tendency was to increase pre-existing evils arising from other causes, would be un-candid and unwise. He was not satisfied that an alteration in the existing Corn-laws would afford them a remedy, or that the evil was one that could be corrected by any legislation on the subject. He thought that quite impossible in an article like corn, which was not an article of manufacture, and the supply of which could be accommodated to the demand for it. Corn was an article which depended upon the dispensation of Providence—it was an article of production which it was impossible to control by human legislation—it was impossible to prevent in time of scarcity a sudden demand for corn from foreign countries; and he greatly doubted, if they discouraged the production of corn at home—if they became dependent for their supply upon foreign countries—if then a time of scarcity should arrive—if there should be a succession of bad seasons—if there should be a deficiency of produce not merely in this country, but in other countries of Europe, which were frequently, if not generally, subject to as much vicissitude of season as this country—then he doubted whether they would not have great cause to regret the derangement of the home produce—seeing that there was a limited supply at home, and that they were dependent on foreigners, who, influenced by no hostility, but pressed by necessity to provide for the wants of their own people, would find imposed upon them the necessity of interdicting the export of that corn which they required for their own use. Under such circumstances, he feared that there would be a still more sudden demand, and still more deficient supply, and that the evils of deranging the currency, and of a drain of bullion, would come upon them at a moment of deficiency and of scarcity, and when they would be forced to encounter evils far greater than any that now existed. The next objection which was made to the Corn-laws was the great fluctuation which they caused in the price of corn, and the great uncertainty which they introduced into the traffic in corn, and the consequent derangement they caused in the commercial intercourse between this country and foreign powers. Now, neither upon this point would he pretend to deny that there had been great fluctuation in the price of corn, greater fluctuation than he wished to see in an article of such general consumption; but at the same time he doubted whether it would not be found, upon examination, that there had been a great or greater steadiness under the sliding scale, as it was called, than could be hoped for under any other system; and here again he would say, that with respect to an article of food, there was in itself a cause which materially affected its price and value under changing circumstances, and upon this point he would beg to quote the authority of a writer who was entitled to very great respect on all points connected with the fluctuations of price, namely, Mr. Tooke. Now, what was the principle laid down by Mr. Tooke with regard to the liabilities of this particular article corn to fluctuation? He begged to say, that what he was about to quote was rather the summary of the evidence of this gentleman before the committee of the House, than an exact transcript of his answers, but he believed it would be found to be a faithful report of what he said on that occasion. Mr. Tooke said, that “the deficiency or excess in the supply of corn, as compared with the average consumption of it, was a question attended with greater difficulties than most other articles of consumption. This observation was confirmed by a reference to the fluctuations in the price of corn, which could apparently be referred to no other cause.” Now, he would beg to compare the fluctuations which had taken place in the price of corn since the present Corn-laws had come into operation, with the fluctuations in former periods before the traffic in corn was made a subject of legislation. It was all very well to take the highest price of one week at 70s., and that of another at 170s., and say there was a difference of 100s.; but let them take the whole variations in the annual averages since the year 1829, and compare the fluctuations with those of former periods, not at the periods of defective legislation in 1815 and 1822, but in periods anterior, when this country was an exporting country, and the Corn-laws could have had no effect upon this trade, and he did not think that this sweeping condemnation would be found to be justified. Now, since the year 1829 to the present time, the annual averages gave an average upon the whole period of about 52s. or 53s., a price which he thought was hardly to be complained of. He would certainly admit, that if it were to be found that, during that period, there had been great alterations from year to year, that would be a great objection to the present system. But he did not think it would be so found. He supposed that the figures which he was about to quote, would be admitted by the opposite party to be correct, as they proceeded from a body calling itself the Anti-Corn-law Association. In 1829, the average price of wheat was 66s.; in 1830, 65s.; in 1831, 66s.; in 1832, 58s.; in 1833, 52s.; in 1834, 40s.; in 1835, 39s.; in 1836, 48s.; in 1837, 55s.; in 1838, 64s.; and in 1839, 70s.; and he thought, that if the right hon. gentleman who spoke last night as to the monthly averages had carried his calculations a little further, he would have found that there was a considerable number of months during this interval in which the price of corn had ranged between 55s. and 65s.

Mr. Labouchere said, that since last evening he had made inquiries upon the subject, and he found, that during the period from 1828 to 1839, there had been 42 months, during which the price ranged from 55s. to 65s., 53 during which it was below 55s., and 43, during which it was above 65s.

Sir Robert Peel: It appeared, then, that there had been ninety-five months during which the price had been below 65s., which, as a low price was considered desirable, was a very gratifying fact. He would now draw attention to the variation which had taken place at a much earlier period—namely, before the act of 1765 came into operation. In the year 1728 the average price was 48s. 5d.; in 1732, it was 28s. 8d.; in 1733, it was 35s.; in 1743, it was 22s.; in 1750, it was 28s. 10d.; in 1757, it was 53s. 4d.; and in 1761, it was 26s. 4d.; being a fluctuation of 100 per cent. Now, comparing these fluctuations with the present period, he found also, that of these seven years which he had quoted, in five there had been an excess of export over import, so that the fluctuation did not appear to depend upon the importation of corn. But Mr. Tooke, in referring to these years, did so in order to confirm his argument, that the fluctuations depended upon the deficiency or excess in the supply, a feature which could not be provided against. Mr. Tooke also stated, that, from the beginning of the year 1794 to the end of 1795, the price had risen nearly double, and he said this fluctuation was entirely unconnected with any fluctuation in the currency, or any great political changes. "It might fairly be referred," Mr. Tooke said, "to the difference in the seasons;" and that gentleman then added the remark, "That the defect or increase in the price of corn was very much beyond the ratio of the excess or deficiency in the supply of the article during the same period, and that the fluctuations in the prices of articles of food were generally much greater than in other articles of consumption."

They had, therefore, the authority of Mr. Tooke for this opinion, that though the fluctuations in the prices of corn were very great, they were not such as to be easily prevented by any legislative precautions; and he was prepared to show, that under the present system, those fluctuations had been considerably less than when no system of Corn-law was in operation. Now, what would have been the effect of the seasons upon the price of corn, supposing there had been a fixed duty during the period which had passed since the present system came into operation? Suppose, as in the years 1833, 1834, and 1835, there should be a succession of very good seasons, and a consequently large supply in this country, and also, as might naturally be expected, a plentiful harvest on the Continent. Now, under circumstances like these, the foreign market being overstocked, he would ask, whether, with a fixed duty, the trader in corn might not be induced to bring over very large supplies, and after paying the duty, offer it in the market at a price much below that of British growth? And would not this operate as a great discouragement to corn of home production—a great discouragement to agriculture—and cause a great deal of land to be thrown out of cultivation? and might not this lead, and at no very distant period, to an alteration on the other side, and eventually to a very diminished supply? He came now to the third objection against the Corn-laws, and a most important consideration it was. The hon. member for Wolverhampton said, at the commencement of his speech in introducing this subject, that if those who had taken part in the support of the Corn-laws last year, could have foreseen, that their so doing must be so immediately followed by so complete a falsification of all their predictions in respect to the increase of our manufactures and home consumption, they would not have had the courage to vote as they had done. The hon. member stated further, that the advocates of the repeal of the Corn-laws relied mainly for the success of their arguments upon the immense falling off which had taken place in the manufactures of the country, and of its internal consumption, since the debate last year, indicating, as they did, the great distress which prevailed throughout the country. Now this was a most important statement; and he would assure the House, that he referred to every thing connected with the manufactures and commerce of this country with the utmost anxiety—he felt that our main strength as a nation, and our position in the scale of nations, depended upon the maintenance of our manufactures; and so much so, that if he were the exclusive advocate and partisan of the agricultural interest, he should tell the landowners that their best friends were the manufacturers, and that the manufacturers of the country, and not the Corn-laws, were the main element of their prosperity and the value of their land. Therefore, when the hon. member for Wolverhampton stated as a positive fact that the manufactures of the country were on the decline, and that there had been a rapid diminution in home consumption during the last year—he thought it highly important to endeavour to ascertain whether statements so important and melancholy were perfectly well-grounded. Now, he had before him official returns relating to the extent of the foreign trade of this country, as exemplified in our imports and exports, giving also the total amount of each description of imports and exports; and upon an examination of these documents, he found, that, as far as figures went, the gloomy anticipations of failure and distress entertained by the hon. member were not altogether realized. He had great satisfaction in finding, that there had been a considerable increase in the exports of manufactured goods. Last year, also, there had been an increase in the manufactured exports of the country, and he did not know whether the hon. member for Kendal was present—Oh! he saw the hon. gentleman in his place, and he was going to say, that he did recollect that last year he proved to the hon. member's satisfaction, or rather the hon. member frankly admitted to him, and succeeded in demonstrating it, that there had been a considerable increase in our export of manufactured articles; and he also begged to remind the hon. member of the argument with which he then met that fact. He (Sir R. Peel) stated last year, that there had been an increase on the total amount of the exports of the year 1838, whether as compared to the year 1837, or to the average of the four preceding years, and that to a considerable extent. To this the hon. member replied, that he admitted that there had been an apparent increase in the declared value of our exports, but, at the same time observed, that the increase in the export of perfectly wrought fabrics was exceedingly small, the principal increase being in articles which our manufactures had scarcely removed from their raw state; that articles in this shape were the elements and means of foreign manufactures; and their export, therefore, an encouragement and advantage to foreign manufactures rather than our own.

Mr. J. W. Wood: I beg the right hon. gentleman's pardon, but I was the first who used that argument.

Sir Robert Peel: Surely the hon. gentleman could not think that he (Sir R. Peel) could forget that, on seconding the address last year, the hon. member had cut from under the feet of the Corn-law agitators that which formed the very foundation of their argument. He did not wish to deprive the hon. gentleman of the gratifying and consolatory reflection, that he had been the first to declare last year that an increase had taken place in our shipping interests, in our foreign commerce, and in every indication of stable and progressive prosperity. And he should never forget how the countenances of those gentlemen suddenly fell, who relied upon the chairman of the Manchester Chamber of Commerce for abundant arguments in favour of the repeal of the Corn-laws, when the hon. member made those memorable and gratifying disclosures. But on a subsequent occasion the hon. member said, it was true that there had been an increase in our exports, but that they had been of manufactured articles in the rudest possible state. The hon. gentleman stated that, "Comparing the average of the last four years with the year 1838, the exports of woollen, cotton, and linen manufactures, had increased from £25,757,000 to £26,190,000, being an increase of only £433,000, or about one-half per cent. upon perfectly wrought fabrics: but that in cotton, woollen, and linen yarns, the increase had been from £6,590,000 to £8,452,000, being an increase of about £1,800,000, or twenty-eight per cent.; these latter being articles which were to be wrought up in foreign countries."

The hon. gentleman deduced from these facts the argument, that although the total amount of our exports had increased, yet that they had increased in a way to become evidence of declining prosperity rather than otherwise. He turned to the return of the present year. He looked to the exports of the wrought fabric bearing on the very cases which the hon. gentleman had taken. He looked first to the cotton manufacture generally. Comparing 1838 with 1839, it appeared that the declared value of cotton manufactures exported in 1838, was £16,715,000, and in 1839, £17,694,000. The export of linen manufactures had increased from £2,730,000, in 1838, to £3,420,000, in 1839. The export of silk manufactures had increased from £777,000 to £865,000; and the woollen manufactures from £5,795,000 in 1838, to £6,207,000 in 1839. Now he did not say that this was a conclusive proof of manufacturing prosperity; but what he said was, that so far as official documents went, they could not say there was that decline in the export of manufactures which had been put forward as an argument against the existing system of Corn-laws by hon. gentlemen opposite. [Hear.] But when he was arguing on one point, he was met with a cheer, as though he meant something else. The hon. member for Wiltshire had said, that he never referred to figures, because the same figures might be made to serve both parties, might be made use of on either side of the argument; but he had shown that in the articles of cotton, linen, silk, and wool, so far as the official returns of the foreign exports indicated, there had been an evident, he would not say, increase in prosperity, but increase in the manufactures of the country. The total increase in the export of those articles of perfectly wrought fabrics, had been from £26,170,000 in 1838, to £28,202,000 in 1839. He (Sir R. Peel) remembered that the hon. gentleman opposite had stated, during the debate of last year, that there had been an increase of only  $1\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. on the export of perfectly wrought fabrics; now this year there had been an increase of eight per cent. But perhaps he should be met with the argument, still there had been an immense increase in the export of yarn, and the merely raw material, and that they had been exporting to a great extent those raw fabrics, which enabled their foreign competitors to rival them in foreign markets. Now he (Sir R. Peel) had the consolation to assure the hon. member for Kendal, that while there had been this increase in the export of the perfectly wrought fabric, there had been at the same time a considerable decrease in the export of yarn. First, in respect to cotton-yarn, the export in 1838 was in value £7,400,000. In 1839, £6,857,000; in linen yarn the export was in 1838, £836,000; in 1839, £814,000. In wool there had been a trifling increase, but the total decrease in the export of yarn was as follows:—in 1838, £8,651,000; in 1839, £8,070,000. Last year there had been an increase of £28,000, or  $1\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. in the export of the wrought fabric, and 28 per cent. in yarns, while this year there had been an increase of 8 per cent. on the wrought fabric, and a decrease of 8 per cent. on the export of the raw material. He (Sir R. Peel) knew well what the argument on this subject was, and certainly it was an ingenious one. It was admitted that there was an increase in the exports of the perfectly wrought fabrics, as shown by the official documents; but then it was contended, that so far from this being a proof that manufactures had prospered, it showed exactly an opposite result. And this view of the case was thus accounted for—that the foreign trade had been forced in consequence of the total inability of the home consumer to purchase. Now, suppose he (Sir R. Peel) had said, that there had been a great falling off in the foreign trade, and that that was evident proof of improvement, and a sure sign of prosperity; suppose he had said, that the falling off in the foreign trade arose from the immense increase in the home consumption; that the demand had been so great at home, that it was impossible to provide for the foreign trade; and that, so far from that being a cause of regret, it ought to be considered as a ground of rejoicing, inasmuch as it proves the prosperity of the country,—how would such an argument be met? and yet it was as good an argument as the one with which he was met, that the prosperity in the foreign trade ought to be considered as a decisive indication of the decline of the national prosperity. Was not that the argument—that they were not to consider the increase in the export of manufactured articles as an indication of the national prosperity? [Mr. Baines—No, no.] He never liked, for the sake of a temporary triumph, to advance any thing which he was not prepared to prove. He held in his hand a document attributed to the son of the hon. member himself, entitled “National Distress proved by Increased Exports combined with Diminished Production.” This gentleman, said, referring to the parliamentary return,—“That official document shows that a larger amount of British manufactures was exported in the year ending January 5, 1840, than in the year ending January 5, 1839; the increase being nearly £2,000,000 on the declared value. Sir, I shall shortly prove, from the very document thus adduced, a case, not of extending but of declining trade and manufactures.”

That quotation bore him out in his representation of the argument of the opponents of the Corn-laws. All he stated was, that the author of the pamphlet relied on the increase of our exports under the existing circumstances as a proof of a decline in our trade and manufactures, and then he said that he should be equally justifiable in arguing, that a diminished foreign trade might be accounted for by an increase in the home consumption. The foundation of the argument was, that the diminished demand at home had led to the increased exports. Now, it was exceedingly difficult to ascertain what the amount of home consumption at any period was. There were means of ascertaining the amount of foreign trade, but to find what relation existed between it and the home consumption was almost impossible. It was almost impossible to find what proportion of the productions of this country was consumed within the territories of her Majesty. There were, however, other indications of the state of the country. As to the amount of manufactures consumed within the kingdom, it was, as he had observed, impossible to form a guess; but he looked at the revenue and compared the amount of the customs in the two last years. In 1838, they amounted to £22,063,118, and in 1839, they amounted to £23,210,881. He then looked at the number of vessels employed in foreign trade; although he certainly expected to be told, that these vessels had been only employed in carrying out the manufactures which our distress prevented us from consuming at home. In 1838, the number of vessels entered inwards was, 19,639; in 1839, 23,143. The number of vessels entered outwards was, in 1838, 17,204; in 1839, 18,423. He did not exactly understand how there should be a great increase of coasting trade, if there had been a great decline of consumption. If the exports had arisen from a decreasing consumption, and inability of the people to buy manufactures, why should there be an increase in the coasting trade? But there was an increase in the coasting trade of the country in 1839, as compared with 1838. If, again, there had been a great increase in the capacity to consume, ought there to be a falling off in the excise duties? How could they reconcile an increase of the excise duties with a great decrease in the capacity of consumption? But there had been a gradual increase in the excise duties in 1837, 1838, and 1839. If there had been a diminution in the consumption of those manufactured articles, with respect to which they had no test of consumption, ought there not also to have been a diminution of articles of very general consumption, which were luxuries rather than necessities? Why, if there was a greatly diminished capacity of consumption, should there have been an increase in the quantity of coffee consumed? The quantity of coffee entered for home consumption in 1838, was 25,818,000lbs, and in 1839, 26,832,000lbs. Tea had increased from 32,000,000lbs in 1838, to 35,000,000lbs. The quantity of timber had increased in 1839 as compared to 1838. There appeared at first sight to have been a diminution in the quantity of sugar; but if they took the quantity of drawbacks on refined sugar exported in 1838 as compared to 1839, they would find, if there had been any diminution in the home consumption of sugar, it was exceedingly small. He had seen, drawn up by a house largely concerned in the sugar trade, an estimate of the comparative consumption of sugar in 1838 and 1839, which claimed a small increase in the quantity of sugar consumed in 1839 as compared with 1838. He, therefore, could not admit that assertions of the increase in the foreign trade of the country, must be considered as a conclusive indication of declining prosperity at home, and an increased inability to purchase articles of general consumption. He knew perfectly well that great stress was laid on the argument that the great articles of consumption, such as cotton, indigo, &c., employed in manufactures, had decreased, but he was glad to perceive that at Liverpool, on the 1st of January 1839, as compared with 1838, there had been an increase in the quantity of cotton taken for home consumption. But why did it vary? Because it was one of those articles which depended on the seasons; and, although there was a fixed duty, an unlimited demand, and unlimited importation, yet cotton varied in price from the vicissitudes of season to a much larger extent than corn. He had heard with great pain of the complaints made by some manufacturers engaged in the cotton trade: he had heard with still greater pain of the privations to which the working classes in some parts of the country were exposed; yet still he could not come to the melancholy conclusion at which some hon. gentlemen had arrived, that there were in the official documents, and in general notoriety, certain indication of the decline of this great manufacture. Upon such grounds, having paid all the attention in his power to these documents, although perfectly ready to reconsider in matters of such immense importance the opinions he might have heretofore given, and to abandon them if he found them ill-founded, he must say he could not conceive, that there had been or was any indication of decay or decline in the country, and, therefore, the opinions which he had expressed last year on the general subject of the Corn-laws, were opinions to which in the present year he was perfectly ready to adhere. It was vain to disguise it—the real question they had to decide was not, whether they should admit any modification of the existing scale of duties; the question which the hon. member for Wolverhampton called on them to discuss, and which their votes would decide, was, whether or not there should be a total repeal of the Corn-laws. At the same time, the right hon. gentleman the President of the Board of Trade, who was entitled to high respect, as well from his general character as from the official station he held, had, in the course of this debate, declared his intention of making some proposition in case the House should go into committee.—[Mr. Labouchere: “No, no.”]—Then the right hon. gentleman had nothing to submit to their attention; but he declared an individual opinion, that a fixed duty would on the whole be preferable to a total repeal and the present sliding scale. That seemed to be rather the theoretical opinion of the right hon. gentleman than one so far matured as to be formed into a resolution, and, if they did find themselves in committee, to be submitted for consideration. He really thought the right hon. gentleman had indicated an intention to submit that proposition; for he recollected that the right hon. gentleman said he could answer for no other member of her Majesty’s government; and he also understood, that the only two other members of the government who had spoken, completely dissented from the opinions he had expressed. But although it seemed they had no chance of hearing the proposition practically made, it was still due to the right hon. gentleman briefly to consider its merits. The right hon. gentleman said, he preferred a fixed duty to the sliding scale; and on being asked to state its amount, he said he thought 7s. or 8s. per quarter would be the amount of duty he should recommend. Then the right hon. gentleman being aware of the objection to a fixed duty, that when the price of corn became inconveniently high, it might be difficult for a weak or even a strong government to maintain a fixed duty in the face of rising prices, he proposed, in order to obviate the difficulty, when corn arrived at the price of 70s. per quarter, the duty should vanish, and corn be admitted free. That was the only proposition which had been submitted to their consideration by her Majesty’s government. Let him then observe to the right hon. gentleman, that his proposition would hardly remove any one of the objections which were made to the present system. Would it tend to promote a final settlement of the question? Not in the opinion of the hon. member for Wolverhampton, because the whole of his speech went to shew that the landed interest was entitled to no protection whatever; that so far from bearing any exclusive taxes, they were exempted from some particular burdens, and that with no shadow of justice should any duty, fixed or variable, be imposed on the importation of foreign corn. All the arguments which applied to protecting corn for the purpose of increasing the rents of landlords, would equally apply to a fixed duty as to a variable duty. All the bad appeals to the passions of the multitude, all the arguments about the impolicy and injustice, the unchristian and irreligious principles of taxing the staff of life, would apply to a fixed duty equally with a variable duty. They, perhaps, would apply with increased force when they came to look at what had been the average amount of duty levied on foreign corn imported under the existing scale for a considerable number of years past. There had been, since the Corn-laws were in operation, of foreign wheat imported into this country for home consumption not less than 9,297,000 quarters, and the average amount of duty levied on that immense quantity did not exceed 5s. 3d. per quarter. He was not prepared to say that there were not great objections to a shifting scale; but as to the amount of duty payable under the present system, there could not be a shadow of doubt that it was very much less than that which any one who advocated a fixed duty at all ever thought of proposing. Under the existing system, the duty charged only amounted to 5s. 5d. per quarter; the amount of duty upon the "staff of life," as it was termed, did not exceed the sum of 5s. 5d. The ignorant man was not prepared to understand the cause or the effect of a sudden importation, and it would be no satisfaction to him to be told that a duty of 5s. 5d. was to be exchanged for one of 8s. Those who upon a question of this nature resorted to an appeal to men's passions, could do so with equal effect, whether the duty was the one sum or the other, or whether it was imposed according to the provisions of the existing law with its sliding scale, or under that which would impose a fixed duty commencing or ending at a certain point. The advocates of change, who denounced the present Corn-laws as irreligious and tyrannical, would be as well entitled to do so under one amount of duty as under another. Was there any thing, he would ask, in the proposal, that when the price of corn rose to 70s. per quarter, the duty should cease, or be materially diminished, that of necessity would have the effect of disarming every topic which lay within the reach of the popular agitator, and at once silencing every appeal to the passions of mankind? He begged also to remind the right hon. gentleman opposite, that independently of failing to give satisfaction to those who were opposed to the imposition of any duty whatever, he had not answered any one of the objections of detail; he had proposed to retain the whole system of averages. Surely that was any thing but giving satisfaction to his hon. friends who demanded free trade. Was that free trade, or any thing like it? Nothing could be more evident than that his whole system was one of averages, for how otherwise could he ascertain his price of 70s., at which his duty was to commence? Then he begged the House to look at the manner in which the proposed plan of the right hon. gentleman would meet the argument of the American merchant, who urged the probable effect of a deficient harvest, when bad corn must of necessity be brought into the market, and when its introduction would most assuredly affect the rate of prices. Next, let the House observe the probable effect of the gradual rise of the price of corn to 67s. or 68s.; what precautions did the right hon. gentleman propose to adopt against the tricks and devices confessedly practised for the purpose of operating upon the averages? Supposing that the price remained at 69s. 6d., the duty, according to the plan of the right hon. gentleman, would be payable; but increase the price by a single shilling, and foreign corn would be imported duty free. It would be difficult to conceive a greater temptation to practise upon the averages than this state of things would present. It offered immense inducements to adopt expedients of all sorts for the purpose of causing the price of corn to turn 70s.; for the moment its average price exceeded that sum of 70s. per quarter, the market might at once be inundated with foreign corn, and might continue to be kept in that state till new averages were made. In such a case how did the right hon. gentleman propose to provide for the difficulties with which the American merchant would have to contend in meeting his rivals in the ports of Holland? The American who thought of exporting corn to this country, hearing that the price was 70s., might suppose himself safe in sending a cargo, relying with confidence upon being able to introduce American corn into England duty free. Before his corn could have time to arrive in the ports of Great Britain, he would find that the price had sunk to 69s.; during the transit of his corn across the Atlantic, parties in the habit of practising upon the averages would have managed to effect a reduction, and so the object which the American speculator proposed to himself would be utterly defeated, and he would find himself under the necessity of paying a duty of 8s. per quarter upon that which he had hoped to have exported to England duty free. Upon these grounds, then, he professed himself at a loss to discover how the right hon. gentleman overcame some of the objections to the averages and a sliding scale. If the right hon. gentleman abandoned the averages, he must resort, or be inconsistent with himself, to a free importation, with a fixed duty of 8s. In times of great abundance, of unexampled—he might say, of excessive and superabundant supply—corn would be poured into this country from the ports of the continent of Europe and from those of America; the importation of foreign corn would then be subject to no control. Then, in times of extreme scarcity, could any government maintain a duty upon the importation of foreign corn? It would be described as a tyrannical impost upon the "staff of life." He did not hesitate to say, that such a duty would be practically removed; and if it were once removed, he professed himself unable to see how it could be re-imposed. He acknowledged that, though the right hon. gentleman declared himself favourable to a fixed duty, he at the same time declared that he did not mean to propose any thing of the sort. It was to be presumed, he apprehended, that, in any attempt to do so, he did not expect to enjoy the support of his colleagues. In making this observation, he also referred to the sentiments of the hon. gentleman, who said, that on that part of his plan which related to a fixed duty, the support of his colleagues had been withheld. Now, if that question of a fixed duty was not to be taken into consideration in committee, why consent to going into committee at all? It was a faint indication that the whole project appeared to melt before him the more nearly he approached it. It was clear, then, that there was not any plan digested by the government, or to be proposed to Parliament, under the authority and responsibility of the Ministers of the Crown. But the hon. member opposite had told the House that it would hear his plan. Even had he entertained the least intention, upon the present occasion, of submitting any plan to the House, he conceived that nothing could be so absurd as to declare for or against any particular set of details—nothing appeared to him more objectionable than to say, that the present Corn-law, in all its details, was a system actually perfect; such a declaration he considered would be utterly unworthy of him to make, or the House to hear. He had no intention on the present occasion of proposing any plan, neither did he think it the fitting opportunity to indicate any thing further respecting his views than he had already taken the liberty of submitting to the House. By the hon. member who had brought forward the present motion, they had been invited to go into committee upon a plain and intelligible principle—namely, total repeal; and considering that to be, as it confessedly was, the real purpose of the motion, nothing appeared to him more ridiculous than the discussion of minor points. He differed, therefore, from the hon. member for the Tower Hamlets, in thinking that the House could advantageously pursue the course to which he invited them; and, while adverting to that, he could hardly refrain from noticing the manner in which the hon. gentleman who brought forward the present motion had referred to the sentiments of the hon. member's friend, and the way in which he had treated the plan of the hon. member for Cambridge, of a modified duty. He should profit by the experience of the hon. gentleman. One, he thought, who ought to be considered as speaking with authority upon such a subject, had been treated almost with contumely when he spoke of a modified scale. Nothing seemed to disturb the equanimity of the hon. mover till he came athwart his hon. friend, whom he accused in language unlike the general tenor of his speech—in language violent and contumelious—of rendering him nothing but insidious assistance. What motive could any one have to enter into the discussion of details, when the only man whom the mover treated with injustice, was he who had ventured to depart from broad principles? The hon. mover refused to take advantage of his assistance upon a division, declaring that he preferred the open hostility of the hon. member for Lincolnshire to his hon. friend's insidious friendship. He should, therefore, say, that the great question which the House had to determine, was that of total repeal; the hon. mover advocated that exclusively; he proceeded upon the assumption, that total and unqualified repeal would alone give satisfaction. To that proposal he could not assent. To that proposal he should apprehend that her Majesty's government could not assent. At any rate the right hon. gentleman opposite had said, that the landed interest were fairly and justly entitled to some protection. He then asked whether any advance was made towards tranquillising the public mind, or towards a satisfactory settlement of the question, when he, who presided over the commercial department of the country, holding an opinion for concurrence to which he could not answer for his colleagues, and which he did not propose practically to carry into effect, consented in the present agitated state of the country, to go into a committee with the vague and indefinite hope that some satisfactory proposal on the subject of the Corn-laws, which was not heard of in the House, might suddenly be made in the committee. The principle of total repeal he perfectly understood. "It was certainly a magnificent scheme for introducing in our intercourse with foreign nations, that principle which ought to regulate the intercourse of this great empire within its own boundaries. He doubted the possibility of applying this principle to the external commerce of this country, in a state of society so artificial, with relations so complicated, and with such enormous interests at stake, which had grown up under another principle, however defective it might be—namely, the principle of protection in certain cases. If the principle now contended for was good for the regulation of the trade in corn, it was good for the trade in many other articles. If good as affecting corn, it was clearly good as affecting labour. Upon this principle there ought to be no navigation laws. Every merchant ought to be allowed to procure labour at the cheapest possible rate, and there ought to be no preference for the British seaman. But the Legislature controlled that principle, just in the abstract, by a reference to the necessity for providing for the defence of this country in case of danger. It was found beneficial to encourage our own marine, and to endeavour to secure the maritime eminence of this country by giving a protection to its marine. Therefore, in this instance, the legislature corrected the principle, however good it might be in the abstract, by giving a preference to the seamen of this country. Besides, if the principle was to be applied generally, the whole colonial system must be altered. Foreign sugar must be entitled to admission into the home market, on terms equally favourable with the sugar of our own colonies. The timber duties must, of course, be got rid of. Every protecting duty on manufactures must be abolished, precisely on the same principle on which it was argued, that there ought to be no protecting duty for corn; and, as he had said before, if the principle were good in the case of corn—if they might not take an insurance against the caprice or hostility of foreign countries in time of war, and against the vicissitudes of seasons, by encouraging the home produce, neither must they seek to secure the pre-eminence of the marine of the country by giving an advantage to the labour of British seamen, neither must they give a preference to the productions of their own colonies, or afford protection to their own manufactures. Theoretically, and in the abstract, this magnificent plan might be correct; but when he looked to the practice, to the great interests which had grown up under another system—when he found that, whatever theoretical objections might apply to that system, still great and complicated interests had grown up under it, which probably could not be disturbed without immense peril—when he, besides, bore in mind, that defective as that system in principle might be, yet under it this country, considering its population, had acquired the greatest colonial empire, the greatest Indian empire, the greatest influence which any country ever possessed—when he considered also, that under this system, he would not say in consequence of it, for that might be denied by hon. gentlemen opposite, but simultaneously with it, we presented this spectacle to the world—a country limited in extent and population, yet carrying on greater commercial and manufacturing enterprise than any other country ever exhibited—when he considered all these things, he would not go the length of the Prime Minister, who said, that he who entertained the notion of upsetting this system "proposed the maddest thing that ever he had heard of;" but this he would say, that he would not consent to put to hazard those enormous interests, for the purpose of substituting an untried principle for one which might be theoretically defective, but under which practically our power and greatness had been established; fearing that the embarrassment, the confusion, and distress, which might therefrom arise, would greatly countervail and outweigh any advantage which could be anticipated from establishing, at the expense of what was practically good, that which might be theoretically correct.

The debate was again adjourned.

WAR WITH CHINA.

APRIL 9, 1840.

Sir James Graham, at the conclusion of a most powerful speech, in which he reviewed the different events leading to the disruption of our amicable relations with China, and charged the government with having aggravated these occurrences by their mismanagement and vacillation, moved the following resolution:—"That it appears to this House, on consideration of the papers relating to China, presented to this House by command of her Majesty, that the interruption in our commercial and friendly intercourse with that country, and the hostilities which have since taken place, are mainly to be attributed to the want of foresight and precaution on the part of her Majesty's present advisers, in respect to our relations with China, and especially to their neglect to furnish the superintendent at Canton with powers and instructions calculated to provide against the growing evils connected with the contraband traffic in opium, and adapted to the novel and difficult situation in which the superintendent was placed."

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, that considering that the House had been occupied for the last six or seven nights with continued debates, first upon the Corn-laws, and then upon the Chinese question, it could hardly be a matter of surprise that occasional indications of impatience had been manifested this evening. But he entreated the House to bear in mind the magnitude and importance of the subject which was now under their consideration. He begged them to remember, that, although no communication had been made from the Crown, although no message had been sent down to the House, it appeared, from the distinct and intelligible declarations of two ministers of the Crown, that we were on the eve of hostilities with a country, the description of which he would borrow from the hon. baronet, the member for Portsmouth—a country which, in point of population, exceeded all that of the continental countries of Europe; nay, at this moment, we might actually have entered into hostilities with a nation comprising a population of 350,000,000 inhabitants, very little short, in fact, of one-third of the whole of the human race. It was certainly not surprising that, with these indications of hostilities, which none could mistake, although the Crown had sent down no communication, and had invited no opinion from the House of Commons—it was certainly, he repeated, not surprising that the House of Commons should inquire, what were the causes of, and who were the parties who were responsible for, this great and acknowledged calamity. "Oh," said the right hon. gentleman, the President of the Board of Control, and one of the parties mainly responsible for this great evil, "for God's sake, do not discuss any thing about China! Have a debate, if you please, on the registration bill, or take a division upon Maynooth." Perhaps the right hon. gentleman would advise the House to occupy its time upon the Peel club at Glasgow. "But the greatest question of China, the greatest question of, who was responsible for, and by what means these hostilities had been brought about, do not touch that (said the right hon. gentleman), for questions of peace and war are involved in it." Five-and-forty minutes of the right hon. gentleman's speech were occupied with comments upon the form of the motion under discussion, and the remainder was a defence of her Majesty's government. Five-and-forty minutes, it was necessary to say to those who had not the satisfaction of hearing the speech of the right hon. gentleman—five-and-forty minutes had been occupied in comments upon the motion of his right hon. friend; and the right hon. gentleman had said, that the motion contained no distinct declaration of opinion upon the policy of the government, that it declared no opinion about the opium trade, nay, that it did not distinctly explain whether or no the right hon. mover thought the merchants whose opium had been taken for the use of the government ought to have compensation or not. "The motion," said the right hon. gentleman, "is a mere party motion." That was the minister's defence. What was the use of this constant and unmeaning clamour about party motions? Was it not incident to free discussion, and to a popular assembly, that even in smaller matters than this, the conduct, the motives, and the character of the government should be subjected to examination and criticism? Did not the Queen's government resort to precisely the same means for defence against the motions which were brought forward by its opponents? Was it perfectly novel in the history of this country, and of oppositions, to find motions brought forward by them—nay, to find retrospective motions brought forward—to find that those whose past misconduct, or whose past neglect, was called in question, were absolutely subjected to the ordeal, not of prospective, but retrospective, erimination? What event during the war was not the subject of inquiry by the opposition? Did the expedition to the Scheldt escape? Did the convention of Cintra escape? Did the battle of Talavera escape? Was there any instance in which, upon the questionable policy of the government (those who watched that government having considered them selves perfectly entitled to bring forward a motion upon the subject of the misconduct of that government,) motions had not been made? What was the motion made by one of the present ministers in the year 1810—Lord Lansdowne—a great military critic, who questioned the policy of the government by a retrospective censure of the convention of Cintra, and who, not content with his proceedings in 1809, appeared again in another field, having succeeded to the peerage in 1810, and brought forward this resolution, which appeared to him, if deserving of censure at all, not more or less than the present motion. Lord Lansdowne proposed to the House of Lords to resolve—“ 1. That it appears to this House, after the most attentive examination of the papers laid before them, relative to the late campaign in Spain, that the safety of the army was improvidently and uselessly risked, and every loss and calamity suffered, without ground on which to expect any good result; and that the whole did end in the retreat of the army. 2. That, previous to entering on this campaign, ministers did not procure the necessary information of the state of Spain, or of its military resources, of the supplies that could be afforded, &c., as the most obvious policy required; and that the result of this rashness and ignorance was a result the most calamitous.”

That was retrospective; it indicated no particular policy; and he thought that Lord Lansdowne and his confederates would have been surprised if, on bringing forward this motion, censuring the operations of the Duke of Wellington and the government of that day, had he been replied to in the same manner that the present motion was answered—namely, “ You ought to tell us what are the despatches which, under similar circumstances, you would have written. You ought, if you question the operations of the Duke of Wellington in parliament, to indicate to the House the precise communications which, under similar circumstances, you would have had with your British confederate on the one hand, and the Spanish authority on the other hand; and you have no business to bring forward a motion censuring the policy of the government, unless, at the same time, you distinctly declare not only what you intend to do, but precisely what you would have done.” He apprehended, when Lord John Cavendish brought forward his motion to this effect, that the thirteen colonies of America had been lost to England, and that England was engaged in a war with France, Spain, the United States, and Holland, without a single ally, and that all this was owing to the negligence and want of foresight of the government, that then a good Whig precedent was furnished for the form of the present motion, and, perhaps, it might have been difficult to find a greater coincidence than it furnished. The right hon. gentleman had deprecated as injurious the practice of the House of Commons entertaining questions of peace and war like this; so that, whatever was the misconduct of the government, the indifference of the House was to be the indemnity. The present motion was a distinct declaration, that the unfortunate state of affairs which had arisen between this country and China, was attributable to the want of foresight and precaution in the government, and their neglect to give certain powers and instructions to their representatives. It did not give any opinion about the opium trade, nor as to the policy and justice of the war; but he would remind the right hon. gentleman, that those questions might be perfectly distinct, and yet the war might be just. The war itself might be politic, and yet the necessity of the war might have arisen from impolitic proceedings. It might be that, from a long series of contests, misunderstandings, and collisions, continued for years by a country unaccustomed to European laws and usages, an act of violence and outrage might have been committed, which left no alternative but a resort to war—it might be, that the course of policy pursued by their representative might leave them no alternative on the grounds of policy but to go to war. It might be, for instance, that in the first conflict that took place between the Chinese and British empires, the conflict was so unwarrantable, that it would be utterly impossible to retrieve the character of the British arms without some manifestation of resentment. A shot might have been fired unintentionally in a moment of irritation against an inferior force, and the result of that first unfortunate conflict might have been to exhibit the British naval force retreating from the action in consequence of a failure of ammunition. It might be, that notices of blockade were issued on one day, and recalled in three days, and those events might really leave that impression on the minds of the Chinese which would be prejudicial to the warlike character of England, so as to make it wise and just to correct that erroneous impression. But consistently with those circumstances it might be proved, that although the war was not unjust—although in point of policy it could be sustained—although it ought to be supported—still the necessity for the war might have arisen from gross negligence and misconduct of the ministers. Now, he asked, supposing that state of things to exist, was it fit that those ministers should escape not only without notice, but, as the right hon. gentleman supposed, even without the formality of a debate? The right hon. gentleman had said, that no one had more lamented the breaking out of the war with France than the late Mr. Fox. There was no one who more deeply felt that that war was a great calamity; there was no man who, at an early period of the war, was a warmer advocate of its termination: but he would remind the right hon. gentleman, that at the commencement of that war, while, at the same time, he supported the armament by which it was to be carried on, the very same night he did so, he brought forward a motion of censure upon the government who brought it on. On the 4th of February, 1793, he said—"We were now actually engaged in war, and, being so engaged, there could be no difference of opinion on the necessity of supporting it with vigour. No want of disposition to support it could be imputed to him; for in the debate on his Majesty's Message, announcing that we were at war, he had moved an amendment to the Address, as much pledging the House to a vigorous support of it as the Address proposed by his Majesty's ministers, and better calculated to insure unanimity. But the more he felt himself bound to support the war, the more he felt himself bound to object to the measures which, as far as yet appeared, had unnecessarily led to it."

And, on that night, Mr. Fox moved this resolution—"That it appears to this House, that in the late negotiation between his Majesty's ministers and the agents of the French government, the said ministers did not take such measures as were likely to produce redress, without a rupture, for the grievances of which they complained."

Therefore, he thought he showed them, upon high authority—at least, upon such authority as would be admitted by hon. gentlemen opposite—that the same man might admit the necessity of a war, who at the same time might feel an imperative obligation to censure those by whom the war was originated. His firm belief was, that the necessity for this war did exist mainly in consequence of the misconduct of the government. He believed in the possibility of its being averted, not by some foresight inconceivable in the limited faculties of human nature, but by the most ordinary attention to the position of our affairs at the termination of the East India Company's charter, and by taking the fair warning afforded by previous experience, as well as by listening to the earnest declarations of our own superintendents, and above all, by fortifying them with the power which they demanded, which ministers might have intrusted to them, giving them instructions as to the views and intentions of government, but which, however, her Majesty's ministers had studiously withheld. Here he would clear up a misapprehension of the right hon. gentleman as to the nature of the charge against the government. It was not, as the right hon. gentleman supposed, that the government had not sufficient foresight to know what the Emperor of China was going to do, but that, after the termination of the relation between China and the East India Company, which had continued for 200 years, and after an immense change, therefore, in the position of this country with respect to China, that her Majesty's government sent a gentleman to China to represent the Crown of this country, without the powers which they might have given him, which it was their duty to have given him, without instructions which he was competent to receive, and without the moral influence of a naval force, the advantage of which was demonstrated by the papers before the House. The right hon. gentleman, the member for Edinburgh, admitted that the instructions were meagre and scanty, and if, under similar circumstances, they had been given to our diplomatic agent at Brussels, or at Paris, the government would have been without excuse. That was an important admission. But the right hon. gentleman proceeded to say, that India was best governed in India, as if a regularly constituted government, with superior and subordinate officers of the greatest experience, with a people accustomed to look up to that government with reverence and respect, with a powerful fleet at command, with an immense military establishment, and with recognized laws and responsibility, as was the case with the government of India, could bear the least analogy to the case of Captain Elliot conducting the affairs of our trade at Canton. The government ought to have supplied Captain Elliot with proper powers. It should have said what regulations were to be established, what offences were to be breaches of those regulations, and then have constituted a court of admiralty and criminal jurisdiction, as they might have done. If, then, they had indicated to their representative the general views and policy of the government, and said, "Here are the powers which the law enables us to invest you with; here are our general views and intentions with respect to our relations with China, the trade in opium, the place of your residence, the mode of your communication; we tie you down by no specific instructions; we leave you, on account of the distance, full latitude and complete discretion, confiding in your prudence and judgment,"—then, indeed, the government might have some cause to rely on in the absence of detail and defined instructions; but their course had been exactly the reverse. They had given their representative what was worse than no power—the semblance without the reality. They not merely withheld instructions, they gave him contradictory instructions; and then they pretend that, on account of the distance, it was difficult to explain the course which he was to pursue. Did the East India Company find that difficult? Read the despatch of the East India Company, addressed to their supercargoes in the year 1832, enjoining caution in dealing with the Chinese, and placing before them the general views of the company, but not binding them down, in that case at least, to minute instructions; and, after having read that despatch, let him ask whether the vindication now set up by the government, that they were 15,000 miles from their officers in India, could be deemed a sufficient excuse for the gross and intolerable negligence which it appeared they had committed? There were three charges which this resolution conveyed; the want of instructions, the absence of a naval force, but, above all, the want of that authority and power, the means of giving which they had within their own control. He would not go through the whole of these several points. It might be demonstrated, that there were periods when a naval force, which might have been present for the maintenance of authority, was absent; and yet a noble lord opposite talked of relying on the moral authority of the naval force, over and over again. The superintendent had asked for such a force, but could not obtain it. Gentlemen on the other side had argued as if the Duke of Wellington's authority supported their views, when, in fact, he had not recommended any thing from which they could derive the smallest support. The opinion of the Duke of Wellington was, that a naval force was only necessary till the trade should be established. He would have adopted the policy of Mr. Davis and of Sir George Robinson: it was their opinion, that a naval force was necessary until the trade should be established; but that was the full extent to which it could be carried. These were facts most clearly made out by the papers before the House, and he declared his deliberate conviction, that no man could read those documents and not arrive at the same conclusion, under the influence of which the motion of his right hon. friend had been prepared. The House could not fail to have noticed the wide range which the present debate had taken, and the variety of topics to which hon. members had addressed themselves; and it therefore appeared to him most important that, at the present stage of the debate, the attention of the House should be confined—at least, so far as his observations were concerned—to the main point at issue between her Majesty's government and the supporters of the motion brought forward by his right hon. friend, the member for Pembroke. Governed by that consideration, he should keep to one point, and not wander over the mass of desultory reasoning which, during the course of the present debate, had been laid before the House. It was now for the representatives of the people to consider and decide upon this question, whether or not her Majesty's government were chargeable with reprehensible neglect in the policy which they had pursued towards China; and whether or not they had given to the British superintendent at Canton the power and authority which his position required, and which the honour and the commercial interests of this country rendered absolutely necessary? One word, however, about the instructions. The right hon. gentleman (Sir J. C. Hobhouse) said, it was impossible for the government to suppress the opium trade. That might be;

it might be impossible. A committee of the House of Commons might too, some eight or ten years since, have delivered an opinion about the opium trade; but he asked this question:—after the despatches which arrived in this country on the subject of the trade in opium up to the 13th June, 1839—after the important change which took place in that year, placing the trade on a perfectly different footing, and giving it a ten times more formidable character than it had in the preceding periods—when their superintendent informed them, “It had been clear to me, my lord, from the origin of this peculiar branch of the opium traffic, that it must grow to be more and more mischievous to every branch of the trade, and certainly to none more than to that of opium itself. As the danger and shame of its pursuit increased, it was obvious that it would fall, by rapid degrees, into the hands of more and more desperate men; that it would stain the foreign character with constantly aggravating disgrace in the sight of the whole of the better portion of this people; and, lastly, that it would connect itself more and more intimately with our lawful commercial intercourse, to the great peril of vast public and private interests. Till the other day, my lord, I believe there was no part of the world where the foreigner felt his life and property more secure than in Canton; but the grave events of the 12th ult. have left behind a different impression. For a space of near two hours, the foreign factories were within the power of an immense and infuriated mob; the gate of one of them was absolutely battered in, and a pistol was fired out, probably without ball or over the heads of the people, for at least it is certain that nobody fell. If the case had been otherwise, her Majesty’s government and the British public would have had to learn, that the trade and peaceful intercourse with this empire was indefinitely interrupted by a terrible scene of bloodshed and ruin. And all these desperate hazards have been incurred, my lord, for the scrambling, and, comparatively considered, insignificant gains of a few individuals, unquestionably founding their conduct upon the belief that they were exempt from the operation of all law, British or Chinese.”

When thus, in characters not to be mistaken, their officers showed that a crisis was at hand—when he told them that the time had come, when the British government must indicate some intention on the subject—when they had a series of despatches received up to the 13th January, 1839—he asked whether, on a subject of such immense and complicated interest, this was a proper reply to the communications received by the British government?

“Sir—Your despatches to the 31st December of last year, and to the 30th of January of this year, have been received and laid before her Majesty’s government. With reference to those despatches as detail the circumstances which led to an interruption of the trade for a short period in December last, and the steps which you took, in consequence, with a view to the re-opening of the trade, and to the re-establishment of your official communication with the Chinese authorities, I have to signify to you the entire approbation of her Majesty’s government of your conduct on these matters. But I have at the same time to instruct you, not to omit to avail yourself of any proper opportunity to press for the substitution of a less objectionable character than the character ‘Pin,’ on the subscription of the communications which you have occasion to address to the viceroy.—I am, &c., (Signed) “PALMERSTON.”

He was not turning into ridicule the adherence to forms, nor underrating its importance; but to answer such communications on the growing difficulty, by saying we approve of the course of practical conduct you have pursued, but be good enough to claim the right of using the less objectionable character than that of “Pin” on the subscription of your letters; for the right hon. gentleman (Sir J. Hobhouse) to get up and say that such an answer was worthy of the occasion, would, if he had not heard him, have exceeded the bounds of his credibility. But he came to the point which he had selected; and as he took one point only, he trusted he should meet with the attention of the House. He meant to support the charge that her Majesty’s government did not give to their superintendent the powers which they might have given—powers which were essential to the performance of his functions—powers with which by the act of parliament they were fully entitled to invest him—and powers with which, if he were supplied, might have materially contributed to avert the calamity which had befallen us. The House would bear in mind that an act of parliament, passed in 1833, called the China Trade Act, substituted for the existing relations with China another form of official communication. The 6th clause of that act gave the government almost unlimited discretionary powers—as full and complete as an act of parliament ever conferred. The 6th clause enacted that:—“It shall and may be lawful for his Majesty, by any such order or orders, commission or commissions, as to his Majesty in Council shall appear expedient and salutary, to give to the said superintendents, or any of them, powers and authorities over and in respect of the trade and commerce of his Majesty’s subjects within any part of the said dominions, and to make and issue directions and regulations touching the said trade and commerce, and for the government of his Majesty’s subjects within the said dominions, and to impose penalties, forfeitures, or imprisonments for the breach of any such directions or regulations, to be enforced in such manner as in the said order or orders shall be specified, and to create a court of justice with criminal and admiralty jurisdiction, for the trial of offences committed by his Majesty’s subjects within the said dominions, and the ports and havens thereof, and on the high seas within 100 miles of the coast of China, and to appoint one of the superintendents herein before mentioned to be the officer to hold such court, and other officers for executing the process thereof, and to grant such salaries to such officers as to his Majesty in Council shall appear reasonable.”

It also enabled them to constitute courts of admiralty and of criminal jurisdiction for the trial of offences. An order in council, professing to be founded on the authority of this act, was issued. But that order in council gave to the superintendent such powers and authorities as certain officers of the East India Company, called supercargoes, had theretofore exercised; and whatever regulations were in force in April, 1834, were continued in force by this new constitution of our official relations. Now, in point of fact, the supercargo had then no authority, and there were no regulations in force. There was the East India Company at hand, for the purpose of ascertaining what their regulations and authority were; but the first order in council issued under the act, gave no legal authority whatever to the superintendent. But the answer to that was, “There are other gentlemen at his side of the House parties to that order.” Be it so, solamen miseris socios habuisse. That was an error of omission, but why were not steps taken to correct it? For that neglect, at least, his friends were not responsible; but the right hon. gentleman must show that the ministers had timely notice of the defect, that they might have repaired it, and that they had not done so; and, up to this hour, had left their superintendent without adequate authority. He asserted, moreover, that a great part of the mischief and embarrassment which had arisen, arose from the want of such powers. Now, in the first place, he maintained that the forcing of the passage of Bocca Tigris by the Jardine, as described by Captain Elliot, arose from the want of such powers; that when Captain Elliot attempted to make regulations for the ships at Whampoa, he found himself equally helpless—that when negotiations were going on in an amicable spirit, and were interrupted by the conduct of the commander of the Thomas Coutts, that the want of such powers were the cause of the embarrassment; and he would establish, he thought, by conclusive proof, the assertions which he had made. He would first of all take the case of the Jardine. Captain Elliot says, in his despatch of Dec. 27th, 1835:—“I hear it is very generally reported to-day that the steam-boat Jardine, now at Lintin, is to proceed to Canton on Tuesday or Wednesday next. The inquietude of the provincial government upon the subject of this vessel, has already been manifested in an edict, desiring that she should leave the country; and I am informed a request to let her ply in the river as a passage-boat has just been negatived. In the present state of circumstances, I feel it my duty to advise that a public letter should be forthwith addressed to the commander of the steam-boat, enjoining him, under the King’s authority, by no means to proceed up the river at present * * * We have been specially warned, and the Chinese officers know the advantage that particular circumstances will afford them, for the vindication of any measures which our scornful disregard of their authority may lead them to pursue. If this steam-vessel goes up the river at this moment, I feel a persuasion that some grave public inconvenience will ensue. * * * In this case, it is my strong opinion that the Chinese will resort to some general measure in assertion of their powers and independence as a government, involving the interruption of this trade, till some required concession shall be made. No government can afford, if I may so express it, to be reduced to utter contempt in the sight of its own people by a handful of heedless foreigners; the sacrifice in point of public estimation is far too considerable."

What was the answer to that? In the first place the whole of the despatch was not given, and therefore, what might have been the representations contained in that despatch he knew not, for there was only a minute of it. The answer, however, was a recommendation to the superintendent to use caution in his interference—that in the present state of our relations with China, it was incumbent to avoid all causes of offence, and not exercise a greater degree of authority than he actually possessed. Good advice, no doubt, as he possessed no authority; but why did not the government give him authority, when it was said, at last, that the Chinese government had resorted to violent and outrageous action? True, they had done so, and, abstractedly speaking, perhaps there was no justification for their having done so. But they must not look to the mere abstract act—at the last word that preceded the first blow—but they must look to the whole tenour of the collision to form a just view of its character. Let the House bear in mind what had been stated by Captain Elliot, that the interests at stake were of immense importance, and that no government could afford to bear the sacrifice of them; and let it also bear in mind the growing causes of exasperation, before it decided on the real character of the transaction. What was Captain Elliot to infer from the instructions sent him, not to interfere with the enterprises of British merchants? Take the case of the regulations made by Captain Elliot with respect to vessels at Whampoa. In that case, and in consequence of the conflicts which had taken place between the crews of British vessels and the Chinese, Captain Elliot found it necessary, as he thought, acting under the powers given him by the order in council, to establish certain police regulations for the conduct of those vessels and their crews. In April, 1838, three years after the last despatches he had referred to, Captain Elliot wrote thus:—"Most serious disturbances, however, had been frequent on this point, and therefore, on my return to Canton, I drew up the accompanying memorandum, furnishing it to the commanders of ships as they arrived, in order that it might be read in the event of need."

Captain Elliot stated, that "The immediate circumstance which led to this measure, was a dangerous disturbance on board the ship, Abercomby Robinson, at Whampoa;"

And he added, that "Every season since the opening of the trade had been marked by constant scenes of disgraceful and dangerous riot at Whampoa, and my own personal attention could not at all times be given without public inconvenience."

What was the answer given to that letter? It was, that the order in council gave him no authority to establish police regulations. The reply of the noble lord opposite was to the following effect:—"The law-officers of the Crown think, that the regulations in question are not in any way at variance with the laws of England, provided they be duly made and issued by her Majesty, according to the Act of the 3rd and 4th of William IV. c. 93, s. 6, but that you have no power of your own authority to make any such regulations. With respect to the territorial rights of China, the law-officers are of opinion, that the regulations, amounting in fact to the establishment of a system of police at Whampoa, within the dominions of the emperor of China, would be an interference with the absolute right of sovereignty enjoyed by independent states, which can only be justified by positive treaty, or implied permission from usage. Under these circumstances, I have to instruct you to endeavour to obtain the written approval of the governor of Canton for these regulations, and as soon as the approval is received in this country, the proper steps shall be taken for giving force to those regulations, according to the provisions of the Act of Parliament."

Now he wanted to know what had prevented the government, two years ago, from giving to the superintendent at Canton the powers necessary to prevent a vessel, like the Jardine, from ascending the river—to establish regulations for the preservation of peace on board the British shipping at Whampoa—and to avoid that rupture which took place at a later period, in consequence of the ship, Thomas Coutts, going up the river to Canton? He would prove, that at an early period the government had distinct notice of the deficiency of the powers possessed by the superintendent under the order in council. On the 1st of July, 1835, Sir G. Robinson informed the noble lord, that the superintendents did not possess the powers which the order in council professed to give them. He would read an extract from Sir G. Robinson's despatch. "Now, my lord, it is respectfully submitted that there were no regulations in existence of the nature contemplated in that order in council."

This despatch was received on the 28th of January, 1836, and therefore the government was then aware that the superintendents had no legal authority to act; and yet, on the 28th of May, 1836, four months afterwards, the noble lord told Sir G. Robinson, that "it would be desirable to extend the limits of the powers of the superintendents." Was such an answer consistent with the supposition that the noble lord had read the despatches? The government knew that the superintendents had no legal authority—that the order in council was a dead letter, that the superintendents had neither the powers of the supercargoes, nor any other power; and yet on the 28th of May, 1836, the noble lord wrote to say, "That his Majesty's government thought it desirable to extend the powers of the superintendents of British trade in China."

The noble lord went on to say, "I have therefore to instruct you publicly to notify, that the jurisdiction of the commission is to be extended, so as to include Lintin and Macao, and that from the date of the promulgation of such notification, the authority of the superintendents over British subjects and ships, is to be considered as extending to Macao as well as Canton, and as being of equal force and validity within this extended jurisdiction, as it has hitherto been within the limits of the port of Canton."

These were the wise general powers which should be given to the superintendents, of which the House had heard so much! The officer of the government informed the ministers that the order in council did not give him the powers which were necessary. They knew that fact in 1836. Four years had passed, and yet they had not supplied the defect. Indeed, four months afterwards, when they knew that the order in council was illegal, and that no jurisdiction existed, their answer was, that the jurisdiction of the superintendent was to be extended from Canton to Macao. The government could not deny that they were aware of the non-existence of jurisdiction; for, on the 8th of November, 1836, the noble lord opposite wrote, that the government was aware of the inconvenience arising from the undefined nature of the jurisdiction of the superintendents, and the want of power to enforce their measures. Now, it might be difficult to say, what might have been the effect, if the chief superintendent at Canton had possessed the powers for which he so earnestly pressed; it might be difficult to say, if he could have restrained the Chinese from ill-using English sailors, or murdering Iascars—if he could have prevented the outrages at Canton—if, when the Chinese were inclined to negotiate, and had actually entered upon negotiation, he could have prevented the rupture of that negotiation by the single act of a British captain—all this it might be difficult to show; but he now proceeded to establish, that with respect to the trade in opium, which her Majesty's government said was uncontrollable by the British government, that if the superintendent had had proper powers, which her Majesty's ministers knew that he had not, but which they neglected to supply him, some, at least, of the great evils which the opium trade involved in it might have been avoided. He said, that the evil was not merely in carrying on the illicit traffic, he admitted that it might have been most difficult to have prevented that traffic, he admitted that the cupidity which had risen up in consequence of long indulgence might have made it most difficult to suppress such a traffic, but the question was, whether proper powers, if vested in the superintendent, would not have robbed that traffic of much that had given offence to the Chinese government. He took the language of Captain Elliot. On the 30th of January, 1839, Captain Elliot wrote—"There seems, my lords, no longer any room to doubt, that the court has firmly determined to suppress, or more probably, most extensively to check, the opium trade. The immense, and it must be said, the most unfortunate increase of the supply during the last four years, the rapid growth of the east coast trade, and the continued drain of the silver, have, no doubt, greatly alarmed the government."

Now let the House listen to this passage—"But the manner of the rash course of traffic within the river, has probably contributed most of all to impress the urgent necessity of arresting the growing audacity of the foreign smugglers, and preventing their associating themselves with the desperate and lawless of their own large cities."

And observe that the opposition of the Chinese government was to the opium trade within the Canton waters; it was not merely the existence of the trade, but the manner of carrying it on, which exasperated that government. Captain Elliot said, in the same despatch,—“Whilst such a traffic existed, indeed, in the heart of our regular commerce, I had all along felt that the Chinese government had a just ground for harsh measures towards the lawful trade, upon the plea, that there was no distinguishing between the right and the wrong. But I told Howqua, that should never happen so long as the governor enabled me to perform my duty; and it could not have happened at all but for his Excellency's countenance.”

On the 2nd of January, 1839, he quoted this with reference to the illicit trade in opium alone, Captain Elliot said—"Carefully considering the critical posture of the momentous interests confided to me, and resolved as a preliminary measure upon an appeal to the whole community; not only with some hope, that such a proceeding might have the effect of clearing the river of these boats, but because (if the case were otherwise), I felt it became me distinctly to forewarn her Majesty's subjects concerned in these practices, of the course which it was my determination to pursue."

Captain Elliot proceeded—"There is certainly a spirit in active force amongst British subjects in this country, which makes it necessary for the safety of momentous concerns, that the officer on the spot should be known to stand without blame in the estimation of her Majesty's government; and it is not less needful that he should be forthwith vested with defined and adequate powers, for the reasonable control of men whose rash conduct cannot be left to the operation of Chinese laws without the utmost inconvenience and risk, and whose impunity is alike injurious to British character, and dangerous to British interests."

That complaint could not have been made if the powers which her Majesty's government must have known were wanted, had been given. But, above all, let the House read and well consider the private conversation which Captain Elliot had with Howqua on the consequences which must follow from the absence of these powers. On the 2nd of January, 1839, Captain Elliot wrote—"I hope it will not be thought intrusive if I mention that I have recently had a conversation with Howqua upon this point, on which occasion I explained, as carefully as I could, your lordship's reasoning in the debate in the House of Commons on the China Courts Bill. He concurred in every word that was said, and particularly on the inexpediency of drawing the subject under the attention of this government, till all things were ready to go into operation. He referred me with earnestness to the requests which had been made before the Company's monopoly was abolished, to make provision for the government of her Majesty's subjects, and he desired to know what more was wanted, and how it was possible the peace was to be maintained if all the English people who came to this country were to be left without control."

That was the opinion of one of the most eminent and most intelligent of the Chinese merchants,—the opinion of one who had had the most intercourse with Englishmen, who was best acquainted among the Chinese with the English character, who was best able to see the consequences which must flow from the absence of control over the English resorting to Canton. Captain Elliot also said—"Howqua further entreated me to remind 'my nation's great ministers,' that this government never interposed except in cases of extreme urgency, upon the principle that they were ignorant of our laws and customs, and that it was unjust to subject us to rules made for people of totally different habits, and brought up under a totally different discipline." "I must confess, my lord," said Captain Elliot, "that this reasoning appears to me to be marked by wisdom and great moderation; and, at all events, convinced, as I am, that the necessity of control, either by British or Chinese law, is urgent, I would most respectfully submit these views to the attentive consideration of her Majesty's government." "In fact, my lord," he went on to say, "if her Majesty's officer is to be of any use for the purposes of just protection, if the well-founded hope of improving things honourable and established, is not to be sacrificed to the chances which may be cast up by goading this government into some sudden and violent assertion of its own authority, there is certainly no time to be lost in providing for the defined and reasonable control of her Majesty's subjects in China."

Why, what was the answer to this? Her Majesty's government had power by the China Trade Act of 1833; they knew that in January, 1836, the powers which the superintendent had were inefficient; that no other means could effect the required object but increased power, was repeatedly shown since 1836. The government were cognizant of this; they had it here, from a most intelligent native merchant, that, by Chinese law, the subjects of the British Crown could not be punished; and he asked, how it could be expected that the peace could be preserved without some powers of control were given to her Majesty's officer? Captain Elliot said, that he found this reasoning to be marked with wisdom and moderation; but, above all, the government had that prophetic warning of Captain Elliot's, that, if proper powers were withheld, he could not answer that some sudden and violent exercise of its authority might not be manifested on the part of the Chinese government, goaded as it was by the continual outrages of British subjects, stung as it was, to the quick, by repeated contempts of its authority, irritated almost to desperation by what neither they nor the British superintendent could prevent, her Majesty's government had in truth no alternative but to give the superintendent the means of definite control over all British subjects trading to China. Had he not gone far to show on this single isolated point—first, that the grave charge upon her Majesty's government, of not giving the superintendent the powers which they must have known that he wanted, and which were indispensable, was well founded; secondly, that there was reason to suppose that a great part of our present embarrassments arose from the want of control over the British at Canton, and the neglect of her Majesty's government to supply the requisite powers? What answer would be given to this by the noble lord? It would be said that application had been made to parliament to give the powers requisite, and that parliament did not meet the views of the government. He (Sir Robert Peel) would give a narrative of that application. In January, 1836, the government knew that the powers were defective, the order in council was a mockery. The session of 1836 commenced. No step was taken. In 1827 a bill was brought forward, but not till June 28. It passed the House of Commons without debate. It was withdrawn from the Lords also without debate, on account, it was said, of the lateness of the session. This was on the 10th of July. Parliament was prorogued on the 17th; that was to say, the government knew in January, 1836, that the superintendent had not adequate powers, yet parliament was not moved to give the powers for legislation until 1837, when the bill was withdrawn without remonstrance, and without a word, good, bad, or indifferent, being said upon it. 1838 arrived, and they applied again to parliament for increase of powers. They brought in the bill on the 30th of April, 1838, and there were, he believed, twenty-two postponements from day to day. It was read a second time in July. [Lord Palmerston: The 21st of May.] It passed the House of Commons in July. This bill, which had been unopposed in the House of Commons, and had been withdrawn from the Lords on the 10th of July, 1837, did not appear in committee in the House of Commons till the 28th of July, some twenty days after it had been withdrawn from the Lords in the previous session, on account of the lateness of the period. Papers were presented to the House on that occasion, calculated, if ever papers were, to mislead them. The House would be led to infer, from this correspondence, that every thing was in a satisfactory state with respect to our position in China. An opposition was made to that bill, and it was withdrawn. But what did that bill effect? It merely added a civil jurisdiction to the jurisdiction which existed before. But when they lost that bill in 1838, what had prevented them from exercising, by the authority of the executive government, the full power which they had under the act of 1833, and convey to their superintendent at least criminal and admiralty jurisdiction? He did not under-rate the importance of civil jurisdiction; but if, through the neglect or indifference of parliament or any other cause, the government had not succeeded in gaining the civil jurisdiction, they were perfectly independent of parliament, so far as the criminal and admiralty jurisdiction were concerned, which by order in council might have been established. They might say, indeed, that the consent of the Chinese authorities was necessary before they confirmed their own order in council, in which it was stated that the Chinese government not only consented to this control, but they requested it to be conferred; and surely, they would not now fall back on the excuse, that they could not confer the powers because they had not the consent of the Chinese authorities. They despaired, perhaps, of procuring the assent of the Chinese government. What said, at a later period, their own superintendent? On the 26th of September, 1837, he said distinctly—"I would in this place, my lord, express a respectful but earnest hope, that no time may be lost in the promotion of adequate judicial institutions for the protection of the King's subjects; and I have no hesitation in assuring your lordship, that it is in my power to secure from the provincial authorities the most formal sanction of it."

Now, here he closed his case. He felt that he had established what he undertook to establish—namely, that her Majesty's ministers were in possession of the means to confer the necessary powers—that they were cognizant of the fact, that these powers did not exist—that they were sensible of the importance of them—that they received continual remonstrances on account of their absence from the superintendent and representative, and from January, 1836, up to this hour, the evil had continued to exist—had become aggravated by the lapse of time; but no attempt whatever had been made to supply it, although the law had provided them with ample power of furnishing it. As strong a case might be made out on the absence of moral influence which naval power gave under the peculiar circumstances in which the superintendent was placed. As strong a case might be made out with respect to the neglect of giving instructions. On these points he would not touch. He again repeated his deliberate conviction, that this great calamity with which we were threatened, was mainly attributable to the neglect and misconduct of her Majesty's government. At the same time there was another and perfectly distinct question, what under these circumstances of extreme difficulty might be fitting to be done? The right hon. baronet (Sir J. Hobhouse) had acquitted those who were opposed to the government of taking every opportunity of embarrassing the government by motions relating to their foreign policy; for the right hon. baronet had said, that during the struggle in the north-west frontier of India, at a time when the issue was doubtful, so little disposition was there to embarrass the government, or to take advantage of any defeat or calamity which, in spite of the best precautions, and the utmost gallantry of our soldiers, might possibly arise, that the opposition forbore from saying a single word upon the subject. The noble lord (Viscount Palmerston) smiled: but this was the testimony of his own colleague. This was the panegyric passed upon the conduct of the opposition by at least an impartial witness, being no other than the right hon. baronet, peculiarly charged with the affairs of India. And what was it that that right hon. baronet, who, from his position in the government, was best calculated to form a correct judgment as to the conduct of the opposition—what was it that that right hon. baronet said? Why, that pending the struggle on the south-west frontier of India, the opposition had acted with a wisdom, moderation, and discretion, which entitled them to the highest praise. He thanked the right hon. baronet for the conclusive reply which he gave upon that point to the hon. member for Lambeth (Mr. Hawes), who had not been quite so charitable in the construction which he put upon the conduct of the opposition. He (Sir R. Peel) had not the slightest doubt that if, in the present instance, the object of the opposition had been to devise the most merciful mode of attacking the policy of the ministry in reference to China, the mode by which they could have done so most effectually would have been, by bringing forward a motion denouncing the opium trade, and deprecating altogether the war into which we were about to plunge. If for party purposes they had made such a motion, he greatly doubted whether a considerable majority of the House of Commons might not possibly have voted with them. But he certainly could not consent to conciliate support to the motion now before the House, by any positive declaration that he denied the necessity of a hostile demonstration with respect to China. He might think, as he had said before, that a violent outrage had been committed, for which the government were responsible [cheers from the opposition], having failed to adopt the means that were in their power of preventing it, but which, having been committed, none perhaps but the melancholy alternative of war might remain. It might be that, after what had passed, British honour and the British name would be disgraced, unless some measure were taken to procure reparation for the injuries and insults which had been committed on us. The noble lord had told them what were the motives for entering into this war. They were threefold; they were, "to obtain reparation for the insults and injuries offered to her Majesty's superintendent and subjects; an indemnity for the loss of their property incurred by threats of violence; and lastly, that the trade and commerce of this country should be maintained upon a proper footing." The exact meaning of this he did not know. [Lord J. Russell.—It is not what I said.] He thought it probable that the Morning Chronicle was correct in attributing those words to the noble lord. "Proper footing" were exceedingly indefinite words.

Lord J. Russell.—If the right hon. gentleman will allow me, my words were—"that lives and properties of British subjects trading in China should be secure."

Sir R. Peel.—But even if it should be demonstrated that hostilities were inevitable, he must say he should deprecate the conduct of them in the spirit in which they had been spoken of by the right hon. gentleman, the Secretary at War. When the right hon. gentleman referred to the vengeance which had been taken at the battle of Plessey, of having humbled in the dust the Dey of Algiers, he was speaking in a tone and a spirit not essentially necessary to the vigorous prosecution of hostilities, and which might aggravate the calamities of war. He might deprecate, also, the details which had been entered into of outrages committed by the Chinese, without some clear and more decisive proof with respect to some of those points. He knew how easy it was, from the past experience of this country in similar circumstances, to arouse the public indignation by the detail of individual outrages; but they ought to be perfectly satisfied of the evidence on which the allegations rested. An advantage had been taken of an expression used by an hon. member in the heat of debate, with a joyfulness which proved to him how happy hon. gentlemen opposite were to have any adventitious aid, even from the casual expression of a man whose character and uniform manner must have taught them they were putting a construction upon his expressions which he never meant. What was the evidence that the Chinese had resorted to an act which all must admit to be contrary to the usages of war—the poisoning of the wells? It was alluded to in a despatch of Captain Elliot, who said he had heard of a placard declaring that the wells were poisoned, and that he did not believe that it had been done with the consent of the Chinese authorities. There was not the slightest evidence of the fact that there had been any poisoning of the wells, and he deprecated any allusion being made to such a fact, for the purpose of exciting public clamour against a great people, but a people of unwarlike habits, and with whom it was of the utmost importance that, after the hostilities we might be forced to enter into, amicable relations and a friendly spirit might again be renewed. The poisoning the wells would be bad enough, but let them not on that account poison the people of this country by allegations such as those he had referred to, while unsupported by sufficient proof. There had been outrages committed by the people of China, and he regretted it; but he might set against these outrages the testimonies which had been borne to the character of the people of that country; and though an individual act might have been committed which would admit of no defence, they should also recollect the provocations the Chinese had received. They should recollect the acts of Lord Napier—they should recollect the publication of a printed placard in the streets of Canton, which roused the people of that country against us—and they should recollect the effects that might be produced on a nation ignorant of our usages by such appeals. They should recollect all the collisions which had taken place, and he believed they would then be surprised at the forbearance of the Chinese under the great irritation and exasperation which they had received, and recollecting that, they would not try to aggravate the necessary horrors of war, by laying the foundation of permanent lasting hostilities. Honourable testimony had been borne in the despatches before the House to the character of the people of China; and he wished to refer to their conduct, when they delivered up to the British authorities, fifteen British seamen who had been wrecked on their coast. Captain Elliot says:—"The fifteen people belonging to the brig Fairy, were despatched to Canton by the government of Fuhkeen on the day after the arrival of the Raleigh at the mouth of the Min river, and they were all safely delivered over into my hands, by the authorities of this province, on the 2nd inst. Their generous treatment by the Chinese authorities has been in the highest degree honourable to the humanity of this government, and I have not failed to convey my respectful sense of such conduct to his excellency the governor."

Captain Elliot also said :—" Before I dismiss this subject, I would respectfully suggest and request that your lordship should address a letter to the governor of Canton, expressive of thanks for the very generous treatment of these fifteen persons. They were well fed, lodged, and clad, and upon their final departure from Foo-chow-foo, each individual received a present in silver to the amount of about 50s. The one-half of their journey to Canton was performed in chairs. There would be no difficulty in transmitting your lordship's letter to the governor through an officer, as was done in the case of the Governor-general of India's communication, brought on in the year 1829, by Captain Freemantle."

Now, he wished to ask the noble lord if he had acted on that suggestion—and if he had attempted to mitigate the hostile spirit of the Chinese authorities by returning some civil acknowledgment for such an act? Another favourable testimony had been borne to the character of the Chinese. When Captain Maitland was leaving China, he said it was a duty he owed to the commander of the war-junks at Canton to state, that their conduct had been marked by the strictest propriety. Captain Elliot, speaking of the general position of the English in China, said that there were many proofs of the sense of justice entertained by that people before the late outrages took place. He said that in no part of the world was life and property so secure as in Canton. He added, speaking of the act of humanity towards seamen, that he believed that in many important respects the Chinese were the most moderate and reasonable people on the face of the earth. After all those collisions and animosities, they had it from their own officer, the superintendent of Canton—that he believed the Chinese to be in many respects the most moderate and reasonable people on the face of earth. He only asked them at the moment when they were meditating this blow, not to direct it in a revengeful spirit. War, if engaged in, must be conducted with vigour; but for God's sake, if they were going to enter into hostilities with an unwarlike people, amounting to 350,000,000, let it not be in a vindictive spirit. Was there any man at the other side of the House who repudiated this sentiment? Did they not wish that justice should be executed, and that the foundation of permanent tranquillity should be laid? The Chinese had an extensive demand for our commodities, and we might depend on it, that every blow we struck in this contest, would recoil on ourselves. We should ravage no place in China, without in some degree injuring some manufacture at home. He did not underrate our powers in any conflict; it was evident we must have the superiority. They could not read the history of the action of the English frigates with the war-junks, which had passed up their line, sinking one after the other, whilst the only shot which struck the English, was one in the mainmast, without feeling that our superiority was great indeed. But let us not be deceived as to the perilous nature of the conflict, and its necessary consequences. A new power might arise amongst millions of people, and new weapons which national honour might furnish—nay, even in the majesty of our power, in the certainty of our success, might consist our ruin. We had taken vengeance at Plessey for the horrors of the Black-hole at Calcutta, and how little was it apprehended that such immense results would follow! He was struck by the remarks of the historian on those events. Mr Clive marched in 1757, at the head of 700 Europeans, and 1,500 natives, obtained a great victory, and a great revolution was the consequence. In the space of fourteen days, one sovereign was deposed, and another placed in his stead. In fourteen days a great revolution was effected, and a government superior in wealth, territory, and population, to most European states, was transferred from one sovereign to another, under the command of a man wholly unacquainted with the arts of war. He (Sir R. Peel) did not know what might be the result of the war with China. He did not know to what revolution it might give rise. There might be universal anarchy, and we might have no alternative but to take the course which they had taken before, and they would then find themselves the necessary masters of that mighty people. Let them remember, too, that there were other powers concerned; and in the course of a conflict with a commercial people having relations with so many powerful countries, they ought to be prepared for the possible contingency of collisions with the nations which traded with China. It had been thought, that other nations would make common cause with us for the purpose of extorting general advantage. Do not act (said the right hon. baronet) on that opinion. You instituted a blockade on the 11th of September. You withdraw it on the 16th. You instituted it on the supposition that a boat was missing, and you withdraw it because the supposition was a mistake, and the boat was recovered. But do not forget, that the result of your blockade was a protest from the Americans, who told Captain Smith that the blockade was unlawful, and that he must be responsible for any loss they might suffer from it. But I cannot help thinking, that the protest was more effectual in putting an end to the blockade, than the recovery of the men. That protest must have dissipated the illusion that common cause would be made with us by the other Christian nations. Have you read the recent debates in Congress? Have you referred to the despatches of Admiral Owen, who was stationed on the coast of China; who says—"Whilst, during war, our naval superiority had driven away every flag from Canton but our own, the threat of stopping trade was an effectual restriction on the Chinese authorities. But since the Dutch, the Danish, French, American, and even the Russian flags have, I believe, now found their way to China, there are not wanting those who will instruct the Chinese governors and others, that an export under such flags may be made with as much benefit to China, and the vessels will be more under the control of, and better subjected to, their regulations."

Again and again, I say, do not enter into this war without a becoming spirit—a spirit becoming the name and character of England. Do not forget the peculiar character of the people with whom you have to deal, and so temper your measures that as little evil as possible may remain. Remember that the character of the people has lasted for many generations, that it is the same now that was given to them by Pliny, and many subsequent writers. It is your duty to vindicate the honour of England, where vindication is necessary, and to demand reparation wherever reparation is due. But God grant that all this may lead to the restoration of amicable relations with China, with little disturbance of our relations with other nations! In the absence of every confidence in her Majesty's ministers, I will express a wish, in which the party of the right hon. member for Edinburgh would join—I pray the Almighty Disposer, from whom all just counsel and good works proceed—I pray to God that he will dispose the minds of this people, and defend them from the evils which they may deserve. I pray to God that he will avert from them the calamities, and turn from us the evils, which, I must say, the neglect and incapacity of our rulers have most righteously deserved.

On a division the numbers were: Ayes, 262; Noes, 271; majority against the resolution, 9.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, that he had given notice of a motion for the production of the orders in council, directing reprisals to be made on vessels belonging to the Emperor of China, or any of his subjects; but he found that the necessity for that motion was obviated by the order in council which the noble lord had just laid on the table, directing such reprisals, and ordering a commission for the constitution of Admiralty or Vice-Admiralty courts. That commission had not yet been made out, but he hoped that when it should have received the assent of the Crown, there would be no objection to laying a copy of it before the House. [Viscount Palmerston: None.] It was not his intention to say any thing which could raise any debate on the subject at present, but he apprehended that the order in council authorized positive instructions to be given to all her Majesty's vessels of war to seize all vessels belonging to the Emperor of China, or to any of his subjects. This he apprehended was not a limited but a general order, extending not alone to the coasts of China, but to vessels of that nation wheresoever found. Then, in the event of seizure taking place, he would ask what was to become of the property so seized? Were such seizures to become droits of the Crown? He apprehended that the Admiralty courts would not proceed at once to adjudication, but that the course would be to detain the vessels, as the adjudication would depend on ulterior events, upon the contingency of the Emperor of China making compensation for the losses sustained by British subjects. But the principle question which he wished to put to the noble lord was, whether the order in council contained instructions to all her Majesty's vessels of war, to seize all ships belonging to China, in whatever seas they might be found?

Viscount Palmerston said, that the order in council contained full authority to all captains of her Majesty's ships of war to seize and detain all Chinese vessels they might fall in with; but practically the order would apply only to such of her Majesty's ships as were on the coast of China—for Chinese vessels were to be met with only in the seas bordering on their own coasts.

Sir Robert Peel: The noble lord then assumed, that the trade of China was carried on only on its own coasts? [Viscount Palmerston: Yes.] In ordinary circumstances that was perhaps the case, but under new circumstances there might be exceptions. He would now beg to ask the noble lord whether the usual proclamation as to the distribution of prize money had been issued?

The subject then dropped.

GRANT TO MAYNOOTH.

JUNE 23, 1840.

Mr. Plumptre presented several petitions against any further grant to the Roman Catholic College of Maynooth; and moved, "That, after the grant for the current year, no further payment of public money be made for the said college."

SIR ROBERT PEELE said, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Litton) was a correct prophet with respect to the vote he (Sir R. Peel) should give on the present occasion, but the hon. gentleman was not equally happy in his anticipations as to the speech he (Sir R. Peel) should make. He did not intend to rebuke those who had proposed and supported the present motion, neither should he express any compunction or regret for the course he was about to take. He was bound to say, that no man at present in this House, or who had ever sat in it, when he did come forward on a public question, was actuated by purer or more disinterested motives than his hon. friend, the member for Kent, who had brought forward this motion. But he (Sir R. Peel) had not the slightest hesitation as to the vote he should give on that motion, or in avowing the grounds upon which he should oppose the pledge contained in it. In the first place, it would be calculated to give equal dissatisfaction to those who would be affected by the vote, whether the grant were to be immediately withdrawn, or whether the House pledged itself to a withdrawal at a future period; for, if there had been a contract, as was contended, that contract would be quite as much violated by a withdrawal of the grant next year, as if it were to take place now. Having passed the grant for the last thirty or forty years, and as persons had prepared themselves for Maynooth, on the faith that it would not be withdrawn, the pledge to withhold it next year would be productive of quite as much embarrassment as if it were proposed to withhold it at present. For his own part, he did not think that there were sufficient grounds for violating an implied understanding upon which parliament had acted for thirty years; and he could not acquiesce in any motion for withholding the grant, unless stronger grounds were made out to show him that he had been in error in the votes which, for the thirty years that he had been in parliament, he had given upon this subject. The foundation had been established in Ireland at a period when religious animosities ran as high, at least, as they did at present, and political divisions were as great as they were now. It had been established, by a parliament exclusively Protestant, as an instrument to produce a disposition favourable to the Established Church, and to discourage the Jacobin doctrines which a foreign education was calculated to engender in those who were educated for the Roman Catholic priesthood of Ireland. The grant had survived the Act of Union, and had been continued by Mr. Perceval in 1806, though something diminished in amount. It was continued, even after the event connected with the election of 1806, by Mr. Perceval, who thought that its continuance was necessary for the fulfilment of the public faith. It was still further continued, after the removal of the disabilities which affected the Roman Catholics; and, being retained under all these great changes, he did not see now, why the House should pledge itself to the abolition. He did not mean to say, that there had been any contract entered into; but, originating as the grant did, and having survived so many changes, he must confess, that he could not help thinking, that a concurrence with the motion would show a hostile disposition towards the Roman Catholics of Ireland. He could not, however, concur in an observation which had fallen from the noble lord. He did not think that there existed such a compact as ought to prevent the interference of the legislature, if the grant should be perverted to evil purposes. He could not agree in the opinion, that the system of instruction pursued at Maynooth ought to be a matter of indifference to the House. He had not heard that observation made by the noble lord, but he had heard it imputed to him, and he had not seen, on the part of the noble lord, any sign of an energetic denial. Now, the system of education was a legitimate matter for the consideration of parliament, and the House would abandon its duty, if it were to avow the doctrine, that, because the grant had been continued for thirty years, it was, therefore, pledged to say to Maynooth, "You may inculcate what doctrine you please, however injurious to the supremacy of the law, and destructive to the established government and monarchy of the empire." If an opinion of that kind were put forward, he, for one, would never concur in it; and he thought it should be repudiated by every member of the House. A misappropriation of the grant would form a very proper subject of inquiry; and if it were proved, the question might be submitted to the House, whether, on that ground, the vote ought not to be discontinued. If accusations of this sort were made, all he could say was, that the recipients of the grant were the persons who should show most interest in challenging inquiry, for the purpose of conciliating the good will of the public, by showing, if such was the fact, that the charges were groundless. Under such circumstances, so far from inquiry being injurious, they should, as he said, be the first to challenge it. But, at the same time, he should say, that nothing but full proof of abuse, would render it wise in the House of Commons to enter into a pledge as to the future with respect to this grant. To him, however, it would be much more satisfactory to have the ground of accusation cut away, and, having established that, he should be able to give the vote which he was about to give with greater satisfaction. When persons not hostile to the establishment admitted the necessity of inquiry, at the same time that accusations were made, it was but fair that some inquiry should be entered upon which would remove the suspicions thus engendered. He had now given his opinion upon the question, without either censuring the opinions or impugning the conduct of the hon. gentleman by whom the question had been brought forward.

The House divided: Ayes, 42; Noes, 121; majority against the motion, 79.

THE ADDRESS.

JANUARY 26, 1841.

The Speaker having read to the House a copy of the Queen's speech, Lord Brasen moved the Address in reply.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, that there was one subject of such surpassing interest, connected with the peace of Europe, and with the general interests of humanity, which so completely cast into the shade all other topics, however important those topics might be in themselves, that it was hardly necessary upon that occasion to notice the omissions that were made in the speech, or to criticise the language in which the various topics were mentioned. If he were inclined to criticise the speech, he could not say that he ever recollected a speech which was more successful than this, in that merit which was generally conceded to documents of this description, the merit of saying as little as possible. On that point, he could not deem it a complete failure. The speech must be considered as the speech of her Majesty's ministers, and it possessed the advantage which had been ascribed by a great diplomatist to all language, that it was given to man for the purpose of concealing his thoughts. It was a careful speech, for the hon. gentlemen, the mover and seconder of the address, found it so utterly impossible to eke out their own speeches with becoming decency to the ordinary length, if they had confined themselves to the topics mentioned in the speech itself, that they felt it absolutely incumbent on them, even at the risk of offending her Majesty's government, to introduce many matters which they thought ought to have been introduced into the speech itself. The state of Canada, and the intentions of the Crown with respect to the union of the provinces, was one instance. It was omitted in the speech; it was touched upon by the hon. mover. The boundary question, again, was touched upon by the hon. seconder. The state of Ireland, and the progress of the repeal agitation, touched upon by the mover. The state of the war in India, and the progress of our arms in Affghanistan, again touched upon by the mover and the seconder. They gave a tacit acknowledgment, from which it was clear what were the topics that they would have introduced if they had prepared the speech for the throne. Nay, it was clear that they were in possession of information which did not appear to have reached her Majesty's government; for, talking of China, one of the hon. gentlemen exulted in a tone which those who had prepared the present speech could hardly have entertained. It seemed, then, that the document which had been supposed to be an edict of the Emperor of China, was not authentic, because the hon. gentleman had talked of the "humble tone assumed by the Emperor," and the hon. gentleman was fully aware of an arrangement that was to give indemnity for the losses suffered by her Majesty's subjects. He hoped that the hon. gentleman's information would prove to be correct, but all the speech asked the House to do was to concur in a mere statement of a matter of fact. The speech said only—"Having deemed it necessary to send to the coast of China a naval and military force, to demand reparation and redress for injuries inflicted upon some of my subjects, by the officers of the Emperor of China, and for indignities offered to an agent of my Crown, I, at the same time, appointed plenipotentiaries to treat upon these matters with the Chinese government. These plenipotentiaries were, by the last accounts, in negotiation with the government of China; and it will be a source of much gratification to me, if that government shall be induced by its own sense of justice to bring these matters to a speedy settlement by an amicable arrangement."

This was certainly a very moderate, and no doubt a very justifiable hope, but it was at variance with the assurance, on the faith of which the hon. gentleman had made his comments. He thought, however, that those who had framed the address in such cautious terms, had done quite right, for he held that unless notice were given, the address should always be so framed as not to demand any opposition, considering especially the disadvantages under which hon. gentlemen making any opposition necessarily laboured. There was, however, one topic of paramount importance—the present state of Europe, and the foreign relations of this country. On the very threshold of the discussion, he could not but express his deep regret and despondency, when he contemplated the present state of our relations with France, and when he heard on every side the din of military preparation. He did hope that, after the lapse of twenty-five years of profound peace—and with a new generation arrived at maturity, who had not taken an active part in the exploits of the last war—he had hoped that all fear had been dissipated, that there had been new guarantees for a prolonged peace, and that mankind generally had been convinced, not only of the inestimable advantage, but of the great moral obligation, to maintain peace, unless for the security of the nation, or for the vindication of the national honour; and he did hope that new material interests had arisen, which would effectually keep down any fresh demonstration of a warlike feeling. With respect to France, whether in power or in opposition, he had never held but one language, or one opinion, that a cordial and good understanding between France and England was essential to the peace and the welfare of Europe. He did not mean to say he was convinced that an intimate alliance of an exclusive nature between this country and France, giving offence to what the hon. gentleman called the great despotic and military powers of Europe—he was not prepared to say that he saw so fully the advantage of such an alliance as others; but no one felt more strongly than he did, that the best interests of humanity were involved in the maintenance of cordial good will and amicable relations between us and France. The French nation, or at least a part of it, entertained a false conception of the opinion of the people of England. It was not true that we felt—the man would be base and ungenerous indeed, who could feel—any triumph in the supposed humiliation of France. He did not believe that there was any wish on the part of this great community, though it had been called her natural enemy, and which had certainly been long and warmly engaged in conflict with her: he did not believe that there was the slightest wish that the power or authority of France should be curtailed, or that there would be the least rejoicing at any reverses befalling France, or subjecting that country to humiliation. At the same time, with that feeling strongly rooted in his mind, he was not prepared at once to say, that the policy which had been pursued of attempting the settlement of the eastern question was not necessary. He could conceive a case of complication arising from the Syrian question, if no vigorous attempt had been made at an adjustment, which would have involved this country in the very war which he was so much inclined to deprecate. It was no doubt true, that the Turkish empire had been long exhibiting symptoms of decadence and weakness. Still it existed in a state of decadence, and weakness was widely different from the approach of the actual dissolution of that empire; for in that event new interests would arise in Europe, and every effort should, in his opinion, be made, to prevent that conflict of interests, and that actual collision, which would arise on the dissolution of the Turkish empire. It was quite clear that the position which the Pacha of Egypt had maintained had become inconsistent with the independence of the Porte, and the interests of this country with Turkey. Well, then, it was said by some hon. gentlemen, "England shall have nothing to do with this; the events apprehended are merely a contingent possibility; they will take place at a remote part of the Mediterranean; and the true policy of England is, therefore, to refuse to take any part in the adjustment of these matters, for fear of the risk which we run." Now, let him take the opinion of the hon. member for Kilkenny, with respect to Russia, as correct—and mind, he did not assent to it—it was impossible to disguise from ourselves the relative position of the Russian empire, and of Constantinople. The peculiar nature of the Russian position, and the force of circumstances, must naturally subject her to jealousy and suspicion; but the course which Russia had pursued ought to have exempted her from some of the aspersions that had been cast upon her. But suppose those suspicions should be well founded, what was the security if we refused to interfere, and Russia were actuated by such ambitious designs as the hon. gentleman attributed to her, would she not take upon herself the part, or exclusive protection, which we refused to take upon ourselves? The hon. gentleman thought that the troubles which had taken place on the north-western frontiers of our Indian possessions were attributable to Russia. Suppose Russia should gain possession of Constantinople, in consequence of the growing weakness of the Turkish empire, would the hon. gentleman view that event with complacency? The hon. gentleman (the member for the City of London) clearly would not, because he stated that, in such an event, he would resort to the physical and material power of England to dispossess her of Constantinople. If that were a sound policy, and if it would be an object for England to dispossess Russia of Constantinople, when once she had gained possession, those who were of opinion that we ought to be prepared so to act in such an extremity, could not object on general grounds to that line of policy which would prevent Russia from getting there—which would prevent, by the exercise of our moral influence, the occurrence of that great calamity which would compel us to go to war with Russia, on ground where Russia, by her contiguity, must have a great advantage over us. It might be no easy matter, considering the position of Russia with Constantinople, and our own distance from the scene of action—it might be no easy matter to make the evacuation of Constantinople by Russia one condition of peace with us. The co-operation of France in effecting a settlement of the Eastern question would unquestionably have been of inestimable value. Of that there was no doubt, and when we were obliged to relinquish the hope that France would cordially unite with us in effecting that settlement; first, by the means of advice, and, secondly, by the aid of a demonstration, the question assumed a new shape, it was to be viewed under a new aspect, the chance of success was much less, the risk of evil was much more; but he thought that it would be difficult to say that if four great powers of Europe, acting as he assumed for the sake of argument, they did, with perfect integrity, really believing that the advance of a rebellious vassal upon Constantinople would be the signal for the dissolution of the Turkish empire, that great evil would arise from the necessary partition of the Turkish dominions, and if they were convinced that the general interests and welfare of Europe required an active intervention, he was not prepared to say, that when one of those powers refused to take part in that mediation, the other four powers should of necessity desist, because he was afraid that the consequence of such an example would not be limited to the single case, but that if the one power could exercise such an authority in the affairs of Europe, it would be tempted to extend its influence beyond that range. He would, therefore, suspend his opinion with respect to the convention till he should have received that further information from her Majesty's government, which he presumed they were prepared to give. They might be prepared to shew that the consequence of a refusal, on the part of England, would have been the immediate interference with Russia. They might remind us, that the event which occurred in 1833 would have occurred in 1840. The Porte applied to us, in 1833, for protection against this very vassal, Mehemet Ali: we refused; what was the consequence? The Porte applied for assistance to Russia; Russia did step in and interfere, and she received, as her reward for that assistance, the treaty, against which we were the first to protest, and which we were obliged to tell her we could not recognize as part of the law of Europe; we were almost driven to war, the very act which might be assumed to be again possible. It was possible that Russia might see her neighbour about to be spoiled, without justice, by one of her subjects usurping the power and authority delegated to him for the purpose of overthrowing his lord. He did believe that, in such an event, Russia or Austria would feel the necessity for an interference; he believed also, that there would be a recurrence to the course taken in 1833; and depend upon it Russia would not twice thus protect Turkey, and twice save her from annihilation, within a space of seven years, without these powers being placed in the relative position of master and slave. He therefore suspended his judgment upon the propriety of the treaty until he should have received the fullest information; but he should not be acting with justice, if, in the absence of that information, he were to agree to any amendment which would be a censure upon the parties to that treaty. He was prepared then to admit, first, that intervention might have been necessary—advisable, perhaps, if we could obtain the co-operation of France—that it might have been necessary, even if the co-operation of France were wholly refused; but he must say that, in proportion as the assistance of France was withdrawn, in proportion as we lost the chance of that cordial co-operation and assistance, which was so essential to us, because the absence greatly diminished the chances of our success—so ought we to have shown, and he trusted that we had shown, throughout the whole of the proceedings, the utmost consideration for the not unnatural feeling with which France would view a revival of the alliance of 1814. It was impossible to admit that there was any analogy in principle between the two treaties; but unfortunately with a sensitive and susceptible people, sometimes the coincidence of facts and circumstances stood in the place of a principle. Yet nothing was more dissimilar than the principle of the quadruple treaty, and that of the treaty which led to the occupation of Paris in 1814. He could make allowance, however, for the feeling of that country, which was among the most distinguished—he could not say more distinguished than our own—for having always set, and justly set, the highest value on its military character. He should be, indeed, sorry, if the French viewed the transactions of 1814 as any humiliation; they must naturally view with regret the reverses to which they were subject, but he was sure that no impartial man, reading the history of that campaign, unfortunate as the termination might be for France, could feel any other than the highest admiration for the skill of her general and the bravery of her soldiers. But the event was too recent, and the reverses, were too great, not to render France exceedingly jealous of any new alliance. He agreed that the evil of excitement by hon. members, aggravating that jealousy, was very great. He attached great importance to this point, and he hoped that the noble lord would not say that he had agreed in the propriety of the higher portion of the subject, and that he had censured only the minor part—that he admitted the great part to be good, and had carped at the small. If it had become necessary to act without France, he would have exhausted every means to convince France of the propriety of our course, he should have come to the resolution to act without her with the greatest regret and reluctance, and he would have left—as he hoped the noble lord had left—distinctly recorded the grounds for what, he trusted, was only the temporary secession of France: he would have exhausted every thing to show deference to the wounded feelings of France. Now, he told the noble lord that there was one point which, on reading the French debates, had given him the utmost concern.

He would quote exactly what passed in the Chamber of Deputies, and the report carried with it internal evidence that both parties concerned in the discussion were acting with perfect honesty, and were only describing their own feelings. M. Guizot was making a speech on the address, and stating the general warning which he had given to the French government, that the proceedings might possibly lead to a negotiation between the other powers, when he was interrupted by M. Thiers, who said:—"I will prove with the documents in my hands, since it appears that I am placed in a position of being compelled to justify myself in presence of an Ambassador who received his orders from me; I will prove, I say, to M. Guizot, that he told me, on the 14th of July, that we had still plenty of time before us, and that there was nothing to render urgency necessary."

To which M. Guizot replied:—"That is true. I foresaw what was probable, but I was sure of nothing."

Whereupon, M. Guizot proceeded to read further extracts from his despatch, when M. Thiers said:—

"This is all very true, but you quote only a portion of the letter. You will permit me to quote the other portion.

"M. Guizot—Certainly.

"M. Thiers—I will prove that you wrote to me on the 6th, 9th, and 14th of July, as follows:—'The English cabinet is in deliberation—there is great agitation—there is a crisis; but nothing as yet decided. Two plans have been prepared—one for five powers, for which propositions have been made to France, and the other for four powers, in the event of France refusing the propositions that will be made to her.' This is what you wrote to me. All your letters contain the supposition that before signing any treaty a proposition would be made to France.

"M. Guizot—That is true; I believed that such would be the case. All the world knows, that during the last days of the negotiation, France was kept in ignorance of what was going on. I was not exactly informed of the proceedings. What I told you, was what I believed. The treaty was concealed from us. This was wrong. It was not delicate conduct, and it was a proceeding against which I loudly protested. I was myself ignorant of the treaty, and therefore could not inform you of it. The fact of the treaty having been signed was not communicated to me until the 17th of July, two days after it took place."

He had read that passage with great concern. The noble lord might say, that from the month of October, to the month of July, intimation was given to France, that negotiations were pending, and that France ought to have conceived that the treaty would have been signed. He did not deny that this was not different from the general tone of the language held by M. Guizot. But, considering the character of the man, and especially considering the friendly feeling of M. Guizot towards England, he could not but say, that after the signing of the treaty of the 15th of July, between the powers who were severally parties to the treaties of 1814 and 1815, having such a man as M. Guizot resident amongst us, and leaving him ignorant of the fact, he was not surprised that there should be some ground for indignation. He did not assert that the parties to the treaty might not have signed it without the concurrence or knowledge of France; but he thought that they would not have been going out of the way to have dealt with the prejudice, and he thought that there would have been an advantage, if in the most temperate and considerate way we had apprised M. Guizot that the object must be attained, and saying to him, "If you do not immediately determine to join with us, we must proceed without you; and in strict candour we must tell you that the affair must be settled." He had carefully read all the letters, and though M. Guizot evidently saw in a dark vista the possibility of a treaty, yet, on the 6th, 9th, and 14th of July, he believed it was distant, and he was in the humiliating situation of not being aware that on the very next day to the 14th, the treaty would be signed. He did regret that proceeding. The noble lord said that it was better to communicate the treaty itself. If the noble lord had said to France, "We are going to war with Syria, and are indifferent whether you join us or not," he believed that it might have been offensive; but if he had gone and said, in a perfectly conciliatory spirit, "This is about to be done; will you co-operate with us, or will you decline to aid or countenance us in our proceedings?" he could not help thinking that much of that interruption of the friendly intercourse which had formerly prevailed, which had taken place, might have been prevented, and he certainly could not help thinking that such a course would have given much less offence than that which had been adopted, of signing the treaty, and then communicating the fact. In private life it must be felt that such would have been the fitter mode of proceeding, and it would have been certainly the more friendly course to communicate the positive intention to do an act, than to adopt the act and then to make it known. Let them recollect what had happened at Verona. In the year 1822, France was about to march an army into Spain, and the circumstances which then existed were not dissimilar to those of the present case. At Verona, France communicated to the allies her intention to invade Spain. The three other powers, Russia, Prussia, and Austria, countenanced the proceedings, but the Duke of Wellington and Mr. Canning decidedly objected to it. But there was, up to the last moment, the most unrestrained communication between the four powers who were parties to the intended invasion, and England, and he could not help thinking, that if the army had been marched without a previous communication being made to England, feelings would have been expressed of regret and disappointment at that course being taken. The noble lord would find, that communications had passed between M. Chateaubriand and Mr. Canning, and that, in consequence of the remonstrance of England, M. Villèle was sent to keep back the army which France was about to send,—facts which proved at least that England was admitted to the conference. All that he contended for was, that this was the more friendly course, and although they might fail in convincing the party of the necessity of the course which they were about to pursue, much of that jealousy might have been prevented which was the result of deciding on and adopting an act one day, and communicating that fact the next, and then saying it was too late to interfere. There was another point upon which he felt bound to say a few words. He must enter his protest against parliament having been allowed to separate last year without a knowledge of the events then in progress having been communicated to it. We were on the point of a rupture, affecting the interests of Europe, and the maintenance of our communication with a powerful empire, when the parliament was permitted to separate. Parliament was sitting on the 15th of July, when the noble lord said, that he still hoped for the cordial co-operation of France; that France had expressed a favourable opinion with respect to the independence of the Ottoman empire, and the general tenor of the speech of the noble lord was, that France was favourable to his views. The noble lord had then the letter of M. Guizot in his possession, containing a strong remonstrance upon the subject of the treaty, and considering the manner of that letter, and that the British parliament was then sitting, he did say, that whatever the technicalities might be, attending the ratification of a treaty, it was not fit that parliament should have been dismissed at a moment when such important matters, requiring such mature deliberation were pending. He must say, if such conduct were to be acted on as a precedent, it would undermine the authority of parliament. But the peculiar conduct of the noble lord with regard to the treaty should be remembered. So anxious was he for its immediate execution, that the parties to it consented that it should be put in operation without waiting for its ratification. Their orders were given to their naval and military commanders to convey fire and sword into the heart of Syria. They knew the ratification of the treaty was not necessary in order to carry its provisions into effect; they knew that its practical execution must endanger our connection with France; and yet, notwithstanding the insufficiency of its completion, they proceeded on it. As there were many points in connection with this subject, upon which, before he could form a correct judgment, he must see the official information of the progress of the treaty; and as, before he could judge of the foundation of the opinions which had been expressed with regard to the possible designs of Russia and other powers, we must also be put in possession of similar correct details; he should say nothing now on the subject of the progress of the negotiation, of the objects which were sought to be attained, or of the mode in which the negotiation was carried on. Considering the position of M. Guizot, he was perfectly convinced, that nothing could be further from the intention of the noble lord than to act unfairly towards him; but he could not help thinking, that the letter of November 2nd, from M. Guizot to M. Thiers, in which he said, that he thought, that there was something to find fault with in what was being done, was not a commu-

niation which could be considered useful. He could not help saying, that he shared in the feelings of regret which were expressed, that the name of France was omitted in the speech from the throne. It was difficult to over-estimate the force and effect of that omission upon the minds of the French people. Could there have been any difficulty in taking the words of the noble lord himself, and expressing regret at the occurrence, maintaining at the same time their own ground, making no concession in point of argument, but expressing merely their regret at the termination of the alliance? In a former speech from the throne they had mentioned the alliance as a security and guarantee for peace. Admitting, if they would, that France was to blame, would there have been anything conceded in the expression of regret, that from some cause that alliance was at an end? The expression of regret could not be attributed to any but that which was the real cause. It could not be ascribed to weakness, because they took credit for signal success, and could there have been a more becoming addition to such a portion of the address, than that regret was experienced at the interruption of those friendly relations which had so long subsisted? If such a thing had been done, it would have been an argument immediately directed against those who took every opportunity of inflaming the minds of the French public against this country; her Majesty said, "I have the satisfaction to receive from foreign powers assurances of their friendly disposition, and of their earnest desire to maintain peace. The position of affairs in the Levant had long been a cause of uneasiness, and a source of danger to the general tranquillity. With a view to avert the evils which a continuance of that state of things was calculated to occasion, I concluded with the Emperor of Austria, the King of Prussia, the Emperor of Russia, and the Sultan, a convention, intended to effect a pacification of the Levant; to maintain the integrity and independence of the Ottoman empire, and thereby to afford additional security to the peace of Europe."

If France had conveyed to this country an intimation of her friendly disposition, and that it earnestly desired to maintain peace, what would there have been derogatory to the dignity of this country in expressing a similar feeling? Again, if the speech were true, and he must take it to be true, her majesty said—"I rejoice to be able to inform you that the measures which have been adopted in execution of these engagements have been attended with signal success; and I trust that the objects which the contracting parties had in view are on the eve of being completely accomplished. In the course of these transactions my naval forces have co-operated with those of the Emperor of Austria, and with the land and sea forces of the sultan, and have displayed upon all occasions their accustomed gallantry and skill."

What were the objects which the contracting parties had in view? Not the destruction of the army of Ibrahim Pacha; no, the great object was, the maintenance of the independence and integrity of the Ottoman empire; and by that means the additional security of the peace of Europe. If they were on the eve of attaining that great object—if they were going to take a new guarantee for the peace of Europe, what objection could they have to the insertion of that expression of regret, which he believed would have been suitable to the case? He fully and sincerely hoped that the clouds which now overhung the subject would gradually disperse, and that Europe would not be visited by those troubles which were threatened. He conceived that there could be nothing more mischievous than the renewal of war. What the consequences might be no man could foresee. What the amount of capital, of time, wasted on preparations, we all are witnesses. If that capital and that skill, which are expended on these preparations, were sunk in the sea, though that would be useless, it would not be injurious: as they are at present exercised, they are worse than useless, they are deeply injurious. The subject could not be thought upon without calling to their recollection those events which paralysed Europe from the years 1793 to 1815, and without reinspiring all those bad passions which should be extinguished. Additional taxation, both upon France and England, must take place—the effect would be a withdrawal of so much capital as was expended from both those countries—a loss which would be attended with the most disastrous consequences. He hoped that when that which had passed had been duly considered in France, it would not be supposed that we were influenced by any feelings of jealousy or animosity towards that country. It was suggested that the Syrian question was settled. They might have determined that the powers of the Pacha should be confined to Egypt, but did that constitute the settlement of the question? He conceived that it could not; and it must be remembered that France, standing in its present isolated position, must be called upon to co-operate with England in the settlement of a thousand questions which might arise and produce difficulties. The relation to be maintained between the Pacha and the Porte must be considered. They might give him the hereditary pachalic of Egypt, but conditions might be imposed, so stringent and onerous, as to render him entirely dependent upon the Ottoman empire. The peculiar relations of Turkey with respect to the Mediterranean must be considered. Could it be denied that France was the most important power, whose dominions joined that sea? How important then must it be for the very objects of the country, that in any amicable arrangement which might be made, France should join; not with a view to extract from England any concessions that she was wrong; but in order, simply, that she might be made a party to any arrangement which might be made of this most important question. He repeated that no settlement could be efficacious unless they could still prevail upon France to become a party to it. No man could be more convinced than he, that the object which had been had in view was the security of peace, and in her Majesty's speech it was declared that their endeavours had been attended with signal success. What was there, then, to prevent their taking fresh steps, and inviting the interference of France? It appeared to him that there was an opportunity in which, without making any unreasonable concession, it might be called upon to interfere. They had been successful, and they had shown that twenty-five years of peace had not abated the gallant spirit of the navy, and the army of England; and now was the time when they could afford to say to France—"We are conjoined with the great powers of Europe for the sake of procuring peace. We can make no concession, but we are actuated by an earnest desire to admit you among our number, that your interests may be consulted, because we entertain no wish to endanger or to curtail your power. We entreat you now to enter into our plans, and to concur with us in considering what would be most advantageous for the interests of France, for the interests of the Porte, and of the peace of Europe. He found that an opinion upon the subject of the importance of the maintenance of peace had been expressed by the gallant general, now a minister of that country. On the 17th July, 1839, Marshal Soult thus wrote to the Baron de Bourqueney:—"In the important crisis into which the death of Sultan Mahmoud has precipitated the Ottoman empire, arising out of the events which marked the last month of his reign, the union of the great European powers can alone offer a sufficient guarantee for the maintenance of peace. The communications exchanged during the last few weeks have fortunately proved that this agreement is as perfect as possible. All the cabinets desire the integrity and independence of the Ottoman empire under the present reigning dynasty. They were all disposed to employ their means of action and influence to secure the maintenance of this element, so essential to the balance of power, and they would unhesitatingly declare themselves against any combination which would affect that balance. Such an agreement in opinion and resolution will be enough (no one can doubt) to prevent any attempt being made against those high interests, as well as to remove every feeling of anxiety, the very existence of which already produces real danger, in consequence of the irritation it causes in the public mind. The King's government believes that the cabinets would be adopting a measure essential for the consolidation of peace were they to declare, in written documents, to be mutually interchanged, and, in case of need, published more or less fully, that they were actuated by such intentions. On our part, we formally declare, that these are our invariable intentions, and I authorize you to transmit to Lord Palmerston a copy of the present despatch, after communicating it to him orally."

He was confident that there was not one of the four powers which would not express itself to the same effect upon the importance of the maintenance of peace, and it must be admitted, that in the exertions which had been made on behalf of the Ottoman empire, no peculiar advantage, commercial or otherwise, had actuated those by whom these steps had been taken, but that they had proceeded upon the belief, that the support of the Ottoman empire was one of the great elements of the peace of Europe. These were some of the grounds upon which he said it was possible to return to peace. He might be doing little good to those of whom he was speaking, in saying that which he did say; but he was convinced that they were doing all that they could do in the present crisis, for the maintenance of peace. If any man could afford to give good counsel with respect to the maintenance of peace, it was Marshal Soult. If any man, by the opinions which he had expressed, was deeply concerned for the maintenance of peace, it was M. Guizot. If there were any two men who would shun a conflict with England in an unnecessary war, he should say it was these two men. It would be a sacrifice of truth, if he did not express his opinion. His belief was, that they were honest men, actuated by a sincere desire to accomplish the objects which they professed. He believed it firmly of Marshal Soult, because he admired the manly, honest boldness, with which the old soldier came forward, and when France was agitated from one end to another, declared that he bore a grateful recollection of the reception that he had met with in this country—a declaration, not the result of any personal vanity, but which he made, because he felt that in the pomp and magnificence of his reception, feelings of personal admiration of the man were not exhibited, but that they indicated that the old, ungenerous animosity, which was entertained in this country towards France, was gone; and that we took that opportunity of showing the different feelings which now prevailed in the country. He believed, that it was this which had passed in his mind, and he ran the risk of injuring him, by the compliment which he paid him, when in the British House of Commons, he expressed a hope that he and M. Guizot might be successful in maintaining peace, and that, aided by the returning good sense of France, they might rescue both France and England from the mischievous calamity of renewed hostilities.

An amendment of Mr. Hume's was negatived; the Address agreed to, and referred to a Committee.

SUGAR DUTIES.

MAY 18, 1841.

The order of the day for going into Committee of Ways and Means having been read,—

Viscount Sandon proposed the following amendment:—"That, considering the efforts and sacrifices which parliament and the country have made for the abolition of the slave-trade and slavery, with the earnest hope that their exertions and example might lead to the mitigation and final extinction of these evils in other countries, this House is not prepared (especially with the present prospects of the supply of sugar from British possessions) to adopt the measure proposed by her Majesty's government for the reduction of the duty on foreign sugar."

In the eighth night's debate, SIR ROBERT PEEL spoke as follows:—"Sir, this is not the first time that I have felt the extreme embarrassment of being called upon to address you, when every argument and every topic which could be converted into the semblance of an argument have been exhausted. And, I should have been perfectly content to relinquish all claim on the attention of the House, if I did not feel convinced that the whole House, without reference to party distinctions, will acknowledge, that it is not fitting, that I should permit this debate to close without the expression of my sentiments. If it be the general opinion of the House, that I have no alternative but to address them on this occasion, I am sure the same feeling will also induce hon. gentlemen to grant me, whilst I do address them, their indulgent attention. Sir, I shall first apply myself to the proper subject of debate—the question which is involved in the resolution which has been moved by my hon. friend. That resolution implies an opinion on the part of this House, that, considering the sacrifices which we have made for the abolition of the slave-trade and of slavery, it is not expedient to sanction the proposal for introducing into the market of the United Kingdom, sugar, which is the production of slave labour. And, Sir, after all the ability which has been exhibited in opposition to that principle, my opinion remains the same, that it would not be for the interest nor for the honour of this country to open our market to sugar, the produce of slave labour. Sir, I should give my vote on this question apart from all other considerations. If I had heard nothing about Corn-laws, if I had heard nothing about timber duties, I should have been prepared on the abstract merits of this particular question, earnestly to support the resolution of my noble friend. I will state the grounds on which I give that resolution my support. I do not support it on the assumption, that there is some overpowering moral obligation which compels us to abstain altogether from the consumption of the produce of slavery. I do not recognise that principle—I do not charge the right hon. gentleman opposite with any unheard-of violation of moral duty in bringing forward this proposition. I myself have voted for the reduction of duties on articles of consumption the produce of slave-labour. I have voted for the reduction of the duties on cotton for the purpose of encouraging the manufactures of this country. I supported the right hon. gentleman opposite last year, in the proposal he made for getting rid of the absurd system of sending coffee, the produce of Brazil and of Venezuela, round by the Cape of Good Hope, in order to introduce it here at a lower rate of duty. I gave him my support on that proposition, and it was not in consequence of any opposition from me, that the right hon. gentleman subsequently abandoned it. Prudential considerations may enter into the discussion of questions of this nature. Reference may be had to the preponderance of good or evil. If, by excluding cotton, I should reduce thousands and tens of thousands in this country to a state of starvation, should paralyse the greatest branch of our manufacturing industry, should undermine the foundations of our national strength—I cannot admit, that I am morally bound to entail such enormous evils on my country, because the cotton I require is the produce of slave labour. If such considerations may influence my judgment as to the admission of cotton, I cannot insist, that they shall be altogether excluded in determining the question of sugar. But after giving their fair weight to these considerations—after attempting to adjust this balance of good and evil—I have made up my mind in favour of this continued exclusion of sugar, the produce of slave labour. Sir, my conviction mainly rests on a consideration of the state of the West Indies, and of the progress of the great experiment of slave emancipation in those colonies. I do not ask you to continue this exclusion for the purpose of supporting the interests of individual West-India proprietors. I admit, that your liberality has been so great, that if their individual pecuniary interests were alone concerned, you would have a right to call on them to sacrifice those personal interests to considerations of public advantage. But, Sir, I forget their individual interests, in the much higher considerations that are involved in this question. I look to the moral and social condition of that part of your empire in which you have recently made the greatest, the most hazardous, and, as I admit, with cordial satisfaction, the most successful experiment which has ever been made in civilized society. And can I conceal from myself what may be the consequence, if, at this time, when society in these colonies is staggering under the shock of that experiment, you take a step which may decide for ever, that sugar shall no longer be produced at a profit by free labour in those colonies? Sir, the hon. gentleman, the member for Liskeard, says, that it is a matter of utter indifference whether sugar should continue to be produced in certain of the old colonies of this empire. “Abandon,” says the hon. gentleman, “abandon the cultivation of sugar in Jamaica—confine it to Demerara and Berbice.” Is that, then, Sir, the point of view in which hon. gentleman opposite consider the interests of the great colony of Jamaica, and of other of the old colonies of this empire? Is it a matter of utter indifference what becomes of the capital invested in the cultivation of sugar? Is it just, to tell the capitalists and proprietors of Jamaica, that emancipation made it necessary, that they should incur great additional expense for the moral and intellectual improvement of the negroes who were about to be liberated—that it was necessary for the social welfare of the colony, that they should burthen themselves with the expenses of increased establishments for the purposes of education, police, and justice—that at this critical moment, the welfare of the liberated slaves depends on the increased exertions and expenditure of the colonists—is it just, after having called on them to make these sacrifices, to inform them, that it is a matter of no concern, whether sugar cultivation be continued in Jamaica? Can we see with indifference, Jamaica reduced to the condition of St. Domingo? Can we see the negroes become the proprietors of all the land in that colony, and content themselves with such a degree of cultivation as will not produce them one single article in the shape of export from that colony? Is this the result which the hon. gentleman contemplates from the adoption of his principles of free trade? Is this to be the result of that great experiment of emancipation which has been proclaimed to be so successful? Is this to be the great and striking example which we are to hold up to the imitation of all other countries? The example, in point of fact, which the hon. gentleman would have the greatest colony of England exhibit is, the expulsion of the white population from the island, and the occupation of the soil by negroes, content with the bare necessities of life—the mere agricultural produce of the country—who are to raise no one exportable commodity—who can, therefore, have no trade with England: and this, this is the happy condition which the hon. member for Liskeard anticipates with joy—this is the state to which the hon. gentleman would reduce that population which has so largely excited the sympathies of the people of this country! The hon. member tells us that there is not a writer—not a man of the slightest authority—who has given an opinion in contradiction to his own. The hon. gentleman says he can refer to a witness of the highest character and of the greatest experience—Mr. Burnley. On the instant, I will refute him from the mouth of his own witness. I have, by mere accident, an extract from the published opinions of Mr. Burnley—and of course the hon. gentleman will attach special weight to those opinions. Mr. Burnley says:—"That unless the power of combined labour be ensured, either by immigration, or some other means, against the termination of slavery in 1840, the capital invested in those expensive works and machinery set up for the cultivation of sugar, must perish; and, in his opinion, unless the system under consideration be established before 1840, the most mischievous consequences must ensue."

["Date, date," from Mr. C. Buller.] I am reading from Mr. Burnley's evidence before the East-India Committee, q. 1,418. [Mr. C. Buller here made some observations which did not reach the gallery.] Why, does the hon. gentleman imagine, that if he prevents the export of produce from Jamaica, if he makes the slaves content with the mere agricultural produce which they can raise from the soil, immigration of labour will flow into Jamaica? Mr. Burnley farther went on to say—"That there was not a man living in Porto Rico, Cuba, and the United States, who did not believe that ruinous prices must arise in 1840 in the British West Indies; and that if the first commencement of the experiment of free labour in those colonies should prove disastrous, it would create such an unfavourable impression through the world, as no subsequent efforts would be able to remove."

Now, Sir, having read to the hon. gentleman the evidence of his own witness, I have another authority for him, to which I think he will be disposed to pay equal attention. ["Now it is coming!" from Mr. Brotherton.] What is coming? Oh! you have heard, then, of the Manchester pamphlet, have you? Sir, I had an interview with three intelligent gentlemen who formed a deputation from the Chamber of Commerce of Manchester. They called on me to advocate the principles of free trade. I told them, that while I must reserve for my place in parliament the declaration of my own opinions on any of the subjects which they brought under my consideration, I was perfectly ready to hear with the greatest attention men for whose extensive experience and personal character I had high respect. Towards the conclusion of the interview, a particular wish was expressed that I would read a certain pamphlet on the extension of slavery, and to which I was assured that I should attach great importance. I made a promise that whatever might be my avocations I would read that pamphlet, and I confess that I entered on its perusal with no little anxiety, after the assurance I had received from such high authority that it was difficult to resist its conclusions. From Mr. Ashworth, a gentleman of great ability, and one of the deputation from the Chamber of Commerce of Manchester, I received the pamphlet in question, with a note, which I will read:—

"Esteemed Friend—Herewith I send thee a pamphlet of William Greg" (the brother, I believe, of the hon. member for Manchester; a gentleman of great ability, and, as I am told, of great authority on the West India question,) "which I commend to thy attentive perusal. I do not hear that either Sir F. Buxton or any of his adherents ever attempted an answer, merely remarking that such reasoning is cold philanthropy."

Now, Sir, towards the close of this pamphlet I find a discussion on this very question, namely, the policy of importing into England sugar from Cuba and Brazil,

I find an impartial view taken of the merits of the question—I find it stated—“That the planters have no right to demand, and, moreover, to expect, that the British nation can permanently or long continue the payment of the enormous prices which have of late been charged for two of the most indispensable articles of general consumption, and that the welfare of our own population, as well as that of the negro population, requires some alteration in this respect; that, with relation to the interests of our manufacturers, we ought to consider that the Brazils were large consumers of our fabrics, but would not long remain so if this country continued to refuse the reception of their principal articles of produce in exchange; and that we ought not to endanger the interests of one class of the community to promote those of another.”

Now, then, hear what is said by this gentleman so connected with the manufacturing interests, the chosen champion of the Manchester Chamber of Commerce—one who entertains a due regard for the value of the Brazil market, and also for the interests of the British consumer. This is evidently a gentleman who is prepared to take an enlarged and a liberal view of this question, even according to the notion of the member for Liskeard. And what is the conclusion to which this gentleman comes?—He says:—“Few things can be more certain, than that the ceasing of the sugar cultivation in our colonies, and the consequent destruction of the capital now invested therein, would lead to the complete abandonment of them by the white population, who would carry to more hopeful lands their knowledge, their energy, and all their capital. Not only would emancipation singularly fail, so far as the moral condition of the negro is concerned, but the effects which it was expected to operate on slavery in other countries, and the anticipated good consequences that were expected to flow from our example, would be wholly lost.”

And now I beg the special attention of the hon. gentleman opposite. The pamphlet goes on to say, that,—“If ever the negro population of the West Indies shall become squatters and cultivators of waste ground, instead of labourers for hire, slavery and the slave-trade will then have received the last and greatest encouragement which it is possible for them to receive.”

Mr. Greg foresaw the argument that would be raised, that we consume slave-grown tobacco and coffee, and could not therefore consistently refuse to receive sugar. His answer is, that the objection is rather a smart than a sound one, and that the inapplicability of the position will be obvious, on a few moments' consideration.—“In one word (says Mr. Greg), this country is not called on to exclude foreign slave-grown cotton, because it never has been excluded. It is called on to exclude slave-grown sugar, because it has never been admitted.”

The conclusion of the pamphlet is as follows:—“That the only method of destroying the slave-trade, and putting an end to slavery, is by destroying the demand for slave-grown produce, and thus doing away with the demand for slaves; that this can only be accomplished by establishing to the world, and through the medium of the West Indies, the superior cheapness and productiveness of free-labour; that the prosperity of the West Indies can only be continued and ensured by an extensive and systematic system of immigration, and by the temporary continuation of the present protective discriminating duties on sugar.”

Sir, in case hon. gentlemen opposite should not perfectly understand the last passage, I will repeat it for their benefit. “The prosperity of the West Indies cannot be ensured without the temporary continuation of the present protective discriminating duties on sugar.” This, Sir, is not the first time, that I have been indebted for an argument to the Manchester Chamber of Commerce.

I have kept my promise, I have read the pamphlet, and it has confirmed me in my opinion, that we ought not to admit to the British market, foreign sugar, the produce of slave-labour. Sir, I am not unaware, that owing to the effects of the emancipation of the West Indian slaves, there has been a great diminution in the productiveness of these colonies; and if we had no other source to which we could look for a supply of sugar, the pressure would be so severe that we could not continue to the West Indies their present monopoly. Whatever might be the advantages of encouraging the cultivation of sugar in the West India colonies, still if we could only look to a supply of sugar to the amount of 115,000 tons yearly, we could not continue the prohibition on foreign sugar. But, Sir, I look to the east. I look to India to afford a security and check against extravagant prices; and I am of opinion, that if you permit the experiment which we have entered on to be carried out, the West Indies, the Mauritius, and India, will together, amply supply us with sugar at a fair and moderate rate. Sir, the right hon. gentlemen, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, referred with apparent satisfaction to the increase that had taken place in the price of sugar on the day on which he spoke. But, Sir, I believe the right hon. gentleman will find, that for some weeks past there has been a progressive reduction in the price; and, notwithstanding the prevalent expectation that this House would refuse to confirm the proposition of the right hon. gentleman, this expectation has not produced any increase in the price of sugar. The member for Liskeard says, we are about to inflict an enormous injury on the East-Indies, by opening the British market to East India sugar, refusing, at the same time competition with foreign sugar; that we are fostering a new monopoly, and presenting to it a single market which will soon be overstocked. But surely the markets of the world will continue open to East India sugar. Why should not East India sugar, if the supply for our use be superabundant, compete in the markets of Europe with foreign sugar? But, says the hon. gentlemen, "Do not divert from their present employment, the labour and capital of India." Divert the labour and capital of India! Have you considered the position in which India stands with respect to this country? Remittances are required from India, on behalf of government, to the amount of £3,200,000 yearly; private remittances amount to about half a million more; and there is no other mode of paying these remittances, except by the agricultural produce of India. If, then, I encourage the produce of that country, and thus enable it to make up the amount of the remittances—if I do this, shall I be told, that I am inflicting an injury either on this country or on India? Shall I be told, that when I am dealing with a country from which we exact a sum of £3,200,000, for government purposes only, and which has no other mode of making up that sum, except from the produce of her agricultural industry, I must apply strictly and rigorously the principles of free-trade? Sir, I have often listened in this House, with painful emotions, to debates respecting the condition of India, and to the evidence of the injury which that country has done her, by destroying her manufactures through the substitution of our own. Can I forget the accounts of Dacca, once a great and flourishing city, the seat of prosperous manufactures, containing a population of 150,000 inhabitants, now reduced to 20,000 or 30,000, with the malaria and famine extending their ravages, and threatening to turn it into a desert? I recollect, in a debate respecting the emigration of the Hill Coolies, being struck by the speech of the hon. member for Roxburgh, a gentleman well qualified from knowledge and experience, to deal with the subject. He spoke of the danger and mischief that would ensue, if you refused an outlet for the agricultural labour of India. He gave an account of the wages of agricultural labourers in Bengal, and of the condition of the inhabitants. The wages of the labourer are about 6s. a month—that is, 1s. 6d. a-week, or about 2½d. per day. They subsist he says, upon rice; and if rice fails, they starve. He described the manner in which he had seen the unfortunate people, hurrying by thousands to receive the relief given by the government of Bengal. "I have seen," said he, "whole villages swept away by dreadful inundations, and vast tracts of land utterly ruined for cultivation." The hon. gentleman then drew a picture of horror, more dreadful than the most romantic imagination could have conceived. I know nothing more appalling than the simple truth related by the hon. gentleman. "I know this," said he, "that an officer charged with a mission from Calcutta, was obliged to turn back, in consequence of the horrible smell arising from the unburied carcases of those unfortunate beings who had died from famine, and whose bodies literally strewed the roads." And are we, with such accounts as these, to be fearful of disturbing the application of agricultural labour in India? Have the people of that country, ruined by our manufactures, and subject to heavy fiscal demands, to be met only by the produce of agricultural labour—have they no paramount claim upon us? The rigid principles of free-trade may make no distinction between their produce and that of the slaveholder of Cuba; but surely there are obligations—moral and social obligations—duties you owe to millions submitted to your sway—which compel you to have some regard for other considerations than cheap sugar. These are the main grounds on which I support the resolution of my noble friend (Lord Sandon); first, I am desirous of giving fair scope for the experiment we have made by the abolition of negro slavery, and of encouraging the production of sugar by free labour in the West Indies. Secondly, admitting the deficiency of our present supply from the West Indies, I will give a decided preference to the East Indies, in procuring an additional supply. Thirdly, I will not, without more cogent evidence of the necessity, incur the risk of encouraging slavery and the slave-trade, by opening, for the first time, the market of England to the sugar of Cuba and Brazil. Sir, I never at any time sought to inflame the minds of the people on the question of slavery. I gave my support to the measure of my noble friend (Lord Stanley) for the abolition of slavery; and I gave every credit to those who took part in the introduction of that measure. Sir, I never lent myself to the cry of Anti-slavery, and I will not now lend myself to the cry of cheap sugar. The right hon. gentleman opposite, reproached my right hon. friend, the member for Cambridge, and myself, with inconsistency, in having formerly been parties to a proposition of Mr Charles Grant, for the introduction of foreign slave-grown sugar. The right hon. gentleman said, the proposition had been supported by the cabinet, of which my noble friend and myself were members; that the great principle of Mr. Grant's measure was the admission of slave-sugar into competition with that of the East Indies, and that the protection proposed for the latter was only 3s. per cwt. The right hon. gentleman said to us, "Are you now prepared to ride into office upon such grossly inconsistent grounds as the rejection of a proposition similar to that which you yourselves supported?" Sir, neither I, nor any member of that cabinet, have any recollection of such a discussion as that which the right hon. gentleman has mentioned. If my noble friend, Lord Glenelg, had any recollection of it, I should have given up my own impressions; but I believe his impression is the same as mine—that no such proposition was ever submitted to that cabinet. It may have been suggested by him, to individual members of that cabinet, but the cabinet never went into the formal consideration of any such proposition. The Chancellor of the Exchequer says, we did not then dissent from the principle of Mr. Grant's measure. Very true—but the principle in question was not the competition of slave-sugar with East India sugar—the principle was, the increase of consumption of sugar by lowering the duty. We said, we agreed to that principle, but feared risking the loss of revenue. But it must be recollected, that since the period in question, slavery in our own colonies has been abolished, and that completely alters the view in which this subject is to be regarded. There was, besides, at that time, a bounty on the export of our own sugar, and the protection proposed by Mr. Grant, at least as far as the West Indies were concerned, was complete. Foreign sugar could not have entered into competition with colonial sugar at the rates of duty he proposed. I am surprised, I confess, at the altered tone which gentlemen have lately assumed respecting slavery. After all our magnificent professions, is this the course which is proposed, and are these the arguments by which that course is recommended? We are now to tell foreign countries that the only effectual way to abolish slavery and the slave-trade, is to admit slave-grown sugar to free competition with our own. True, we may give a temporary stimulus to the produce of slavery, but then we shall improve the manufacture of free-labour sugar, by rivalry with that of sugar the produce of slave-labour. But will not the improvement be reciprocal? If the result of competition will be to economize the application of capital on our part—to introduce improved machinery—to stimulate skill and invention, as applied to free-labour sugar—will not the influence of that same competition produce similar results in Cuba and Brazil? But who will believe your professions? Who will believe that your motive in opening, for the first time, the market of England to slave-sugar is the benevolent wish to extinguish slavery? No, tell the truth. If you want cheap sugar, say so. If the high price of sugar diminishes the comfort of your own population—if you want to open the markets of Brazil and Cuba to your manufactures by taking their sugar in exchange—avow your object, and foreign countries will understand you. But they will only laugh at your pretence that you are labouring to extinguish slavery by increasing the consumption of slave-grown produce. I have heard, with surprise, from cabinet ministers, in the course of this debate, the doctrine, that the delinquencies of foreign countries are no business of ours; that we never contemplated removing slavery in other countries by our example; that it is enough for us to have removed the taint from ourselves; that the conduct of other countries with respect to slavery, is a matter of indifference to us. The member for Wolverhampton says, the United States would have as good a right to refuse commercial intercourse with us, on account of the Corn-laws, as we have to do so with other countries on account of slavery; in short, that the question is a matter of indifference to us. Why, surely, the hon. gentleman said, the municipal laws and usages of other countries were no business of ours, and applied his remark to the continuance of slavery and the slave-trade by countries with which we had commercial intercourse. The intense feeling that once animated the people of England with regard to the abominations of slavery may have abated, but I am mistaken if there will not be great regret, great indignation, at our altered views and altered tone with respect to slavery, and to the moral obligations which we are under to discourage, by every effort we can make, the slave-trade and slavery, in other countries of the world. We are now, it seems, to abandon the high position we have hitherto taken, and to deny our own right to speak to other nations in the language of commanding authority on the subject of slavery. The noble lord alluded to the difference between England and Rome, and quoted the beautiful lines of Dryden for the purpose of heightening the contrast:—

"Rome, it is thine alone with awful sway
To rule the world, and make mankind obey, Disposing peace and war, thy own majestic way."

True it is, that we have no such power as that which the poet ascribes to Rome. We have formidable competitors in the struggle for empire; we cannot compel obedience to our commands by the exercise of material power; but I had hoped, until I heard this debate, that there was a sway, an "awful sway," which we could still exercise—that there was in our hands not a material but a moral power, enabling us to "rule the world," and, through the influence of high principles and of glorious sacrifices, to "make mankind obey." Peace and war we cannot dispose according to our arbitrary will, but I thought we still hoped to dispose other nations to follow the "majestic way" which has conducted us to humanity and justice. If we still cherish these hopes, if we have not abandoned these high pretensions, then the noble lord may still claim for England some of the high privileges asserted for Rome, and continuing his quotation, may confidently say—

"To tame the proud—the fetter'd slave to free,—
These are imperial arts, and worthy thee."

Sir, these are the grounds on which I give my vote for the resolution of my noble friend. And in voting for that resolution, I am taunted by the noble lord with factions purposes. The noble lord commenced his speech, Sir, by repelling with indignation the accusations against her Majesty's ministers, and said with much earnestness that he was conscious no man who had watched the progress of the government of which he was a member, could ever suppose them capable of bringing forward any public measure with a view to court popularity. Now, Sir, I say nothing on the subject of the noble lord's defence of himself—but I had hoped that the experience of the noble lord would have sufficed to free us from the charge of having offered a factions opposition to her Majesty's government. Before he levelled any such accusation against us, he might have recalled to his recollection several occasions when, if we had offered a factious opposition to him, his position as a minister of the Crown in this House would have been far less easy than it has been. He might have borne in mind the question of privilege—the question of the union of the Canadas—the question of the Poor-law—and, Sir, the noble lord might have had, on a review of these measures, the justice to give us some credit for not having been desirous against our convictions to embarrass his government on great public questions. But the course I pursue is a factious course!—I, who take the same course now that I took last year—I, who, when the member for Wigan proposed to introduce into this market foreign sugar, the produce of slave-labour, in competition with colonial sugar, the produce of free labour—voted against the hon. member's proposition on precisely the same grounds on which I vote against that of the government this year—I, forsooth, am to be charged with faction, not because I alter, but because I adhere to my opinions! Why, the only primâ facie evidence of faction in this case is, that her Majesty's government pursued the same course. I have had some experience of parliamentary assurance, but it is an unexampled specimen of it, when gentlemen who abandon their opinions this year, charge those who adhere to those same opinions, both parties having held them together in concert last year, with faction. There is another objection to our resolution. "Oh," say hon. gentlemen opposite, "you embody no great irrevocable principle in your resolution." They point, no doubt, to the illustrious example of the noble lord's resolution of 1835, on the appropriation of Church revenue in Ireland. "Why content yourselves," they say, "with temporary grounds of objection to our present measures? why not declare that no settlement ever can be satisfactory, which does not exclude now and for ever foreign sugar?" No, no, we have had memorable examples of irrevocable resolutions—we have them fresh in our memory—we find them recorded in the journals—the standing opprobrium of your government. "But see what an enormity you commit," say hon. gentlemen opposite. "You absolutely leave a loophole to escape by. Who can predict but that next year you will be compelled to adopt this very proposition which you now reject?" Why, even if we should do so, should we be worse off than the gentlemen opposite? They opposed, last year, the very motion they make this, and thus left for themselves the loophole by which they are now escaping. But do not mistake me. Do not believe that I vote for the resolution of my noble friend with the intention of deviating from my present course in a future year. I will be frank and explicit with you. My deliberate opinion is, that the great experiment, which has cost this country so much—the great experiment for the extinction of slavery—should be fairly and perfectly tried; and that to this effect we ought to encourage sugar, the production of free labour, by giving it the preference in the market of the United Kingdom. If our West India colonies, and our possessions in the East, can supply the consumption of this country, can ensure us a supply of sugar at reasonable prices, at such prices as shall permit the accustomed use of sugar—I would continue to them, on the special and peculiar grounds which I have referred to, the preference in the home market. The price of sugar is falling; it was 56s. 10d. in July 1840—it is now only 37s. 7d.; and you have recently given, by equalizing the duties on East India and West India rum, increased encouragement for the production of sugar in India. I confidently hope, therefore, that we may look for an adequate supply of sugar, the produce of free labour. I should be perfectly content to have terminated my observations with what I have stated, but that I am reminded by the speeches of hon. and right hon. gentlemen opposite, that this question is a great financial and commercial question, as well as a question of sugar—that it is connected with others of equally grave and serious import to the State—that her Majesty's Government court investigation into their whole plan of finance, and that it is expected that hon. members should not confine themselves to one particular topic in discussing it, but embrace all its bearings. With this I do not agree. I contend, that the policy of admitting foreign sugar must be determined by other considerations than those of ordinary commercial policy—that it stands on special and peculiar grounds—and that I might fully admit the principles of free trade—and yet exempt from the application of them this particular question. Sir, I do not deny that in this country there exists great manufacturing distress;—and I am sure that, whatever may be the issue of our party contests in this House, we all hear with pain, those details of individual suffering that have been read in the course of the debate. But, Sir, I protest against these details as legitimate arguments to influence our judgment on the question before us. No man can hear them with more pain and sympathy than I do—no man can more cordially or more anxiously desire to relieve them; but, at the same time that I admit this, I am bound also to remind you that, at all times and under all circumstances, similar distress has existed; and so long as we live in our present complicated state of society, I see no reason to suppose that such will not exist, and that appeals, founded on it, will not be preferred, and attempts made to influence by these means our reason and judgment. But, Sir, although I freely admit the existence of such distress, I do not, I confess, view with the same alarm as hon. members opposite have professed to view it, the commercial and manufacturing condition of the country. I have referred with some anxiety to the accounts that have been laid before the House, as to the commerce and manufactures of this country; and I see nothing in them to justify the belief that the depression in these branches of our national industry is more than temporary, and that we may not expect a speedy revival, from the elasticity of our resources. I shall take first the most unfavourable document that I can find. The House is aware, that there are comparative estimates of the exports and imports of the United Kingdom for three years, beginning with 1838, and ending with 1840. The official value of our exports was, in 1838, £92,000,000; 1839, £97,000,000; 1840, £102,000,000. But official value, it may be stated, is only a criterion of quantity, and the declared value is a better test of the profitable nature of our trade. The declared value then of exports was, in 1838, £49,630,000; 1839, £52,700,000; 1840, £51,000,000, showing a decrease of £1,700,000 on a comparison of the last year with the preceding. In the cotton manufactures, however, there is no decrease, nor in the linen manufacture. The decrease has been on the earthenware manufactures, hardware, the woollen manufactures, and the silk manufactures. These have been the chief articles on which there has been a defalcation. The total defalcation is £1,700,000, comparing the declared value of 1839 with that of 1840; and the defalcation in earthenware, hardware, and in our silk and woollen manufactures, will account for £1,600,000 of the whole. Now, I find that for these four articles, the United States are our chief customers. The United States take two-fifths of our earthenware, two-fifths of our hardware, one-half of our silk manufactures, and one-third of our woollen manufactures; and, when I consider the unsettled state of the United States, in respect to credit and currency, I see ample cause why there should be a temporary decrease of demand for articles of British manufacture, and grounds for the confident hope, that, when the difficulties of the United States have passed away, the demand will again revive. We must not be too desponding on this subject, when we consider the great variation in demand, which has frequently taken place in the American market. It is quite singular to observe the vicissitudes of our commercial intercourse with the United States. I have been furnished with a return of the value in dollars, of exports from Great Britain into the United States for some years past. In 1834, it was 47,000,000; in 1835, 61,000,000; in 1836, 78,000,000; and then it suddenly declined to 44,000,000. The year after, it was again so low as 44,000,000; in 1839 it was 65,000,000; and, as might be expected after so sudden an increase, the next year was one of depression and deficiency. Thus, the experience of our trade with the United States warrants us in entertaining the hope that the demand in the United States will revive, and that the depression in those particular manufactures which have fallen off within the last year will ere long cease. Let us now take the state of our navigation, during the last three years. I cannot reconcile that state with any serious and general diminution of our manufacturing and commercial prosperity. In 1838, the tonnage of vessels built and registered in the ports of the United Kingdom—these are newly built vessels,—was 157,000; in 1839, it was 290,000; in 1838, it was 333,000. In 1838, the total shipping—I take the tonnage and not the vessels, because the number of vessels might be increased and yet the tonnage remain the same, or decline in quantity; the tonnage of shipping entered inwards in 1838, was 4,000,000; in 1839, 4,433,000; in 1840, 4,657,000. The tonnage of shipping cleared outwards was, in 1838, 4,099,000; in 1839, 4,494,000; in 1840, 4,783,000. The tonnage of vessels built and registered in the ports of England was, in 1838, 127,000; in 1839, 144,000; in 1840, 165,000. Now, fully admitting that there is severe pressure of manufacturing distress in some parts of the country, I can hardly reconcile the existence of the very serious extent of commercial distress, which some persons suppose to exist, with that increase of the trade and navigation of the country which is indicated by the increase of the tonnage. Looking, then, at the state of the United States; looking at the state of our relations with China, and the interruption of our intercourse with that country; looking, too, at the condition of Syria; looking at the position of France, and other countries of Europe, influenced by the fear of war, affecting in a certain degree the course of peaceful commerce; if, under such a combination of circumstances, there should have been a diminution in the declared value of British exports during the last year, I am not led to infer from that diminution that all hopes of the manufacturing prosperity and superiority of this country are extinct. At the same time, Sir,

I am quite prepared to admit, that, even if the state of affairs was most prosperous, that is no reason why relaxations should not be made in restrictions upon commerce. Do not let us remain stationary. If we can improve the commercial position of this country, do not let us be content with maintaining our present ground, but apply ourselves to a fair consideration of the means by which that increased prosperity may be obtained. The hon. member for Wolverhampton insists upon it, that I must make a declaration of my sentiments with respect to the principles of free trade. The hon. gentleman says, that his principles, and the principles of his friends who concur with him are, that, without reference to any other consideration whatever, your true policy is to buy in the cheapest market. Now, if these are the principles of the hon. gentleman, and to be uniformly and invariably applied without reference to the circumstances under which, and the time at which, they are to be applied, I can only say, that in those principles, or rather in the application of those principles, I do not concur. I do not contest them with reference to countries in which, if it were possible to conceive such a case, there are no preformed relations of society; but as my noble friend justly said, in that admirable speech which he has delivered in the course of this debate—in a country of such complicated relations, of such extensive empire, in a country where there exist moral and social obligations wholly independent of mere commercial considerations, I say, invariably and uniformly to apply the principle of buying in the cheapest market would be, in my opinion, to involve this country in extreme embarrassment. I apprehend, that her Majesty's government will be obliged to dissent from the principles of free trade, as laid down by the hon. gentleman. If the principle of the hon. gentleman is really to buy in the cheapest market, without reference to any other consideration, what does he say to the proposal of her Majesty's government, to impose a duty of 8s. per quarter on the importation of corn? Why does he not demand from them the free and unrestricted importation of wheat, sugar, timber, and every thing else? But, in fact, her Majesty's government claim exactly the same privilege that I claim, viz., that I will not commit myself to your mere abstract principles, without knowing the circumstances under which, and the time at which, you propose to apply them. If by the principles of free trade you simply mean the progressive and well-considered relaxation of restrictions upon commerce, I may venture to refer to the past. I can say with truth, notwithstanding the observations of the noble lord, that there was no man in this House from whom Mr. Huskisson derived a more cordial and invariable support than he derived from me. I know not whether the principles on which he acted are unpopular now or no, but I do not hesitate to declare that I did at that time cordially support the proposal made by Mr. Huskisson, and that the result of those measures has confirmed me in the wisdom of that course. The noble lord, however, seemed to consider that Mr. Huskisson met with a cold and hesitating support from his colleagues and from the party who generally acted in concurrence with them; but this I know, and I may appeal to the noble lord (Lord Palmerston) to confirm my statement, that Mr. Huskisson assigned, as one of his chief reasons for joining the Duke of Wellington, in 1828, that he would have in me a colleague, from whom he had previously received constant and cordial support in his commercial measures. Now, a word as to the unvarying assistance which Mr. Huskisson received from the noble lord's party. The fact is, that the most formidable opposition which Mr. Huskisson had to encounter came from the hon. member for Coventry; and on that very question which has been so particularly referred to, the silk manufacture—on that particular question, the member for Coventry (Mr. Ellice), boasting, of course, of the most enlarged views of commercial policy, yet, being pressed by his Coventry constituents—collected together every argument which he could possibly collect, with the assistance of the silk manufacturers of Coventry, to show why silk manufactures should be exempted from the principles of free trade; and the only opposition, in point of an actual motion, which my right hon. friend encountered, was the motion made by the hon. gentleman, the grande decus columenque rerum of her Majesty's government. And the hon. gentleman was seconded and cordially supported by a learned gentleman (Mr. Williams), a faithful adherent of the same party, who was then member for Lincoln, and has since been elevated to the office of judge. The hon. gentleman (a sound Whig, I presume,) not only contested the principles of free trade, but he accused Mr. Huskisson and us who acted with him, of being "cold-blooded metaphysicians, who," according to the language of Mr. Burke, "were actuated by all the malignity of the devil—and by the same sovereign contempt for the happiness and welfare of mankind." And now, forsooth, we are to be told that Mr. Huskisson met with nothing but obstruction from his own party, and that he was wafted over all his difficulties on the flowing wave of Whig enthusiasm. The noble lord seems to claim an exclusive inheritance of the principles of Mr. Huskisson. Nay, he makes the awful announcement, that if he and his colleagues are driven out of office, they will pack up the principles of free trade and carry them off with them. "Don't rob us of our property," says the noble lord; but at last the generosity of his nature prevails, and he promises that, if he is properly applied to by his successors, he will not withhold a contribution from the stock of liberal policy. Why, what right has the noble lord to claim this exclusive dominion over the principles of Mr. Huskisson? When did we hear a word of them until the pressure of the present moment? Was there ever any public man who pronounced so positive a condemnation of the principles of free trade as the present Prime Minister of this country? And did one of you dissent from that declaration? When Lord Melbourne said, that it would be absolute insanity to deprive the agriculture of this country of protection—and when he held language from which it must be reasonably inferred that he thought it impossible, in the complicated relations of society in this country, to apply the pure principles of free trade to the trade in corn or almost any thing else—when he gave that plain indication of his sentiments, as the head of the government, did one man of you rise in this House to express his opposition to those sentiments? Was the budget of last year brought forward on the principles which are now advocated? Was the five per cent. additional, on customs and excise, a specimen of your comprehensive financial views? When the President of the Board of Trade, in the simplicity of his heart, said there could be no great harm in putting five per cent. additional on tobacco, since the present amount of duty was 1.200 per cent. on the prime cost of the article—had he then become a convert to the principles of Mr. Huskisson? Let us do justice to Mr. Huskisson, and not confound his measures and proceedings with yours. Mr. Huskisson applied his principles soberly and cautiously, and with the power, and means, and intention, of effectually carrying them out. He prepared the public mind for the adoption of these principles; he anticipated opposition to them, and prevented the success of that opposition, by the cautious and deliberate manner in which he approached them. You ask me, What I propose to do with reference to the Corn-laws? Sir, I will not shrink from the expression of my opinion. If I saw a reason for changing my course, I would do so, and frankly avow it. But I have not changed my opinion. Notwithstanding the combination which has been formed against the Corn-laws, notwithstanding the declaration that either the total repeal, or the substitution of a fixed duty for the present scale, is the inevitable result of the agitation now going forward—notwithstanding this declaration, I do not hesitate to avow my adherence to the opinion which I expressed last year, and again to declare that my preference is decidedly in favour of a graduated, to a fixed duty. I said, last year, and I repeat now—for I may refer to the speech I then made as the expression of my opinions now, that I viewed with anxiety the state of the manufactures of this country. I stated then, as I state now, that I consider the prosperous state of the manufacturing industry of this country to be intimately connected with the welfare of our agriculture, and that the prosperity of our manufactures is a greater support to our agriculture than any system of Corn-laws. That was the language I held then, and that is the language I now repeat. I said, that I preferred the principle of a sliding duty to a fixed one. I said, that I would not bind myself to the details of the existing law, but would reserve to myself the unfettered discretion of considering and amending those details. You declare, however, that no man can maintain the present system of Corn-laws, and be friendly to a liberal commercial policy. I deny that conclusion, and I refer you to Mr. Huskisson. He certainly never considered protection to agriculture incompatible with the removal of restrictions on commerce. An hon. gentleman has quoted some opinions, said to be delivered by Mr. Huskisson after he left office, but I know that, during the period I was united in office with him, there was no more strenuous supporter of a graduated scale, and no more determined opposer of a fixed duty. And to put that question beyond all doubt, and to set at rest any suspicion of my stating opinions as his, which he had not entertained, I will quote them to the House. Mr. Huskisson stated in 1827, that it had been urged against him that he held the opinion that England ought not to depend largely on other countries for the supply of corn, and that he had declared in 1815, and still maintained, that nothing could be more dangerous, than a reliance of this country on foreign countries for her food. He avowed that such were his opinions, and with regard to the graduated scale, he observed, that he was not only the advocate of it, but he claimed credit for being its actual author. In 1827, Mr. Huskisson said:—"I proposed in 1814, a graduated scale, and it is not likely I should now recommend a principle utterly inconsistent with it."

In 1828, Mr. Huskisson spoke thus:—"An hon. gentleman had spoken in favour of a fixed duty; abstractedly, that might look well enough; but, when they regarded the circumstances of the country and the wants of the people, they would see the impossibility of adopting such a principle. If a high permanent duty were imposed, then, in periods of scarcity, the poor would be exposed to sufferings, the infliction of which no claims for protection on the part of the home corn-grower would ever justify." "A permanent fixed duty was out of the question."

This was the opinion of Mr. Huskisson in 1828, two years before the termination of his useful career. The noble lord will, however, propose the adoption of a fixed duty. I shall offer my opposition to it on the ground that I do not think a fixed duty can be permanently maintained. The member for Marylebone agrees with me, for he supports the proposition, not on its own merits, but because it will be a stepping-stone to absolute freedom in the trade of corn. The noble lord's fixed duty will be assailed by the same arguments by which the graduated scale is now attacked. The members for Finsbury or Wolverhampton, will again detail cases of severe privation in the manufacturing towns—the cry of "no bread-tax," will be raised—the noble lord will infallibly be met by that illegitimate warfare of which he has set the example—and what is his confidence that he will be enabled to maintain his fixed duty? You ask again—what do you propose to do with respect to the timber-duties? I answer, I reserve to myself an unfettered action on this point. Before I consider the timber-duties, I shall require that the noble lord will give me the benefit of that information which he has derived from the Governor-general of Canada. How is it possible for me—how could any rational man venture to form an opinion upon such a subject as the timber-duties, without having been put in possession, not only of the financial and commercial, but of the political circumstances, connected with them? Did the noble lord apply without hesitation, the principles of free trade to the timber-duties? No; the noble lord availed himself of the advantages which his office gave him. He knew that there was a great political crisis in our North American colonies. He looked to the state of Canada. He considered the great experiment which had been made there by the union of the provinces. He reflected upon the state of our relations with the United States of America, consequent on the apprehension of Mr. McLeod, and the long-pending and unsettled question of the north-eastern boundary. He took all these important circumstances into consideration, and wisely said,—"Before I disturb the trading interests of Canada by great alterations in the existing timber-duties, I will ascertain the state of feeling in that country on political questions, and confer with the Governor-general as to the political effects of a commercial measure."

And what answer does he receive from the Governor-general? An avowal that the alteration of the timber-duties, under present circumstances, would greatly add to his difficulties in conducting the government of Canada. And is there any justice in your demanding from me positive declarations of my opinion on the subject of these duties, and denying me at the same time the opportunity of weighing the political considerations that are involved in them? The only information you give me is, that the measure of the noble lord will increase the difficulties of governing Canada, and yet I am to declare peremptorily in its favour. But it seems that the Governor-general of Canada has informed the noble lord, that if some other measures were proposed, concurrently with an alteration in the timber-duties, the dissatisfaction in Canada might be materially abated. The noble lord has not given us the faintest conception of the nature of that other measure. How preposterous it would be to enter into the question of the timber-duties, with nothing but partial information, and mysterious notices as to the possible effect which the agitation of that question might produce in a colony which is in the crisis of a hazardous experiment in government, and which is on the frontier of a powerful state with which our relations are far from satisfactory. Still, however, there remains the argument, that we are in a state of extreme financial difficulty, and some extraordinary effort must be made to relieve us. There is great financial difficulty; and, for that financial difficulty you—her Majesty's government—are mainly responsible. You have had the possession of power since the year 1835. You have had the complete uncontrolled administration of the finances of this country during that period. Whenever you happen to be successful, you boast of success as a proof of your wisdom, but you never admit failure to be even prima facie evidence of your incapacity. But the whole course of your financial administration has been a series of failures. Year after year there has been deficiency, year after year increasing expenditure, and diminished means of meeting it. And now, when the aggregate of your yearly deficiencies amounts to near £8,000,000—when the burden becomes intolerable—when exposure and disgrace are inevitable—instead of penitent confessions of your own incapacity and mal-administration, you represent yourselves as martyrs in the cause of free trade—and call upon me to furnish you with a budget. And I am by no means surprised at your confidence. You recollect that when I left office in 1830, I had been connected with an administration which, during the period in which it had the management of the finances of this country, reduced the public debt by £20,000,000 of capital, and the annual charge upon that debt by more than £1,000,000. You remember, too, that we left a surplus of £1,600,000 of revenue over expenditure—and mark! we did all this with the incumbrance of an unreformed parliament. You have had your own way for five years, with the advantage of a reformed parliament; you have had the full enjoyment of the promised blessings of “cheap government.” You got rid of these your illiberal colleagues in 1834—[pointing to Lord Stanley and Sir James Graham]—and with all these advantages in your favour, a reformed parliament, cheap government, no patronage, no obstruction from illiberal colleagues, the shameful result is a deficit for the present year of £2,400,000, a total deficit of £7,500,000. And you consider me responsible for this, and demand from me a budget. You recollect, no doubt, the aid which I gave you with respect to the Jamaica question, on a former occasion—when I rescued you from the perils of your own evil ways, when I enabled you to retain popular representative government—when I prevented you from disturbing the foundation of the security of every other colony which boasted of a representative system—when you were compelled to take my advice, and were glad and rejoiced in your counsellor—you remember all this, and with good reason invoke my aid again—and be assured that, if the circumstances were the same, I would again give it you, and again compel you to take my advice. But I cannot help you now. No, great as is my commiseration, I cannot assist you. I view with unaffected sympathy the position of the right hon. gentleman, the Chancellor of the Exchequer. It has been remarked, that a good man struggling with adversity, is a sight worthy of the gods. And certainly, the right hon. gentleman, both with respect to the goodness of the man, and the extent of his adversity, presents at the present moment that spectacle. Can there be a more lamentable picture than that of a Chancellor of the Exchequer seated on an empty chest—by the pool of bottomless deficiency—fishing for a budget? I won't bite; the right hon. gentleman shall return home with his pannier as empty as his chest. What absurdity there is in demanding a budget from me—in requiring that I, who am out of office, who have been out of office for ten years, shall agitate the public mind, by declaring what taxes I would impose, or what taxes I would remit, if I were in, power! There may be some young member silly enough to suppose, that I will permit declarations on such a subject to be extorted from me—that I will give you the advantage of hinting at a property tax, or threatening to increase the penny post. I will make no declaration whatever as to the course which I will pursue, if in office, with regard to financial measures. Nay, more, my first act in office must necessarily be to demand a vote of confidence from the House of Commons, in order that I may be enabled to review the financial situation of the country—to consider its expenditure, and the various causes from which the present difficulties have arisen. I would not receive office on the condition of making hasty, ill-considered attempts, to repair the existing evils. I admit now, as I have often admitted, the bad policy of incurring debt during peace; but that admission should not prevent me from proposing such temporary arrangements as might give time for mature consideration on the present financial condition and prospects of the country. The decision of to-night will involve a vote of confidence. If unfavourable to the government, it will imply distrust in their competency to relieve the country from its present embarrassment. They are chargeable with having produced it: it is in vain for them to refer to occasional causes of extraordinary expenditure—to a rebellion in Canada—to an expedition against China. After making allowance for these, there is the evidence of gross mismanagement—there is proof that, while there was a growing increase in expenditure, not only there was no effort made to provide fresh means of meeting it, but existing means were thrown away. Revenue was abandoned while estimates were increasing—revenue was abandoned, not from the conviction of the government that the sacrifice was wise,—but abandoned for the purpose of conciliating party support. What has been the cause of this? What has led us, step by step, to the brink of this precipice? Not the want of ability in individual members of the cabinet—not negligence, not incompetence—no, the evil is to be found in a departure from constitutional principles—in the persevering attempt to govern without having the confidence of the House of Commons. There may be dexterity in this, but it is fraught with intolerable evil to the country. I speak not of occasional defeats, but of the exhibition, year after year, of the inability of a government to carry its own measures. You yourselves must be conscious of this. You have written your own condemnation. When I retired from office, in 1835, after a short and ineffectual struggle of three months—when I relinquished office, on the express ground that I did not possess the confidence of the House of Commons—the noble lord told me, that I had acted in the spirit of the constitution. When Lord Melbourne returned to office, in 1839, after the defeat of government on the Jamaica Bill, Lord Melbourne—after referring to a conversation between King William III. and Bishop Burnet, in which the King observed, that the worst form of government was a weak and inefficient monarchy—said, that the worst administration that could be formed was that which did not possess sufficient of the confidence of parliament to be enabled to carry the measures which it deemed important for the public welfare. It is a violation of constitutional principle—a violation of the spirit of representative government—that this state of things should continue. It is not fit that we should present to Europe the spectacle of a House of Commons constantly refusing to sanction the measures of an administration, yet not influencing the fate of that administration. It is not for the interest of free and popular government, that this exhibition should continue. It is not for the interest of monarchy, that the servants of the Crown should be powerless in the House of Commons. It is not for the interest of the measures which they recommend, that those measures should be viewed with suspicion and distrust on account of the position of their authors. It not for the interest of public men—it detracts from their weight and authority—it is injurious to their public character—to retain office without power. Power, indeed, in one sense, they do possess. I do not underrate it. They can excite and inflame the people; they can, by the minutest detail of sufferings—by imputing those sufferings to the acts of the legislature—by comparing, for instance, the wretched condition of a manufacturing population with the ease and comfort of liberated negroes, they can obstruct the calm and dispassionate consideration of public measures. But this is a sorry triumph: this appeal to passion can always be made—it always has been made: distress—severe distress—privations that are afflicting in the recital—will always exist in such a society as that in which we live, and can always be urged against any measure which partakes (as the best measures may partake) of an unpopular character. These appeals have a powerful effect, when made by individual members of the legislature. When made by men in authority—by men, whose duty it is to resist the influence of such appeals, and to expose their tendencies—they act with tenfold weight. It may be, that you will succeed in your present object; it may be, that amid the conflicts of passion which you will have excited, amid the collision of contending interests, you may gather up the scattered elements of discord, and combine them into the materials of party strength; but you will find them dangerous and uncontrollable instruments of government. Rely upon it, that when authority supports itself by invoking the assistance of agitation, it calls to its aid an ally, powerful no doubt, but an ally that will be its master, and not its slave.

CONFIDENCE IN THE MINISTRY.

SIR ROBERT PEEL: I shall proceed, without a word of needless apology or elaborate preface, to address myself to the subject of the motion of which I have given notice for this night. When, on Thursday last, the Chancellor of the Exchequer intimated that it was his intention to proceed with the business of the government, I entertained a strong impression that after the defeats to which that government had been subjected—defeats, as I thought, indicative of the withdrawal of the confidence of this House—indicative of inability on their part, to give effect to measures which they deemed important for the public welfare—I did feel, I say, that after that notice, unaccompanied with the slightest explanation of government, it was impossible for me to acquiesce in the propriety of the course proposed to be pursued, without taking some step which should bring to issue the question, whether government do or do not possess the confidence of the House of Commons; and having come to that conclusion, I infinitely prefer bringing the question to issue in the most direct and manly manner in which the sense of the House can be taken. I might have resorted to other proceedings. I might have obstructed the course of the government with respect to measures of great importance to the commerce and industry of the country. I might have threatened the government with obstructions to the grant of supplies, I might have taken the milder course of submitting a proposition for the postponement of some important bill, and thus, in an indirect manner, have tested the opinion of the House; but I think it infinitely better, on the very first day the forms of the House permit, to bring, in the direct manner I now propose, under the consideration of the House of Commons, the question, whether it give the present government its confidence. The resolution which I mean to propose, affirms two propositions—first, that her Majesty's government do not sufficiently possess the confidence of the House of Commons, to enable them to carry through the House measures which they deem of essential importance to the public welfare; and secondly, that their continuance in office under such circumstances, is at variance with the spirit of the constitution. My duty is to establish those propositions, and, if I establish them, I shall have a fair right to claim the assent of the House to the resolution which I am about to move. With respect to my first proposition, that "Ministers do not sufficiently possess the confidence of the House of Commons, to enable them to carry through the House measures which they deem of essential importance to the public welfare;" it is unnecessary for me to offer any detailed proof of its truth. Will any man affirm, after the experience, not of one or two nights, but after a long and continuous experience—will any man affirm that ministers possess so much of the confidence of the House of Commons, as to enable them to carry measures which they deem of essential importance to the public welfare? I am not speaking of occasional defeats, of casual obstructions to the progress of public business, I speak of the general course of public business, of measures which have been brought forward and postponed almost without an effort to carry them,—I speak of occasions on which measures proposed by the government have been modified, in deference to the opinions of those who opposed them. I speak of their failure to carry into effect measures, which they strongly recommended to the adoption of the House. I am speaking, not, as I said before, of one or two failures, not of obstructions offered to the government on its first formation; I am drawing my inference of loss of confidence from the continuous course of the government, in respect to legislation, and the degree of support which ministers have received from the House of Commons. I am speaking, of course, immediately with reference to the defeat they sustained the other night, on a most important measure connected with the financial administration of the country, following other defeats which they have recently met with. Now I say that these are complete and decisive proofs that my first proposition is correctly stated—that the government do not possess such a degree of confidence on the part of the House of Commons as has enabled them, or will enable them, to give effect to measures which they deem important to the public welfare. If that proposition be true—if her Majesty's ministers do not possess the confidence of the House of Commons, then, I say, that their continuance in office is at variance with the principle and spirit of the constitution. I presume I shall hardly be asked to define what I mean by the "spirit of the constitution." I do not speak of those theories which refer to some combination of the opposing elements of monarchy, aristocracy, and democracy, each armed with defensive and offensive instruments, by which they keep each other in check. I speak only of that system of parliamentary government which has prevailed in this country since the accession of the House of Hanover. I speak of that system which implies that the ministers of the Crown shall have the confidence of the House of Commons. I speak of that system which has prevailed during the period when, according to the expression—the just expression of the noble lord, whom I now see opposite to me, in his able and dispassionate Essay on the English constitution, "the centre of gravity of the State has been placed in the House of Commons." When I use the phrase, "spirit of the constitution," I speak of the system of government which has maintained the equilibrium between monarchy and democracy—of that system of government which has harmonised those apparently conflicting elements—of that system of government which, by the constant yet almost unfelt interposition of slight checks, has prevented the necessity of recurring to the use of extreme instruments in the collision of antagonist powers. That is the spirit of the constitution of which I speak, and that spirit of the constitution appears to me to be violated, by the continuance in office of ministers who have not the confidence of the House of Commons. My impression on that subject is confirmed by a reference to all historical precedents having analogy to this case. It is confirmed by the authority of all eminent writers, all statesmen versed in the practical administration of affairs. But my impression also receives melancholy confirmation from the actual experience of positive evils which arise when another system of government is substituted for that which has hitherto prevailed. It is confirmed, likewise, by the course of historical precedent. I look to the period which all constitutional writers have referred to, as the period from which dates the necessary system of parliamentary government, to the accession of the House of Hanover, to the appointment of Sir Robert Walpole as Prime Minister, and I say that recurring to the history of administrations, we find that invariably, or at least with scarcely an exception, that a minister, whatever might have been his power, however confirmed his influence, however long the duration of his authority, when deprived of the confidence of the House of Commons, has felt it incumbent upon him to do homage to the principle of representative government, and to abdicate his functions as minister of the Crown. I begin with Sir Robert Walpole. He held office for, I think, the long period of twenty-five years. If I mistake not, he was appointed in 1715, and the termination of his power took place about 100 years from the period at which I am now speaking, namely, in 1741. Sir R. Walpole was dispossessed of power under these circumstances:—A motion was made by Mr. Pulteney, which implied the withdrawal of the confidence of the House of Commons. That motion was negatived in favour of ministers by a majority of three; but upon Sir R. Walpole being in a minority on the Chippenham election (the determination of election questions was then exclusively influenced by party spirit, and they were looked upon as convenient modes of testing the strength of ministries), notwithstanding the slight majority which he had on the question of confidence, Sir R. Walpole relinquished office, after having been minister for twenty-five years. In 1782, Lord North yielded to the same influence. In that year, two motions were submitted to the House of Commons. The first was brought forward by Sir John Rouse, and the second by Lord George Cavendish. One motion declared that it was impossible for the House to place confidence in the government, and the other was couched in terms very nearly similar. One was negatived by a majority of nine, the other by a majority of ten; but Lord North, nevertheless, yielded to the necessity implied by the withdrawal of the confidence of the House of Commons: and his authority also came to an end. In 1804, Lord Sidmouth retired from office, although he had in his favour a majority which has been almost unknown in the recent history of parliamentary contests. Lord Sidmouth, in the course of his administration, frequently had majorities to a great extent, but they having been reduced to, I think, thirty-seven, his lordship felt it his duty to retire. He considered a majority of only thirty-seven, as indicative of the withdrawal of the confidence of the House of Commons. In 1812, on the first formation of Lord Liverpool's government, the House of Commons, on the motion of Lord Wharnccliffe (then Mr. Stuart Wortley), by a majority of four, agreed to a resolution expressing an opinion that a more efficient administration ought to be formed. That majority of four was decisive of the fate of the first administration attempted to be formed by Lord Liverpool. He and his colleagues resigned their trust into the hands of the sovereign, and it was not until attempts which proved ineffectual had been made to form another administration, that Lord Liverpool was again placed in office. The next administration which yielded to the influence of public opinion, as expressed by the House of Commons, was that which was presided over by my noble friend the Duke of Wellington. In 1830, on the meeting of parliament, upon the question whether or not the civil-list should be referred to a committee of the House of Commons, we were defeated by a combination of parties entertaining opposite opinions, and the House of Commons resolved by a majority of, I think, twenty-nine, to refer the consideration of the civil-list to a select committee. I felt that the minority in which the government had been left, was decisive of its fate. I thought it sufficiently significant of the fact, that we had not the confidence of the House of Commons; and therefore the Duke of Wellington and myself felt it our duty to retire from office. The right hon. baronet opposite, the President of the Board of Control, will recollect that upon that occasion, his opinion anticipated ours. Immediately after the decision, the right hon. baronet, entertaining an opinion which was just and natural, and which was in conformity with that of many others, inquired from me, "Whether, after such an expression of opinion on the part of the House, it was the intention of ministers to retain their places and continue to carry on the government?"

Sir J. C. Hobhouse: Since that period I made an apology to the House, and the right hon. gentleman, for having put that question, and said, that I considered the question to be a very improper one.

Sir R. Peel: I never thought of complaining of any want of courtesy on the part of the right hon. baronet. I never thought that the right hon. baronet proposed the question in an offensively hostile manner, and if I had supposed so, I would not have alluded to the circumstance on this occasion. The opinion which the right hon. baronet implied by his question was entirely confirmed by the House of Commons. Lord Brougham in vain attempted to appease the impatience of the House of Commons on that night, and my own opinion so strongly concurred with that implied by the right hon. baronet's question, that, on the next day, I signified to the Crown my intention to withdraw from its service. On the night after the right hon. baronet put his question, which never excited an angry feeling in my mind, Mr. Brougham suggested that, after what had taken place, it would be better to permit the ministers of the Crown to have some time for deliberation, and, considering the position in which they were placed, proposed that the appointment of the committee which it was wished should take place immediately, should be deferred till the next day. His advice, however, was overruled; and such was the impatience of the House of Commons to proceed to some decisive act which should imply the downfall of the government, that, on that very night, the select committee on the civil-list was appointed. The next administration which also yielded to public opinion, as signified by that of the House of Commons, was that over which I myself presided for a short time in 1835. I did carry on for a short time, an unequal contest, in opposition to the power leagued against me; but this I must say, that the first time I was positively obstructed in an act of legislation, that moment I felt it my duty to withdraw from the management of public affairs. I beg to remind the noble lord, that at a much earlier period than the date of my resignation, he implied an opinion that I was holding power injuriously to the public interests, because I did not possess the confidence of the House of Commons. On the 2nd of March the noble lord observed, that he believed no ministry ever stood before, in respect to the House of Commons, in so extraordinary a position; and the noble lord observed on the evil influence which my attempt might have upon public affairs. On the 16th of March, the noble lord said—"I own I come more and more to the opinion that we ought to revert, whenever we can, to that old practice of the constitution, under which the powers of the Crown were administered and exercised by persons in whom the House and the country had confidence."

The noble lord said, that while persons exercised the powers of the Crown in whom the House reposed no confidence, they imposed the necessity of making motions most inconvenient, and, perhaps, unconstitutional, such as that which had been made relative to the appointment of a noble friend of mine to an embassy at St. Petersburg. The noble lord said—"You, by remaining in power, are contravening the principles of representative government, and you alone are responsible for the delays and obstructions that may arise, or for any offence to which, by your acts, the Crown is exposed."

The noble lord was then, day by day, waxing stronger in the opinion, that we ought to revert to the old practice of the constitution.

So little did I think that I had cause of personal offence in the remark made in 1830, that in 1835 I myself shared the opinion of the noble lord. In 1835 the right hon. gentleman opposite told me that the fault and difficulty of my position did not rest with the opposition, but from an act which would be the fruitful source of evils, namely, the endeavour to govern by a minority; and being, therefore, fully sensible of the difficulties of my position, so soon as the noble lord had carried a resolution which implied that no adjustment of the tithes would be satisfactory, except that which he advocated, I did not wait for the progress of the bill, for I thought, that the resolution indicated, that I did not possess the confidence of the House of Commons; and, therefore, being obstructed in the progress of important legislation, although I had remained in office after having been defeated on the amendment to the address, and on the choice of a Speaker; yet, being as I have said, obstructed in the progress of important legislation, I at once signified my intention of resigning office. In speaking of administrations which have yielded to the authority of the House of Commons, I have omitted to mention a case in which the precedent appears at first sight to be somewhat different. I mean in 1783, when Mr. Pitt, notwithstanding the adverse votes of the House of Commons, remained in office, and continued to hold office, until he could take the sense of the people by a dissolution. But I contend, that the circumstances of that case were in no degree analogous to the present. The circumstances of the contest between Mr. Pitt and Mr. Fox, in 1783, were these:—On December 17, 1783, the bill which had been brought in by Mr. Fox, for the regulation and management of affairs in India, was rejected. On the 17th of December, the very same day, the House of Commons resolved to go into a committee of the whole House on the state of the nation on the Monday following. On the 19th of December, the government of Mr. Fox and Lord North was dissolved. [Mr. Macaulay: Dismissed, you mean.]—I am much obliged to the right hon. gentleman, but I really thought, when a government had been dismissed, it might be said to be dissolved. On the 19th of December, Mr. Pitt was appointed minister. But before Mr. Pitt could take his place as minister in the House of Commons, an address to the Crown was moved not to dissolve parliament. At the outset of the government, before even there was time for the re-election of Mr. Pitt, his seat being vacated by the acceptance of office, an address to the Crown was moved, not to dissolve Parliament, and his Majesty was "earnestly entreated to hearken to the advice of his faithful Commons, and not to the secret advice of particular persons who might have private interests of their own, separate from the true interests of his Majesty and his people." An adjournment of Parliament took place on December 24th. Parliament re-assembled on the 12th of January, 1784, and before any one act of the government could be submitted to the consideration of the House of Commons, on the very day on which Mr. Pitt appeared to the House as minister of the Crown, on the very first day, a resolution of the House was come to, moved by Lord Surrey, as follows:—"That in the present state of his Majesty's dominions, it is peculiarly necessary, that there should be an administration which has the confidence of this House and the public."

On the 16th of January, four days after the meeting of parliament, it was moved by Lord Charles Spencer:—"That the appointments of his Majesty's present ministers were accompanied by circumstances new and extraordinary, and such as do not conciliate or engage the confidence of this House; and that the continuance of the present ministers in trusts of the highest importance and responsibility, is contrary to constitutional principles, and injurious to the interests of his Majesty and the people."

The objection to the continuance of Mr. Pitt, was not that the confidence of the House of Commons was withheld from the measures which he proposed. There were surmises—there were allegations that Mr. Pitt owed his power to the exercise of undue influence; that the King's name had been made use of for the purpose of influencing elections. The objection, therefore, was taken at the outset to the administration of Mr. Pitt. Before Mr. Pitt could take his seat, hostile resolutions were come to; and before he could bring forward any one act of government upon which the sense of the House of Commons could be taken, resolutions were affirmed implying objections, not to acts of that government, but to the principle upon which it was constituted. The battles which Mr. Pitt was then fighting was not in opposition to the principle that a minister ought to have the confidence of the House of Commons for the purpose of carrying on the government, but Mr. Pitt contended that Mr. Fox, having a majority in the House of Commons, was attempting to control the constitutional prerogative of the Crown, and, without reference to attempts at legislation, without reference to public acts of the government, was denouncing that Administration, and implying beforehand want of confidence in it. It is true, that there were in that case repeated resolutions implying a want of confidence on the part of the House of Commons, but I say, that the circumstances of that case are not analogous. They did not, in the case of Mr. Pitt, imply a want of confidence on account of the acts proposed by the government. They implied a want of confidence on account of the suspicion that it owed its origin to unconstitutional motives; and that it was the duty of the House of Commons from the first to dissent from and reprobate its appointment. On this principle it was, that the great contest took place in 1783-4, which led to the dissolution of that parliament, and the election of a new one. But is the present, I ask, a case at all analogous? Am I obstructing the course of a government at its first formation? Am I depriving it of the opportunity of submitting its measures to the consideration of Parliament? Am I not urging that you have had the opportunity, in repeated sessions, of laying before the House of Commons the measures you think essential to the public welfare, while they have been in some cases so modified, so altered by the prevailing influence of those in opposition—in other cases have so completely failed, having met with so little support either in their principle or details, that the long-continued experience of your weakness is the foundation of the resolution which I move? I say, then, that constitutional precedent, that the records of history, with one exception, and that the case of '83, not analogous to the present, support my proposition—that ministers not possessing the confidence of the House of Commons have felt it their duty to relinquish office. I say again, that the authority of public men and public writers comes in aid of historical precedent. The authority of Mr. Burke, the authority of Mr. Fox, the authority at least of all who have advocated the popular principles of representative government, are in unison with my opinions on this point, and confirm the position I have laid down. Take the opinions of Mr. Burke. Mr. Burke, on the motion relative to the speech from the throne, said:—"A House of Commons respected by his ministers is essential to his Majesty's service. It is fit that they should yield to Parliament, and not that Parliament should be new modelled until it is fitted to their purposes. If our authority is only to be held up when we coincide in opinion with his Majesty's advisers, but is to be set at nought the moment it differs from them, the House of Commons will sink into a mere appendage of administration, and will lose that independent character which, inseparably connecting honour and reputation with the acts of this House, enables us to afford a real, effective, and substantial support to his government. It is the deference shown to our opinion, when we dissent from the servants of the Crown, which alone can give authority to the proceedings of this House when it concurs with their measures."

That was the opinion of Mr. Burke. What was the opinion of Mr. Fox? He said:—"That it was true, that the most solid and incontrovertible basis upon which a government could be built, was the confidence of the House of Commons. He meant, that cordiality and union, that constituted the spring of the House of Commons; and it was the confidence in the House of Commons which gave energy and effect to every administration. However disagreeable the issue, it must be imputed to those who thought themselves wiser than the House of Commons, and they alone must answer for it."

But did Mr. Fox say, it was the duty of a minister never to differ from the House of Commons? Did he not, on the contrary, arrogate to himself the right of proposing measures he deemed necessary for the public welfare, notwithstanding the adverse opinion of the House? He said: "He was far from meaning, that a minister was never justifiable in differing from the House of Commons. No man was more likely so to differ than himself; but he would adhere to his own opinion, and when he found that the House differed from himself, he would resign, and say to the House of Commons—'Choose some other instrument to carry on the public business; I am no longer fit to serve you.'"

Such were the opinions of Mr. Burke, and Mr. Fox. I will now refer to another high constitutional authority—no other than the noble lord himself, as expressed in that work to which I have before referred, and now refer again with the most sincere respect, as containing a most moderate, dispassionate, and able view of the British Constitution. The passage I am about to quote, be it remembered, is no hasty expression, uttered by the noble lord during the heat and excitement of debate, it is the calm and deliberate opinion of the noble lord, delivered in his character of a writer on the constitution of the country, upon the relative position of the Crown and the House of Commons. The noble lord says:—"The accession of George I. was the era when government by party was fully established in England. During the reign of William, Whigs and Tories had been employed together by the King; and although the distinction of a Whig ministry and a Tory ministry were more decidedly marked during the reign of Anne, yet Marlborough and Godolphin, who formed great part of the strength of the Whig ministry, were Tories; and Harley and St. John, who put themselves at the head of the Tory administration, had held, a short time before, subordinate offices under the Whigs. But the complete downfall of the Tory administration, who had signed the peace of Utrecht, and the well-founded suspicion which attached to the whole party, of favouring the claims of James the Second's son, placed George I. entirely in the hands of the Whigs. At the same period, the financial difficulties which followed the winding up of the war, and the great practical talents of Walpole as a statesman, contributed to give a greater importance to the House of Commons than ever, and to place within that House, if I may so express myself, the centre of gravity of the State. From the doctrine of the responsibility of ministers it follows, that they ought to enjoy the confidence of the Commons, otherwise their measures will be thwarted, their promises will be distrusted, and, finding all their steps obstructed, their efforts will be directed to the overthrow of the constitution."

The noble lord says, that "from the doctrine of the responsibility of ministers, it follows, that they ought to enjoy the confidence of the House of Commons;" and he justly describes in powerful language, the consequences which would follow from departing from the constitutional rule. He says:—"Otherwise their measures will be thwarted, their promises will be distrusted, and, finding all their steps obstructed, their efforts will be directed to the overthrow of the constitution."

Now, although the noble lord is in office, yet I will not take so extreme a view as he has taken of the consequences of persevering in such a course. It may not follow, that the ministers, being obstructed, will meditate "the overthrow of the Constitution," but those other evils, that the noble lord has spoken of, must necessarily and inevitably follow, as the consequences of endeavouring to govern by a minority in the House of Commons. You cannot, in this country, restrict the influence of party. You may say, "Why meet this government by party opposition?" Why not lend them your cordial and hearty support, without reference to their merits, and thus enable them to go on? Why, the noble lord himself has properly scouted such doctrines. The noble lord said:—"From the collisions of party, arise the energy and vital principle of the constitution, and of popular government. (The noble lord added) I never find any persons denouncing these party animosities and conflicts, except mock philosophers, effeminate men, and sentimental women."

The natural and unavoidable consequences of attempting to govern by a minority were the consequences I met with. Upon almost every night my proceedings were obstructed. On every committee of supply, I met with some motion which prevented my proceeding with the public business; and at length I was compelled to yield. While party influence and party connections remain in this country, such will be the case; but this I will say, of all administrations that ever existed, considering the relative position of minorities or majorities, whichever it may be, never government met with less obstruction than the present. Never government had less of factious or mere petulant opposition. Without encouraging extravagant apprehensions then as to the overthrow of the constitution, this I say, that practical experience proves to us, that the noble lord is right, that there will be great evils, absolute, unavoidable evils, in the administration of public affairs, resulting from the inversion of the constitutional rule, and the attempt to govern without a sufficient majority in this House. Look at the noble lord's experience in the administration of affairs since he held office. Let me take the present parliament—let me instance three measures—one in its commencement, one in its maturity, and a more recent one, supposed to be towards its close. First of all, let me take the history of the appropriation clause, then the Jamaica bill, and lastly, the case of the sugar duties; and can I see what has taken place on these three questions without coming to the conclusion that the authority of the House of Commons is not supported by the course which has been pursued? I never taunted the noble lord for abandoning the appropriation clause. I thought he was placed in a situation of necessity, which, upon the whole, made it advisable for the public interests that there should be a settlement of the title question without the appropriation clause, but can I conceal from myself, that this necessity arose out of the weakness of the government—that it arose out of a want of confidence on the part of the House of Commons, which left to the government no other alternative but to recede from the most express engagement, or, by insisting on that engagement, to sacrifice great public interests! Then, look to the Jamaica bill. Do I want the most conclusive proof of the evil consequences likely to arise upon that question on account of its abandonment by the government? The government brought in a bill, the object of which was to extinguish representative government in the colony of Jamaica. It failed. We opposed them. They were compelled to bring in another bill in conformity with our recommendations. But what was the statement of the evils anticipated from that course by the noble lord, the Secretary of State for the Colonies, and the noble viscount at the head of the government? The noble lord opposite said—"It is obvious, that in Jamaica the authority of the Crown will be greatly weakened by any vote of the House of Commons giving support to the contumacy of the Assembly of Jamaica against the proposition of the ministers of the Crown. (He said,) In continuing in the administration of affairs, not having a sufficient degree of confidence and support to carry on those affairs efficiently in this House, we should be exposing to jeopardy the colonies of this country."

Lord Melbourne said—"The Jamaica bill was of paramount indispensable importance, for the great objects of emancipation, and the vote of the House of Commons was fatal to that measure. Not only so, but it indicates, with sufficient clearness and distinctness, such a want of confidence on the part of a great body in the other House, as to render it absolutely impossible that we should continue to administer the affairs of her Majesty's government in a manner useful and beneficial to the country."

That is the opinion which you yourselves give as to the degree in which the colonial interests were to be compromised by the attempt to govern without a sufficient majority in the House of Commons. Take, again, the case of the sugar duties. Can you, or can any man, say, that the position of the Chancellor of the Exchequer was a satisfactory or becoming position? After the grounds on which that measure had been advocated—after the importance which had been attached to it—after the expectations of relief which were held out in consequence of its adoption—was it a course calculated to exalt the authority of the House of Commons to find the Chancellor of the Exchequer, on Thursday last, having been overruled in his propositions, after the declaration of the Judge-Advocate, that we must consider the budget as a whole—was it becoming in the Chancellor of the Exchequer to move, without a word of explanation, the adoption of the existing sugar duties? I say, that those measures to which I have referred, and which are but specimens and examples, are conclusive proofs, that the evils which the noble lord prophetically anticipated, as arising from the thwarting and obstruction of the government, have been practically realised, as we ourselves have had the opportunity of observing. Is this for the credit of the House of Commons? Is this for the maintenance of its authority, as one of the constituent branches of the legislature? Alas! no. It may appear, to a superficial observer, that it is a proof of the strength of the prerogative of the Crown, that it should be able to support its ministers without a majority of the House of Commons. But that is an imperfect and mistaken view. The interests of the Crown and the interests of the House of Commons are identical. You cannot strike a blow at the House of Commons, in its just and legitimate authority, without, at the same time, striking a blow at the monarchy of this country. But, can it be said to add to the authority of the monarchy, that its ministers and representatives, who counsel measures in this House, on the authority of the Crown—can it be supposed, that the sorry triumph of being maintained in power by the Crown—is a compensation for the delays, for the spectacle of insufficiency and want of authority in the government we have recently beheld; It may be said, “True, we may have not the confidence of the House of Commons; but, perhaps, as Mr. Pitt, was able to say, though Mr. Fox denied it, if we fail in the House of Commons, there are sufficient indications that we possess the confidence of the country. First, however, I should say with Mr. Fox, it is dangerous to admit any other recognised organ of public opinion than the House of Commons. It is dangerous to set up the implied, or supposed opinions of constituencies against their declared and authorized organ, the House of Commons. The House and the constituencies should not be brought into this unseemly contest. But if you deny the force of that argument—if you hold that it is right to defer to the opinions of the constituencies—can you, I ask, show me, in the elections that have recently taken place, any just ground for the boast, that the confidence withheld from you by the House has been extended to you by the constituencies of the empire? I know not exactly how many vacancies have occurred since the commencement of the present parliament. I believe them to have been upwards of one hundred; but this I can say with confidence, that, upon the general balance, there have been twenty elections in which there have been changes of the former members, and of those twenty, embracing large towns, boroughs, agricultural districts, in fact, every kind and description of constituency, out of those twenty in which changes have taken place, sixteen have been adverse to you, and four only have been in your favour. So that, upon the whole, in those places where changes have taken place, during the present parliament, there has been a positive loss of not less than twelve members. I say, then, whatever may be the object you expect from an appeal to the people, if that be the course you are meditating, you have no right to say, from the result of the elections hitherto, that the opinion of the constituencies differs from that of their representatives. I know it will be said, that all my general doctrines may be true—that it is right, under ordinary circumstances, that ministers should have the confidence of the House of Commons; “but there are special and peculiar circumstances,” her Majesty’s ministers might say, “that except us from the ordinary rule, and entitle us to continue in office.” Now, it is perfectly obvious that this plea will apply in fact to all times. Who can deny, that in the important position of this country, with such complicated affairs to be administered, there must be at all times, special and peculiar circumstances connected with the executive government of the day, and that you (the government) being the judges, will be enabled to discover special and peculiar circumstances, why you should be exempted from the ordinary principle; so that, in fact, there will be no limit to the application of that principle? The men who have to determine are not quite impartial judges as to the urgency of the circumstances which constitute the special case. Perhaps, however, it may be said, that you contemplate an appeal to the people, and that you are holding office for the purpose of making that appeal. I know nothing whatever upon that subject. As a member of the House of Commons, I can have no evidence of the intentions of the Crown. But I see you repeatedly in minorities; I see indications that you have not the confidence of this House. I know that you have power, at any time, to dissolve—I know, too, that you can choose the most favourable time for a dissolution. No doubt that is the prerogative of the Crown, a prerogative of a delicate nature for the House of Commons to meddle with. But all this does not relieve me from the performance of what I conceive to be a duty, in calling upon the House of Commons to say, if her Majesty's government possess their confidence or not. And here, too, I will say, that I shall have no additional confidence if, after exciting the public mind upon such a subject as the sustenance of the people, you then make your appeal to the country by a dissolution. I believe that you are not, by that course, advancing the measure which you advocate. I do not underrate the power of clamour. I do not underrate the evils arising out of the conflict of opposing parties. I do doubt your power to carry that law, as I doubt your power to carry a proposal of a shilling a bushel fixed duty. Although I have no right to anticipate the decision of the House upon the Corn-law, yet I appeal to any rational man, whether he does not concur with me in this conclusion, that you are bringing forward your measure without a hope of being able to carry it, or of procuring the assent of the present House of Commons to your proposition; that you bring it forward (I will not say with the purpose, but the certain effect of your proceeding will be) to produce, by the increased agitation of the public mind, an indisposition to look at any settlement of the question. Nevertheless, you may say, you conceal your intentions with respect to a dissolution, and that, after taking a debate on the Corn-laws, you reserve to yourselves the power of appealing to the people. I disregard that consideration altogether, as a reason why I should not bring forward the present motion, and I am fortified in this conclusion by the course which you yourselves took with respect to a measure scarcely less important than that of the Corn-laws—I allude to the bill relative to the Poor-laws. You propose, without having, as I think, sufficient authority as a government, to submit to the consideration of the House an important measure on the subject of the Corn-laws; and yet you, at the same time, notify your intention not to proceed with the consideration of another measure connected with the Poor-laws of the country, which you profess to think of essential importance. And on what ground do you withhold this measure, from the consideration of the House? I have your own authority—a statement from your own mouth—as to the grounds on which you withhold from discussion in the House of Commons, the question of the Poor-laws, which you professed to regard as one of paramount importance. The noble lord opposite, stated, that “in the present state of affairs, he thought it better not to proceed with the Poor-law amendment bill;” and on what ground? “In the first place,” said the noble lord, “there would be a protracted discussion without any final result.” That is the ground which you urged to the House of Commons as a reason for withdrawing from its cognizance the question of the poor-laws—“a protracted discussion without any final result.” If this is your anticipation, with respect to the Poor-laws, may I not venture on a similar anticipation as to the Corn-laws? If I deviate from strict form—if I am unobservant of technicalities in anticipating a discussion on the Corn-laws, do not you fall in the same error, in making prophecies in respect to a discussion on the Poor-laws? You think that that is a legitimate ground of action—you expect that there will be long discussions without final results on the Poor-laws—I anticipate the same with respect to the Corn-laws. Nay, you proceeded to prophecy—“In the next place, with the expectation that every hon. member seemed to have, that he was to account for his conduct on the hustings.” The noble lord opposite, thought “there would be a great many motions, and a great many speeches made, intended rather for the hustings than for any useful purpose of legislation." The poor-law bill, then, was stated to be withdrawn, not on account of the unpopularity of the measure, not because its discussion in the House of Commons might inconvenience members at an election, but on the ground, "that there would be long discussions without any final result;" and "Members would make speeches rather for the hustings than for any useful purposes of legislation." This was the ground on which the Poor-law bill was abandoned; but the Corn-law question is to be persevered in. Is there any more prospect of a final result from the discussion of this subject? Is there less expectation of long speeches—any greater reason to anticipate that the speeches delivered will be spoken more with a view of convincing the judgments of hon. members in this House, than for the purpose of conciliating the favour of the constituencies, whom the speakers might represent in agricultural or manufacturing districts."

I have been given to understand—but I can scarcely believe it—that her Majesty's government, in proposing an alteration of the Corn-laws for the consideration of the House, intend, when the result of the discussion is known, to appeal to the people. If an appeal to the country be made on such a question, so far from tending in the slightest degree to remedy the depression of trade, and to calm the agitation and increase confidence in the public mind, it will, according to my firm belief, only serve, by suspending the operation of all the ordinary retail dealings of this metropolis—by leaving in a state of uncertainty for months to come what the ultimate decision of the House of Commons would be on the subject of the Corn-laws, to aggravate the evils already connected with the stagnation of commerce, and throw an effectual obstacle and impediment in the way of the revival of its prosperity. And, therefore, as I said before, if I had the perfect assurance—which you cannot give me—that it is your intention to bring forward a discussion on the Corn-laws, so far from that being a reason why I should not press my motion to a division, I should regard it only as an additional ground for doing so.

There are many other reasons, which I might state as a justification of my present motion, but I do not intend to enter on them. I rest my proposition to-night on constitutional grounds. I think I have sufficiently proved that "Her Majesty's ministers do not sufficiently possess the confidence of the House of Commons, and their continuance in office, under such circumstances, is at variance with the spirit of the constitution." I reserve all other grounds. I have a want of confidence in them, on account of their administration of the finances of the country. I think that our embarrassment, with respect to the finances, mainly arises from the same cause as has brought on the general embarrassment of the country—the attempt on the part of the ministers to administer the government without possessing the confidence of the House of Commons. I do not believe, if they had possessed the confidence of the House of Commons, that they would, in the face of an increasing expenditure—in the face of an increasing deficiency (not of a decreasing revenue, comparing the expenditure with the revenue)—I do not believe that they would have incurred the risk, nay encountered the certain evil, of losing £1,200,000 of revenue by the Post-office bill. I believe that it was the same cause which led you to abandon that Post-office revenue as induces you to have recourse to the expedient to which you have now resorted.

Your weakness is the cause. I believe your weakness is the cause of your constant oscillations between Conservative opinions on this side of the House, and antagonist opinions on the other. You found it necessary to conduct the government on Conservative principles; and in making the attempt you encountered the opposition and forfeited the confidence of gentlemen on your own side of the House. It became necessary for you to re-establish yourselves in their opinion; and you discovered that some measure must be had recourse to, like that of the Post-office bill, for the purpose of recovering their favourable opinion. When was it that the Post-office Bill was introduced? After your failure on the Jamaica bill. I cannot dive into your intentions—these things may not stand in the relation of cause and effect; but it was a remarkable circumstance that, after your defeat on the colonial question, you did resort to that measure which I deprecated at the time and opposed; not that I denied that advantages might arise in many respects from the reduction of the Post-office duty, but because I thought we could not afford to hazard a revenue of £1,600,000, and because I did not believe that your resolution, that "you would supply the deficiency by increased taxation," would be listened to with any great favour. I do believe it is the same cause now—your weakness—which has impelled you to propose a budget which has only had the effect of disturbing the country. When you say that your object in proposing these measures is to supply the deficiency in the revenue, you do not explain to us how that hope is to be fulfilled. The Chancellor of the Exchequer never explained to us whether he expected to recover the £1,400,000 or £1,600,000 lost in the Post-office, by the imposition of a fixed duty upon corn. It is necessary that that point should be explained, for unless the admission of foreign corn at a fixed duty of 1s. per bushel, will secure a revenue of £1,600,000, the budget of the Chancellor of the Exchequer is worth nothing—literally worth nothing at all. [It was intimated that the calculation of the Chancellor of the Exchequer was to raise only £400,000 from the admission of foreign corn.] I understand the calculation to be £1,600,000, but whether it were so calculated or not, it is plain that the revenue derived from the admission of foreign corn must be at least equal to that sum, if the deficiency in the revenue is to be supplied; for as the Chancellor of the Exchequer estimates the amount of the customs for the present year, at the same amount as the customs of last year, and as £1,100,000 or £1,200,000 of the customs revenue of last year, was derived from the admission of corn, it is clear that his calculation to be just, must be upon the anticipation of driving somewhere about £1,600,000 from the admission of foreign corn in the present year. Now, with respect to the duties on timber. I have seen an answer returned by Lord Sydenham to a deputation which waited upon him on this subject; what does Lord Sydenham say? I have no official information on the subject. [An observation was made by Lord John Russell.] Surely the noble lord does not mean to draw a distinction between a private letter written by him, saying "we are going to bring forward the timber duties," and an official despatch, in which the same intelligence was conveyed in a more formal manner. Surely the noble lord will not insist upon the distinction to be drawn between an intimation made upon large paper and one made upon small paper—the one being marked "private," the other bearing upon its cover the stamp of official business. But Lord Sydenham says, that if the government should bring forward the timber duties, it will be his imperative duty to urge that due regard be had to all existing interests, and that ample time be given to vested interests to dispose of them, and to provide for the transfer of their property to some other branches of trade. If that be the case—if that imperative duty be imposed upon Lord Sydenham—will it be possible to realise, in the course of the present year, the revenue you anticipate from an alteration of timber duties? But it is not my intention to enter into detail. I reserve altogether my opinion upon this and other measures of administration. I reserve altogether my opinion upon China. I will only say, that upon that question I can give you no confidence. I cannot conceive a position more fraught with anxiety as to the moral influence of England, not only in China, but throughout the whole of the Indian empire, than that which we now occupy, as far as our present information goes, in that quarter of the world. Upon other great questions, such as our relation with America, and with France, I retain the opinions I have previously expressed. I have viewed our alienation from France with feelings of deep regret, and without entering further into the subject, I may state, that notwithstanding the brilliant exploits of our fleets and armies, I yet entertain the opinion, that it would have been impossible to have effected every thing that British and continental interests required, in a manner that would have been reconcilable with such a mode of proceeding towards France as would have avoided the excitement of so bitter a feeling towards us in that country, the consequence of which has been, the unproductive expenditure of a vast amount of capital in making preparations for war, and the generation of a feeling in the French mind which, I fear, will for some time prevent the re-establishment of those friendly relations between France and this country, which I sincerely wish to be permanent, and which, I believe, to be one of the most essential foundations for the permanent peace and tranquillity of Europe. But into these considerations I will not enter; because I wish mainly to urge the constitutional ground upon which my motion is founded. Confining myself to that ground, and maintaining silence upon all others, I dare say I shall be met by the taunt, that I have brought forward no scheme of comprehensive policy of my own. I shall be told that this is a decisive motion—that I might possibly have concealed my opinions when I was discussing the sugar duties, but that when I invited the House to concur in a motion of this kind, I ought to be prepared with some declaration of public opinion upon all questions of public interest and national importance. To that I answer—Where is the man that has more explicitly declared than I have, his opinions upon all the great constitutional questions that have of late years been raised—upon the ballot—upon the extension of the suffrage—upon the shortening the duration of parliaments? Have I ever withheld my opinions upon any one of those great questions? The hon. member for Finsbury says to me, “Make a bidding against the government. Outbid the government! Propose something further than the government, and then you shall have the support of gentlemen of extreme opinions like myself.” I shall do no such thing. I make no bidding for popular applause. I maintain my opinions upon the great constitutional questions to which I have referred, and I shall not, for the purpose of filching some support from the government on the present occasion, indicate opinions at variance with those which, in the course of discussions upon those individual questions, I have constantly expressed. Did I not, when a question like the present was last under the consideration of the House, did I not, upon the vote of confidence last year, fully and explicitly state my views with respect to all the ordinary subjects of legislation? Have I not, when any question has been brought forward, whether church reform, church rates, or any other question of important public interest, invariably expressed my opinions in plain and explicit terms? What is the public question of ordinary legislation in respect to which any rational doubt can be entertained as to my views? I certainly draw a distinction between financial questions, and ordinary matters of policy. I stated the other night—I stated explicitly, that I would not express any opinion upon the financial condition of the country; and I repeat now—giving you the full advantage of that expression of my opinion—that if I were called to power to-morrow, I would claim the right (for it was in that sense I used the expression) deliberately to review the financial position of the country, and that I would not be forced into any precipitate measures for the purpose of extricating the exchequer from its present difficulty. These are the grounds upon which I submit, with confidence, my resolution to the House of Commons. I never have been a flatterer of the House of Commons. I never have encouraged the House of Commons in any attempt to carry measures which I thought would have the effect of unduly increasing its own privileges and power, at the expense of the prerogative of the Crown. The very last occasion on which I gave a vote, was in support of her Majesty’s government, in their attempt to resist a motion, which, in their opinion, would have the effect of unduly encroaching upon the prerogative of the Crown. I did what I could to support the Crown’s prerogative; but my example was not followed by many members of her Majesty’s government. I did what I could to resist the attempt of the House of Commons to interfere with the undoubted prerogative of the Crown. That attempt, Sir, was defeated by your single vote. You were the single obstacle to a motion, which, in your opinion, would amount to an interference with the prerogative of the Crown. You, Sir, though the organ of the House of Commons, had the manliness, which I expected from the consistency of your conduct; yes, Sir, you had the manliness to interpose your single but exalted and effectual authority against a measure, which you deemed injurious to the principles of the constitution. I expected that vote, and I expected the declaration of principle upon which it was given. But when I saw how great had been the risk, I could not but feel confirmed in my opinion, that the prerogative of the Crown was not safely protected by a government, which, even with the aid that I, assisted by my friends, could lend them, could command only an equality of votes upon a question of so much importance, and were obliged to call upon the Speaker to save them from the disgrace of defeat, upon a matter in which the prerogative of the Crown was directly concerned. But, although I have resisted, and always will resist, any unconstitutional attempt on the part of the House of Commons, to trench upon the prerogative of the Crown, I have yet endeavoured to maintain in the House of Commons, every just principle to which it could lay a claim. I supported the noble lord (Lord J. Russell) last year, in defence of the privileges of the House of Commons. I might, upon that occasion, have been seduced by the temptation of party advantage, to take a different course. As it was, I had to encounter the pain of differing from, perhaps, a majority of my friends. But I thought that vital interests—that important powers were at stake, and I was determined that I would not, to conciliate the favour and affection of my own esteemed friends, put to hazard the legitimate privileges of the House of Commons, and subject the House of Commons to the control of a court of law. I know that it is imprudent and unwise to advert to these things. I know that it would be more politic on my part to conceal these differences with my friends. But I will be guilty of no such concealment. I differed from them and voted against them, from a sincere belief, that it was absolutely necessary for the vindication of the privileges of the House of Commons, nay, that it was essential to our existence as a legislative body, that we should have the power of free publication. Why should I shrink from a reference to the opinions I then expressed, and the vote I then gave? Is it not rather a subject of pride with me that I can be permitted to take my own independent view as to the vital privileges of the House of Commons, and yet that due justice shall be done to my motives, and that I shall again be able to rally around me in the bond of common connection and common esteem, those friends from whom I happen upon this particular question to differ. Acting in conformity with these views, which teach me to resist the encroachment of the House upon the prerogative of the Crown, and yet to maintain for the House itself its legitimate influence in the State, I think I may fairly conclude that the House of Commons has a right to expect that the minister of the Crown, who is alike the proper guardian of the royal prerogative and of parliamentary privilege, should possess its confidence. This present House of Commons has been constituted and moulded upon the views of the noble lord the member for Stroud (Lord J. Russell). The noble lord was the author of the bill by which this House of Commons was constituted. It was the noble lord who thought it expedient to abolish the system of nomination boroughs. It was the noble lord who thought it expedient to introduce more of popular spirit into the constitution of this House—to make it correspond more with the progress of popular intelligence, and with the advance of knowledge. To achieve this the noble lord thought that we ought to make the House more an image of the public opinion—an assembly more sympathizing with the people—more originating from the people—more expressive of the public view. This House of Commons, thus constituted according to the views of the noble lord—this House of Commons had the advantage (if it could be so considered) of being elected under the noble lord's auspices; and whatever benefit there may be from having had its election at the time when her gracious Majesty came to the throne of these kingdoms, that benefit also the noble lord was possessed of. Yet this House of Commons so constituted, so elected under the auspices of the noble lord—this House of Commons it is that has given, as I think, sufficient indications that it withholds its confidence from the government of which the noble lord is a conspicuous member.—I trust I have executed this duty in conformity with the spirit in which I intended to execute it—with none of that asperity of party which I may sometimes be betrayed into when rising at the end of a debate to speak under the excitement and agitation which naturally belong to that period of our deliberations. It has not been my intention to treat with disrespect those who hold the executive offices of government, but it has been my intention to say to the government, it is your duty to the House of Commons—if it has those additional claims upon public confidence which you ascribe to it—if it embodies more of the public spirit—and reflects more accurately the image of the public mind than those which have preceded it—it is your duty, your peculiar duty, not to deprive it of any of the legitimate influence which it possessed under other circumstances, and which you were the first to recognise, and to wish to extend.—Of this I am convinced, that if the House of Commons, so constituted; had ratified your decrees—had acted in conformity with your suggestions, you would have been the first to acknowledge its opinions with respect; and let me tell you that when the House of Commons takes a different course, it is your bounden duty not to reject its decisions with scorn, because,

A long debate ensued, extending over five nights, at the close of which, SIR ROBERT PEEL again spoke to the following effect :—Mr. Speaker, a great portion of the speech of the noble lord has been occupied by the information, kindly conveyed to me, as to the measures which I should discover to have passed, in case, after the lapse of ten years, I should be called to office. And I have not the least doubt, that, if there should be in the House at present, as there was some time since, some eminent stranger, to whom the speech of the noble lord should be translated, and who may not be very conversant with the parliamentary history of this country, that eminent stranger would suppose that I was a person to whom it was necessary for the noble lord to convey information as to the measures that have been passing during that period, that I have been excluded for ten years from any parliamentary proceedings—and that I had taken no part whatever in those measures which the noble lord was detailing. I can assure the noble lord that his reminiscence was unnecessary. With many of those measures I have been fully conversant. I think I know something of the consolidation and improvement of the criminal law. It is true, I did not appoint a well-paid commission, of five gentlemen, sitting for years. I effected those improvements with no other aid than the ordinary official assistance; and after the testimonies which I have heard borne to the utility of those improvements from the ministerial side of the House, I think it is hardly necessary for the noble lord now to claim exclusive credit for them, and to remind me that such a thing had been effected, as an improvement in the criminal laws. Then, with respect to Dissenters' Marriages, why, during the short period that I was permitted to hold office, in 1835, one of the measures which I introduced, was the measure for the removal of grievances of which the Dissenters complained, both in respect to marriage and to baptism; and, on my statement of that measure on the part of the government, I well recollect that to the principle of it, and to the spirit in which it was conceived, ample testimony was borne by those who then occupied the opposition benches. With respect to the English Tithe Commutation bill, I think also I need not be reminded of it in this House. For, although it is true, the noble lord did superadd, after the lapse of three years, the compulsory commutation—and, I admit, it was an important improvement—I never contended it was, nor when I brought that measure forward, did I say, that I would exclude compulsory commutation; yet, with that addition, the whole of my own measure was copied, and introduced by the noble lord into his bill, and I did all that I could towards promoting its efficiency and perfecting it. Then again, with respect to the Irish Commutation act, all I know is, that after a lapse of three years, after much confusion, disorder, and bloodshed, in Ireland—for which I was not responsible—but after an intervening delay of three years, the self-same measure, which I had introduced in 1835, was tardily and reluctantly assented to by her Majesty's government. The noble lord says, "Don't feel too confident as to the permanency of that settlement." O! no, I feel no such confidence. I know that the noble lord has the power to disturb it. God forbid that the pressure of political necessity should ever induce him to disturb it; but, I own, I shall feel much greater confidence in its permanency, if I can have the assurance that no political necessity can occur, than I now feel that, if a necessity should occur, it will not be submitted to. With respect, likewise, to the Irish Poor-law act—why, do I not recollect the bitter, the venomous, opposition to that law, which the noble lord met with from him who is the chief supporter of his government? Do I not know, with respect to that measure, and with respect to half the measures which the noble lord has thought it necessary to recal to my recollection, that, without my aid, the noble lord could not have carried them? Next, is the English Poor-law bill. Does the noble lord really think it necessary that he should inform me, as if I had been banished from this House, that a Poor-law bill has been under consideration? Then comes the Jamaica bill. The noble lord says, I have no right, whatever, to taunt the government on the subject of Jamaica. I am not conscious that, in discussing the subject, I ever did taunt him. I said this, that the noble lord had been compelled to adopt the suggestions I offered with respect to the Jamaica bill. The noble lord says, that the amendments I proposed were slight and unimportant, and that they involved no difference in principle, but that their adoption simply referred to time; and that, if the House of Assembly in Jamaica proved refractory, the time might come when he himself might assent to those amendments. But if those alterations were a slight and unimportant difference, why did the noble lord, in consequence of their adoption, abandon the functions of government? The noble lord seeks refuge under the authority of the Duke of Wellington; but, I think, without much bettering his case. In the course of this session, the noble lord was compelled to admit, that it was well that our counsels had prevailed—that our predictions had been verified—and that it had not been necessary to sacrifice popular government in Jamaica, and thereby set an example for the forfeiture of popular government in every other colony which had liberated negroes. The noble lord, instead of disturbing the peace of society throughout the West India colonies, and shaking the security in representative government, in consequence of differences which he now says were unimportant, but which were important enough, in his opinion, at one period, to justify the abdication of his trust—has been compelled to admit, that, by taking our advice, he has secured every object to which he could have looked, and has prevented that confusion and disturbance which would have followed an adherence to his own system. I recollect, then, not only the measures which have been passed, but I recollect also the dangers that have been averted, through our interference—dangers which, without our assistance, the noble lord had not the strength nor power to avert. What would have become of the question of the ballot? What would have become of the New Reform bill? Would the noble lord, by the mere strength of his own hand, and without our help, have had the power to prevent, in the midst of the storm, “the raising of the anchors by which the British monarchy was moored.” What would have become of many of the prerogatives of the Crown, if it had not been for our intervention? Have I not seen the noble lord abandoned, not only by those who are giving him their support to-night—they voting in direct opposition to him—but have I not seen him seated almost alone, when some of the most important prerogatives of the Crown have been under consideration,—with scarcely one of his official colleagues to assist him in the vindication of them? And, therefore, it is, that I recollect, not only the measures which have been prevented by our opposition, which have been modified at our suggestion, and which, when good, have been carried exclusively by our aid; but I recollect, likewise, the important changes in the British constitution, which have been attempted—the revolution, once a-year, which the noble lord had to deprecate, which has been sought to be effected; I recollect all this, and I know that it has been by the aid of the Conservative party, that the noble lord has been able to avert them. The noble lord has described his government, as a government successful abroad, possessed of the confidence of the Crown, and having its measures discussed by a House of Commons, the constitution of which was framed by the noble lord himself. With all these glories, and all these advantages—according to the noble lord’s own statement—will he permit me to ask him, why it is that he does not possess more of the confidence of the House of Commons? The noble lord has said, that all I promised was to take a calm review of certain matters. True, I did so; but I did not allude to those legislative and political measures which, night after night, I have been reviewing. But, among other differences which I should find, and have to review, when restored to power, one would be this, that whereas I, who, on quitting office, left a clear surplus of two millions of revenue—I, who belonged to an administration which, in three years, had reduced the public debt by twenty millions—I, who belonged to a government that had reduced the interest of that debt by one million annually—should have to deal with a state of things which presents a deficit of nearly eight millions, under an administration of five years. True, I should find reforms; true, I should find a Poor-law; true, I should find the Jamaica constitution—defective but for our recommendations; true, I should find that I had introduced into the preamble of a certain Canada bill, an amendment, which the noble lord told me, if adopted, would be fatal to the bill—nay, would be fatal to the government; but that amendment was introduced, and notwithstanding its introduction, and notwithstanding the predictions of the noble lord, the same government has still preserved its vitality. Among all these discoveries which I should make, still my satisfaction, certainly, would be somewhat abated, on perceiving, notwithstanding all this success, that such is the melancholy state of our finances, that there has occurred, within five or six years, a deficiency of not less than £7,600,000;—and it was with reference to the means of supplying that deficiency, and of determining upon what system the financial administration should be placed, that I declined to accede to your preposterous demand, that I should at once come forward and suggest what those means, and what that system should be. I stated, that I would promise nothing but a careful consideration of the causes which had led to this deficiency, and of the measures by which that deficiency might be supplied. That was the calm review which I promised; and is it not too much for men who have all control over every public department, who have the means of collecting efficient information from able public servants, in every department of the revenue, whom they may call to their assistance;—is it not rather too much, that they, who have been the immediate cause of involving the country in that deficiency, should tell me that, without such official aid, it is my duty to suggest the means of supplying it. I come now to the constitutional objections which have been made to the resolution which I have proposed; and I must say, that it has been impossible to discover any objections, on constitutional grounds, to the proposal involved in that resolution, without abandoning every principle for which the Whigs have hitherto contended. I begin with the objections urged by the right hon. gentleman, the Secretary at War. That right hon. gentleman says, that my resolution involves a mere abstract dogma—that it is a mere declaration of constitutional law. Does the right hon. gentleman really believe that any man will construe that resolution without reference to the circumstances on which it bears? Does the right hon. gentleman mean that I am really proposing a resolution to this effect,—“that any minister, who is in a minority upon an important legislative measure, ought to resign?” Is that the resolution I am proposing? Do I contend for that principle? Do I say, that any minister, on the first formation of his government, and who is obstructed by a powerful opposition, is bound to resign after the first defeat he encounters? Of course I do not, or I should condemn myself for the example I set in 1835. Do I, again, say that it is the duty of a minister, having proposed certain financial measures, and having met with obstruction, at once to resign office, and abandon the reins of power? No such thing. I lay down no such principle; and I trust no government will ever consider itself bound by it. I do not hesitate to say, that you might taunt me as long as you please with this resolution, but I should not feel myself bound to resign upon any single defeat. Of course not. I construe that resolution with reference to the circumstances in which the ministers are placed. If the right hon. gentleman and his colleagues are dissatisfied with respect to their own confessions and declarations of their inability to carry on the government, why, I ask, did they resign on the Jamaica question? The noble lord now says, that it is a monstrous doctrine, that a ministry ought to resign on the failure of legislative measures proposed by themselves; and he has gone through a long series of precedents, showing how ministers had retained office in defiance of the legislature. Sir Robert Walpole, the noble lord says, was defeated upon the Excise scheme;—Mr. Pitt was defeated upon the question of the fortification of Portsmouth and Plymouth; and Lord Liverpool was defeated on the property tax;—and yet none of these ministers resigned. No doubt all this is perfectly true. But do I affirm it was their duty to resign? No. The propriety of resignation depends upon a combination of circumstances. But I ask the noble lord, of what avail are his precedents, with reference to himself? He cannot deny that there may be circumstances in which it may be proper for a ministry to resign, on being defeated on their own legislative acts. [Lord John Russell: Hear, hear!] The noble lord recollects the Jamaica case now. For there was a case where the government was not defeated—where the government had a majority of five, and yet they considered their victory so indicative of the want of confidence on the part of the House of Commons, that they resigned. I ask, then, is this a fair proceeding, that the government shall have the power of selecting any legislative measure, on the rejection of which it may resign and abdicate its functions; but that the House of Commons shall have no power of deciding, under other circumstances, what shall be the duty of that government in respect to resignation? Is it fair, that the government shall take the particular measure on which it may be convenient for them to resign; but that the right shall be denied to the House of Commons of determining whether the rejection of other measures constitutes a case on which the resignation of the government ought to take place? Why, Sir, the very admissions of the right hon. gentleman, the Secretary at War, are sufficient to justify the House in demanding a resignation. Did I not hear that right hon. gentleman say, not only that the government had not the power to carry the alteration of the Corn-laws, but that they proposed that measure without the expectation of carrying it? Has the right hon. gentleman a right to say, that I confine the government to a single case—to the Irish bill, or to the Sugar Duties bill—when he himself has told us, that he did not expect success when it was proposed to agitate the House and the country upon the subject of the Corn-laws? Again, did he not say, that his government had been subjected, by parliamentary defeats, to a series of humiliations, to which nothing could reconcile them but an overwhelming sense of public duty? What did the noble lord, the Secretary for Ireland, tell me two years since? After summoning up all his energies, that noble lord made the frightful announcement, that the government had at length determined to exist no longer on sufferance. Yes, the noble lord, stung by a sense of that humiliation to which the right hon. gentleman has referred, two years ago, told us, that their situation was intolerable, and that the government had at last determined that they would exist no longer upon sufferance—but you have had some humiliation since—[Cheers]—and you

For sufferance is the badge of all your tribe.”

Therefore, don't tell me that this resolution has reference to a single defeat—that it is to constitute a rule to future governments—that you are to suppose the politicians of future times will take the dry bones of this resolution, and say, “Here is a precedent which is to govern posterity!” No: they will look at your long series of defeats—at your inability to carry the measures which you have proposed—at your own admission that your situation is become intolerable; and the construction which they will put upon the resolution will bear reference to your own measures, your own acts, and your own confessions. The noble lord (Lord John Russell) has argued, at the close of this debate, as if the government has the confidence of the House of Commons. Yet almost all his colleagues who have preceded him have admitted that, at length the time was come when the want of confidence was sufficiently manifest, and that it was impossible that they could retain power with the existing House of Commons. All his colleagues who preceded the noble lord have admitted that. They admitted that the government had but two alternatives—resignation, or the dissolution of parliament. Now, under what circumstances did I give notice of this resolution—this unconstitutional resolution—the facts contained in which, and the inference drawn from those facts, being both denied?—although, notwithstanding that denial, I have got this important admission, that, after the defeat upon the Sugar Duties, following other defeats, the government are at length placed in a situation in which they have no alternative but resignation, or dissolution. I have that admission from the whole of them. After this, all your doctrine about retaining office notwithstanding legislative defeats, is at an end. And, Sir, in passing, I must refer to that doctrine. The doctrine of the right hon. gentleman, the Secretary at War, is this,—that it is the duty of the government to administer certain executive functions; and that that government may submit to legislative defeats, may survive those defeats, and be indifferent to them. So unconstitutional, so dangerous a doctrine I never heard maintained. A doctrine so discouraging to public men, so fatal to the energies of a government, I never before heard advanced; and it rather convinces me that the resolution I have proposed is not quite so unconstitutional, is not quite so open to objection, as hon. gentlemen opposite assert it to be, when I find that high and learned authorities are obliged to resort to such unconstitutional grounds for the purpose of opposing it. Why, can any man survey the course of government in this country, and not see that acts of legislation are so interwoven with acts of administration, as to render it utterly impossible to draw a line of distinction between them? Nay, I go further, and say, that the character of an administration, that their claim upon public confidence, is infinitely stronger on account of their legislative measures, than on account of their administrative acts. If mere departmental administration, not liable to question, is a sufficient ground for a government to retain office, and to be regardless of legislative defeats, it is pretty clear that there need be no union or concert among ministers. I dare say, in ordinary times, when questions of peace or war are not in agitation, it may be tolerably easy to fill the departments of office with honest, respectable, and sufficiently competent men, who, each in his department, would be able to conduct the duties devolving on him, in such a manner as not to be much liable to question by the House of Commons. And no matter what opinions such men may entertain upon the legislative policy of the country; they may either avoid legislation altogether, or take the safer course—propose measures, and being defeated, fall back upon their acts of administration. But I say, survey the course of the legislative and executive administration of this country, and look at the great measures which the government have had to consider of late years, and see whether the character and vigour of a government do not depend upon its legislative more than upon its executive administration. Take the measures which the noble lord has referred to, with so much pride and satisfaction. Take the removal of the Roman Catholic disabilities, as affecting Ireland. Take the repeal of the Test and Corporation acts, as affecting this country. Take the Reform of Parliament—take the Poor-law bill—take the Municipal bill—take the proposition for the repeal or alteration of the Corn-laws;—are not these the great questions by which the character of administrations has been judged and determined? And is it possible to contend, in a reformed parliament, with these great measures in our view, that a government can be safely indifferent to the success or failure of its legislative acts? See what the inevitable consequence would be if such a doctrine were to prevail. See what an inducement would be given, both to the Crown and to the House of Commons, to depart from the sphere of their proper respective functions. The Crown would—or might—be constantly attempting to place the House of Commons in the wrong, by proposing popular legislative measures, and throwing upon the House of Commons the odium of rejecting them. The Crown might constantly labour to place the House of Commons in opposition to the constituent body, and to lower the character of the House of Commons, by inducing it to reject popular measures purposely proposed with that view. If the doctrine of the right hon. gentleman were to prevail, all that the Crown would have to do, in order to stop the useful functions of the House of Commons, would be to say—“Legislative measures are matters of indifference; the government I have chosen shall remain in office in spite of the rejection of the measures they have proposed; and we, the Crown and the government, shall have credit with the country for propounding popular measures, which you, the House of Commons, have rejected.” Such would be the effect as regarded the Crown. Then see what an inducement you would give to the House of Commons to step beyond its functions, and thwart the executive. If the government say, “We are independent of the legislative measures and decisions of this House: that which is your peculiar function we will disregard; our fate shall not depend upon your decisions; nothing but your interference with our executive administration shall influence our retention of power;”—what an inducement do you not hold out to the House of Commons to interfere with the prerogatives of the Crown? The House of Commons, then, knowing that the only way in which it could influence the fate of the government must be by interfering with its administrative functions, would press for the production of despatches, the production of which, possibly, might be injurious to the public service, or would protest against appointments made by the Crown. In short, knowing that, by the exercise of its ordinary legislative control, it could not affect the government, the doctrine of the right hon. gentleman would present to the House of Commons the greatest inducement to depart from its proper sphere, and to interfere with the most important functions of the executive.

The hon. member for Lambeth says, that history is to constitute no precedent for us now; that, in consequence of the passing of the Reform Bill, he is indifferent to all precedents of former times. I should have thought, that an advocate of the Reform Bill would have contended that the House of Commons, being now a more exact image of the popular mind, should exercise a greater influence over the government than an unreformed parliament had ever done. But, for the hon. gentleman to contend that a government may be independent of parliament, and that parliament is to exercise no influence because it is reformed, is a doctrine I never conceived would have been advanced by any man professing himself to be a reformer. But these are the shifts to which you are driven. You seek some plausible objection to my resolution; and you are obliged to abandon every constitutional principle for which you have hitherto struggled, in order to show me that that resolution is at variance with the spirit of the constitution. The noble lord affected to be surprised that the vice-president of the Pitt club, and a professed admirer of Mr. Fox, had come forward to advocate the motion before the House, because, as he asserted, both Mr. Pitt and Mr. Fox repudiated the doctrine laid down in the resolution. I read some extracts, the other night, from a speech of Mr. Fox, and I showed that Mr. Fox recognised the principle, that the confidence of the House of Commons is necessary to enable a minister of the Crown to carry on the government of the country.

Lord John Russell.—Nobody denies it.

Sir Robert Peel.—But the noble lord read an extract from a speech made by the same statesman, which he seemed to think countenanced another principle. Out of the same volume—nay, out of the same page—I will produce an authority from each of those great men, to show that my view of the question was in their estimation, the correct one. Mr. Fox said, upon this subject, that—"He wished to conceal nothing. He had a suspicion that Mr. Pitt had an opinion, that the Crown might appoint a minister, and persist in supporting him, who had not the confidence of the House of Commons. He wished the suspicion might be ill-founded, but he dreaded it to be true."

Those were the words of Mr. Fox. Mr. Pitt's opinion was to this effect:—"He would, however, admit, that the confidence of the House of Commons was necessary to an administration, and he would be the last man to oppose that doctrine."

These were the opinions of Mr. Pitt and of Mr. Fox upon this subject. If, then, I have—as I have—the admission of her Majesty's ministers, that they have so far lost the confidence of the House of Commons, that they ought either to resign or to dissolve—if they thus admit the truth of my first proposition; on what ground, I ask, do they object to the second proposition,—namely, that a ministry who have lost the confidence of the House of Commons ought not to continue in office?

I have already inquired on what ground it was that I gave notice of this resolution? These were the circumstances:—On Tuesday, the 18th of May, the noble lord was defeated by a majority of 36. The noble lord then proposed an adjournment to Thursday, the 20th of May, in order that the government might calmly review their position, and decide on the course they meant to pursue. The universal impression was, that her Majesty's government intended to resign. The noble lord has admitted, that that was a subject of grave deliberation. My first proposition, then, cannot be so utterly remote from the truth. On Thursday, the 20th of May, the Chancellor of the Exchequer quietly moved that the House should, on the Monday following, vote the existing sugar duties for the year. This was the whole of the information which was then conveyed to us. A question was afterwards put to the noble lord, as to when it was that he intended to bring forward the Corn-laws? The answer of the noble lord was, that he intended to bring forward his motion on that subject, on Friday, the 4th of June. Such being the answer given by the noble lord on the 20th of May, what right had I to infer that the government meditated a dissolution? From what circumstance could I suppose that her Majesty's government—notwithstanding our having had the formal assurance of the noble lord the Secretary for Ireland, that a state of suffering was no longer to be borne—that they would no longer exist upon suffering? From what circumstance could I infer that her Majesty's government did not intend to pursue the usual course, and conduct the business of parliament to the end of the session in the ordinary way? Under circumstances so peculiar, I also took time to deliberate on the course I should pursue; and having no reason to suppose that the government meditated an immediate dissolution, and at the same time thinking that it was a violation of the principle of the constitution,—that it was not doing homage to the representative principle,—after the long succession of defeats which they had experienced, that her Majesty's ministers should remain in office, and continue to conduct the ordinary business of the country,—I determined to give the noble lord every advantage which a direct, intelligible, and straightforward course could afford him; and, on the Monday, I gave notice that, on the earliest opportunity, I should move a resolution that her Majesty's government had not the confidence of this House, and that their continuance in power was at variance with the spirit of the constitution. And it was then, and not till then, that the fact was elicited from the noble lord that it was in the contemplation of her Majesty's ministers to dissolve the parliament. Up to that period not a word had fallen from the noble lord, not only which pledged the government to a dissolution, but which even indicated any intention on their part to dissolve. But after I had given my notice,—about ten minutes after,—the noble lord got up and said, that her Majesty's government did not intend going on with the Poor-law bill in the present session, on account of the temptation which it might offer to members to make speeches intended for the hustings, and with a view to recommend themselves to their constituents, rather than for the purpose of influencing the deliberative judgment of parliament. It thus appeared that the noble lord preferred the alternative of a dissolution, which he admitted to be inevitable, if he should relinquish the other alternative,—that of resignation. But it was then, for the first time, that the noble lord gave any intimation of his intention to adopt that alternative. If, therefore, my motion has done nothing else than thus to force her Majesty's government to determine which of the alternatives it would adopt, still it has done good; because it has, at any rate, gained this admission from the government,—that for them to retain the power of governing and conducting the affairs of this country, under the circumstances in which they are placed, without either resigning or dissolving, would be at variance with the spirit of the constitution. But does the mode of their dissolution reconcile me to the act? Not at all. I do say that, having made their election, it was the duty of the government—not, certainly, to dissolve without passing the annual Sugar bill, (and with respect to that no obstruction would have been offered to them)—but having adopted the alternative of dissolution, and not of resignation, it was, I say, the duty of the government to resort to a dissolution at the earliest possible moment.

It is inconsistent with all usage, and inconsistent with the spirit of the constitution, that a government should be enabled to select the measures which it thinks proper to submit to the consideration of a condemned parliament,—that it should withdraw some, and submit others,—that it should tell the parliament—“An immediate dissolution is in contemplation; but, before we dissolve, we will just bring forward those measures, the rejection of which we think most likely to damage the House of Commons in the eyes of their constituents;—we will propose popular votes, such, for example, as one of an advance of money for the construction of railways in Ireland;—we will bring forward particular measures, which, we are of opinion, may aid the party cause of our administration;—but, respecting every measure which we have hitherto described as essential to the welfare of the country,—measures, the principle of which has been affirmed by large majorities in parliament, but the further discussion of which may prejudice our cause at the hustings,—respecting these, we will exercise our own discretion as to whether they shall be brought forward or withheld.” Now, although the hon. member for Lambeth will, doubtless, utterly disregard the circumstance, yet I do affirm that there is no precedent for any government to adopt such a course as this. When Mr. Pitt got the Mutiny bill, after some slight obstruction experienced from Mr. Fox, that moment he dissolved the parliament. Lord Grey, I apprehend, took the earliest opportunity of dissolving in 1831. But, whether there be any precedent or not, I say it is unconstitutional, and contrary to Whig principles, to condemn a House of Commons, and then to exercise your own discretion, for party purposes, as to what measures you will bring forward, or what you will withhold.

Nothing has surprised me more than the desperate fidelity with which a Whig ministry seem to cling to the opinions of Mr. Pitt, while the opinions of Mr. Fox upon the subject they utterly despair of, if not despise. But they have got the precedent of 1784, and they bring it forward on all occasions as a justification for the course they are pursuing. With all personal respect for them, I must say that it does appear rather ludicrous to see them stretching forward with so much eagerness, in order to place their feet in the gigantic footsteps of Mr. Pitt. First, there is the right hon. gentleman the Secretary at War; then, the right hon. member the President of the Board of Control; and, lastly, comes the noble lord himself,—each trying to plant his shoes in the footsteps of Mr. Pitt. It is only under the refuge of the mantle of Mr. Pitt that they can seek safety. They seem to exclaim with Trinculo in the play—"Alas! the storm is coming, and I have no retreat except under his gabardine;" and it is under the gabardine of Mr. Pitt that they seek shelter. But the moment they depart from that gabardine,—the moment they thrust their head from beneath it,—that moment they utter some unconstitutional doctrine;—such as declaring that there is a clear distinction between the administrative and legislative functions of a government.

I think I have shown that the two propositions contained in my resolution are true:—first, that the government, by their own admission, have not the confidence of the House of Commons; and, secondly, that it is in conformity with all constitutional principle and precedent, that a ministry, not having the confidence of the House of Commons, should relinquish office. I admit that, if there be a clear intention forthwith to dissolve the parliament, that may be a vindication of the government; but I contend that a dissolution ought to be immediate. The House of Commons has no other mode of marking its sense of the unconstitutional tenure of power, than by passing some such resolution as that which I have submitted to the House, and which I most properly submitted to its decision, because I could not know, and did not know, the intentions of her Majesty's government with respect to a dissolution. If any thing could more than another thoroughly convince me of the wrong position of her Majesty's government,—I must say, the humiliating position, on account of their tenure of power, in defiance of all constitutional principles,—it is the appeals which have been made, throughout this debate, to an individual member of parliament like myself. I will notice, first, the unjust imputations that have been thrown upon me by some of the right hon. gentlemen opposite; and, I must say, I was surprised at the speech of the right hon. gentleman the Vice-president of the Board of Trade. He said that he claimed for himself the most perfect freedom of speech; and he also said, with truth, that, in his parliamentary conflicts with me, he had maintained all due courtesy; but he contended that that courtesy was perfectly consistent with the utmost latitude of speech, and with the freest criticism on the conduct of men holding a public character. I perfectly admit all this. No one more readily admits the right of any man to criticise, in the strongest terms, the public conduct of any member of parliament, whether in an official or in a private capacity; and I believe it is perfectly in the power of any hon. member to reconcile the exercise of that right with all the courtesy which ought to preside over the debates in an assembly of gentlemen. I do not ask for courtesy from the right hon. gentleman; but I do ask for justice. And I ask whether the charge he has made against me is just? He said he would review my proceedings as a minister; and he charged me with having excited religious animosities in the election of 1835.

Mr. Sheil.—No! I did not charge you with it. I said quite the contrary.

Sir Robert Peel.—Why, then, when speaking of my acts, as a minister—why, with reference to my administration, did you dig out of this forgotten appendix to the report of the Orange lodge committee, a report of the proceedings of some Orange lodge, if it were not for the purpose of having it presumed that I had encouraged the animosities and the feuds to which the Orange lodges had given rise? The right hon. gentleman read an extract from some grand Orange lodge report, in which it was stated that there were, in the various parts of Ireland, 3000 Orange lodges. On looking at the report, I find it is dated the 12th of November, 1834; at which time I was at Geneva, on my way to England. Why did you make me responsible for those proceedings? Would it not have been more just and fair to look, not at what the records of an Orange lodge might state, but at what were the opinions I had expressed, and at what was the course I had taken, when the proposal was made to address the Crown respecting Orange lodges? It was not fair, on the part of the right hon. gentleman, to bring such a charge against me. I do not deserve it from persons of his religious faith, that such unjust imputations should be thrown upon me, for the purpose of creating an excitement in Ireland, and of propagating the belief that it is my wish that that country should be governed through the influence of religious party feeling. Why, if, at that election of 1835, I had encouraged religious animosities, I suppose I should have incurred some obligations to Orangemen; and when, in 1836, a proposal was made to address the Crown to discourage Orange lodges, and those who should belong to them, I presume that that might have been the occasion—I being in opposition at the time, and therefore under no obligation to take any particular part—when I ought to have given my support to my friends on this side of the House, many of whom entertained strong opinions upon the protestant side of the question. But what was the course I took on that occasion? The House will permit me to refer to the debates on that question—a reference which the right hon. gentleman himself ought to have made, if he really wished to know what were my public declarations, and my sentiments on the subject, instead of referring to the acts of some individual Orange lodge, for which it is impossible I could be responsible. In 1836, these were the opinions I delivered. (I beg pardon for trespassing on the indulgence of the House; but it is necessary I should do so, for my own vindication; for did not the right hon. gentleman refer to the appointment of Lord Roden,—and was it not the whole intention of his speech to show that, in 1835, I had a design to encourage Orange lodge associations, to promote party spirit, and foment religious animosities in Ireland?) This, then, was the opinion which I delivered:—"I am deeply impressed with the conviction, that it would tend to the welfare of Ireland to see the extinction of all secret associations." Let me observe, I was not in power at the time. I was expressing my own sincere opinion—an opinion upon which I acted; and I was risking some parliamentary disapprobation by expressing it. I went on to say, that, however laudable might be their intentions, however sincere their professions of loyalty, I still thought that the existence of societies having secret signs, was a bad precedent for other organised bodies; and that, therefore, I wished, not only to see the Orange lodges suppressed, but the angry spirit which had so long distracted Ireland extinguished; without which there was very little to be gained by the mere suppression of external forms. I did every thing I could for the purpose of procuring the abandonment of those Orange societies. The right hon. gentleman may think what he will, but I venture to say, that no man has given advice which has been more effectual. It was strictly attended to, and has been most honourably acted upon. Those to whom it was given have strictly kept the promises which were then made. I thank them for it; but I think it rather hard, after the course which they and I have taken, that we should be now taunted with a desire to provoke religious animosity in Ireland.

The hon. gentleman the member for Lambeth said, that he supposed I had brought forward this motion in consequence of finding a clamour against the Poor-law prevail; and another hon. gentleman, the member for Lincolnshire, asked me what my opinions were with respect to the charter? He said that I had stated my opinions with respect to the ballot, and with respect to the franchise, but that I had not yet given my opinion with respect to the charter, and that that was one of the grounds on which the hon. gentleman withheld his confidence from me. May I ask the hon. gentleman whether the doubt he would imply by that statement is an honest doubt? Whether he considers that the course I took the other night, with respect to the release of political prisoners, was such as to justify him in supposing that I have done any thing to court the Chartists? Whether, in fact, that is really one of the grounds on which he withholds his confidence from me? Whether, although I have declared my opinion upon the subjects of the ballot and the franchise, he yet really entertains a doubt as to whether or not I have some secret understanding with respect to the objects of the charter? Then, again, with regard to the course which I would pursue: charges and conjectures, of the most inconsistent nature, have been indulged in by hon. gentlemen on this point. At one time your charge is, that I am clearly the advocate of all monopolies; that, when you inquire into my political life, you find such has been my opposition to all popular rights, such my resistance to every species of reform, that no man, looking at the course I have hitherto pursued, can entertain the slightest doubt as to the course which I must henceforth pursue should I attain to power; and that, upon that ground, you withhold your confidence from me. At another time the charge is, that I have withheld or concealed my opinions on every point; that I have reserved to myself such a latitude of action upon all subjects, political, commercial, and financial, that there is no one of them upon which I am not perfectly at liberty to act according to that course which I may conceive to be conducive to the advancement of my party interests. How is it possible for me to reconcile these contradictory charges? I believe, however, upon the whole, that my political principles are pretty well known. I think the course I have pursued is tolerably clear; and that those hon. gentlemen who believe that I am not prepared, for the purpose of acquiring popular favour, to introduce into the working of the British constitution so much of democracy as shall disturb the other elements of which it consists, place the proper construction on my sentiments. Then, you say, "Tell us your details." I ask, whether a more absurd or preposterous demand could be made? Take the Corn-laws. I should like to know who has stood forward more than I have done in defence of the existing Corn-laws? I should like to know whether any man, looking at these debates, can really have a doubt that my desire is to maintain a just and adequate protection to the agricultural interest? Have I not contended for this, while I admitted, and I always will admit, that there may be some details of the present law which require alteration? You want me to pursue the course which you are yourselves pursuing. You wish me to call a public meeting, and to move some resolution, to the effect that no adjustment of this question can ever be satisfactorily arrived at—that no settlement can be effected—unless we pledge ourselves irrevocably to adhere to the present law in all its minutest particulars. If I had done this, would not the charge have been preferred, that, for the purpose of obtaining a party triumph, I had tried to create a division between the agricultural and the commercial interests; and that, for the purpose of procuring agricultural support, and of getting the votes of the hon. gentleman the member for Lincolnshire and of his noble colleague, I had irrevocably pledged the House to the maintenance of every thing in its present state.

But the hon. gentleman the member for Lincolnshire has a new doctrine. He says that I owe him some gratitude for his vote on the sugar duties. Gratitude! I owe the hon. gentleman no gratitude for his vote. What! gratitude from one member of the House to another on account of a vote upon a question involving the interests of large classes of the community! The hon. member considers I am guilty of ingratitude, because I move a resolution of a want of confidence in her Majesty's ministers, which has placed him in a difficult position with respect to his vote. The hon. gentleman thinks that this resolution is some trap, or rather some immense pitfall, laid especially for him—that it has been moved for the purpose of involving him in some difficulty. I must say, that the hon. gentleman somewhat overrates the authority and importance that are attached to the vote he may give on this occasion. Let the hon. gentleman take his own course. One would really suppose that the hon. gentleman had lapped the milk of Whiggism from his earliest years. And then, when the hon. gentleman made that touching appeal about Ireland, I could not help asking, what used to be his sentiments respecting that country? I rather believe I lost the confidence of the hon. gentleman by proposing the bill for Roman Catholic emancipation. I think that, when he was in parliament, in the year 1820, he voted, as I did, against the repeal of Roman Catholic disabilities. The hon. gentleman should have recollected this before he asked me what would be the opinion which I should have of him if he were to write himself down a "recreant Tory?"

And now, with respect to the Corn-law. As I said before, look at the course which I have hitherto uniformly pursued with respect to that important law. I cannot say that the hon. gentleman opposite has put any wrong construction upon my intention. I have always contended that the two great interests of this country—the manufacturing and the agricultural—have a close and reciprocal relation and influence to and upon each other. It is impossible to say what must be the influence of such a town as Liverpool upon the rents of the land in its neighbourhood; or what the effect of such a town as Manchester or Birmingham upon the interest and prosperity of the agriculturists residing in those districts. It is still more impossible to close one's eyes, and not to feel that the prosperity of our manufactures is one main source of agricultural prosperity. I attach all due importance to the manufacturing interest; but I do not wish to appear as the partisan of one interest or the other. While, therefore, I admit the important influence which the manufactures of the country have upon the agricultural interest, I, on the other hand, maintain, that agricultural prosperity is essential to the prosperity of our manufactures. If one should fail, there would not be merely a cessation of demand for the produce of the other, but, that failing interest being no longer able to discharge the burdens imposed upon it, those burdens would inevitably be transferred to the other. It is said that I reserve to myself the details of any measure which I would support relating to the importation of corn. I do so; and why? Because I am constantly receiving, from the best friends of the agricultural interest, communications as to the improvements that may be made in those details. If I were to say "I will support a Corn-law against a fixed duty," and made no reservation as to details; why, such is the manner in which you fasten me down to every expression I make, that do I not know you would at once turn round upon me, and say that I had incurred some positive obligations of honour to stand by every detail and every letter of the present Corn-law; and that the question was, not as to the maintaining the principle of a graduated duty, but that the question was as to maintaining, permanently and unalterably, every detail of the existing Corn-law; nay, that I was not at liberty to correct the admitted abuses of the present system; that I was not at liberty to prevent any sudden in-pouring of foreign corn arising from the objectionable mode of taking the averages. I know, if I had made some such declaration as that, I should have been told that I had committed myself, not only to the principle, but to the very letter, of the existing law, and that I was precluded from making any alteration whatever in its details. The hon. gentleman has asked me—and he has a right to ask me—whether or not I intend to maintain the present protection for agriculture? I know what he means. He would require me to pledge myself to some specific details. That was his object when he asked me what were my intentions upon the subject of the Corn-law? I will not give a specific answer. I state as much as any man can expect or reasonably require from an individual member of this House. What I say is, that I prefer the principle of a graduated duty to a fixed duty, and that I think protection to agriculture perfectly consistent with manufacturing prosperity. I do not attribute the present distress of the manufacturing interest to the protection which is given to the agricultural interest. It is you that have attempted to show that—I have not. At the same time I will not bind myself irrevocably against any improvement in the details of the existing law. Supposing I undertook to give an answer on the details, how should I act? "Tell me the pivot," says the hon. gentleman. Why, was there ever any thing so preposterous? If, indeed, I had followed the precedent that has been set me, I might well have adventured to enter upon details; and if, after having given them, I should have altered them, we will say in the proportion of 5 to 8, no doubt I should have credit for it to-morrow. Why, here is a government that had ten months to consider the question on which they wished to legislate, and that was no less a question than one concerning the franchise in Ireland—a government that came forward with a declaration of details, and yet who, as an immediate preliminary to the introduction of their bill, altered those details in the proportion of from 5 to 8. And this is the government which thinks it decent to call upon me to commit myself to details! Supposing I had given details, and supposing that, afterwards, just before the discussion in parliament, I, for the purpose of conciliating the votes of two or three agricultural friends,—or four or five at the most,—without any public objection or discussion, had altered those details,—I know what imputations I should have been liable to. But these "chartered libertines"—they may alter their details at pleasure;—they, the government—with full opportunity of considering their measure before propounding it! But every sort of imputation is to be thrown upon me, because I content myself with stating the general principles that would guide my conduct; and refuse, not being in office, to say what is the system of taxation I would propose, or what are the details of a bill on the importation of corn which I would support. Yes: here is a government who alter the details of one of their own most important measures from a £5 to an £8 franchise, with no other reason than to conciliate two or three votes, charging me with the concealment of my intentions because I do not bring forward details!

Now, allow me to ask the question, why were not these three great subjects—corn, sugar, and timber—brought forward at an earlier period of the session? What pretence is there for not having named any one of them in the speech from the throne? If you bonâ fide intended to bring them under discussion, why, I ask, did you not mention them in the Queen's speech? Is this the reason—that it is contrary to all precedent to refer to the details of measures until you are prepared to introduce them—that it has only a tendency to agitate the public mind, to disturb commercial enterprise, to divert the application of capital, and induce precipitate speculations? If these were your reasons, upon what principle do you demand of me, an individual member of parliament, without the responsibility of office, to make a declaration of my opinions as to details of such measures as these? You say that the sugar and the timber duties formed part of the budget; but the Corn-laws formed no part of the budget. That might have been mentioned in the speech from the throne, and the attention of parliament might have been called to it at an earlier period. Nor was there any reason why the timber duties should not have been mentioned in the Queen's speech. There is a strong suspicion abroad that you had two budgets—one for fair weather and the other for foul; and it was not until foul weather had overtaken you that you produced your present plan. To have prevented such an impression being formed, you should have alluded to these important questions in the speech from the throne at the commencement of the present session. You describe these measures as involving important considerations, as affecting the prosperity of the country; and you say that the principles which you now avow are the principles which must be ultimately adopted. Why, then, in justice to those principles, did you not urge them at an earlier period? What was the course you took with respect to the import duties committee? Your measures are founded upon the report of that committee. But was that committee moved for by her Majesty's government? Were the members of her Majesty's government aware of the intentions of those by whom that committee was appointed? Did any one cabinet minister attend that committee? Was any one question asked, by any member of her Majesty's government, of a single witness examined before that committee? Did the right hon. gentleman the President of the Board of Trade attend the sittings of the import duties committee? No, not one day. And yet the report contains all that relates to the practical application of those great principles which her Majesty's ministers now propound. Surely you must have been aware of the pressure of your finances as far back as from the middle of last year, at least; and yet so little were you convinced of the soundness of these principles, which you now affirm to be necessary to the salvation of the country, that you permitted the import duties committee to be appointed, without knowing well what its object was, and without thinking it necessary for any member of the government to attend upon it. If you thought it desirable to affirm the principles mentioned in the report of that committee, why did you not make that announcement from the throne? Or, if you thought that further inquiry was necessary, and additional evidence was required, why did you not, at an earlier period of the session, move that that committee be re-appointed? You did neither the one nor the other; nor did you take any step till the month of May; and then you introduced, in a time of pressing political necessity, three great measures, founded upon the evidence, and exclusively upon the evidence, taken by that committee. It is this which compels me to say that the manner in which you have brought forward these great questions is one by which you neither do justice to yourselves as a government, nor to the importance of the measures you propound. And again I say, if these principles are so excellent—if these measures, founded upon them, are so absolutely necessary for the salvation of the country,—is it not most unfortunate that you should have incumbered them with your help, not on account of your actions as ministers, but on account of your position as the executive government? There is, depend upon it, a prevalent feeling in the country, that these measures could not have been passed in the manner in which they were propounded.

Your object being to remove the commercial distress, and relieve the financial embarrassment of this country, to restore confidence, and to find means of profitably employing capital, I must say that you are striking the severest blow conceivable against the industry of the country, by leaving these three great questions in doubt for an indefinite period; by setting party against party upon such a question as that of the Corn-laws; by stirring up society to its foundation; and by arraying against each other, in bitter discord, classes of the community whose harmony is essential to their own welfare, as well as to the happiness and safety of the state. You are now about to dissolve parliament upon the cry of "cheap bread." You promise the substitution of a fixed duty for the present fluctuating one. My firm belief is, that a fixed duty will give no effectual protection to the agriculture of Ireland, or of many parts of this country. What the effect of it may be is entirely doubtful. I believe it to be fraught with the most serious consequences. I do not believe that you can paralyze agricultural prosperity, by a fixed duty of 1s. a bushel upon corn, without seriously affecting other interests connected with agriculture. But my firm belief is, that the course which you have taken, the appeals which you have made, the mode in which you have conducted this question, and the excitements to agitation which have been created through that mode of its introduction, will make it, when the time of difficulty shall come, impossible for you to resist the application of the same appeals, and to maintain that duty which you now state to be fixed and immutable. This is my firm conviction; and I now take my leave of the discussion of this question, and place it in the hands of the House, content, whatever may be the issue, with the course which I have pursued,—which has been less with a view to any party advantage than to the vindication of the just authority of the House of Commons, and to uphold the great principles of the constitution. Many may think that it would have been much better to have permitted you to go on with the discussion of the Corn-laws, and to have had three successive debates, and three successive minorities, each decreasing in numbers. That might have been a better and more political course, in respect to party. I know the advantages which I give you by bringing forward this motion. I am content to give you those advantages, because I think I should have been abandoning my duty, after the declaration you made, of its being your intention to continue in the ordinary performance of your official functions, notwithstanding the defeats you had met with, if I had acquiesced in that principle, and had not asked the House of Commons, by some distinct declaration, to affirm or to deny the proposition—that you do not possess the confidence of the House, and that your retention of power, under such circumstances, is at variance with the spirit of the constitution.

MINISTERIAL STATEMENT.—SUPPLY.

JUNE 7, 1841.

Lord John Russell at the conclusion of a short explanatory speech, in reference to the position of the government, and to the anticipated alterations in the Corn-laws, moved the Order of the Day for the House going into Committee of Supply.

SIR ROBERT PEEL:—Sir, I shall, as nearly as possible, confine myself to the topics touched upon by the noble lord; and I hope I shall express my sentiments upon them as candidly as he has done. I will, first, refer to the charge which the noble lord complains that I made against the government at the conclusion of my reply the other night, that the budget had been framed with a view to particular purposes, and not to the real state of the finances of the country. I can assure the noble lord that nothing was further from my intention, or could be more repugnant to my feelings, than to take any advantage of an opportunity to make a charge against the government where no reply could be given; and to prove this, when I heard the boasts of the government the other night, of the great and triumphant success of their foreign policy, although I felt that I could have made some abatement of those triumphs in my reply, I refrained from any allusion to that topic, because I knew that the noble lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs could have no opportunity of reply. So much, then, for any wish on my part to take any advantage of the noble lord. I certainly did state, with reference to the budget, that there was an impression very generally entertained that the measures which the noble lord proposed would not have been brought forward if the government had not been unsuccessful upon other questions. But the noble lord says, now, that this impression was a wrong one; and in that declaration of the noble lord I am bound to confide, and I do place in it implicit confidence. But, after all, I will observe, that if those measures were deemed by the government to be measures of importance as regarded the finances and commerce of the country, they ought to have been brought forward at a much earlier period of the session, and to be introduced to parliament in the speech from the throne. There was also another course which I think the government ought to have pursued with respect to those important measures, when they had determined to submit them to parliament; that was, to renew the import duties committee. I before stated, that not one member of the government had attended on that committee; and I therefore think that it would have been better had the committee been re-appointed before those measures were submitted to the House. I cannot see that it was at all necessary to wait for the usual time for bringing forward the budget in order to introduce those measures. They might have, at least, been proposed a month earlier.

Now, with respect to the Corn-laws, the noble lord had one of two courses only to pursue upon that subject. Those two courses were, either to press the immediate consideration of the subject upon the House, or to abstain from touching upon it altogether. I shall not say which of these two courses it would have been better for the noble lord to adopt; but I will say that I think it hardly fair in the noble lord to give us, this evening, the main heads of the arguments he would have made use of had the question come properly before the House. The noble lord has told us four of the principal arguments he would have used on such an occasion; but into those arguments I cannot follow the noble lord, to state the totally different views I take of the question, without provoking a very inconvenient discussion, which, under present circumstances, I think it much better to avoid. I will therefore leave the noble lord in the full possession of all the advantage he can derive from the course he has pursued, although I do not think that that advantage has been very fairly taken.

The only other point to which the noble lord referred was the question of supply. The noble lord says that it is the intention of the government to appeal to the sense of the country by calling a new parliament. Upon this point I shall express no opinion, but leave to the noble lord all the responsibility of the advice he has given to the Crown upon this subject. I did understand the noble lord to give notice, on Friday night, that he would prepare a vote of supply, but only such of the miscellaneous estimates as it was his duty at once to propose, because, if these were not granted at the present moment, their further delay would cause great inconvenience to the public service. Now, while I am not prepared to make any objection to this proposition of the noble lord, or to throw any obstruction in the way of the vote, my opinion is,—leaving to her Majesty's ministers all the responsibility of the dissolution of parliament,—that that measure ought to be executed with the least possible delay. I say, that in a parliament whose days are registered—the fate of which is determined—it is not correct to propose any measure not imperatively called for by the circumstances of the country. I mean no asperity; but I do say, also, that the vote of Friday night is an additional reason why this should not be done, but that reference should at once be made to the sense of the country. When, on Friday night, the noble lord announced his intention of proposing the estimates immediately necessary for the public service, I had made up my mind not to make any objection to such a course; but the present proposition of the Chancellor of the Exchequer is quite a different thing. He proposes to take a vote of credit for six months. I shall not state what my opinion is as to the advice which the government have given to the Crown, or their duty in that respect, as to dissolving the present parliament; but, the government having given such advice to the Crown, I shall not oppose the sugar bill, which I know is a necessary measure to be passed; and I took the same view of the estimates to which I supposed the noble lord referred in his notice of Friday night; but I was not prepared to expect that any more extensive measure would be proposed. My opinion is, that the Crown having been advised to dissolve the parliament, it is not only necessary that that dissolution should take place as soon as possible, but also that the new parliament should be called together with the least possible delay. For many reasons I consider it of great importance that the new parliament should be convoked at an early period. It is necessary, not only to quiet the public mind, but to prevent advantage being improperly taken in commercial speculations arising from the doubtful state of the law; and I consider it still as much called for by the position in which the executive government of the country at this moment stands before the people. I therefore say that the new parliament should be convoked with as little delay as may be; and this practice is in strict accordance with past precedents and the analogy of former similar occasions. In 1784, when Mr. Pitt dissolved the parliament, the succeeding parliament was immediately called together. Such also, was the case after the dissolution in 1817; and Lord Grey, after the dissolution in 1831, pursued the same course, and convoked the new parliament immediately. These three cases are exactly analogous; and therefore the House has a right to expect that the noble lord will call the new parliament together at as early a period as possible. If the noble lord will declare his intention to advise the Crown to pursue this course, that declaration of the noble lord will be quite satisfactory to me. I consider the declaration of the leader of her Majesty's government so sufficient that I shall implicitly rely upon it. I say that, if the noble lord pursues former precedents, he can have no hesitation in the course he ought to follow; and if he act upon those precedents, notwithstanding the notice of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, I shall make no objection to the propositions intended to be submitted to the House by the government. The noble lord can have no constitutional objection to giving to the House the assurance which I ask, because for such a course, also, there are several precedents. In 1807, the Crown intimated the intention of calling the new parliament speedily together, by his Majesty, in his speech from the throne, expressing the hope that the attention of the new parliament, which he should direct forthwith to be convoked, would be directed to certain measures. In 1820, "His Majesty also, in his speech from the throne, informed the House that it was his intention to call the new parliament without delay." In Lord Grey's government, too, in 1831, which is the last instance, his Majesty expressed his hope, in the speech from the throne, that the attention of the new parliament, which he would direct immediately to be called, should be applied to the consideration of certain important subjects. And thus I have shewn, by four former precedents, that the new parliaments were convoked in these cases at as early a period as possible after the dissolution of the existing parliament; and I have shewn, by three former precedents, that there was no objection on the part of the Crown to giving an intimation of its intention to call the succeeding parliament without delay. I think, therefore, that the noble lord cannot object to give the House the assurance for which I ask,—and which, as I before said, will be perfectly satisfactory to me upon the subject. I shall say nothing of the precise position of the executive government; but, supposing the noble lord to be unable to give this assurance to the House, I shall not offer any obstruction to the dissolution of parliament. But I cannot be a party to a vote which would imply an opinion, on my part, that, although the parliament may be dissolved, yet that its successor need not be convened for an indefinite period.

Sir, it is, I apprehend, quite clear that if the noble lord were to take a vote for the remaining estimates for six months,—that is, from the 5th of April to the 5th of October,—such a vote would enable the government to defer the meeting of the new parliament until October or November, or even a later period; but that, I think, would be an unconstitutional proceeding; and against it, I do submit, this House has an undoubted right to protest. I repeat, therefore, that, if the noble lord will give me an assurance, in his place as a minister, that it is not the intention of the government to advise the Crown to pursue that course, but that it is their intention to advise the Crown to pursue the course taken on all former occasions,—I say, if the noble lord will give me such an assurance as this, such, his declaration, will incline me to place entire confidence in him, and not to quarrel with the particular proposition which the right hon. gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer has made. If, however, the noble lord is not prepared—is either unable or unwilling—to give me this assurance,—even then, I will consent, in part, to the grant for which the right hon. gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer asks; although I should submit that estimates for a period of three months would be amply sufficient to supply all the exigencies of the public service. The House will observe, that so determined am I not to take advantage of my present position for the purpose of inflicting on any branch of the public service inconvenience, that, if the right hon. gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer only will say there are certain votes which the government requires, and for which the amount of estimates for three months would not be sufficient,—if he will only shew me, for instance, where some particular vote has been anticipated, or, proves to me the absolute necessity, why, in some particular cases, estimates for a longer period ought to be granted,—I can only say that I shall not object;—that I shall be ready to grant to the government any additional sum which they may require, on being furnished with evidence of such a necessity. I do trust that the noble lord is aware of the motive which induces me to call for this assurance; and I shall be happy if the noble lord will relieve me, by such a declaration, from further hostile discussion on the subject. There is nothing whatever inconsistent on my part in asking, or on the part of the noble lord in making, that declaration for her Majesty's government; and, as I require no further guarantee beyond his declaration,—if the noble lord makes it, I can only say, without implying that I waive my right to discuss any particular vote, that I, for one, shall not object to grant the remaining estimates for six months, or any additional sum which I am assured the interests of the country may require.

After a short discussion, the House went into committee, several votes were agreed to, and the House resumed.

On the 23rd of June, parliament was dissolved by proclamation, and a new one summoned, to meet August 19, 1841.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO THE SPEECH.

AUGUST 24, 1841.

Parliament having been opened by commission, and the Speaker having reported to the House the Lords Commissioners' speech, Mr. Mark Philips proposed the Address in reply.

Mr. Wortley then rose, and proposed, by way of amendment, a series of resolutions, to the effect, that her Majesty's advisers do not possess the confidence of that House.

SIR R. PEEL, in the fourth night's debate, spoke as follows:—If I felt more acutely than in fact I do, either for myself or the party with which I am connected, the weight of censure and vituperation with which we have been visited by the hon. and learned gentleman who has just sat down, (Mr. O'Connell,) I still could find some consolation; for, whatever may be his present abuse of the Tory party, it falls infinitely short of that which he has so often lavished on his beloved Whigs. The hon. and learned gentleman has, in fact, reduced himself to a position in which his praise and his censure are of equal value. If these Whigs are the men who have so improved and advanced the condition of Ireland,—if these are the men who for ten years have given to that country happiness and tranquillity,—what can have justified you in loading them in former times with every calumny? What! are these "the base and bloody and brutal Whigs?" When you are accounting for their difficulties and embarrassment, do you bear in mind that there is not one distinguished member of that party, I might say without any exception, who has not had the—honour—of your vituperation? Is there one? You say that for ten years they have so governed Ireland, as to secure to that portion of the empire tranquillity and order. Why, for four of those years my noble friend near me was Secretary for Ireland; for four years out of the ten that man, whose advent to power you now deprecate, was the immediate agent of the Whig administration in Ireland. I ask now, if these men have so well deserved your approbation; and if so, why it was that, night after night, you increased their difficulties and embarrassments by your opposition; by denouncing them to the country, and by trying to create prejudice against them in Ireland, by every calumnious expression which an imagination fertile in calumny could suggest? Sir, I am sorry I have been provoked on this occasion; but I think

I have had some provocation. I am sorry, sir, that I should have been provoked into a single expression betraying the slightest irritation. It was my wish, and I earnestly hope I shall fulfil my intention, to discuss the questions that are now before the House, in a spirit and in a temper becoming the gravity of the occasion, and the magnitude of the interests which they involve.

I have been opposed to the hon. gentlemen opposite, for the period, except for one short interval, of nearly ten years. I have attempted to conduct that opposition—reconciling, at the same time, the frank exposition of my opinions, and the open and direct condemnation of their measures—with an absence of every expression of an acrimonious nature—the absence of every feeling betraying personal hostility or dislike. Placed in that situation in the opposition where some latitude is necessarily allowed, I have endeavoured to discharge my duty temperately; and it certainly is not upon this occasion, when, according to the apparent feeling of the House, that opposition is likely to be attended with success, that I shall allow myself to be betrayed into a course different from that which I have hitherto pursued. I feel that all the exultation of party triumph should be suppressed in the presence of those great questions which have been submitted to our consideration; and if it be true that those great consequences which have been anticipated, are likely to flow from the debate of this night—if it be true that the destinies of this country, so far as the government are concerned, are to be committed to other hands:—those who, according to public opinion, will be called to power, ought to survey the position of public affairs with feelings far more elevated than such as are connected with mere party considerations. I hope sincerely—if public anticipations be correct, if it be likely that I shall be called upon to take a part in the conduct of public affairs—that I shall contemplate those dangers and those difficulties to which the hon. and learned gentleman has adverted, and which perhaps may account in some degree for the want of confidence in the present administration—I hope I shall contemplate them without any unmanly fear, or any shrinking from that responsibility which belongs to public station; but, at the same time, I conceive it to be perfectly consistent with those feelings, to contemplate them with an awful sense of the obligations which high office imposes, and of the responsibility which public duties involve. It is in that spirit of contemplation, rather than with any feeling of party rancour, or exultation, that I proceed to give my opinion upon the topics that have been adverted to in the course of this debate.

Let me first briefly notice two or three points in the address upon which no great difference of opinion is entertained. The first is that in which we express our satisfaction, “that the temporary separation which the measures taken in execution of the treaty of the 15th of July, 1840, created between the contracting parties and France, has now ceased.” Sir, no man learns with more satisfaction than I do, that that separation has ceased. No man learns with more cordial satisfaction that France has been able, consistently with her honour, to enter again into the great councils of Europe. I do, however, hope that that re-union will not be a mere formal re-union, but that it will be accompanied with the restoration of those amicable feelings, and of that cordial and good understanding between this country and France, which is essential to the security and tranquillity of Europe. I have read with feelings of the greatest satisfaction the sentiments which have been recently expressed by a great statesman—I speak not of sentiments expressed in the assembly of the Chamber of Deputies of France, but at a public meeting of his constituents; and whatever is stated at any meeting, by a man so eminent, holding so high and important a situation, and who has proved himself so truly deserving of the character of a great statesman, as M. Guizot, the present minister for Foreign Affairs in France, must command attention: I have seen, I say, with the utmost satisfaction, this frank declaration from him, “That he rejoices in the prospect of the restoration of a good understanding between France and the other powers of Europe.”

The next paragraph in the address refers to her Majesty’s hope, “That the union of the principal powers upon all matters affecting the great interests of Europe will afford a firm security for the maintenance of peace.” I, for one, with the rest of this House, also reciprocate that hope. I sincerely hope, that a cordial union may exist between those powers upon all matters relating to the interests of Europe; and I hope that the first great interest of Europe that will be attended to may be that of a general disarmament. Is not the time come when those powerful countries may reduce their military establishments—when they may say to each other, “There is no use in this relative increase of military strength?” And what, after all, is the use of one power greatly increasing her navy, or greatly increasing her army? Does not that power know that for the purposes of protection and self-defence other powers will follow the example? And does it not also know, that there is no relative increase of military strength that does not produce a corresponding weakness in another direction? By such a course you deprive peace of half its value, while you anticipate the energies of war when war is uncalled for. I know it is a romantic idea, that a nation ought to trust to professions for security; but then, if each country will commune with itself—if each country will ask what is the state of its finances, and of those of every country in Europe—if each country will ask what is the danger to be apprehended at present from foreign aggression, compared with the danger of producing dissatisfaction and discontent from curtailing the comforts of the people by undue taxation,—the answer it must give is this,—that the danger from aggression is infinitely less than the danger incurred by preparation to resist it. The interests of Europe do not depend upon the question of which country shall exercise the greatest influence in this small court or in another; the true interest of the countries of Europe is, to come to some one common accord which shall enable them to reduce those military armaments which belong to a state of war rather than of peace. I wish that the councils of each of those countries—and if their councils will not, I hope that the public mind will induce them to do so—would turn their attention to the great revolution which has been brought about of late years in the feelings of Europe. A twenty-five years’ peace, an increased intercourse of commerce, new connections, and new interests, have effected a great change in public affairs. Take France, for instance; and what country in Europe, if common sense prevailed in the councils of that country, would wish to see such a nation curtailed of its legitimate proportion of authority in the general councils of Europe? The common feeling of Frenchmen seems to be, that the old-fashioned feeling of national hostility towards France still prevails in this country. This is a complete mistake. If you take the public opinion of this country in the proportion of ninety-nine to one, you will find that there is no other wish amongst her people, than that France should consolidate the free representative institutions by which she is governed—you will find that there is not one feeling of rivalry directed against her successful competition in the paths of science, or in the encouragement of the arts, of literature, of manufactures, of industry, and of commerce. My firm belief is, that if France were in danger from unjust aggression, the security of the nation would not be found in the number of her regiments, but in the mind and public support of her people, who would rise with the energy of one man to rebuke and repel the danger. Look, then, at that magnificent spirit which in Germany has virtually abolished the division into small states. At present, there is but one feeling from Hamburgh to the Tyrol, and from Berlin to the southern confines of the country, and which, if the country were threatened with aggression, would rise in all its fulness and its majesty, and annihilate the invaders. In a spirit like this are to be found the securities against aggression, and for the maintenance of peace.

Not high raised battlements or laboured mounds, Thick walls or moated gates,
But man, high-minded man,— who, at the call of patriotism, in Germany or France, would, at the notice of a moment, rise in all that energy which France displayed in '93. Why do I give this counsel? [Cries of “Hear, hear!” from the ministerial side of the House.] If I may assume your hypothesis, that I shall be called to power, you surely won’t charge me with indecent presumption in offering this opinion. The first impression perhaps will be, that “this man is afraid of war,” or “that he counsels other states to reduce their army, in order that he may gain, by their so doing, some paltry advantage.” But public men must disregard such low and grovelling imputations. You cannot conduct war, as Buonaparte conducted it, against the countries of continental Europe. You cannot make a country that you conquer bear the expense of the conquest. That is impossible. What, then, must these warlike preparations end in? A moment must arrive, the most infelicitous for states as well as for individuals—the day of reckoning must come! It is the same thing in every country. And when the people come to calculate, in their sober moments, the relative advantages of immense armaments and universal distress in the train of military glory, with the taxes raised to maintain those armaments,—when they come to take calmer and more discreet views as to the relative merits of the cost, and of the momentary excitement,—their sober conclusions will justify a statesman in adopting an equally sober policy, but a policy which, at the same time, is perfectly consistent with the firmest determination, if an occasion should unhappily call for it, to risk everything in the maintenance of the honour and true interests of the country.

I come to a point, now, which is of greater importance. I confess that I remarked with great regret the omission in the speech of any notice of our relations with the United States of America:—not, however, that I necessarily blame that omission; I am sure that it was not casual—I am sure that it was not inadvertent. Why I regret that omission is, because I fear that you have nothing very satisfactory to refer to. A question was asked of the noble lord the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, by an honourable and learned gentleman, to which the noble lord made an answer that might have easily suggested other considerations. The noble lord laid down the position, that we had nothing to do with the institutions of other countries as apart from their general government; that our demand must be uniformly made upon the public organs of authority, and upon them alone; that their internal laws and regulations could not be appealed to as an answer. When the noble lord read the despatch from Mr. Webster, if the occasion had been an ordinary one, some questions must have necessarily arisen. But I understood the noble lord to deprecate the putting of questions, and to state that he thought it might be more conducive to the general interests of peace, and consonant with the national honour, that this course of questioning should not be pursued; and, drawing the inference from what I understood to be the opinion of the noble lord, I shall abstain from pressing these questions or soliciting any further explanation. But the noble lord will permit me to say that the explanation which he gave was anything but full and satisfactory.

I shall now proceed at once to those great subjects which have been adverted to in the speech and the address, and which immediately led to the amendment that has been proposed. The speech of the hon. gentleman who moved the address directly called on us for an express approval of the measures recommended by ministers before the dissolution of parliament. The speech had especial reference to those measures, which were intended to supply the deficiency in the public finances of the country, more especially with reference to the duties on the importation of timber, sugar, and corn. I do not mean to avoid the expression, or, I must rather say, the repetition, of my opinion on the subject of these duties. I stated, before the last session terminated, what was the course which I intended to pursue, and what view I took with reference to them. I was told that the country would disapprove of the secrecy which I meant to observe, and that it was unworthy any person likely to possess power to shrink from a divulgement of his plans for the remedy of the financial embarrassments of the country. But I gave an opinion then,—to which I now adhere with the greater resolution, because it has been supported and confirmed by the voice of the country,—that I, who am at present to be regarded as a private individual, am not called on by any considerations of public duty—nay, that I am precluded, by my own sense of public duty—from divulging the detailed measures by which, if called to power, I would attempt to rescue the finances of the country from their present embarrassed position. The right hon. gentleman the President of the Board of Trade asked me whether, if I dissented from the measures of the government, I therefore dissented from the truth of the principles of free trade? Sir, I protest against the principles of free trade being trifled with in this indecent manner. I protest against the conclusion that, because I oppose those individual measures, I therefore entertain an opinion adverse to the removal of restrictions upon commerce—that I therefore imply an opinion hostile to the doctrines of free trade. In the first place, Sir, if I now profess my conviction of the truth of the principles of free trade, I cannot be charged with any new or hasty adoption of that creed. I was Secretary of State in 1825, and was intrusted with the preparation of a speech from the throne, which recommended the removal of the restrictions from commerce, in a manner, as it appears to me, more calculated to promote that removal—to make it acceptable and satisfactory—than the mode which has been since adopted by the government. In 1825, with my entire acquiescence, his Majesty delivered this recommendation, through the commissioners, in the speech from the throne:—"His Majesty commands us not to conclude without informing you that evident advantage has been derived from the relief which you have recently given to commerce by the removal of inconvenient restrictions. His Majesty recommends to you to persevere, as circumstances may allow, in the removal of similar restrictions, and his Majesty directs us to assure you that you may rely upon his Majesty's cordial co-operation in fostering and extending that commerce which, while it is, under the blessing of providence, a main source of strength and power to this country, contributes in no less a degree to the happiness and civilisation of mankind."

These were the sentiments to which, in 1825, I was a party. The right hon. gentleman has, I think, a fair right to say, "But don't content yourself with these general declarations in favour of free trade. If the principles be good, the onus is thrown on you of establishing the grounds for making an exception." I will, then, say,—although an hon. gentleman has taunted me with assuming the mantle of Huskisson,—I can say with perfect truth that I did cordially co-operate with Mr. Huskisson in his financial measures, and received from Mr. Huskisson the assurance that from no member of the government did he receive a more cordial support than from myself in forwarding those measures. But the right hon. gentleman says, "We were prepared with other measures." It may be perfectly true that there were other measures, founded on the principles of free trade, which the right hon. gentleman intended to introduce. He states that he has other more extensive measures in contemplation; but on these he will surely not expect me to express any opinion. As to those, however, which he actually proposed, independently of the three great measures of last session, the principal one which I can call to mind now was the regulation of the duties on coffee from the Brazils, with a view to get rid of that absurd anomaly which permits that coffee now to come round by the Cape. The right hon. gentleman met no opposition from me in that matter. I was fully disposed to give him my cordial support. Another measure brought forward by him was for the equalisation of the duties on East India produce, as compared with those upon West India produce. Upon that measure, the right hon. gentleman met with some opposition, I think, from this side of the House,—some slight opposition;—but he will recollect that I expressed my opinion distinctly in his favour. The other measure of the right hon. gentleman was to diminish the cost of production in the West Indies, by permitting the free introduction of lumber and provision at a fixed rate of duty. The right hon. gentleman did not meet with any very formidable opposition on that measure.

Mr. Labouchere.—It was opposed by the member for Cambridge University (Mr. Goulburn).

Sir R. Peel.—The measure, as I remember, was but slightly opposed. But, proceeding to other matters, I shall now refer to another passage of the speech:—"It will be for you to consider whether some of these duties are not so trifling in amount as to be unproductive to the revenue, while they are vexatious to commerce."

You ask whether I contend against that principle? Not in the least. I can conceive nothing more just—nothing more wise, than such a recommendation. If there be duties which are unproductive to the revenue and vexatious to commerce, there can be no possible objection to consider them with a view to their removal. Nor to the principle contained in the following passage can I at all demur:—"You may farther examine whether the principle of protection upon which others of these duties are founded be not carried to an extent, injurious alike to the income of the state and the interests of the people."

The only reason why I object to the address is, that you have announced that it means to challenge an opinion upon the three principal measures which formed part of your budget; and my fear is, that with that public intimation of your intentions, I might acquiesce in the general words of the address, and you might construe that acquiescence into an approbation of the detailed measures. I come, then, to the detailed measures themselves. Before the House separated last parliament, I said with respect to the timber duties, I will give no pledge—I will reserve to myself the consideration of that question; but I will know, circumstanced as the

Canadas are—I will know whether there may not be political considerations which may contravene the general principles of free trade, or render it desirable to carry them out in this particular case. Now, what are the facts with respect to this question? The noble lord (Lord J. Russell) told us that Lord Sydenham, the Governor-general of the Canadas, had said that the proposition for the reduction of the duties on foreign timber as compared with those on colonial, would greatly add to his embarrassment—that it would greatly embarrass him just at the moment when he had formed that union which, according to the learned gentleman, is to be productive of so little harmony, contentment, and satisfaction. At the present moment when our relations with the United States are so critical, Lord Sydenham said, “If you carry the timber duties, you will greatly add to my embarrassment.” He said there might be other measures which, if carried, might reconcile the Canadians to an alteration of the duties; but to this hour we have never heard what those measures were. Why, what is the state of the Canadas at this moment? What is the state of the Canadas as affected by our relations with the United States? I have seen lately published in the newspapers a despatch from the noble lord the secretary for the colonies—a despatch of a peculiar nature—such a despatch as I believe never was published before—a despatch in which the noble lord frankly informs the Governor-general of Canada, and proclaims to the world, that he has thought it necessary to refer a project for the fortification of Canada, not merely as he would have done in ordinary times to the Master-general of the Ordnance, but to Lord Hill and the Duke of Wellington, and that £100,000 per annum should be devoted for that purpose. Why, if that be so—if we cannot rest on the superiority of our naval force—if we must fortify Canada—and if this be proclaimed to the world, with the object, I suppose, of convincing the United States that our mind is made up, at any risk or cost, to defend the Canadas, and perhaps also to assure the people of Canada that, notwithstanding our own financial difficulties,—notwithstanding the pecuniary embarrassment in which we are involved,—we are ready to take on ourselves the debt contracted by Upper Canada;—I don't contest the wisdom of the measure. It may be right so to tranquillise the public mind; it may be right to hold out that pecuniary inducement to the consolidation of the new union; it may be wise to fortify Canada, and to spend £100,000 annually in that fortification,—nay, it may be wise to resort to the extraordinary step of publishing your communications with the Duke of Wellington upon that subject to the United States; but if these measures are justifiable and wise, don't they indicate a state of public feeling and a state of public danger which justifies my reserve, lest at this moment we should increase the embarrassment of the Governor-general of Canada? Observe, I know nothing of the secrets of the Colonial-office,—I refer merely to a published despatch; and I suppose the very fact of its publication will acquit me in the eyes of the noble lord of taking any step for increasing its notoriety. I should deeply regret if I had contravened any intention of the noble lord to keep the matter secret; but the despatch to which I have referred was published in the English newspapers at full length.

Now, with respect to the question of sugar. Upon that subject, I am afraid I must maintain precisely the same language as I held last session. At any rate, you shall acquit me of this charge, that before the dissolution I held one sort of language with the view of gaining a majority, and that, having gained a majority, I am now going to modify that language; as if I had sought your removal from office on account of those distinct measures which you have proposed, and at the same time contemplated my own confirmation in power by the adoption of the same course. I frankly own I contemplate no such thing. I maintain, now, the same opinions on this subject I stated when the question was last discussed. I say, seeing that you propose to admit the sugar, not only of Brazil, but of Cuba, at a duty of 12s.;—seeing that your own measure was so ill considered that you were obliged to alter it within a week from its first introduction;—seeing that you made no stipulations whatever at the time of proposing that great advantage in respect of slavery or the slave trade,—it did appear to me, in the first place, that you were incurring a risk of aggravating the horrors both of slavery and the slave trade, particularly as far as Cuba was concerned. You took no precautions which, even if your views were just, you might have taken, in exacting conditions from those states; but, above all, there was the prospect of an increased supply of sugar from your own colonies in the East and West Indies, affording the means of materially reducing the price of sugar from our own colonial dependencies.

Now, I fairly admit I cannot reconcile that course to the just principles of free trade. I fairly admit that the principles of free trade, if strictly applied, would require the disregard of those considerations connected with slavery. That is perfectly true. But still those considerations connected with slavery did weigh on my mind. I did distrust your calculations that our supply would be so short, and the price would be so high, as to compel a reduction of the sugar duties. I did not taunt the right hon. gentleman for changing his course in 1841; and I really think, although I am sure I have had plenty of provocation during this debate, it would be much better that we should, as far as possible, avoid taunting each other with any change of opinion. [Cries of "Hear, hear!" and laughter.] Do not mistake me, I am not going to change mine. I tell you I adhere to the opinions I expressed on this subject before the dissolution. But let me remind the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Labouchere), that, although I did not taunt him, yet the grounds he took in 1840, and urged with so much ability, were diametrically in opposition to the scheme he propounded in 1841. Those grounds were, that the West Indies were tottering under the weight of a great experiment,—that sugar cultivation in the West Indies was peculiarly onerous,—that on the sugar estates the mortality was much greater than that caused by the raising of any other colonial produce; and he said that the people of England required that justice should be done to that great experiment. Upon these grounds the right hon. gentleman resisted—and, in my opinion, properly resisted—this measure in 1840. Although he said other considerations overpowered him on account of the sufferings of the people of this country, his grounds for resisting the alteration of those duties were not of an incidental or temporary nature. I thought there was a prospect of an increased supply of sugar from our colonies,—I thought the price would be reduced. Now, what is the fact? The right hon. gentleman made a very able speech, and entered into many details; but he forgot the part of Hamlet, too,—he forgot to refer to the price of sugar. The price of sugar on the 1st of September, 1840, when I voted with the right hon. gentleman, was 58s. 4d.; on the 8th of January, 1841, it was 50s. 10d.; and the present average of the price of sugar, the produce of the British colonies and our East Indian possessions, is 36s. 3d. I do not say the reduction of the price of sugar derived from your own colonial possessions is a conclusive argument against the admission of foreign sugar in competition with it. The principles of free trade and competition must disregard the fact of low prices. In point of fact, low prices may be perfectly compatible with monopoly. A low price might be an argument in favour of competition. I am merely referring to the reduction of price as a conclusive proof that my expectations and predictions were not at fault. If the right hon. gentleman could say to me, "True, there has been a reduction in the price of sugars, but there has been a great decrease in consumption; the consuming power of the people has abated;"—if it were so, that, I fairly own, must be taken into the account in estimating the value of the reduction of the price of sugar. But will the right hon. gentleman allow me to ask him why he confined his estimate of consumption to the first six months of this year as compared with the last? Observe, during those six months there was a great derangement of the trade in sugar, because the ministerial propositions were known, and every one was expecting the inlet of foreign sugar; at least all were expecting a great change in the duties levied on sugar. There was a great depression in the market, and an unwillingness to purchase sugar; and these circumstances must account for the diminished consumption, or at least, the taking sugar out from the docks for the purpose of consumption. But is it true that, in the last three months, there has been an increase in the consumption? I have been told,—I do not know whether I can entirely rely on the information I have received, but it is to this effect,—that during the three months ending the 5th of August, 1840, the consumption of sugar imported from the British plantations, including the Mauritius, was 937,000 cwt.; and in the same period of 1841, for the three months ending the 5th of August of the present year, it was 992,000, or nearly 1,000,000 cwt. Is that fact true, or is it not? If it be, why did the right hon. gentleman opposite (Mr. Labouchere) confine his estimate to the first six months of 1841, leaving out of consideration the succeeding period? But if the statement be true, it is a most important fact, and, at the same time, a most consolatory one, which I value infinitely less on account of the revenue to be derived from it, than as an indication that there is an increase in the consumption. Infinitely less do I regard it on account of any advantage that may result to the exchequer, than as an indication that the reduced price of the article has contributed to an increased consumption. If these facts be true, you have it proved that there is a fall of the price of sugar from 58s. 4d. per. cwt. to 36s. 3d.; and this within the last three months, since sugar, the produce of the East Indies, has begun to arrive in this country. I hail this result, then, as one of great importance, encouraging the hope that the period of recovery, slight indeed, but still showing a turn in the downward progress of diminution, perhaps may have arrived.

I come, now, to that more important and exciting topic, the consideration of the duties on corn. That I may make no mistake, allow me to quote the exact expressions I made use of with respect to this question of the Corn-laws previous to the dissolution of the late parliament. I said, what I now repeat, that I preferred, on the whole, a graduated scale;—that, after mature consideration, I had formed an opinion, which intervening reflection has not induced me to change,—that the principle of a graduated scale was better than the imposition of a fixed and irrevocable duty on corn. I said, and I must repeat it, that I think the sliding scale preferable to a fixed duty. I said that I would not pledge myself to the details of the existing law: but that I would reserve to myself the unfettered power of considering and amending those details. I hold that language now. I still prefer the principle of a graduated duty. But if you ask me whether I bind myself to the maintenance of the existing law in all its details, and whether that is the condition on which the landed interest give me their support, I say that, on that condition, I cannot accept their support. [Cries of "Hear, hear!" from the ministerial benches.] Well, but am I not repeating—am I not maintaining—now,—precisely the same position I took up formerly? I may be wrong; I know it is the fashion to be positive of accuracy; but it does appear to me to savour of intolerance, for every gentleman to presume that he is in the right, and that those who differ from him are wrong. But, suppose we are in error. Have compassion on the comparative infirmity of our inferior judgments, if you will; but, at any rate, do not impute motives to us which you disclaim for yourselves, and do not suppose that, in maintaining the opinions we conscientiously think just,—base motives can have any sway with us. The right hon. gentleman opposite says, that there have been great errors in calculating the averages; and would any man of common sense, who looked forward to succeed to power, debar himself of the full opportunity of correcting those errors? There may be various modes of correcting those errors; but I will not enter upon them. I purposely avoid entering upon the details. But this I say, reviewing the whole bearings of this question, I do now, with a majority, as it is supposed, hold the language which I held in a minority, and I reserve to myself the unfettered power of considering the details hereafter. You are not satisfied with this, and your whole store of obloquy is directed against me in consequence; but which, after the experience of thirty years, I can endure with as little irritation or uncomfortable feeling as most men. Still, your obloquy is directed against me on this ground;—you say to me, "You prefer a graduated scale to a fixed duty, and yet you withhold from us all knowledge of the mode in which you would carry out your principle." Why, was there ever a more preposterous demand made of a public man than that he should not only declare his preference of a principle, but bind himself irrevocably, before the whole world, to the precise mode in which he should apply it? You made this demand of me in May last, and yet you have remained in office up to the present time. You said, in May last, "You are coming into power, we are going out. Was there ever such a shallow candidate for power as not to tell us, upon the eve of his advent to office, what his proposition is with respect to the sliding scale?" Why, suppose I had done so. All this demand proceeded on the assumption that you were about to quit office. On the 18th of May I should have declared my intentions. Your views were changed in the intervening period; and, having determined to retain power and to appeal to the people, you wanted the convenient advantage of attacking my detailed project, and, to the best of your power, making it utterly impracticable. But, add to this all the intervening confusion of the corn trade. There was a measure proposed on the 18th of May, which subsequent events proved could not be submitted to the House before the middle of October, at the earliest; and the whole country was to be occupied in sifting, and condemning, if they deserved condemnation, the details of the measure; and then, when, after five months, I came into power, you would have bound me to that plan so prematurely condemned; and, if I had not adhered to it, you would have said, "Here is a man who came forward with a certain plan in opposition; he has got office; and, the minute of his attaining it, he alters the details!" I was honoured with the confidence of a powerful party, which did not free me from the obligation of expressing my opinion with respect to the new measures of ministers, but which did not require me to develop a budget; for, if it were my duty to do so, why do we go to the immense expense of maintaining establishments of public functionaries—ministers of the Crown—whose duty it is to arrange the budget? If we are all on an equality, and if we have all the means of procuring official information, for the purpose of arranging the details of a financial scheme, what becomes of the necessity for the offices which are held by the right hon. gentlemen opposite? But I will prove to you that you could not require this of me. Why did you give me a year to consider the New Poor-law? That measure has been the subject of discussion; and why should I not, in the same way, be called upon to explain the details of the amendments I may find it necessary to propose on it? Is not the one just as reasonable as the other; and do not you know, with respect to each, that the premature declaration of the details of a measure, and the sifting of them, in popular assemblies, before they are submitted to parliament, tends to prejudice the free consideration of them? And yet you ask me to pledge myself as to the details of a new Corn-law. Suppose I had done so. I was to proceed afterwards to the formation of a new government. There was one point in the measure to which I must have adhered—I mean the pivot price. But, suppose I had declared my measure in detail, offering it in competition with that of the government, in order to satisfy the public mind; and I was to go to each colleague to ask him to assent to belong to my government, but, at the same time, I was to tell him "there is one irrevocable principle to which you must conform—not to a mere alteration of the Corn-laws,—not to a mere preference of the graduated scale,—but you must subscribe to this precise mode of correcting the averages, and the pivot price on which I have individually determined, and from which I cannot depart, because I have declared in parliament that it shall be so and so, and I have left a blank to be afterwards filled up." Is it not clear what would have been the consequence? And can any reasonable person deny that there never was a more preposterous demand made from any public man, than that I, not being in office, but supposed, by you, to be a candidate for power, should declare the precise measure, on the subject of the Corn-laws, which, in the event—the perhaps distant event—an event contingent on your inclinations—of my return to power, I should propose when I was in office? I stated that before the election; and no demands, no solicitation, no ridicule, shall induce me to depart from it. What was the question between us? On your side, gentlemen, who are the advocates of free-trade, many of whom were not members of the last parliament, seem to have forgotten what the real question at issue was. We both acknowledged the principle of protection—we both acknowledged the principle of protection to agriculture. The first finance minister of the Crown being asked, "Is this measure of fixed duty a tax or protection?" his answer was, "Most unquestionably it is one of protection." Well, we started, therefore, from the same point. The government proposed a fixed duty of 8s. to be levied on foreign corn, at all times, and under all circumstances. No matter what might be the glut of corn in the market;—no matter what might be the price of corn—90s. or 100s.;—the proposal of the government was, and is, I suppose, that the 8s. duty should be rigidly adhered to. Now, will the hon. member for Stockport have the goodness to apply his calculations to the government proposition of an 8s. duty on corn; and when he estimates the amount of duty which is taken from the pockets of the poor man, compared with the amount of the duty on bread which is taken from the pockets of the rich man, will he tell me whether his calculations are not, literally and precisely, as applicable to a fixed duty as they are to a graduated scale? And, when I have adopted the fixed duty, and accepted it as a final settlement of the Corn-laws, what security shall I have that those promised denunciations which are daily and nightly to be lavished against the bread tax, will not apply with equal force to the fixed duty of 8s. as it does to the duty under a graduated scale?

Mr. Brotherton.—It depends on the amount.

Sir R. Peel.—No, it does not depend on the amount. If a certain quantity of flour is necessary for the consumption of a poor family, and a certain quantity only is necessary for a rich one, every one of those elaborate calculations which were brought forward by the hon. gentleman will apply with precisely as much force to that fixed and unvarying duty as to a shifting duty, without reference to the amount. And every argument of a popular nature, calculated to produce dissatisfaction and discontent, will apply with at least equal force to a fixed irrevocable duty, levied directly under the name of a tax on bread, as it does to the duty which is levied under the graduated scale. The principles of free trade are as opposed to the one as to the other. And would it be a satisfactory state of things, if we were to have a mere intermediate alteration of the Corn-laws, public declarations having been made by some of the most eminent members of the House of Commons,—some saying that they accept it only as an instalment, others that they take it only as a stepping stone to free-trade,—but all declaring that they regard it not as a final settlement, but that, having got this, they will agitate for more? And that is one of the considerations that make me very much doubt the advantage, and, if I may be allowed to borrow an expression of the noble lord opposite, the “finality” of such a scheme.

Now let me ask you this question:—Suppose you had passed your law in the month of May last, fixing a duty of 8s. on corn, to take effect from the end of the session. Suppose the weather had continued unfavourable; that the present harvest had been a peculiarly deficient one; and that the price of corn had risen towards September or October, to 90s. a quarter;—did you mean to have insisted on your fixed duty of 8s.? That case might have arisen—this is no improbable conjecture. You want to give security to commerce; what does that mean? That men may speculate in corn—that they may have the chance of making great gain by pouring in foreign corn when the price in England is at 90s.,—subject only to a fixed duty of 8s. Of course the principles of free trade require the rigid exaction of that duty. Is there to be a board of trade with a discretionary power to remove that duty whenever it shall think fit? That, surely, would not be in accordance with the principles of free trade. You say that the remote consequence you contemplate is that the price will not rise. That is not the speculation of those who contend for a total repeal; but I speak to those who advocate a fixed duty. I was about to say that the tax upon corn was contemplated as one to come into immediate operation. The Chancellor of the Exchequer contemplated that tax as forming part of his Budget for the year; and I merely refer to the right honourable gentleman to prove that no delay was in contemplation, but that he estimated the 8s. duty as a part of his ways and means. Well, suppose the prospects of the harvest to be gloomy; suppose that there had been a defective supply, and the price had risen in consequence; suppose, I say, all this as taking place in September or October next,—would you have insisted upon a rigorous exaction of your 8s. duty?

An hon. member.—Yes!

Sir R. Peel.—You would? Then I publicly notify to the country, upon the authority of a great manufacturer and a stern free trader, that, be corn at the price of 80s., or 90s., or 100s., his rigid adherence to the principles and doctrines of free trade will compel him to exact the duty of 8s. So that, when the honourable member for Stockport should come forward with the distressing details of the misery of the poor—when others should come forward with their sympathy (and, as I sincerely believe, their unfeigned sympathy,) with the sufferings and distresses of the poor, sufferings of which they themselves are cognizant—when they should say “Here is corn at a price of 90s. or 100s., a foreign supply is pouring in;” then their neighbour and friend, the honourable member who answered “yes,” would reply, “No matter what the amount of distress that prevails—no matter what may be the extent of privation—no matter what the amount of suffering; yet still the 8s. duty must be exacted; there is no power to remit it. “In vain would it, then, be to show that under the existing scale it would have been admitted at 1s. In vain would it be to draw a comparison between the state of the law, now—defective as it may be—admitting corn when there is scarcity—in vain would it be to draw a contrast between that state of law which now admits foreign corn when prices were at 80s. or 90s., with that state of law which would require 8s. irrevocably and under all circumstances. No matter for these considerations; hon. gentlemen would adhere strictly to the 8s. duty, and would say that the importer of corn was entitled to the letter of his bond! It may be very well to make all this parade of strict adherence to principle; but I tell you that under those circumstances the duty of 8s. could not be levied. You would be compelled to a relaxation of it, either by parliament or by some subordinate power. How will you provide for that relaxation? Will you provide that when corn shall arrive at a certain price the council shall be required to abate the duty? If you do, then you must maintain the system of averages. And then I say that in that case the right hon. gentleman must apply himself to the correction of the system of averages, for there would be the same temptation, as now, to deal with the averages when there should be a price fixed at which the council should be enabled to relax the duty. If, on the other hand, you take no such power, then that principle which provides for the total remission of the duty when corn is inconveniently high, is far more likely to work well than that principle which requires, irrevocably, and under all circumstances, a fixed and permanent duty.

With respect to the fluctuations in price, I confess, having paid my best attention to this subject, that I have great doubts whether your expectations, that free trade in corn will produce a great fixity in price, will be realised. It does appear to me, that there are, and must be, such fluctuations in the price of corn, from the very nature of the commodity itself,—a commodity not dependent, like articles of manufacture, upon machinery, which can be limited, but dependent upon circumstances varying and accidental as the seasons, or as the quantity of corn produced. That the proposal of a fixed duty, therefore, would be an improvement in the law, as regards insuring fixity of price, I very much doubt. In considering this part of the subject, it will be important to compare the price of grain in those countries in which corn laws do not operate, with the prices in this country. And here let me say, incidentally, that, in considering this question, I wish to disregard every party and political feeling whatsoever, and to treat it as only it ought to be treated. With respect to the fluctuations, then, in the price of corn, undoubtedly they have been great, greater than I could have wished. The main object to be attained is a comparatively fixed price. Let us compare the variation in the price of corn in the United States with the variation here. America is a country not subject to the operation of any corn law. America is a country with a perfect free trade in corn within its own territories, producing more corn than its inhabitants can consume. It is not, therefore, supposed to be subject to the fluctuations which a country like England, partly dependent upon foreign supplies, must necessarily be. I have, here, a paper, which gives the price of corn in the different countries of the world, and particularly in the United States. I take the state of New York; and, unless I have made some error, or that there be an error in the print itself, here is an account of a very remarkable fluctuation in price. In November, 1834, the price of the Winchester quarter of eight bushels was 33s. 4d.; in October, 1836, it was 54s.; in January, 1837, it was 63s.; in June, 1839, it was 67s. 4d., and in October, 1839—mark! in the same year—it was 39s. 7d. Thus, in the state of New York, alone, in the course of six months, the price of corn varied from 67s. 4d. to 32s. 6d. Whence arose that fluctuation; how is it to be accounted for, unless by the nature of the intervening harvest producing so immense a variation? In October, 1840, the price was 31s. 9d.; so that we see the price fell from June, 1839, when it was 67s. 4d., to October, 1840, to 31s. 9d., a great deal more than 100 per cent. I know that the first argument which will be used in answer to this will be,—“Oh! but the state of the Corn-laws in England deranges all the corn markets of the world.” But Mr. Whitmore, a great authority, has declared that when there is a duty of 8s., we must not expect any very material import from the United States; and that, in consequence of its distance, that country is not liable to derangement in its market on account of the English corn regulations. Yet, in that country, where the trade is free, where the supply of corn is superabundant, on account of the variations of the seasons, there are much greater fluctuations than there seem to be here, and, at times, much higher prices. In January, 1837, when wheat was 63s. per quarter at New York, the price was 55s. 6d. in England; in October, 1836, when the price was 54s. in New York, it was only 65s. 9d. in England. Here, then, is a country, subject to great variations in prices and supplies on account of the fluctuations of the seasons, and occasionally suffering a corresponding amount of distress in consequence, where the system of free trade in corn is in full play.

Again: when I look at the other papers presented to parliament, the whole of which I have hardly had time to examine, I find one of them containing a most extraordinary statement with regard to Russia. Here is an account from your own consul, which you have yourselves laid on the table of the House. He says that, supposing the cultivation of grain to go on in Russia according to the existing limited scale, the supplies sent out from St. Petersburg would be from 175,000 to 210,000 imperial quarters of corn per annum. But what does he add with respect to times of abundance? He says, the quantities may be trebled on account of the variation of the seasons. Why, can it be otherwise than that there must be immense fluctuations in a country where, on account of the variation of the seasons, the produce may be multiplied threefold? In the very next paragraph, in order to give an idea of what this country can produce when the harvests are particularly good, your informant states that he has been assured by one of the principal corn merchants in Russia, that, in the year 1835, Tambov alone produced 38,000,000 quarters of grain.

An honourable member.—Impossible!

Sir Robert Peel.—Impossible? Then you, that have asked me to make my corn law before I had an opportunity of considering what, in May last, I was to anticipate,—namely, all the information you were to get,—you, when I first read that information, meet me with the exclamation, “Impossible!” Here it is, in page 2, of a series of answers from Sir Edward Baines to a letter signed “Palmerston,” requiring information as to the amount of price, and other particulars relating to grain in Russia. In the same document I find that the cost price of wheat, at first hand, at St. Petersburg, is stated to be from 13s. 6d. to 14s. 1d.; oats 4s. 5d. to 9s. Now, if these facts be true, is it not quite possible that a great fluctuation in the price of corn may arise from other causes than the operation of the Corn-law? I would wish still to speak in the spirit in which, as I said before, this question ought to be discussed; but I cannot help thinking that you, who contend for such an unstable change in the Corn-laws as that connected with those fluctuations, are exaggerating the advantages to be gained.

I am sure I heard with the deepest regret those accounts of distress in the manufacturing communities which have been described by honourable gentlemen whose character and opportunities of observation entitle them to great consideration; but some of those statements were so afflicting, that I said to myself, “What must be the operation of the poor law in that district which could permit such a horrible degree of misery to exist?” Surely there must be some great neglect to make it possible for a man to be found dead at his loom, and yet for no inquiry to be made, and no helping hand extended to the sufferers. But this I know, that we ought not to content ourselves with mere expressions of sympathy. Those in authority ought, at once, and in the first instance, to demand by whose laxity it is, and by whose neglect it is, that such things can have taken place. It does, indeed, give me great pain that such instances of suffering should exist. If I could be induced to believe that an alteration in the Corn-laws would be an effectual remedy for those distresses, I would be the first to step forward, and say, at once, to those who are most interested in upholding the present system, the agricultural interest,—“It is for your advantage rather to submit to an alteration of the present Corn-laws than, by insisting upon their continuance, to be the occasion of suffering such as has been described.” If any sacrifice of theirs could prevent the continuance of that distress,—could offer a guarantee against the recurrence of it,—I would earnestly advise a relaxation, an alteration,—nay, if necessary, a repeal of the Corn-laws. But, Sir, it is because I do not, and cannot, believe that the present Corn-laws are at the bottom of the evil,—that the distress that exists in the manufacturing districts, and which has been so ably dwelt upon by honourable members opposite, does, in reality, spring from these laws,—that I am induced to stand up for their maintenance. Perhaps I am taking a gloomy view of the subject; but I do not believe that it is in the power of this House to alleviate that suffering and distress, or to palliate those evils, by any legislative enactments. One of the causes, if not the principal one, which has given rise to much of the distress in the manufacturing part of the country, is the sudden introduction of machinery as a substitute for bodily labour. That that substitution has been productive of great good to the country no one will question; but it is equally evident that much private distress has been the consequence. In the course of the inquiries that I have made into this subject, I have been most forcibly struck by documents which appear in the first report of the poor-law commissioners, giving an account of the state of manufactures in Lancashire in 1835; and if such things as are there described can exist,—if there can be such stimulants applied to production,—then I fear that the inevitable consequence must be, that, when the check arrives, when the markets are encumbered with produce,—when wars in China, wars in Syria, and disturbances in Europe affect the vent of supply,—then the inevitable result must be, that there will be a recurrence of that distress, in general and in detail, which has been described in such forcible terms in the course of the present debate.

Now, this is the account which Dr. Kay, a gentleman possessing the confidence of the government, who holds an office of great importance under the government, but who, at the time I am speaking of, was employed as a poor-law commissioner;—this is the extraordinary account which he gives of the state of manufacturing industry in July, 1835. I recommend the whole document to the attention of every hon. gentleman who sits in this House. Dr. Kay says, that within two years, new machinery, equal to 7507 horse power, would be brought into operation; that 45,032 fresh hands, at the rate of six mill hands to each horse power, would be required to work these machines with, and an equal number of mechanics and labourers,—making, in the whole, 90,064 fresh hands, in the then state of Lancashire, for working the new power thus brought into operation. The erection of this power presupposes the outlay of an immense capital. Dr. Kay says that it involves an outlay of £3,752,000.

I would ask, whence must the population required by the manufacturers be derived—and what was the remedy suggested? It was proposed that a suitable agent should be appointed at Manchester to encourage immigration. I will refer the House to the state of the population in one township,—namely, that of Hyde. In 1801, the population was 830; in 1811, it was 1806; in 1821, 3355; in 1831, it had increased to the amount of 7138, of which 5000 must be the result of direct immigration. In June, 1835, Messrs. Henry and Edward Ashworth calculated that nearly 20,000 persons would be required in the neighbourhood of one of our seats of manufactures alone, namely, that of Staleybridge. The erection of new mechanical power leads necessarily to a rapid and vast accumulation of population, which must ever be subject to sudden and severe distress from the fluctuations in the demand for their labour. When you have got this population together, you find them in a short time suffering from distress, for which there is no remedy without drying up the source of our prosperity—the application of machinery. When you have erected your new power, and collected the hands necessary to work it,—when you have established your mills, and drawn together the 10,000 or 20,000 persons who are to keep them in motion,—then, the ingenuity of man discovers some new mode of producing similar articles of manufacture with a great curtailment of manual labour. This immediately gives rise to great want and great distress; thousands are thrown out of employment, and, for the time, are deprived of the means of existence. What I deprecate, then, is, the exaggerated view that is taken of the advantage of an alteration of the Corn-laws, as a remedy for the distress from which some portions of the population are suffering. Let the whole question be looked upon in a philosophical point of view,—let it be borne in mind that there are other causes besides the Corn-laws that may occasion distress; and do not take the unjust, the unwise step, of attributing all the ills our fellow-men endure to the operation of those laws.

I will not enter further into the discussion of this part of the question. I am sure the deep importance of it will have justified me in the eyes of the House for the extent to which I have gone. I cannot acquiesce in the Address moved by her Majesty's ministers. It involves an approbation of the specific measures that were involved in the budget, to which I expressed my dissent. It would imply, also, that confidence in her Majesty's ministers which I do not entertain. I do not think that the noble lord (Lord John Russell) will quarrel with the proceedings that have been taken. I think he will feel that it is infinitely fairer—infininitely more direct, more just, after the appeal which has been made to the people, to come at once to the issue—whether the government has or has not the confidence of the country—than to permit the noble lord to remain in ignorance upon that point, and to take the ordinary course of thwarting his measures. The hon. gentleman the member for Finsbury (Mr. Wakley), who, in his speech last night, affected the most extraordinary and sentimental loyalty, who seems to suffer more from an irritation of the feelings of romantic and chivalrous loyalty than any other gentleman in the House—the hon. member for Finsbury says that we (the Opposition) are acting in opposition to the Queen's wishes by moving an amendment to the Address. That is strange doctrine for one professing a great regard for the constitution. We, the House of Commons, are to be prevented from performing our duties, in respectfully submitting our opinions to the Sovereign, by the fear of contravening the Sovereign's private wishes! And the hon. gentleman contrasts the course which I am now pursuing with that which was pursued by my opponents in 1835. The hon. gentleman says, that after the generous treatment I experienced—after the forbearance which was manifested towards me—after the earnest desire that there was to permit me, deliberately and fairly, to lay upon the table of the House those measures for the public good which I proposed to recommend to the attention of the legislature,—after all this, I ought to feel discouraged from taking so indecent and hostile a step as to declare a want of confidence in her Majesty's ministers on the first day of the meeting of parliament. True, when I was in office, I think I remember the opposition to the Speaker, and the declaration of the right hon. gentleman whom I see opposite, that being beaten on the question of the Chair, I ought at once to have resigned. But if that hint was not sufficient, there was another in store for me on the succeeding day; for an amendment was moved to the Address, which censured me in direct terms for having advised the Crown to dissolve the parliament. What affectation, then, is it for the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wakley) now to come forward and state, "True; there was an attempt to censure you; but no want of confidence was implied. The vote was not a vote of want of confidence, but an abstract, dispassionate, impartial view, taken by great patriots, of the single measure of dissolution; and you, the unhappy object of the censure of those great patriots, were to continue in the administration of power, not considering that as an indication of the slightest distrust." Now, I will destroy that illusion by the authority of the right hon. gentleman opposite; because, last year, speaking upon this very question of want of confidence in ministers, he made use of these expressions:—

"He (Sir Robert Peel) advised the King to dissolve the parliament. I do not deny his right to give this advice, any more than the right of the next parliament to give an opinion on that advice. We know what that opinion was; it condemned the advice given by the right hon. baronet in this most essential particular; and the House of Commons, by a majority of seven, pronounced a verdict against the right hon. gentleman,—a verdict which amounted to a vote of no confidence as much as any vote could do."

No doubt it was meant as a vote of no confidence. It was a perfectly legitimate mode of trying the question; and it was but a short time that I survived it. I retained power till I found that the sense of the House of Commons was decidedly against me. Then I resigned—then I threw up a power that I felt I could not properly continue to hold. But I had previously fought the battle of the Speakership, and several other battles. Do not suppose that I called upon a minister, upon the first intimation of dissent or distrust, at once to throw up office. No; he owes obligations to the Crown which would warrant him in taking so precipitate a course. After the division on the Speakership, I knew that the fate of my government was sealed, and I, at once, determined to resign; but, at the same time, I do not think I was exercising an undue discretion in continuing in power as long as I did. My position, at that time, was perfectly different from that of her Majesty's government at the present moment. It is now upwards of two years since the government declared their own opinion that they had not sufficiently the confidence of this House to enable them satisfactorily to discharge their public duties; and I firmly believe that their retention of power, in defiance of the important constitutional principle, which declares that any ministry that undertakes to administer the affairs of this country must possess the confidence of the House of Commons, has weighed more with the constituencies of England than any other misdeed of which the noble lord and his colleagues have been guilty. Lord Melbourne has declared that the worst government was that which could not execute its measures. He has declared that great interests might be exposed to hazard by a minister's attempting to hold office after he has lost power. Those words made their impression upon the public mind; and the result of the late and general election was, in my opinion, a vindication, on the part of the people, of the great constitutional principle—a principle which every friend to popular government, every friend to the representative system of government, ought to hold in honour,—namely, that the favour and support of the Crown ought not to maintain for a long and indefinite period a government in existence, against the will of the representatives of the people. It compromises the prerogative of the monarchy so to retain power, because it exhibits the prerogatives of monarchy without their just influence. It exhibits the House of Commons as wanting in its just influence, when it can thwart the measures and censure the acts, but cannot decide the fate, of a ministry. And now, when you appeal to the constituency—the constituency which you yourselves have framed, professing to consist of the middling classes—professing to be selected from the middling classes, as being less liable to undue influences than if you had widened the franchise—when you make that appeal to them, and tell them that, in your opinion, as expressed by your chief, you are retaining power at the hazard of great interests—when the House of Commons has declared that you do not possess their confidence—when you thus appeal to the people, the day of retribution comes, and the people, vindicating the constitutional principle, confirm the decision of the House of Commons.

The public opinion has been frankly expressed. That opinion, I firmly believe, is unfavourable to the government. You say that that opinion is unjust—you say that the people are too fastidious. These are unjust reflections upon public opinion, and upon those you have made the depositaries of a great public trust. I do not believe that the constituencies of this country are so disqualified to form an opinion of the character, conduct, and acts of public men. But this I am sure of, that their judgment must be decisive, if you intend to retain the popular mode of government. There is no appeal from it. I might have said, in 1835, “It is very hard to condemn me; I have brought forward no measures; it is very hard that the people should declare against me before I have an opportunity of explaining what I mean to do.” What was your constitutional reply? “The people are to judge of that; they have decided against you; you are not to remain here holding power, and executing public trusts; the people are against you; you must submit to the will of the people.” That is the constitutional principle; and it is in deference to that principle that we have moved this amendment, partaking, I trust, as little as possible of any unnecessary acerbity, but embodying an expression of the public opinion, which must be decisive. The result is expected to be the resignation of power by the present government. It is not for me to speculate what may be the result of that; others have speculated upon it. I contemplate with calmness, without anxiety,—nay, with confidence,—whatever may be the result. If power do not devolve upon me, I shall make no complaint. If power do devolve upon me, I shall accept it with the consciousness that I have gained it by direct and constitutional means, and that I owe it to the voice of the people of this country, and to the favour of the sovereign. I am told that, in the exercise of that power, I must be the instrument of maintaining opinions and feelings which I myself am disposed to repudiate. With my views of government,—with my views of the obligations which it imposes, the duties which it entails, the sacrifices it involves,—I am little disposed to add to those sacrifices by accepting with it a degrading and dishonourable station. I am told that I must necessarily be the instrument of effecting objects in Ireland which I myself disapprove. I am asked whether I dare affront my associates and partisans? The hon. member for Meath (Mr. H. Grattan) has alluded to the conduct of a public functionary in Ireland, who, he says, has offered an insult to the religious feelings of his fellow-countrymen by some public act of an offensive nature. I am not afraid of expressing my opinion with respect to acts like that; and I say at once, that there is no man in this House—no Roman Catholic member in this House—who heard with deeper pain or deeper regret than I did, that a gratuitous, an unprovoked insult, and an unnecessary insult, had been offered to the religious feeling of the people of Ireland. If I cannot gain power, or retain it, except by encouraging and favouring such feelings, I say, at once, that the day on which I may relinquish power, rather than defer to such feelings, will be ten times a prouder one than the day on which I obtained it. If I do accept office, it shall be by no intrigue—it shall be by no unworthy concession of constitutional principle—it shall be by no unnatural and factious combinations with men (honest I believe them to be) entertaining extreme opinions, but from whom I dissent. If I accept office, it shall be by walking in the open light and in the direct paths of the constitution. If I exercise power, it shall be upon my conception—perhaps imperfect—perhaps mistaken—but—my sincere conception of public duty. That power I will not hold, unless I can hold it consistently with the maintenance of my own opinions; and that power I will relinquish, the moment I am satisfied that I am not supported in the maintenance of them by the confidence of this House, and of the people of this country!

[The result of this division led to the resignation of ministers, on the 30th of August. Sir Robert Peel having undertaken the formation of a new ministry, parliament again met, after an adjournment of a few days, the right hon. baronet being at the head of the new government, and holding the office of First Lord of the Treasury.]

SUPPLY—POLICY OF THE ADMINISTRATION.

SEPTEMBER 17, 1841.

Sir R. Peel moved that the Order of the Day for the Committee of Supply be now read.

The question having been put,—

SIR ROBERT PEEL (in reply to some observations by Lord John Russell) said,—Sir, the course which I took yesterday, in announcing to the House of Commons the proceedings that I propose to adopt with respect to the public business of the country, will have been a sufficient indication that I had no wish, at the commencement of the harassing and arduous task committed to me, to enter upon it by any controversy of a party nature. I am perfectly ready to admit that the course which I propose to pursue constitutes no rule for the noble lord,—that our respective positions are different, and that he is entirely at liberty to invite me to the discussion which he has originated; and, though I had no wish to originate that discussion myself, I assure the noble lord I am little disposed to deprecate it, and I am thankful to him for the opportunity which he has given me of commenting on his observations. I refer, in the first instance, to those points on which there can be no material disagreement between us. I concur with the noble lord in the earnest desire that amicable relations may be maintained between this country and France; and, if possible, still more cordially do I concur in the prayer that he put up, that it may please Almighty God to continue His protection from the hand of the assassin to that distinguished monarch to whom it is given to rule the destinies of that great empire. It is impossible to hear of these attempts at assassination without feeling for the character of humanity and civilisation; but it appears as if Providence had provided some overruling protection against them, for the only result of these attempts is, to provoke one general feeling of disgust at their abettors, and sympathy with the intended victims. It does appear as if some extraordinary protection were vouchsafed to that illustrious family. My firm belief is, that, so long as they continue to reign, they do constitute a sufficient guarantee for the continuance of peace, and that they rally around them all who wish for peace, and who desire that attempts at assassination may be defeated. I do not anticipate that the change in the government which has taken place in France is likely to interrupt our amicable relations. I have received no intimation from France of any indisposition towards the present government, or any indication of our amicable relations being altered. I should be surprised if it were so; for I recollect that, upon the occurrence of those events which shook to its foundations the throne of the elder branch of the Bourbons, I was one of those who, in conjunction with my illustrious friend the Duke of Wellington, and many of those now joined with me,—seeing that it appeared to be the will of the authorities, and of the people of France, that their government should be committed to other hands,—did, notwithstanding the reluctance of other powers with whom we were in the most cordial relations, at once advise the Crown of this country to recognise that Sovereign on whom the choice of the people of France appeared to be fixed.

And, Sir, with respect to the character of that man, of whom future ages in France will be justly proud—I mean of him who now presides over the government of France—with respect to the desire of maintaining a cordial understanding with that nation, which shall be consistent, at the same time, with the maintenance of British honour—with respect to the conviction that intimate relations of amity (without the necessity of exclusive diplomatic relations) between England and France are most essential to the maintenance of general tranquillity, that they must conduce to the advance of social improvement and civilisation—with respect to all these matters, I am not now, on my accession to office, holding language which is meant only to facilitate my course as a minister; for, for the last ten years, in office and out of office, my language has invariably been the same. I have taken every opportunity of doing justice to the character of the King of France, of expressing an earnest wish for the continued prosperity of that country, of desiring that past hostile collisions between England and France might be forgotten—that each might repose under the laurels which each, respectively, has gained, that these two great countries, each so distinguished for its military character and achievements, might feel that they could maintain relations of amity with one another without the slightest reflection upon either. I have as often expressed my opinion that both nations ought to feel that those relations are essential to the welfare of the world. These are the opinions I have held when opposed to hon. gentlemen opposite; and it is not likely that, now, on my accession to power, I should shrink from their repetition. With respect to our relations with the United States, I view the existing state of them, as does the noble lord, with great anxiety; but it appears to be so manifestly the interest of these two countries, united together by so many ties,—by the community of language, and the community of interest,—to maintain peace; that so little can be gained by war, that the wound which the one inflicts on the other is reflected back on the hand which makes it—that I cannot but hope that the prevailing good sense of each community will influence the government of each (if the government of each want such adventitious aid); and that, upon the whole, the result will be, the maintenance of amicable relations. I say no more: that is my sincere desire; yet, at the same time, I feel, also, the obligation of making no concession affecting the independence or the honour of this country, for the purpose of purchasing temporary tranquillity.

Now, I approach the consideration of those questions in respect to which the controversy arises between the noble lord and me. The part of the speech of the noble lord which I most regret, was that in which he declared his intention not to require from the House of Commons a decision on the course he has taken. I do wish that the noble lord had taken the sense of this House of Commons—elected under his advice, and under his auspices—with respect to the reasonableness and justice of the demand which I make upon its confidence, and would have enabled me to judge whether the House of Commons approves, or disapproves, of the course which I mean to pursue. I should have thought it so reasonable that, after a lapse of ten years, for which I, with the exception of some three or four months, have held the situation of a private individual—I should have thought that, on returning to power after the lapse of ten years, there would have been an universal impression that it was but reasonable—that I should not be called upon, within a month, to propose an alteration of the law in respect to the trade in corn. I should have thought that it would have been felt that there might be advantage in the access to official information—that it might be desirable to avail one's self of the information that exist in the departments—to ascertain the opinions of those who receive large emoluments from the public for the purpose of collecting information—and that it was but reasonable to permit me to have some interval, in conjunction with my colleagues, for the purpose of deliberately considering any proposition we should make. But, if I am responsible for not proposing a measure on the Corn-laws within one month of my accession to office, what must be thought of that government that has held office for five years, and which never, until the month of May, 1841, intimated, on its own part, a united opinion on that subject? What—if you are so convinced of the intolerable evils inflicted upon this country by the operation of the Corn laws,—if you think that commercial distress is to be attributed justly to them, if you think that they are at the root of the privation and suffering to which the labouring classes in some districts of the country are exposed,—what has been your neglect of duty in permitting five years to elapse without bringing forward, on the part of an united government, a proposition for the remedy of such abuses? Why have you allowed this question to be an open question in the administration? You may say that you had no hope of carrying it. I tell you, then, that that course I will not pursue—I shall form my opinion of the subject of the alteration which may be made, and no considerations of convenience—no leaving it an open question, to be proposed here and defeated there—shall prevent my bringing it forward, and—having stated to the House of Commons the course I mean to pursue on the part of a concurring and united government—my staking the existence of the government on the issue.

But, as respects this question, of the urgency of which you now feel so deeply convinced, how have you remained in office, permitting Lord Melbourne to hold opposite opinions? I make no proposal for inquiry. But I have made appointments which have been cavilled at. And what appointments did you make? For the office of Vice-President of the Board of Trade, you selected a man who refused to take into consideration the Corn laws; and I say this, if you were so deeply and thoroughly convinced of the necessity of a change in these laws, it was your duty, as ministers, to propose that change to the House of Commons. It is in vain to reply that you could not form a government without making the corn question an open question; it is in vain to allege you could not carry it. The greatest mischief you can do to great principles is to leave them in abeyance. Five years have elapsed, and without any alteration having been proposed on the part of the government in respect to the Corn laws until April, 1841. And why, if these feelings which you profess were entitled to respect, why did you neglect calling the attention of parliament to the Corn-laws in the Queen's Speech of 1840? Why reserve this general denunciation of the Corn laws till the period when you made an appeal to the people, and when you were in a minority of 80? Why reserve the question of the Corn laws to 1841? And, with your opinions with respect to these Corn laws, you brought them forward in a way most calculated to prejudice their consideration; for it is now perfectly clear that the view you at present take is a comprehensive, philosophical, and enlightened view, with respect to the operation of the Corn laws on the great branches of industry! No matter whether you raise one shilling, or one million, by the Corn laws, it is necessary to call attention to the causes which are drying up the sources of national prosperity! What reason could there be, after the commencement of 1840 (if it were not till then that your doubts were dispelled), that the Corn laws were not alluded to? What reason was there that, at the commencement of the session of 1841, you did not insert in the Queen's Speech some declarations analogous to those which you did insert when it was totally impossible to carry them? And when you did bring forward the question of the Corn laws, it was as the means of raising a revenue; and your proposal with reference to the Queen's Speech of 1841 must be construed as not a general recommendation to take the Corn laws into consideration, but only as a recommendation to adopt the tax of 8s. a quarter, which was the proposition deliberately made by the government. Do you adhere to it now, or not? When you recommended the Corn-laws in August, 1841, had the recommendation reference merely to vague general recommendations of inquiry, or had it reference to your specific proposition on the authority of government with reference to a duty of 8s. 8? If you say you are not bound to adopt the duty of 8s., with what modesty can you call on me to announce my plan, when you already see reason to doubt the policy of applying a fixed invariable duty of 8s. a quarter on foreign corn? If you say the subject is still open to consideration, — that a new parliament may adopt new views, — and that the adoption of the 8s. duty may not be considered at all as a final measure, — if that be your view, you perfectly justify me in maintaining reserve till I mean to give practical effect to my proposals. But, on the other hand, if what you meant, and mean, be to impose a duty of 8s. a quarter on corn, to be levied invariably, and without reference to price, then may I say, you owe to me and to others some acknowledgment for not having allowed it to pass. This I will venture to affirm, that if it had occurred—(it might, possibly, have occurred at one time)—that, instead of there being a happy change in the weather, the weather had continued to be unfavourable, and corn had risen in this country to 90s. a quarter, we probably should have been assembled under your auspices for the purpose of asking a parliamentary authority to abate the duty. If your proposal had been granted by parliament, at this moment a duty of 8s. a quarter on foreign corn must have been imposed; and I think there must be some who, in contrasting the present operation of the Corn-laws, which is admitting a great quantity of foreign corn for the consumption of the people at the duty of 1s., will be of opinion with me, that circumstances might have occurred which would have made the levy of an 8s. duty exceedingly embarrassing and oppressive.

Now, Sir, with respect to the subject of finance. The noble lord laments, also, that I have brought forward no proposals for effecting a permanent taxation, in order to meet the present deficiency in the revenue. Again, I deeply regret that the noble lord has not taken the decision of the House on this point. I wish the appeal to be made to the deliberate judgment of all. Having been in possession of power three weeks,—having had, during that interval, the charge of forming the government, and of making all the arrangements of government,—having, of course, to devote some portion of time to the consideration of the foreign policy of the country,—I should wish to appeal to the House, whether I should bring forward at once a measure involving the permanent taxation of the country? And from whom does this charge come? What is the position in which I inherit office? For five years the gentlemen opposite have held power. In the year 1838, there was a deficiency between the revenue and the expenditure of £1,128,000; in 1839, there was a deficiency of £430,000; in 1840, there was a deficiency of £1,457,000; in 1841, there was a deficiency of £1,851,000; making a gradual accumulating deficit, on the 5th of April, 1841, of £5,166,000. In the year that ends the 5th of April, 1842, it is estimated, and estimated with lamentable truth, that the deficit for this single year will amount to £2,500,000; making a total deficit—an accumulation of deficit (if I may use such a phrase)—for the last five years, of £7,666,000.

I come to the administration of the finances. I have been in office for a month, and I am asked at once to propose a plan for the permanent taxation of the country. Is that fair or reasonable? And what lights have I to help me? If I adopted your budget, should I repair the deficiency! So far from it, that I proceed to show, as the noble lord has provoked me to this discussion, that even if your budget had realised all your expectations, you must still have proposed a vote of credit, in order to repair the deficiency, to the amount of at least £800,000. Fore seeing that there was to be a deficit of £2,400,000, you proposed your financial measures to repair this deficiency. You proposed to diminish the duty on Baltic timber, and to increase that on Canada timber, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer took credit for £600,000, to be derived during the present year from the change in taxation. Now I will prove, to the satisfaction of every one of you, that not 1s. of that £600,000 would be realised. I am not now discussing the commercial policy of an alteration in the timber duties; I am only considering a more limited question—the financial effect of such a proposition as it bears on the budget of the present year. Had I adopted your budget, then should I have escaped the necessity in which I am now involved? What says Lord Sydenham? He says, on the 24th of April, 1841,—"Great alarm is naturally felt by those engaged in the timber trade in Canada, at the prospect of any alteration in the duties levied on wood in the United Kingdom."

He says,—“The question must be resolved by parliament, according to the view it takes of the general interest.”

After some other paragraphs, which are not material, Lord Sydenham goes on to say,—“If any change should be determined on, disturbing the proportion of duty paid on colonial and foreign timber, care should be taken to diminish the loss to individuals by making it gradual, which is most just and politic; but, above all, I must express my hope, that, in whatever alteration is adopted, the recommendation of the committee of 1831, of which I was chairman, will be adhered to, namely, that the change should not affect the importations of the year; which would be an act of extreme hardship to the colony.”

I turn to the recommendations of the committee, of which Lord Sydenham was the chairman, and I find these are the recommendations to which he alludes:—“Resolved, that it is the opinion of this committee, that such reduction be made, so far as may be consistent with the interests of the revenue, without any augmentation of the duty on colonial timber.” “Resolved, that it is the opinion of this committee, that, in any alterations made, such alterations should not affect the shipments made in the year 1836.”

In the first place, I must observe, that the measure of the late Chancellor of the Exchequer was completely at variance with the recommendation of Lord Sydenham; for the committee of which he was chairman resolved, that in case of any relative alteration in the duty upon foreign and colonial timber, it should at least not take effect by way of an augmentation in the duty on colonial timber. The report is dated August, 1835, and it further recommends that, if any alteration should take place, such alteration should not affect the shipments of 1836; that is, Lord Sydenham, in August, 1835, recommends that the duty, as altered, should not take effect till 1837; and he, the Governor of Canada, responsible for the peace of that important colony, in April last, strongly recommends you to adhere to the recommendations of 1835. If you had done so, as I am confident you would, is it not as clear as day that not a shilling would have been received to meet the deficiency of the year ending April, 1842, from the alterations you proposed in the timber duties, and consequently, that the item of £600,000 must be absolutely struck out of the budget? Adding that £600,000 to the £800,000 to which I have before referred, there is an actual deficit of £1,400,000, for which there has not been even an attempt at provision.

I now come to the sugar question. From the alteration which was proposed in the sugar duties, the right hon. gentleman opposite calculated he would derive £700,000; that sum was to be raised in consequence of the importation into this country of foreign sugar, on which a duty of 37s. per cwt. was to be levied, being a differential duty of 12s. in favour of British sugar. From the reduction of duty on foreign sugar, £700,000 was to be raised. But there has been such a reduction in the price of British sugar, without the introduction of foreign sugar, that there is great reason to doubt whether, if the calculations of the right hon. gentleman were correct, any considerable quantity of foreign sugar would have been imported. The state of the market in sugar, the produce of British colonies, is very remarkable. It really does afford some satisfactory ground for entertaining a hope that the circumstances of the country are—slowly, I fear, but—gradually, already recovering. I won't speak with confidence; I earnestly hope it may be so. I have in my hand a statement of the weekly average prices of British muscovado sugar from the 4th of May to the 7th of September, 1841, compared with the corresponding period of 1840, exclusive of duty. It is as follows:—

I believe that in the first of these periods (1840) the average price of British sugar was not less than 50s. I have not the exact calculation of the averages, but I should think the average price was much more. I take the last six weeks included in the return from the 3rd of August, for each following week to the 7th of September. The price of British sugar per cwt., duty not being paid, was 57s. 4½d., 56s. 9d., 57s. 1½d., 58s. 1d., 58s. 3¾d., and 58s. 9d. Let me then compare the same weeks in 1841—37s. 7½d., 36s. 3¾d., 36s. 3d., 36s. 4½d., 36s. 3d., 34s. 8¾d. Compare, again, the last week of the year 1840, the week ending the 7th of September, with the corresponding period of the present year. The price of British sugar per cwt., for the week ending the 7th of September, 1840, was 58s. 9d., and for the same week in 1841, the price was 34s. 9d., being a reduction in the price of sugar of 24s. per cwt.; and the average price of sugar, since the 4th of May, if we take all the weeks, does not exceed 36s. 8d., being subject to a duty of 25s. The noble lord said that the lowest price at which foreign sugar could well be imported was 61s. Calculating its produce at 22s. per cwt., the duty of 37s. made it 59s., and we may add 2s. per cwt. on account of the increase of price which will arise from its admission to internal consumption; 61s., then, is the price at which foreign sugar can be profitably used. But the grower of colonial sugar has continued to supply you with sugar which, after paying duty, does not exceed 61s.; therefore little or no importation of foreign sugar would take place; and if that be so, what becomes of the £700,000 which was calculated to arise from the duty on foreign sugar? I won't strike off the whole £700,000, but I must strike off £500,000, and having got £1,400,000, not in hand, but exactly the reverse, and adding this £500,000, my deficit already amounts to £1,900,000, for which the late Chancellor of the Exchequer must have made provision, either by new taxation or by a vote of credit—I doubt not he would have preferred the latter.

Then I come to the question of corn. We were to raise the duty on corn to the amount of £400,000. But in order to justify the calculations of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the duty raised from corn alone must have amounted to £1,500,000.

Lord J. Russell.—No, no!

Sir R. Peel.—I beg the noble lord's pardon. I am speaking from my recollection of former debates, but I believe my statement will be found to be correct. The late Chancellor of the Exchequer said, that he estimated the produce of the customs in 1841 to be equivalent to the produce of the customs in 1840. Now, a portion of the customs duties in 1840 was £1,100,000 received from corn, and consequently that £1,100,000 must be added to the £400,000 for which the right hon. gentleman took credit in his budget; because, if there was any deficiency in the £1,100,000 received from corn in 1840, there would be a corresponding reduction in the customs duties of 1841. Therefore, unless you could raise £1,500,000 from corn, in 1841, the deficit, which I think I have already clearly shown amounted to £1,000,000, must have been still more largely increased; and, however cordial the co-operation which the noble lord may receive from those who sit behind him, yet, when I listen to what they state with respect to "the bread tax," and the injustice of subjecting to heavy duties that which forms the staff of the people's subsistence, they won't hear. I am sure, with very cordial satisfaction, that that part of the budget was to levy £1,500,000 on the food of the people. Indeed, although I know it is utterly impossible for me to expect the concurrence of honourable gentlemen opposite, they will say the advantage of trade, the regularity of commerce, will be greatly promoted by a fixed duty on corn; yet, if I could meet them privately, and ask whether they would, when wheat was at 83s. per quarter, have an importation of 1,000,000 quarters at a nominal duty of 1s., or at a fixed duty of 8s., divesting themselves of their political feelings, there can be no doubt which they would prefer. The Chancellor of the Exchequer took credit for a deficit of £2,500,000, although I have certainly had very little opportunity of considering these things, I have devoted some time to the inquiry whether or not that deficit of £2,500,000—supposing the present amount of the revenue continue—is, in point of fact, the whole deficit on which we may calculate; and I am bound to say to the noble lord that the prospects of future years are far from satisfactory. The Chancellor of the Exchequer struck out from the expenditure of the present year £400,000 for the operations in China; estimating for the future, he said he did not think we should be called on to provide anything like that sum in any future year. Are these expectations likely to be realised? I say nothing whatever of the policy of the operations in China; but I do ask if it is not probable that the demands made on us in future years for the expenses of these operations will far exceed £400,000? Here is the estimate of "the sum required to be voted in the year 1841, on account of the expenses of the expedition to China—£400,000." The expense already incurred appears, by the last return presented to parliament (No. 274), to have amounted, so far as it can be at present estimated, to £625,293. This paper is dated the 28th of May, 1841, and I venture to say the greater portion of the sum stated had been already incurred in October, 1840. Now, you have to provide for the expenditure which has accrued since October, 1840, and what means have you of judging of its amount? This is all the information the estimate gives—"N. B.—No accounts have been received from which an accurate estimate can be framed." I have read in the public papers some information on this point which appears to have come from tolerably good authority. With respect to the Chinese expedition, H. L. Fleming Senhouse, captain of her Majesty's ship Blenheim, writing from Amunghoy, March 10, 1841, states: "We have been exercising for eight months the most extreme and unparalleled forbearance and kindness to the Chinese, thereby incurring an expense of probably the full amount of the remuneration we are seeking."

Depend upon it, great additional expense will be incurred. I am not implying any opinion favourable or unfavourable on the political question; I refer now merely to its financial aspect, and I say no prudent Chancellor of the Exchequer, calculating the future expenditure of the country, will omit from his estimate the probable demands of the Chinese expedition. The noble lord wishes—or at least he makes a speech calculated—to produce unfavourable impressions, and add to the difficulties which encompass me on my introduction to office. I do not hesitate to say to the noble lord, I look with alarm to the growing tendency to expense in our colonial dependencies. Here is a paper which was presented the other day for the expenses of the civil establishment at Hongkong—£900,000 for the present year only; but I cannot say how much further, next year, the absolute necessity for increased establishments, which all colonial governors see more strongly than the treasury at home, may possibly carry it. This is the position in which I am called upon to estimate the probable expenditure of the country, and make adequate provision to meet it. I come now to New South Wales. I have read a despatch dated 31st January, 1841, from Sir George Gipps to Lord John Russell, in which he states that he has issued a great number of bounty warrants, the total number of persons emigrating being 71,315, and the estimated amount of bounties on them £979,562, payable in two years. The noble lord contemplates this demand with great alarm, and he rebukes the governor for incurring it. The noble lord most justly says—"The same mail which has brought to me this report of the commercial embarrassments of New South Wales, and of the over-trading and ill-advised system of credit to which you ascribe them, has also brought me your despatch of the 31st of January, 1841 (No. 29), on the subject of bounties on emigration. From that despatch I learn that you have given orders for bounty, payable within two years, for no less a sum than £979,562. This is a fact which has arrested my most serious attention, and which I cannot regard without deep anxiety. It will form the subject of a separate communication, which I shall address to you as soon as I am in possession of the results of certain inquiries which I have thought it right to institute. For the present, I can only express my earnest hope that the commercial embarrassments which you have depicted will have suggested to you the absolute necessity of abstaining from the multiplication of such orders. On the part of her Majesty's government, I must disclaim any responsibility for this proceeding, and any obligation to ratify your engagements to the enormous extent to which you have entered into them. On the other hand, as to the colony, it appears that at the moment of the commercial embarrassments to which you have referred, there were afloat in the market, bounty orders amounting to nearly £1,000,000 sterling, the whole of which, it is but too probable, the colonial treasury may be called upon to redeem. It is difficult to measure the effect which such an operation must have had in stimulating that reckless spirit of commercial enterprise to which you ascribe the disasters of the colony; but it is clear that the effect must have been very considerable. It is impossible to regard a financial operation of this kind as one in which the British treasury are not deeply interested: if proof of this were wanting, it would be abundantly supplied by the experience of the present year, in the case of South Australia."

Here we are, says the noble lord, in the greatest commercial embarrassments; and if it be lawful for a humble official instrument to imitate his superior, the governor acts upon the principle that the greater the financial embarrassment the more liberal should be the expenses of the colony! The noble lord checks that profuse expenditure, and insists upon the governor taking immediate means to recall the bounties; but, do what he can, he will not leave less than £500,000 to be provided for, some way or another. The colony is wholly unable to make the necessary provision, and the door at which the colony will knock does not require any specific indication. I hold the government responsible for the appointment of those instruments who have made engagements to the amount of nearly £1,000,000. Such are some of the items which I must consider, and I demand that the House will, in justice to the interests at stake, give me the opportunity of doing so. I have taken you from Hongkong to New South Wales; let us now come to South Australia. Such was the desperate state of that colony that, last year, we were called on to provide £155,000 to meet the expenses which had been incurred there. Since then, £14,000 has been incurred, for which no provision has been made. The bills have been protested on the British treasury, and I only fear we shall be obliged ultimately to pay the bills and the expenses of protest too.

I now come to New Zealand, and I find that bills to the amount of £33,000 have been drawn from New Zealand upon the treasury of New South Wales—that treasury which is without means of paying its own liabilities. But do not flatter yourself that this is half the demand; there are indications that £54,000 more such bills are on their way. Thus a sum of between £80,000 and £90,000 will be required to meet them. The estimate taken was, I believe, only £6,000.

Now, with respect to Canada. Since the budget was brought forward, what has taken place? There was distinct intimation that the credit of this country was to be guaranteed for a loan of £1,500,000. I do not question its policy; I am not questioning the propriety of adhering to engagements entered into under the circumstances in which Canada is now placed. But you have also guaranteed the application of £100,000 annually, for the fortification of Canada, for which no provision has been made.

Lord J. Russell.—Yes.

Sir R. Peel.—I thought the despatch from Lord Sydenham had been received subsequently to the presentation of the estimate. I give perfect credit to the noble lord for the vigilance he has shown in attempting to stop abuses, when they have become known to him, and the very proper rebuke he administered to the Governor of New South Wales; but, in detailing these various items of expense, for which no provision has been made, have I not preferred an almost conclusive claim as to the justice of permitting me to review all these subjects before I am called upon to provide for them? The noble lord says, parliament should not separate till some financial measure for the year has been brought forward. Would it not, first of all, be advisable, to see exactly the relations we may entertain—I hope an amicable settlement of our differences—with the United States? Before we can propose any general financial scheme, we should at least be allowed an opportunity of a few weeks, to consider the position in which we stand with respect to our commercial treaties with Naples, Texas, and the Brazils, and, above all, with France. I say nothing as to the policy of that treaty with France; but it is notorious that it was broken off in consequence of the quadruple treaty of July 15. There may be a disposition to resume the consideration of this subject; but, at least, will it not be absolutely necessary, before any permanent settlement of the revenue can be attempted, that we should exactly comprehend the position in which we stand on the subject of this commercial treaty? If that treaty should propose the admission of French brandy at a greatly reduced duty, is it not quite clear that such a measure must greatly affect taxation? It will undoubtedly affect the taxes levied both on British and colonial products, and on the wines of other countries. And will it be possible, maturely and satisfactorily to consider questions of this nature until you have first decided what are to be your commercial relations towards France? I have not yet had the slightest opportunity of reading any correspondence which has taken place with France in reference to these matters; other more pressing subjects will, for weeks, intervene to prevent me from doing so. Is not that, again, a conclusive reason why the House, whatever distrust any part of it may feel in the constitution of her Majesty's government, should not refuse the demand I made for time to consider of these things—a demand, not founded on considerations of personal convenience, but on a regard for the public good? Is it not the best course to bring these questions to a close at the time at which they are taken up? Is it not right that they should not be proposed on the responsibility of government, without some further time than has yet been afforded to my colleagues and myself for the purpose of considering these vast and difficult questions? The noble lord has done me justice, in a frank and handsome manner, with respect to the course I have pursued in advising the Crown as to the constitution of the government of Ireland; but if, already, I have attained some degree of confidence on that ground, let me remind the noble lord what were the confident predictions made, some time since, relative to the course which I should be obliged to take in framing the executive of that country. Was I not told, night after night, that I did not dare to form a government which would attract general confidence? Was I not told, that I must be the instrument—the reluctant and degraded instrument—of men who were ready to offer every insult to their Roman Catholic fellow-countrymen—to hoist the standard of ascendancy, and to demand from me complete and servile acquiescence in their views? That was predicted as the inevitable consequence of my accession to power; and yet, not a month has passed, when the noble lord admits that, over that difficulty, at least, I have triumphed; and that I have constituted the government of Ireland in a manner to give a guarantee that the universal people of that country will be treated with impartiality and justice.

Sir, I have made no concession, for the purpose of conciliating support in the House of Commons; I intend to administer the law with fairness, and, I hope, with firmness and vigour. I will not permit the administration of Irish affairs to be influenced by the hope of conciliating parliamentary support. From the confidence which the noble lord expressed, I have a right to say that the engagement into which I have entered, of administering impartial justice in the government of Ireland, shall, so far as depends upon me, be strictly carried out. The appointments I have made—the appointment of my noble friend, Earl de Grey, who, with great reluctance, was induced to undertake the important functions of his high office, and to withdraw himself from occupations and enjoyments most refined, most honourable, most creditable to every man of high station—the appointment of Lord Eliot—the appointment of my right hon. friend, Sir E. Sugden, to the Chancellorship of Ireland—do, I think, give guarantees, as strong as any public appointments can give, of my resolution to adhere to those declarations. My right hon. friend, the Chancellor of Ireland, as he was in the receipt of a pension for former services in that capacity, honourably acquired by him as some compensation for the sacrifice of his professional emoluments—although for a brief discharge of judicial duty—felt it incumbent upon him, conformably to the principles which have always actuated him, at once to resume the position he had before held in Ireland. But I do not hesitate to say, that if any circumstances had occurred to prevent the resumption of office by my right hon. friend, I would have selected from the Irish bar the Irish Chancellor—I would have paid that compliment to a profession which stands as high as any other in the empire. The noble lord, after having, not reluctantly, but at once, admitted, that I had triumphed over the difficulties which threatened my course with respect to Ireland, says, that on account of the composition of the government, and the menaces which have been held out in parliament, it will be impossible for me to perform my public duty on other questions which concern the domestic policy of the empire. I can assure the noble lord that it is my intention to act upon a sense of public duty, and to propose those measures to parliament which my own conviction of public duty shall lead me to think desirable. Sir, it is right that there should be a distinct understanding as to the terms on which a public man holds office. The force of circumstances, and a sense of duty to the country, have compelled me to undertake the harassing and laborious task, in the performance of which I now stand before you. What can be my inducement to undertake that task, and to make the sacrifices which it entails?—what but the hope of rendering service to my country, and of acquiring an honourable fame? Is it credible that I would go through the labours which are daily imposed upon me, if I did not claim for myself the liberty of proposing to parliament those measures which I shall believe conducive to the public welfare? I will claim that liberty. I will propose those measures; and I do with confidence assure this House, that no consideration of mere political support shall induce me to alter them. I will not hold office by the servile tenure which would compel me to be the instrument of carrying other men's opinions into effect. I do not estimate lightly the distinctions which office confers. To any man who is fit to hold it, its only value must be, not the patronage which the possessor is enabled to confer, nor the personal distinction it confers on him, but the opportunity which is afforded to him of doing good to his country. And the moment I shall be convinced that that power is denied me, to be exercised in accordance with my own views of duty, I tell every one who hears me, that he confers on me no personal obligation in having placed me in this office. Free as the winds, I shall reserve to myself the power of retiring from the discharge of its onerous and harassing functions, the moment I feel that I cannot discharge them with satisfaction to the public and the approval of my own conscience.

A long discussion ensued, and the House went into committee.

SUPPLY.—STATE OF THE COUNTRY.

SEPTEMBER 24, 1841.

The Order of the Day having been read for the House going into a Committee of Supply,—

Mr. J. Parker expressed his surprise at the continued silence of the right hon. baronet, as to the views which it was the intention of government to adopt on the subject of the Corn-laws. He thought the people had a right to know a little of the policy of the right hon. baronet on the important subjects which have been so long under consideration.

SIR R. PEEL.—Sir, I confess it appears to me that, if I were to take the advice of the hon. member for Sheffield, I should not give that satisfaction to the country which he requires me to give. For all that the hon. member demands is, that I should give a “little development” of my intentions. Now, I can really see no great practical advantage in a “little development.” It appears to me that the course which I propose to pursue is a much more rational one than that which the hon. member has suggested. The course I proposed to pursue, on being called, with my colleagues, to the administration of public affairs, to repair, if possible, some of the enormous embarrassments in which the country has been involved by the late government, so far as financial affairs are concerned,—was to ask from the House sufficient confidence to enable us to take a comprehensive view of the whole position of the country; and a short—a comparatively short—period (considering the importance of the questions to be discussed,) to mature our plans, and submit them to the consideration of parliament. That really appears to me to be a far more reasonable course than that I should make a “little development” of my views. Why, what should I say on the subject of the Corn-laws? If the Corn-laws are to be considered at all, is there any other alternative than that of fully stating the measure of the government? Is it not infinitely better that nothing should be said till the plan is maturely prepared, and ready for the consideration of parliament? What advantage would arise from merely hinting at details, and then postponing the consideration of them? It was only the other night that I was told, from the other side of the House, that nothing would be so unwise as to bring forward the discussion upon the Corn-laws without taking into account the question of the Poor-laws. I was told that these two subjects were so intimately connected, that I ought not to develop the views of the government with respect to one, without, at the same time, explaining them as to the other. Again: was I not told during the last session, that the consideration of the Corn-laws is essential to any wise system of finance—that finance is so interwoven with the Corn-laws that they could not be separated, and that the introduction of the Corn-laws into the budget had happened because the government thought they ought not to be disconnected,—that they must never be distinctly considered? If, then, the opinions thus expressed on the other side be correct, is it not perfectly clear that I ought, at the same time, to propose the plans of the government with respect to all these great questions, pressing, as they all equally do, for consideration? I stated, last session, that, if the opposition which I conducted should be successful, I would not be forced into a premature declaration of my opinions. Since that time, the opinion of the country has been taken, by an election, under the auspices of the late government; and, whatever may be said by hon. gentlemen opposite, the opinion of the country has been evinced in favour of the course which I pursued, and the reasonableness of the demand which I made. I distinctly stated that, if my opposition proved successful, I should not, on assuming power, immediately bring forward any financial plan; that I would ask for the temporary means of supplying the presumed deficiencies of the year; but that I would wait till I had prepared a matured measure. I said this before the late election,—the constituencies were well aware of it; yet the consequence of that election has been such, that her Majesty's late government could no longer continue in office. The hon. gentleman the member for Manchester says, that I maintain a perfect reserve. Well, but the country knew of that reserve,—the country demanded no more explicit declaration of opinion from me,—and, notwithstanding that reserve, the late government were left in such a minority that they were forced to abdicate. [Mr. Gibson, By the counties.]—The counties! the constituencies of this empire, as formed by the Reform bill of the noble lord opposite. But this is always the way. The moment the party opposite is unsuccessful,—the moment they are deprived of public confidence, and a declaration of public opinion is made against them,—a new Reform bill is threatened. It is said that the real opinion of the country is, after all, at variance with the result of the election. If that be so, how happens it that, although by reason of the change of government some thirty seats were vacated, and it became necessary for those members of the government to appeal to their constituents, not one, hitherto, has been defeated? Nay, more, with the single exception of that formidable opponent which was first offered to me, and then to my noble friend, on the part of the same individual candidate, not one of the members of the government have met even with an opponent. Certainly, the hon. member for Manchester has a right to make the most he can of his Mr. Acland, for he is the only opponent the government met with on the re-elections. [Cries of "Hear, hear!" and laughter.] To be sure, this formidable opponent was formally proposed and seconded.

Mr. Gibson.—And had the show of hands.

Sir Robert Peel. Oh, yes,—the show of hands; but he had such small confidence in that popular demonstration that he did not go to the poll. Now, it was not from any disrespect to the two hon. members who commenced the discussion, nor from any indifference to their representations, that I refrained from rising immediately after the hon. member for Manchester; but I think, after the discussion of the other night,—not at all, however, questioning the full right of the hon. members to take the course they have pursued, if they deem it proper,—yet I must say I think it is an unusual course to interrupt the committee of supply with a discussion which can lead to no practical result. I understood that the hon. member for Renfrewshire wished to make some statements of a peculiar character and importance affecting his constituents—statements which cannot have been listened to without pain; but I did not imagine that the hon. member intended to provoke a discussion upon the subject debated the other night. And, considering what the hon. member has said of the distress of his constituents, and all the sympathy which he has expressed for that distress, I must say that I am surprised he should have found time to concoct that laboured series of exceedingly bad jokes about musical instruments, by which it seems that he is desirous rather of the reputation of jocoseness and wagery, than of recommending himself to the gratitude of his constituents. The hon. gentleman convinces me, also, that, notwithstanding the prominent position he occupies, his counsel, as an adviser under the present difficult circumstances, is not altogether to be depended on; for the hon. gentleman says that he attributes a great part of the defectiveness of the existing constituencies to the retention of the old freemen in the boroughs; that, in the first instance, he was resolved not to maintain the rights of those old freemen, but that he ultimately did so; and the hon. gentleman gives no better reason, to justify the course which he took against his own resolve, than the personal obligation he felt to those freemen for having returned him to parliament on four successive occasions. This clearly proves that whatever course the temporary interests of his constituents may require him to take, will prevail over the enlarged views of his own mind. So far has the hon. gentleman carried this principle, that, having to repair the vessel of the state, he consented to vote for the insertion of that which, according to his own words, is a "rotten plank." This is the hon. gentleman's description of his own policy as a legislator; that, owing obligations to certain freemen, he purposely inserted a rotten plank in the vessel of the constitution. The hon. gentleman, therefore, will permit me to detract considerably from his authority, as a counsellor, after that declaration of his past course in reference to the interests of his constituents.

As I have said before, I deeply sympathise with the distressed portions of the population in certain parts of the country. I do not deny the existence of distress; which I believe to be most painfully felt in some districts. But it is most important that those upon whom the duties devolve of laying the foundation, if possible, of a remedy for those distresses, should not be driven into hasty and precipitate measures, in the hope of applying an immediate effectual remedy. I am certain that the deliberate sense of this country is, that those who are now intrusted with the administration of public affairs should have an opportunity of ascertaining to what causes the distress which prevails in some quarters of the land is attributable, before they attempt to devise measures to remove it. It is of very great importance that they should be enabled to ascertain, if possible, to what causes that distress is to be ascribed. I have heard those, who now are most actively engaged in anti-corn leagues, attribute that distress mainly to those very causes, for alluding to which her Majesty's government is now ridiculed, namely, the artificial stimulus which was applied to production by means of the excessive issue of bank notes. The chamber of commerce of the town which the hon. gentleman represents distinctly stated, in reference to manufactures, and to the manufacture of cotton in particular, that they were in a state of prosperity up to the year 1836. That prosperity certainly was co-existent with the present system of Corn-laws. But the chamber of commerce declared, that, in consequence of the misconduct of the Bank of England, followed by the misconduct of the joint-stock banks, there was, first, the most extravagant stimulus given to manufacturing speculations; advances were made by joint-stock banks to manufacturers and owners of cotton mills; machinery was placed in those cotton mills, the machinery and the buildings being assigned as a security for the advances. Then came a revulsion in trade; and then came a demand for money. The mills were stopped; and the security, being of little value, realised but a comparatively small sum. Those were said to be the causes of all the embarrassment and distresses of the manufacturers. But now it is alleged that the Corn-laws are the cause of all the mischief. I must declare, however, that I am morally certain that the evils are to be attributed to other causes. When, therefore, the hon. gentleman, in making a reference to free trade, asks me to come forward and propose a new Corn-law, I will ask him, in return, if he will be satisfied, now that corn can be admitted at 1s., that I should propose that the duty be not less than 8s.? I know very well that her Majesty's late ministers will allege, that had the 8s. duty been adopted before, the distress might have been prevented. But I will not enter into a retrospective argument. I will return to the subject before the House. You ask me for the sudden proposition of remedial measures; and I ask, in reply, whether you would be satisfied were I to propose the adoption of that remedy which has been heretofore propounded—namely, an 8s. duty, instead of a duty of 1s.? If you tell me that you would not be satisfied with that proposition, and that the increased duty on the importation of corn would only aggravate and extend the distress, you must admit that some other course must be adopted to remedy the evil.

The hon. gentleman asks me whether or not I deny the existence of the distress? Certainly not. I fear that in the manufacturing districts it has been very general, and that it has been most severe in certain places, particularly in those connected with the cotton manufactures; but while I express feelings of the deepest regret at its existence, I must say that I do not think it wise to take so desponding a view of it as some hon. gentlemen seem disposed to take. I do not believe, generally speaking, that the condition of this country is such as to forbid all hope of returning prosperity. Among the many documents which any person wishing to consider the position of this country would be naturally led to examine, even if from some of them no very lucid inference can possibly be drawn, there is one of great importance and value in regard to the kind of information which it conveys; and to such a document, of course, those who have the management of public affairs, and who must necessarily be impelled to ascertain the precise condition of the country, will direct their attention. The document to which I allude is "an account of the principal sums paid into the National Debt Office, and drawn therefrom, by the trustees of saving banks and friendly societies during the following periods." The hon. gentleman the member for Renfrewshire, referred to the friendly societies, and stated that they are unable to afford relief; and the hon. gentleman thereupon inferred that I must therefore calculate upon an universal system of private benevolence, for the purpose of supporting the poor and relieving their distresses. I am at a loss to discover from what the hon. gentleman draws such a wide conclusion; and I hope to be able to show that the hon. gentleman is wrong with respect to the friendly societies. I know how unsafe and unwise it is to lay one's self open to the charge of indifference to distress, by the attempt to correct mistakes of this kind. Yet, if misapprehensions and mistakes exist, they ought to be corrected. The savings banks will most probably be affected by causes similar to those which affect friendly societies; and although I do not deny the distress which now exists, I think that in the document which I hold in my hand I see indications which forbid the application of any instantaneous remedy. This document is an account of the principal sums lodged in the savings banks of the United Kingdom, from which it appears that in the month of June, 1841, the sum of £66,422 was paid in, while the amount drawn out was £86,364; exhibiting certainly this melancholy fact, that the sum drawn out exceeded the sum paid in by nearly £20,000. In July, however, the sums paid into the savings banks reached £125,917, and the sums drawn out were only £87,061. This is a most material change. In the month of August the deposits altogether were £100,033, and the sums drawn out £50,004 only. Now, let the House just observe, that in June the sums withdrawn exceeded the sums paid in by nearly £20,000; and that in the month of August the sums paid in exceeded those drawn out by £50,000, doubling in fact the withdrawals. I will not presume to say whether this remarkable change is partly or chiefly owing to the confidence engendered through the country in consequence of the change in the administration—[Cheers from the ministerial benches, and laughter from the opposition.] The hon. gentleman perhaps may think that I take rather an interested view of the matter; but I assure that hon. gentleman that one of my reasons for hoping for improvement in public affairs is the increased confidence of the country in the present administration. In that hope I am confirmed by this fact, which may be considered, perhaps, as only simultaneous with the change of ministry, and not in the nature of an effect resulting from a cause, that whereas in the month of July the sums drawn out of the savings banks were nearly £20,000 more than those paid in; when the presage of the change in the administration was about to be realised, the sums paid in exceeded those withdrawn by £50,000. I state the fact only; I draw no inference from it; but it constitutes an additional reason for not taking any rash or too sudden a step. Again, the sums paid in from the 28th of August up to the 11th of the present month amount to £32,325, and the sums drawn out to £20,850; showing another increase in the deposits. The hon. gentleman may say that these are not satisfactory indications of the condition of the working classes. I agree in such an opinion; but at the same time, the argument always has been, that the state of the working classes is pretty well demonstrated by the manner in which the small retail dealers find themselves affected by passing circumstances; and, perhaps, there cannot be a more satisfactory test of the state of the small retailers than the state of the savings banks, particularly in manufacturing districts. But it will be said by the hon. gentleman, perhaps, that this return is for the United Kingdom; and that, as it does not discriminate the manufacturing from the agricultural contributors, it is no evidence on the subject of manufacturing distress. That is true so far as that it is a return for the whole kingdom; and what I want, and what I mean to move for, is, a return discriminative of the contributions in the agricultural and manufacturing districts,—separate returns, in short, from each. I have, however, procured a return of the deposits paid into the savings banks in the manufacturing districts, embracing Lancashire, Yorkshire, Cheshire, Glasgow, Birmingham, Coventry, Nottingham, and Paisley, for the last three months; and the result is, that the gross total of the sums paid in was £123,329, while the amount drawn out was £114,378; still showing, even in the manufacturing districts, an increase in the deposits. I am quite sure that great distress exists in parts of Lancashire; but still a view of the question must be taken upon the general results, rather than upon particular features. Within the last three months, however, even in Manchester, the amount of deposits was £25,555, while that of sums drawn out was but £22,740. It is therefore of great importance that time should be allowed to ascertain where the pressure is felt, and to make some inquiry as to the cause of that pressure. I think the government have shown that they are not indifferent to the distress that exists, and the production of the present document may be taken as a proof that they are attempting to ascertain the position of the country for the purpose of considering, and not of denying, the distress. At the same time I deprecate that exaggeration which demands immediate and precipitate, and, I must say, as a consequence, delusive measures, for removing it. The hon. gentleman the member for Manchester, speaking of the reserve with which he charges me, mentioned a single instance in which that reserve was broken. The hon. gentleman was not very fortunate in his selection of an exception. He stated that in the town of Manchester a candidate came forward having inscribed upon his banners, "Cheap bread! no Corn-laws, no Poor-laws, and, high wages! Vote for Murray and Entwistle!" But the cry of "Cheap bread, no Corn-laws, no Poor-laws, and high wages," failed of success; whilst those who were prudent enough to follow my example and maintain a complete reserve, and who said to the country, "We will make no rash and precipitate declarations; we have confidence in the government, and will give them full opportunity for maturing proper measures," were successful. But the unfortunate candidate in the manufacturing district, who put forth on his banners "No Poor-laws, no Corn-laws, cheap bread, and high wages," was rejected. I will not pretend to say whether the addition of the words "No Whiggery" tended to produce that effect; but it has been said that possibly it did tend to his downfall. The hon. gentleman, however, in selecting that single instance of failure, rather proves to me that the country was content with the reasonableness of the proposition which I made—that they did approve of that reserve. Although in the course of debate our attention may have been called to these questions; although it is impossible to deny that we are familiar with finance, with the Corn-laws, and with the Poor-laws; yet my firm belief is, that the intelligent and thinking part of the community in the three kingdoms are of opinion that, on the constitution of a new government, under the auspices of one who has been excluded from power for more than ten years, it is a rational and just proposal, as conducive to mature deliberation as to the adoption of wise measures, that we should take time to make inquiries, and avail ourselves of the opportunities and sources of information which official power affords to us; and having inquired, and called the attention of parliament to the measures we have to propose, we should then leave it to parliament to determine whether those measures are founded on just and wise principles, or not; and whether or not they are likely to conduce to the permanent welfare of the country.

The House then went into Committee, several votes were agreed to, and the House resumed.

WAYS AND MEANS.

SEPTEMBER 27, 1841.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer submitted his financial scheme to the House, and proposed a series of resolutions for its adoption. In the course of the debate which followed, Mr. Hawes, Mr. Ewart, and Mr. W. C. Scott, implored the right hon. baronet not to allow parliament to separate without discussing the question of the Corn-laws, &c.

SIR ROBERT PEEL:—Sir, I hope the hon. gentleman the member for Lambeth, and the hon. member who followed him, as well as the hon. gentleman who spoke last, will not think that it is from any disrespect to them that I repeat my determination to adhere to the course I have already laid down on the subject under debate,—not to be driven to a premature development of my intentions during the present session of parliament. For I think it is more consistent with the duty which her Majesty's government owes to parliament and to the country, to consider calmly the state of affairs in all their bearings, and to make use of all the information which their position enables them to command, before they submit their measures to the opinion of parliament, than that I should bring them forward in a crude hasty form now, or, to use the expression of the right hon. gentleman the late Chancellor of the Exchequer, that if I did not give the country a full view of my plans, I should, at least, give it a glimpse of them. On that point I must again repeat my intention to adhere to my determination, as expressed the other night; and I must add, that I think the country would be less benefited than injured by such partial glimpses, as the right hon. gentleman wishes for. Such a course I consider more calculated to mislead the country than to set it right; and I doubt whether I should convince the hon. gentleman the member for Dumfries that I possess any firmness of character, if I departed from the course that I have laid down for myself on this occasion. The hon. gentleman has been pleased to say that force of character and superior intellect (which latter, he says, I possess) are seldom found combined in the same individual. I am much mistaken in my estimate of myself if I deserve the right hon. gentleman's panegyric; but he has one consolation, at least, if it be true, and that is, that if they are not combined in the same individual, they are combined in the same government. Sir, in the course of this debate, the late Chancellor of the Exchequer seemed to intimate that I was chargeable with a want of consistency with respect to my conduct now, and what it was when I was in opposition to the government. To that I will only reply, that it would imply very great inconsistency indeed on my part, if I were now to bring forward a charge of wanton and profligate expenditure against her Majesty's late government, while I offered no such opposition when on the other side of the House. The character of a government depends, in a great measure, on the nature and amount of its expenditure—on the foreign policy which it follows—and on the general measures it adopts; and I think it was quite impossible for an opposition to exercise any complete control over the expenditure of the country after particular measures had been adopted by the government. I shall exemplify this by putting a case in point. I shall take the case of China, for instance, as one of the most pregnant and apposite to my purpose. The late government adopted a certain course of policy with respect to that country; and the expenditure that may be necessary for the carrying out of that policy cannot be now foreseen. The present government, formed after the adoption of that system of policy, and bound by the circumstances of the case to carry it out, cannot, therefore, be charged with the expenditure that may be required. But it is quite consistent in an opposition to question the policy of the government, as well as the question of expenditure of its details. On that question, as on some others, I have found assistance where I had the least reason to expect it; and I have found it now on the other side of the House. The hon. member for Coventry has contrasted the estimates laid before this House in 1830, when my noble friend the Duke of Wellington was at the head of affairs, with the estimates of this year, as prepared by the late government; and the hon. gentleman has shown—I think very clearly—that the estimates of the Duke of Wellington's government, making every deduction for the unsettled state of Canada, and the expedition to China, exhibit a difference of £2,300,000 in favour of the country, as compared with those of her Majesty's late government for the present year. Now, it is very possible that the estimates lately presented by the hon. gentlemen opposite might be justified, on due explanation; but I certainly think that, on his own showing, the hon. gentleman has no grounds for withholding his confidence, on this point, from her Majesty's present government, or for expressing a doubt as to their economical intentions.

Mr. Williams.—I expressed no opinion on the subject.

Sir Robert Peel.—I do not care so much for the hon. gentleman's expression of opinion as I do for the decided proof he gave, in this instance, of his conviction what that opinion ought to be. I did not expect so much candour on the part of the hon. gentleman as to hear him state his confidence in the government; and I am not, therefore, disappointed; but I thank him, nevertheless, for offering such very strong and decided proofs as he has done in the course of his speech, that such confidence should be placed in her Majesty's government. The hon. gentleman then went on to say that a reduction of £5,000,000 could be made in the expenditure of the country. If so, the hon. gentleman cannot deny that men intrusted with the functions of the government should have a sufficient opportunity of considering how close, or whether at all, the hon. gentleman's statement approximates to the truth. The hon. gentleman says that £5,000,000 might be saved to the country; he cannot, therefore, object to our having time and opportunity to ascertain whether he is right in whole or in part—whether he is right even within 50 per cent. of that sum, for that amount would make up the deficiency at present existing. I agree, however, with the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that it is quite delusive to hold out to the country the hope of any such reduction; and all I can promise is, that her Majesty's ministers will give the most careful consideration to all the estimates, and that whatever reductions can be made, compatible with the efficiency of the public service, and consistent with the honour and interests of the country, they will make. But it is altogether delusive to make promises, off-hand, of any positive reduction; and it is not to be thought of that such reduction should be attempted without the fullest previous consideration. To hold out the expectation to the public that any reduction to the amount of the present deficiency is practicable, is to excite hopes that can never be realised. The hon. gentleman rests very much upon the reduction he suggests in the expense of collecting the revenue of the country, and he institutes a comparison between the present cost of collection and that for a former period—a comparison apparently very much to the disadvantage of the latter. But when this subject is looked at a little more closely, no such discrepancy will be found, and it will be seen that there is little or no analogy between the cases quoted. Formerly, the officers employed in the collection of the revenue were paid, principally, by fees. That mode, however, pressing onerously on trade, the present system of salaries was substituted, and fees were in all cases abolished. The officers are now paid by salaries alone; and though the expense to the country at large has been somewhat increased in consequence of the alteration, I will venture to say that trade and commerce have been more than commensurately benefited.

With respect to the course I mean to pursue, I cannot expect that it will meet with the approbation of the hon. gentlemen opposite; but I cannot believe that it meets with such universal condemnation as they have stated—I cannot fancy such a thing, or think so ill of the reformed House of Commons; because, if that was the case, hon. gentlemen would be more ready to take a division upon the subject. I cannot help coming to the conclusion, that, if the country at large were opposed to my view of affairs, there would be many more indications of that opposition than there have been. I only ask one favour of the hon. gentleman. I entreat him, now, to recollect, at some future period, his description of the state of the country such as it was when we came into office. He says that from week to week and from day to day there has been a gradual and decided depression in trade—that the workpeople cannot exist because the masters cannot afford to employ them—that debts cannot be recovered or payments made for want of means to meet them; and he draws a piteous picture of the stagnation of all kinds of trade, and the universal and complete prostration of business. I beg the House to recollect this description at some future period. In those districts of the country connected with that most important branch of our national industry, the cotton manufacture, I have often had to admit the existence of occasional distress; and, in doing so, I deeply lamented the fact, while I expressed a firm conviction that it was but temporary. But I must take leave to caution hon. gentlemen against the too frequent custom of giving exaggerated descriptions of that distress, because, while it is a departure from the fact, it is a circumstance also calculated to inflame the minds of the people, and excite them against all government. And I think it is important, in all cases of statements made to the House, that the truth should be told. In respect, therefore, to such statements, this is the course I mean to pursue. When I hear of any case of individual distress,—when the facts are given, and not a general statement,—I am resolved to institute thereupon an immediate inquiry into all the circumstances; and I shall avail myself, for that purpose, of the power placed officially at the disposal of the government, to probe the case to the bottom. If only vague, general descriptions of distress be offered, it will, of course, be impossible to make any inquiry of the kind; but wherever there is a case stated, with accompanying facts, into that inquiry shall at once be instituted. And I am sure you cannot better show your good will for the Poor-law commission, or their subordinate agents, than to make them the instruments of such inquiry. But the necessity for caution in making these statements of distress is strongly enforced by every circumstance that comes to my knowledge. One, for instance, I shall relate to the House, in exemplification of that necessity. In the course of a debate the other night, the hon. member for Ashton not only made a broad statement of the general distress of the manufacturing community, in the district in which he resides, but he also made a particular mention of the distress of an individual. These were his words. He stated that—"He (Mr. Hindley) had lately met with an individual, a working man, who had been obliged to go from master to master in consequence of the introduction of improvements in machinery. He had been last with a master who failed, and he was at present, in consequence, thrown out of all employment. He (Mr. Hindley) said, he was afraid that under these circumstances he must go upon the parish. The man answered, to the parish he had gone. He went to the parish of Royton, near Oldham, where he received from the overseer 1s. 6d. a week, to support a family of five persons. Was this right? Tell him not of party politics; he cared not what party was in power provided they consulted the good of the people. But what were the people to expect? The right hon. baronet told them that he should bring in a bill, yet that he would prevent these poor men from appealing from the merciless parsimony (he must call it so) of the overseer to the magistrates, or in any other quarter; that he must put up with this pittance, or go to a bastille. Before he sat down he must tell the right hon. gentleman that the great body of the people whom he represented were full of apprehension for the future and of suffering at present; and he implored the right hon. baronet to take these matters into his deepest consideration."

Now, Sir, in the course of this day, I received the following letter in reply to the statement of the hon. member; and, as I have read the one, I will, if you please, read the other:—

OLDHAM, Sept. 21, 1841.

Right Honourable Sir,—At the petty sessions in Oldham yesterday, I called the attention of the overseer of Royton to the inclosed statement in the Times newspaper, which, after reading in the presence of myself and two other magistrates, he pronounced to be absolutely untrue. He also added that the Standard had been handed to him a day or two before, which contained a similar account, and that he had written to Mr. Hindley on the subject on Wednesday. I may say that I am in constant communication with overseers, having the charge of something like a population of 30,000 in the two counties of Lancaster and York, and can state that no similar circumstance has come under my knowledge.

To the Right Hon. Sir. R. Peel.

Now, here is a case of distress particularly stated,—a case of a man with a large family, supporting himself and them on only 1s. 6d. a week, not only wholly denied, but, in addition, it is asserted that no such occurrence has taken place, not alone in the neighbourhood, but in the district in question. The House will, therefore, come to the conclusion, I am sure, that, when such statements are not borne out by irrefragable facts, it would be far better to forbear from making them, and much wiser to avoid exciting, by such means, the feelings of an irritated people, unless, indeed, hon. members be fully satisfied of their entire truth. I can sympathise with the patience of the people under no ordinary distress, and I can admire their fortitude and forbearance under severe suffering; that forbearance confers honour on them and upon our national character; but this should only make us the more cautious that we do not aggravate that suffering, by superadding to it dissatisfaction, which must be the inevitable result of making statements of this description not founded on fact.

Resolutions put and agreed to, and the House resumed.

On Thursday, Oct. 7, 1841, parliament was prorogued to Thursday, Feb. 3, 1842.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO THE SPEECH.

FEBRUARY 3, 1842.

The Earl of March moved, and Mr. Beckett seconded, the Address in reply to her Majesty's Speech.

Lord John Russell signified his concurrence in the main portion of the Address, and thought, that whatever differences might hereafter arise, there was nothing to prevent the House on the present occasion from coming to an unanimous vote.

SIR ROBERT PEEL: I cannot be surprised, though I am gratified, to hear the noble lord who has just sat down, express his feeling that we should unanimously concur, whatever may be our present divisions, or our prospect of future conflicts, that we should cordially concur in presenting an Address to her Majesty, conveying to her Majesty the heartfelt congratulations of this House on the event which has recently occurred, and has given new stability to the throne and constitution of this country. I have purposely abstained, with my colleagues, having long held that opinion, that there was great inconvenience in forcing the House, on the first day of its assembling, to a division, without the means which formerly existed of ascertaining the sentiments to be contained in the Address, from taking that course, and from calling on the House to pledge itself to the support of certain measures; and, therefore, we did undoubtedly purposely frame the Address in a manner which we hoped would not unnecessarily produce a collision. We felt perfectly certain of the unanimous concurrence of the House in that part of the Address which congratulated her Majesty on a recent event; and we felt perfectly convinced that if that event has completed the domestic happiness of her Majesty and her illustrious consort, it has also added to the private and domestic happiness of every family in this country. The noble lord has very lightly touched on those parts of the Address which referred to the foreign correspondence of this nation, and in all of them he expressed his readiness to concur; he expressed his satisfaction at the conclusion of a treaty with the court of Teheran, and at the prospect of the establishment of amicable relations between Persia and this country. I think that I should not refer to that subject without bearing my testimony to the cordial co-operation which the diplomatic agents of this country received from the minister of Russia in his exertions. But I am bound to say, that I trust it is the good sense of the court of Teheran, and the sense of the common interests involved in the question in dispute, which have induced that court to accede to our advances and proffers, and that the establishment of our friendly interest is attributable to its own right and proper feeling. The Emperor of Russia, however, I must add, has exhibited every desire, by means of his agent, to influence the court of Teheran to re-establish its amicable relations with this country. The noble lord, in his speech to the House, seemed to intimate some doubt upon the policy of sending a special mission to the United States of America; but he should bear in mind, that some of the causes of difference between the United States and this country have long existed—that the attempts on the part of the various governments, by means of correspondents, however able they may have performed their duties, to bring them to a satisfactory conclusion, have been unsuccessful—that the continuance of these unfortunate causes of discord leads to fresh and increasing difficulties. These considerations it was which induced the government, without implying the slightest censure on the very able minister now in the United States, to send a person whose high station in the councils of this nation pointed him out as the fittest person to be selected, and who, possessed of the views and intentions of the government, might go at once to the United States, and attempt, by some other mode than that which had hitherto been resorted to, and which has not been successful, to effect that which would be a great object to attain for the interests of humanity and civilization throughout the world, namely, the restoration of a perfectly friendly and cordial relation with the United States; or, I should rather say, the termination of the existing differences. But if our friendly relations can be altogether re-established, I say, that it will not only be for the interest of the two countries, but for the general interests of humanity and the civilized world. Lord Ashburton, in undertaking the duty which has been imposed upon him, has been influenced by a sense of public duty, sacrificing his own feelings and views, but he shared in the feelings and views of the government; and, considering the position in which that noble lord stands with regard to the United States, and the estimation in which his respected name is held there, we felt that no more welcome messenger than that noble lord could be found. I am not aware of any other subjects connected with the foreign policy of the government to which the noble lord has adverted. He referred with some warmth to the plans of the government for the relief of the domestic embarrassments of this country. He said, that he had heard various schemes suggested, and that he was pleased to find that no reference was made to any of them in her Majesty's speech. He said, that a plan of general emigration had been spoken of, but that it appeared to have been put forth without any authority; but I think that the noble lord might have gained sufficient experience in public affairs, and in the conduct of a government, to know that, because measures are imputed to the executive government, it does not, therefore, necessarily follow that they are in serious contemplation. The noble lord, I think, will agree with me, that it is not because a paragraph appears in a newspaper, imputing an intention to a government, that, therefore, that intention should be denied; and I think he will not deny, that such a course would be extremely inconvenient, because, if adopted in one case, silence in another might appear to show acquiescence, and the executive government would at length have little else to do than to contradict reports of their presumed intentions. The noble lord, however, has referred to certain dramatic reports which have appeared, of interviews which I had with some delegates on the part of the manufacturing population of this country. I confess that I am rather surprised that the noble lord should speak with so much asperity of Socialist editors. The government, undoubtedly through inadvertence, may have been deceived, but they did not, at all events, encourage those who came to them to expect the high honour of presentation to her Majesty. It is perfectly true, that I for one had an interview with a body of persons, who requested an interview, as a deputation from the manufacturing classes of the north. I do not know what course the noble lord would have advised me to pursue. Would the noble lord have thought it becoming in me to decline it until I had first ascertained the private characters and the political opinions of those who composed the deputation? I had no notice of those names; but even if I had, I should have received them without making the slightest inquiry as to the political opinions they professed. I saw the persons who called upon me, and who succeeded in deceiving me so far, that on entering the room I believed them to be a deputation as represented—a belief which was strengthened by the perfect knowledge of the subject on which they came to speak—a knowledge which indicated a practical and daily connection with the manufactures of the district from which they came. I conversed with them; but I am no party to the publication of what took place. They never consulted me as to whether or not the report was correct; and I must say I deprecate the publication of conversations with a minister, without first ascertaining from him whether he acquiesces in the accuracy of the report. Surprised as I was to find that a lengthened and detailed report of what had passed had been published, I am innocent of any intention to derive an advantage from the dramatic effects of which the noble lord spoke; and, until I saw that these persons were editors of a newspaper, I remained under the pleasing delusion, that I had been talking to working men, deputed by their brother workmen to give an account of their sufferings. With respect to the poor-law, I think the apprehensions excited in the mind of the noble lord, by the declarations made in the newspapers, might have been dispelled by the memory of the course taken by the government during the last session, and by the recollection of that which had so recently occurred in the House. I now approach that portion of the Address which involves subjects of the utmost consideration. I am sure the House will not expect me now to enter into any details with regard to those questions. The debate of this evening, the reading, by the Speaker, of her Majesty's Speech from the throne, was preceded by an intimation given by me, that I would, on the first day that was consistent with the convenience of the members of the House, submit the views of her Majesty's government on that important subject. I have given notice that I shall submit a motion on this subject; to any discussion of it, therefore, either directly or collaterally, on this occasion I am opposed, and I must postpone any further observation upon it till proper opportunity shall arise on my bringing forward the motion of which I have given notice. On behalf of my colleagues and myself, I may say, that we had hoped to have disclosed the whole of our financial and commercial policy together, and to have submitted at once to the House all the measures which we propose to take with reference to these subjects. I am precluded from doing so by considerations of public duty, although, on the part of the government, and as far as I and my colleagues are concerned, I am prepared to do so. When the House separated for the recess, and with the expectation that the recess would be long, I gave a pledge, on the part of her Majesty's government, that the recess should be occupied in carefully reviewing all the great questions which then pressed for a thorough investigation. I undertook that all those great questions should have a full attention; I undertook that they should all undergo a careful review; I undertook, also, that after the recess no unnecessary delay should take place, but that her Majesty's government would be prepared to explain their views, as well as the means to be adopted for the practical application of those views, and of the principles on which they are founded, I gave that pledge. I now ask no further delay than is essentially necessary to enable us to bring forward our measures in the mode laid down by the forms of this House. I propose to submit the financial measures of her Majesty's government as soon as the votes of supply can be taken in committee of supply, so as to enable us to proceed in committee of ways and means, when we shall fully discuss the whole subject. I do not, then, ask for delay; I do not intend to postpone the announcement of the budget, as it is called, to that period of the year at which it is usually brought forward. Indeed, so far as concerned the convenience of her Majesty's government, we are prepared to state to the House now the measures with reference to the commerce and finance of the country which we mean to propose; and, as I have said, I should have wished to state the nature of those measures simultaneously with the views which we have arrived at on the subject of the Corn-laws; but I think that there would be disadvantage to the public interests in postponing the consideration of the Corn-laws, and that it would be better that her Majesty's government should propose to the House their views relative to those laws on Wednesday next, and postpone the remainder of the financial and commercial policy until the House is prepared to vote the usual provision for the service of the year, in committee of ways and means. There certainly would have been considerable advantage in her Majesty's government having the power of disclosing the whole of their policy at once. That advantage, therefore, I must forego: and, as I have said, I shall next week move, as I have given notice, on the subject of the Corn-laws. As soon, also, as I have obtained some votes in committee of supply, I will, on the earliest possible day, state the views of the government as to the financial situation of the country. I trust that the House will approve of the fairness of the course which I have adopted, on the part of my colleagues and myself, in redemption of the pledge which I gave on the separation of the House last session. We have carefully considered the state of the country, and we have instituted such inquiries as we thought necessary for the purpose of obtaining information; and we are now prepared to submit to the House such measures as we think that the interests of the country require. They shall be submitted to the House as is requisite as regards the responsibility of the government for them. Looking, then, at the various complicated interests of the country, and the difficulties attending our financial situation, we are prepared to state, that these are the measures which, to the best of our judgment, we thought ought to be adopted; and it will be for the House of Commons to determine, when they hear our statements, whether its views concur with ours, and whether it is prepared to ratify these measures, or to adopt other measures for the relief of the country from its present difficulties, and for the promotion of industry and commerce, submitted to it by those who differ with us as to the view of the state of affairs.

Address agreed to, and a committee appointed to prepare and draw up the same.

CORN-LAWS.—MINISTERIAL PLAN.

FEBRUARY 9, 1842.

SIR R. PEEL rose, and moved that the paragraph in her Majesty's Speech relating to the Corn-laws be read.

The motion being agreed to,—

The Clerk at the table read the following paragraph in the Speech from the Throne:—"I recommend also to your consideration the state of the laws which affect the import of corn, and of other articles, the produce of foreign countries."

SIR R. Peel next moved, that the House resolve itself into a committee, to consider the laws relating to the import of corn.

The House accordingly resolved into committee, and Mr. Greene, the chairman of committees, having taken the chair,—

SIR R. Peel again rose, and spoke as follows:—Sir, I rise in pursuance of the notice which I have given, to submit to the House the views of her Majesty's government with respect to the modification and amendment of those laws which regulate the import of foreign corn. I should consider it a reflection on this House were I to prefer any claim on its patience and indulgence. Whatever demands I might have to prefer, and however unqualified I may be to relieve a subject necessarily one of detail, necessarily abstruse, by any illustrations of fancy, yet I am convinced that the paramount importance of the subject itself, will induce the House to lend me that patient attention for which, under other circumstances, I might have deemed it necessary to appeal to its indulgence. I am aware of the difficulties which encompass the subject I am about to bring under the consideration of the House. With regard to a matter in respect to which such adverse opinions prevail, it is difficult to discuss it without making statements or admissions which will be seized on by those who entertain opposite opinions; but I feel that the best course I can pursue, is to submit to the House the considerations which influenced the judgment and decision of her Majesty's government, and to leave them to be decided on by the reason, moderation, and judgment of parliament. I am confident that the course which her Majesty's government have pursued in bringing forward this measure, whatever may be the differences of opinion as to its nature—I am confident that that course at least will meet with general approbation. If her Majesty's government deemed it right to submit a measure of this character to the consideration of parliament, it was due to the importance of the subject that the attention of parliament should be called to it in the Speech from the Throne. It was due also to the importance of the subject, that her Majesty's government should undertake, on their own responsibility, to propose a measure for the adjustment of this question, and that no interval which could be avoided, should be allowed to elapse between the recommendation contained in the Speech from the Throne, for consideration of the subject by parliament, and the proposal of the measure itself. The only object which I shall aim at, in bringing this subject under the consideration of the House, will be to state as clearly and as intelligibly as I can, the considerations which have influenced her Majesty's government in reference to the nature of the measure I am about to propose. One other object I shall aim at—namely, to discuss this question, affecting such mighty interests, in a temper and spirit conformable with its great importance, bearing in mind how easy it is, on each side, to raise exaggerated apprehensions, and find inflammatory topics by which the feelings of the people may be excited. Her Majesty's government have deemed it their duty to consider the Corn-laws, with a view to their modification and amendment. They undertake the consideration of this question at a period when there is commercial distress, and when there exist great suffering and privations connected with that distress. But I feel it my duty, in the first place, to declare that, after having given to this subject the fullest consideration in my power, I cannot recommend the proposal which I have to make, by exciting a hope that it will tend materially and immediately to the mitigation of that commercial distress. While I admit the existence of commercial distress—while I deplore the sufferings which it has occasioned, and sympathise with those who have unfortunately been exposed to privations, yet I feel bound to declare that I cannot attribute the distress—to the extent in which it was by some supposed imputable—to the operation of the Corn-laws. I do not view with those feelings of despondency, with which some are inclined to regard them, the commercial prospects of this country.

I do not believe that the resources of our commercial and manufacturing prosperity are dried up. I do see a combination of causes, acting concurrently and simultaneously, sufficient, in my opinion, to account, in a great degree, for the depression which has unfortunately prevailed among the manufacturing and commercial interests of this country; and I have that reliance on the native energies of this country, and I have had such frequent experience of preceding depressions and revivals almost as sudden and extraordinary as the depression which has recently occurred, that I do entertain a confident hope and belief that we may still look forward to the revival, by the operation of natural causes, of our commercial and manufacturing prosperity. It is impossible, I think, to take a review of the causes which have affected that prosperity, without perceiving that there have been in operation, during the last four or five years, several causes, the separate effect of which would have been considerable, but the concurrent effect of which is sufficient to account for the depression which has taken place. If you look at the stimulus which was given, partly, I think, by the facilities of credit, to great undertakings in 1837 and 1838; if you look to the connection which existed between the directors and parties concerned in joint-stock banks and the manufacturing establishments; if you look at the immense offers made for the increase of manufactories, and for the building of houses for the reception of those who were to labour in those manufactories; if you look at the immigration of labour from the rural districts into districts the seats of manufactures, and the vast increase of mechanical power which took place in consequence in the years 1837 and 1838, you will hardly be surprised to find that the result which has before attended similar excitement and stimulus should again ensue. The same causes which operated here to produce depression, operated also in the United States at the same time. The derangement of the monetary affairs of the United States has acted powerfully on the demand for our manufactured produce, and, concurrently with the depression in this country, has had the effect of diminishing the demand for British manufactures. There has been at the same time an interruption of our amicable relations with China, which has been the cause of a considerable deficiency in the exports to that country of our manufactured goods within a recent period, as compared with previous periods. There have been also up to a recent period an alarm of war in Europe, and that stagnation of commerce which, in some degree, is inseparable from such a state of things. The united effect of these causes goes far, in my opinion, to account for that depression in our prosperity which has created so much regret. I am admitting the extent of that depression; and I am equally disposed to admit the extent of the privations and sufferings which have resulted; but I feel bound again to declare, that I cannot recommend the measure which I am about to propose, by exciting a hope that any alteration of the Corn-laws will be a remedy for some of the evils which, in a great manufacturing country like this, seem inseparable from the system. Extend your foreign commerce as you may, depend on it that it is not a necessary principle that the means of employment for manual labour will be proportioned to the extent of your commerce. Whatever may be the extent of your commercial prosperity, whatever may be the demand for your manufactures, it is impossible not to feel that coincident with that general prosperity, there may exist in particular districts the severest partial distress.

This must have been the case at periods of the greatest commercial and manufacturing prosperity. The necessary consequence of the sudden employment of machinery, diminishing the demand for manual labour, must be to expose in certain districts of the country those who depended for support on manual labour, to great privations and suffering. You find hundreds of persons occupied in a great manufacturing establishment. Their reliance for subsistence has been placed on their labour in that establishment; but by an exercise of ingenuity some improvement in machinery is suddenly devised, and copied by others, which has the effect of depriving those who have relied on manual labour for subsistence of employment. This has been the case with the handloom weavers, and with many parties engaged in manufactures. It is the hard condition, inseparable from a manufacturing country, that there must be such revulsions in the demand for manual labour; and it is not an impeachment, therefore, of any commercial system that great privations and sufferings exist. Let it not be supposed that I am deprecating the exercise of skill and the improvement of mechanical power. It would be madness to attempt to check them. It would be folly to deny that in the aggregate this country has derived a great source of strength from such improvements in manufactures. The attempt to obstruct them would have the necessary effect of encouraging competitors and rivals, already too formidable. In referring to instances of distress, inseparably connected as it appears to me with such development of skill and improvement in machinery, I do not do so for the purpose of impeaching that skill or deprecating that improvement, but for the purpose of discouraging the too sanguine hope that any extent of legislative interference can exempt you from the occasional recurrence of distress. In proportion to the manufacturing excitement—to the stimuli to which I have referred—the stimuli of speculation—of facilities for undertakings created by undue advances and credit—in that proportion must you expect that in certain districts those privations to which the attention of parliament has been called, will occur. But looking at the general state of the commerce of this country, I neither see grounds for that despondency, with which some are in the habit of viewing it, nor can I see any ground for imputing to the operation of the Corn-laws, as some do, any material share in the evils at present existing. I think we are too apt to assume that there must be a constant and rapid increase in the amount of our exports to other countries, and we are too apt to despond when we find any occasional check in the amount of our exports. We decline to compare the extent of our commerce in the last year with a period of time more distant than the preceding year. We insist on comparing it with the year immediately preceding; and if there appears a decline we are too apt to apprehend that the sources of our prosperity are dried up. At all periods of our commercial history there have been these alternations of prosperity and depression. The latest period to which the returns respecting our trade are fully made up will include the year 1840, and comparing the state of trade in 1840 with its condition in preceding years, during the operation of the Corn-laws, I see no ground for the inference sometimes drawn, that the Corn-laws are the cause of our misfortunes, and that the repeal or alteration of them will supply an immediate remedy. In 1840 the exports of British produce and manufactures to all parts of the world exceeded the exports of 1837 by £9,355,000. I am speaking now of declared value. The exports of 1840 exceeded those of 1838 by £1,345,000 and fell short of the exports of 1839 by £1,827,000, a falling-off sufficient no doubt, to create anxiety and unpleasantness. But the causes of that falling-off are amply accounted for, by referring to the state of commercial transactions with the United States—a country with whose prosperity our own was so intimately interwoven. There, during that period, there were causes operating, connected with the monetary derangement, sufficient to account for the cessation of the American demand. I have stated that in 1840 as compared with 1839, there was a deficiency in our general exports of £1,827,000 declared value. But in 1839 there was an export to the United States of goods to the value of £8,839,000; whereas in 1840 the total amount of exports to that country was only £5,283,000; thus showing a diminution of our exports to the United States in 1840, as compared with 1839, to the extent of £3,556,000. That fact, therefore, is sufficient to account for the falling-off in the general amount of exports in the year 1840 as compared with 1839. The falling-off in the amount generally was greatly less than that in the amount taken by America, and the difference was consequently made up by an extension of our commerce with other parts of the world. It is very satisfactory, Sir, for example, to view the progress of our colonial trade. In 1837 the exports to the colonies were £11,208,000 in value; in 1838 they were £12,025,000; in 1839 they were £14,363,000; in 1840 they were £15,497,000. Let us look also to the state of our commercial transactions with those countries in Europe which are the chief sources of our supply of food. Let us look at the state of our export trade with Germany, with Holland, and with Belgium. In 1839 the value of our exports to those three countries, the chief sources of our supply was £8,742,000; in 1838 it was £9,606,000; in 1839 it was £9,660,000; in 1840 it was £9,704,000. So that even with respect to those countries from which we derive our chief supply of grain, when we stand in need of it, which are supposed to be such formidable competitors in manufactures, and from which the demand for British produce and manufactures is supposed to be so rapidly diminishing, on account of our exclusion of their products, it still appears, on the whole, that there has been a progressive increase in the amount of our commerce carried on with them. I cannot, therefore, infer that the operation of the Corn-law is to be charged with the depression which is at present so severely felt in many branches of trade; I see other causes in operation which are sufficient, in a great degree, to account for the evils no one can deny to exist. In considering then, Sir, those modifications of the Corn-laws which it may be desirable to effect, it is important to review the proposals that have been made for this end. Various opinions are entertained with respect to the Corn-laws. There are some who will admit of no modification whatever in those laws as they now exist. My firm belief is, that that party in this country is exceedingly limited in number. I do believe that among the agriculturists themselves there is a prevailing feeling that the Corn-laws may be altered with advantage.

So far as I can collect that feeling from the communications which have been made to me, I must say I think that the impression among the agriculturists is in favour of modifying those laws in certain respects. There are others who entertain a decidedly opposite opinion, who will not hear of a modification, but insist on the immediate and absolute repeal of the Corn-laws. Sir, it is impossible not to feel that those who advocate the repeal of every impost of every kind upon the subsistence of the people are enabled to appeal to topics which give them a great advantage—to urge that there is a tax upon bread, a tax upon the subsistence of the people—to urge that that tax is maintained for the protection or advantage of a separate class. He who urges arguments of this kind must, of course, make a considerable impression upon those who listen to him. A comparison is made between the dearness of food in this country, and the cheapness of food in some other countries, and the inference is immediately drawn, that the people of this country ought to be placed upon the same footing in respect to the articles of subsistence, and that their condition will be benefited by the reduction of the price of food to that rate at which it can be purchased in other countries. Sir, it appears to me that any conclusion founded upon such a position will be altogether erroneous. The question is, can you infer the comfort and ease of the people from the price which they pay for their food? Reference is made to the price of food in Germany, and to the facility which the low price of sustenance gives for the establishment of manufactures; and the inference is hastily and unwisely drawn that the people of this country would be placed in a situation of greater comfort if the price of food should undergo a corresponding reduction, if it should be equalized with the price prevailing in Germany. Now, I apprehend the true question is, not what is the price of food, but what is the command which the labouring classes of the population have of all that constitutes the enjoyments of life, whether these be necessities or luxuries, partaking, in point of fact, from the universal prevalence of consumption, of the nature of necessities? Now, let us compare the condition of the labouring classes in this country, under the operation of the Corn-laws, with their condition in other countries in which, I admit, the price of provisions is greatly less. There is nothing to impede the cultivation of corn in the Prussian states, in which its price is greatly lower than in this country. But can it be thence inferred that the condition of the people in the Prussian states is preferable to the condition of the people in this country, or that the consequence of an immense reduction in the price of various articles, and particularly in the price of food, must necessarily lead to a great increase in the comforts and enjoyments of the labouring classes in this country? Sir, there are means, from sources I apprehend of unquestionable authority, for forming a judgment as to the comparative degree of comfort enjoyed by the people of the two countries I have mentioned; and, before you determine that a low price of provisions is necessarily essential to manufacturing industry, general consumption, or to the comforts and enjoyments of the people, it will be well to weigh the materials of which you are possessed for forming a judgment on the subject.

Sir, in the report of the committee which sat for the revision of the import duties, there is evidence upon this point given by the hon. gentleman, the member for Bolton, whose attention has been directed to this subject, who has collected the materials of information and comparison, and who, before that committee, as well as in the report which he made on the Prussian League, on the state of our commercial relations with Prussia, and the laws which exist in that country with reference to trade, has made statements as to the comparative consumption of the people of this country and the inhabitants of the Prussian states. Let us look to the great articles of consumption. I will begin by admitting that meat is dear in this country; that corn is dear; and that the other great articles which constitute the sustenance of the people and add to their comforts, are dear; that they are much higher in price in this country than in Prussia; but, as I said before, it appears to me that the true test is not the comparative lowness of price, but the command which the people have over all that constitutes comfort and enjoyment. I will begin, then, with meat, and I will quote no authority which can be suspected—I will take my information from a perfectly unobjectionable source. I will refer to one who differs entirely from me with regard to the operation of the Corn-laws, and who is a decided advocate for their repeal. Dr. Bowring's calculation with respect to the consumption of meat was made in 1840, and given in his report on the Zollverein. The hon. and learned gentleman spoke on a state of things in this country when the Corn-laws had been in operation for nearly thirty years, affecting, as they must have done, if it was their tendency to produce such effects, the comfort of the people, and consequently the means of consumption within their power. Dr. Bowring then says, that in Prussia, —and I beg the House will remember that the means of ascertaining the exact proportion are believed to exist,—14,000,000 inhabitants consume in one year 485,000,000lb. of meat, that is, 35lb. per head. The hon. and learned gentleman says again, that in this country 25,000,000 persons consume 50lb. per head yearly; that the quantity cannot be less than 50lb.; and that it has been frequently estimated at 100lb. I take the lowest calculation, from which the House will observe it appears that while the inhabitants of Prussia consume but 35lb. per head, those of the British empire consume at least 50lb. I am not attempting to deny, by the quotation of these facts, the severity of that distress which prevails in many parts of the country. I could not have attended the discussions which have taken place without feeling a perfect conviction that in Paisley and many other places there is a fearful amount of distress. Do I mean to say, for instance, that the 17,000 persons in Paisley, who are supported by charitable contributions, consume meat to any thing like the extent I have stated? Not at all; but it is impossible to argue on this subject without drawing general inferences from general statements. I must not be taunted with the remark that individuals at Paisley, Stockport, and other places, do not consume 50lb. of meat per year. I admit they do not; but in drawing general conclusions, with reference to legislation, you have no other alternative than to deal with general averages and general results. I ask you again, before you determine that high prices are necessary evils, to compare the consumption of sugar in this country with that of other European states. I rely entirely on the authority of the hon. and learned gentleman. The hon. member states the consumption of sugar in France at 4½lb. per head annually; I will say 5lb., as there may be some increase which he has overlooked. In the states of the German League, it is 4lb.; in Europe generally, 2½lb.; while the consumption of Great Britain is calculated by the hon. gentleman at 17lb. per head. Taking next the consumption of wheat, I find that Mr. Deacon Hume, a gentleman whose loss I am sure we must all sincerely deplore, states the consumption of this country to be one quarter of wheat for each person. Dr. Bowring calculates that 24,000,000 of inhabitants in Great Britain consume 45,000,000 quarters of all kinds of grain. I beg the House to recollect, that I take the estimate of two gentlemen possessed of ample means of information, and entertaining views on this question which free their testimony from all suspicion. Mr. Hume, then, made our consumption one quarter of wheat per head. The hon. gentleman (Dr. Bowring) allows nearly two quarters of grain to each individual. In the Prussian States, he says, 14,000,000 of inhabitants consume 13,000,000 quarters of grain, being less than one quarter to each person. Again, while Mr. Hume allows one quarter of wheat per head in England, the hon. gentleman calculates that of the one quarter of grain which he assigns to each individual in Prussia, three-fourths at least consist of rye. Throughout the Prussian States, the consumption of rye to wheat, he says, is in the proportion of from three and four to one. In 124 towns of the league he estimates the consumption per head at 65lb. of wheat, and 241lb. of rye; that is to say, each individual consumes very little more than one bushel of wheat, instead of one quarter. In England, the hon. gentleman states the consumption of tea at 1lb. per head, annually; in the Prussian States at only  $\frac{1}{3}$ lb. The consumption of salt, he says, is 16 $\frac{1}{2}$ lb. in Prussia, and 22 $\frac{1}{2}$ lb. in England. The annual consumption of cotton goods in Prussia, he says, is about 4 $\frac{1}{2}$ lb. for a family of five persons, which is about half the amount supposed to be used in England. The consumption of woollen cloth in Prussia amounts, he says, to 2 $\frac{1}{2}$  ells for each individual; in Great Britain, it has been estimated at 5 $\frac{1}{4}$  ells. The consumption of tobacco appears to be greater in Prussia than in England, it being 3lb. per head in the former country, and 1lb. in the latter. Of butter, 2lb. per head are used in Prussia, and only 1lb. in England. But, taking the other great articles I have enumerated, it is shown, that the consumption of them by each individual in this country, for the year 1840, was very much greater, although, in that year, the price of corn was exceedingly high, compared with the price in Prussia. So that, looking to the command enjoyed by the laborious classes, of the necessaries and comforts of life, is found to exist to a far greater extent in England than in Prussia, although there, the price of grain scarcely exceeds half that which it bears in this country. I do not mean to say, that this forms any argument against increasing that amount; I do not wish to push my conclusion further than the point to which it can be legitimately brought. My argument goes to show, that it is not fair to appeal to the diminished price of food in other countries as proving increased comfort in the people in proportion as the article is low priced.

Additional information has been very recently laid on the table, with respect to the condition of the working classes in Belgium. I invite the attention of the House to the prices of manual labour there, as stated in this document. The average prices of labour are, for agricultural labourers, 11*d.* a-day; for weavers, 1*s.* a-day; for masons, 1*s.* 3*d.* a-day; for locksmiths and carpenters, 1*s.* 3 $\frac{1}{4}$ d. a-day; for operatives, working in manufactories, 1*s.* 3*d.* a-day; for operatives, working in quarries, mines, &c., 1*s.* 4*d.* a-day; for jewellers, goldsmiths, and others, 1*s.* 8*d.* a-day. That is the rate of wages in Belgium. Now, what is the price of corn in that country? Last year, at Ostend, wheat was from 51*s.* 9*d.* to 53*s.* a quarter; at Antwerp, it was 51*s.* to 51*s.* 2*d.* a quarter. Taking the general average prices of labour in Belgium, and comparing them with the amount of wages received by the labourers, it does appear to me, that notwithstanding the amount of the manufacturing wages, and notwithstanding the amount of the agricultural wages, which are received there, it does, I say, clearly appear to me, that those wages do not give the labourer there such a command of subsistence, as that given him by the rate of wages usual in this country. I refer to this for the purpose of confirming my impression, that to look for any rapid or great change in the condition of the working population of this country from any extensive change of the Corn-laws, would subject you to great disappointment. My firm belief is—I am now speaking with reference to those who wish for an absolute repeal of these laws—that if the House of Commons should be induced to pledge itself to a total repeal, which we on this side of the House deprecate so much, without relieving permanently the manufactures of the country, you will only superadd the severest agricultural distress. Any such disturbance of agriculture as must follow from a total repeal of the Corn-laws would, in my opinion, lead to unfavourable results, not only with respect to the agriculturists themselves, but also to all those numerous classes who are identified with them in interest.

There is, however, another portion of those who wish for an alteration of the existing laws who would not go the length of total repeal, but desire a substitution for the present, at least, of a fixed duty. With respect then to the ground as thus narrowed, they who are favourable to a fixed duty on corn admit that the agriculturist of this country is entitled to some protection, and therefore they seek to impose a duty invariable in its amount on the importation of foreign corn. Now, with respect to this proposition, it must be remembered that whatever odium attaches to the imposition of a variable duty must apply with equal force to the imposition of a fixed. (A cry of "No, no," from the opposition benches.) Hon. members do not seem to apprehend my meaning. I was not saying that exactly the same objections apply to a variable as to a fixed scale of duty. I was only saying, that so far as odium attaches on the imposition of any duty at all, to that extent odium attaches to the imposition of a fixed duty. There might possibly be advantages in a fixed duty which did not apply to the case of a variable duty, but the argument against the imposition of any duty whatever on the importation of the subsistence of the people applies equally to the imposition of a fixed duty. Either the one or the other is imposed on the ground that the agriculturist needs protection. On principle, however, the imposition of a fixed duty rests on the same grounds, and must on principle be defended by the same arguments, as the imposition of a variable duty. Together with my colleagues, and in concert with them, I have given to the question of a fixed duty the fullest and most patient attention; and if I could have come to the conclusion that for the variable scale of duty it would be better to substitute a fixed duty, I hope I should—considering the obligations under which I act as minister of the Crown—I hope I should have had the moral courage to avow my conviction, and to propose a fixed duty for the adoption of the House; but, under the actually existing circumstances of the country, I cannot reconcile it to myself to propose to the House that measure for its adoption. But I do not see how to propose such a fixed duty as shall be sufficient for the protection of the agriculturists of this country. I agree that for the last four years the average supply of this country has been unequal to the demand; but in considering this question it becomes important to ascertain what is the probability that this country from its own resources can be able to supply its own population. Now, I am not prepared to admit that this country is unable in ordinary years to supply its own population. If I formed my judgment from the circumstances of the last four years, I should have been compelled to conclude that we were dependent on foreign supply for a great proportion of our consumption; I should have been compelled to come to this conclusion, because the average of the last four years' importation of foreign corn into this country was 2,300,000 quarters. But if we take a longer period—if we take twelve or thirteen years, then it would appear, that on the whole, the annual average importation of foreign corn was very considerably smaller. In proof of this I beg to state, that taking the quantities of wheat and wheaten flour imported in those years, it appeared that the whole did not amount to more than 12,000,000 or 13,000,000 of quarters. I will state it more particularly since the year 1828. From July the 5th, 1828, to January the 1st, 1841, the whole quantity of wheat and wheaten flour entered for home consumption was 13,475,000 quarters; and thus I think it must be admitted, that if you take any period of ten years, or taking a somewhat shorter period even, you cannot hope for any period of any thing like ten years to pass without seasons occurring within it during which you must be dependent on foreign supply. You cannot hope for an absolute freedom from all dependence on foreign supply some time in the course of a period of ten years, and therefore in that sense you are not now independent of foreign supply. Looking, then, at the question from this point of view, I refrain my opinion, which I expressed some time ago, that it is of the utmost importance to the interests of this country, that you should be as far as possible independent of foreign supply. By this I do not mean absolute independence, for that, perhaps, is impossible; and nothing I think would be more injurious than to pass such laws as would give rise to a general impression that it was intended to keep this country in absolute independence of foreign supply; but, speaking generally, I say that it is of importance in a country like this, where the chief subsistence of the labourer consists of wheat, if we resort to foreign countries for supplies, to take care that those supplies should be for the purpose of making up deficiencies rather than as the chief sources of subsistence. Again, if I draw my inference from the last four years, I should be bound to admit, that this country, on account of the increased population, was dependent on foreign countries for a considerable amount of annual supply, because, as I said before, the amount derived from foreign countries in those years was as much as 2,300,000 quarters. But take the last ten years, and what do we find? With respect to the first six years, the produce in those years was sufficient to supply the consumption, or very nearly so; for, in the first six years of the last ten, the average annual importation was only 137,000 quarters. Taking, however, the years 1832, 1833, 1834, 1835, 1836, and 1837, it would be too much to infer, that the population has so rapidly increased with reference to the production of subsistence, that you must abandon altogether the hope of deriving your supplies from your own fields. Within the last ten years the increase of population has exceeded any thing that has ever hitherto been known in this country, and during the last four years the demand for foreign corn has been much greater than usual; but for the greater part of the ten years, the produce of the country has been found equal to its necessities. Therefore I cannot bring myself to the conclusion, that there must be periodical, or even an annual importation of foreign corn, in order to supply the wants of the country; and therefore, in determining our course on this occasion, we have to provide for the case of the produce of comparatively abundant years, as well as for years of comparative scarcity. Now, six years of good harvests may again recur consecutively, in which the produce of the country shall equal its necessities. If they do occur, then, what I fear from your fixed duty would be, that the unlimited right of import at a given amount of duty, which you could always maintain in periods of scarcity, would expose this country to great suffering and distress from producing by excess too great a fall in the prices of agricultural produce, and the remuneration of agricultural labour. It has been observed by writers of great authority, that favourable and unfavourable seasons return in certain cycles; that a year of abundance does not follow a year of scarcity, but that you will find five or six years of the one followed by five or six years of the other. Now, the effect of a fixed duty will be at all times, and under all circumstances, to admit foreign corn to our markets, the produce of a favourable harvest on the continent generally corresponding with that of a favourable harvest here. The great producing countries are within the same parallels of latitude, and are affected by the same causes, and you will generally find that an abundant harvest here has been contemporaneous with an abundant harvest in most countries on the continent. Now, whenever there is an abundant harvest, a slight addition to the amount of corn brought into the market produces a difference in the price very disproportionate to the extent of such addition. Mr. Tooke, in his History of Prices, lays down the position that prices vary in a ratio very different from the variation in quantity, and that the difference of ratio between quantities and prices is liable to alter according to the nature of the commodity, but is greater probably in the case of corn than in that of most other articles of extensive consumption. Mr. Tooke also institutes a comparison between the produce of deficient and productive harvests on the continent, and states that a deficient harvest here is accompanied generally by a deficient harvest in the countries from which our supplies are usually derived, and that an abundant harvest here is usually accompanied by an abundant harvest there. If that be so, then, when the harvest in this country is sufficient, or very nearly sufficient, to afford a sufficient supply of food, clearly we shall not stand in need of importation from abroad; but if there comes a series of deficient harvests, in that case it appears to me, that there will be such discouragement given to the national agriculture, as must ultimately lead to that dependence for subsistence on foreign supply which I should most earnestly deprecate. But it is argued on the other side by the advocates of a fixed duty, that a fixed duty will prevent these great alternations, and that though it might be difficult to support the fixed duty in times of scarcity, yet the tendency of this duty will be to preserve the country against the occurrence of such contingencies, during which, it is admitted, it would be difficult to maintain it. Now, it appears to me, that such fluctuations of prices are continually taking place, in consequence of the variations of the seasons, as it will be impossible to provide against by legislation, and that no law which you could pass for the establishment of a fixed duty would, in case of a deficient harvest here and on the continent also, prevent a rise to such prices as would render it impossible to maintain the fixed duty. Look to the case of the United States; they are not subject to Corn-laws, yet there you will find fluctuations in the prices, arising out of the variation in the seasons, altogether as great as takes place here. In Prussia, I find that the price of rye, a grain not subject to the operation of the Corn-laws, is liable to fluctuations as great as wheat is subject to under the operation of those laws. In fact fluctuations in price, must depend so much on the seasons that no law, in my opinion, can guard against the occurrence of high prices. But, if high prices occur, will you maintain your fixed duty? If you impose a fixed duty of 8s. or 10s., and if you do not authorise some relaxation in periods of scarcity, then, supposing prices to rise to 80s. or 90s., I retain the opinion which I expressed last session, that no Government in such a case could undertake to enforce the payment of the duty. If that be admitted, then you must make some provision for a relaxation of the duty; but if you intrust this power to the executive government, you introduce uncertainty into the system, you introduce a power difficult to exercise, and liable to abuse; and you destroy altogether the grounds for looking forwards to permanence of mercantile arrangements, which is the great secret of commercial success. I have again, therefore, after considering this subject with the fullest attention, come to the conclusion that it would not be advisable for parliament to legislate on the principle of applying a fixed duty to the importation of foreign corn.

The alterations of the law which I shall propose will proceed on the principle of retaining a duty upon corn, varying inversely with the price of the article in the home market—i. e. the principle of the existing law. The retention of that principle necessarily involves the maintenance of a system of averages. It has indeed been said that there would be a great advantage in sweeping away altogether the system of averages. It is quite obvious that whether it may or may not be desirable to abandon the system of averages with respect to the imposition of a duty on corn, you must nevertheless maintain a system of averages because the whole of your proceedings under the Tithe Commutation act are founded on the system of averages. It is impossible for you to abolish the system of averages, because the annual payments on account of tithes are founded on calculations connected with it; and it does appear to me, that as the averages must be maintained for the purpose of the payments under the Tithe Commutation act, it would not be expedient to adopt any other system of averages materially varying in principle from that for determining the duty on corn. I hope I shall not be misunderstood. I am not saying, that because there is a system of averages for fixing the payments to be made under the Tithe Commutation act, therefore you must apply a system of averages for the purpose of determining the duty on corn. That is not my argument. I am merely stating that you cannot dispense with a system of averages while your present Tithe Commutation act continues in force. The averages must be taken, in order to determine the payments under the tithe law; and I say, that as you have to determine the amount of payment applicable to tithe by averages, and also the amount of duty to be imposed on corn, it would be inconvenient on the one hand to have two systems of averages prevailing in the country at the same time; while on the other hand, it would be inconvenient and unjust to depart materially from that principle on which the averages with respect to tithes are determined. I propose, therefore, as a necessary incident a varying duty, to retain a system of averages. Now, there is a very general impression throughout the country that there have been very great frauds in respect of the averages. There is a very general impression, particularly on the part of the agricultural body, that very great frauds have been practised with regard to the averages, a very extensive combination being supposed to have been entered into for the purpose of influencing the averages, and procuring the release of corn at a lower rate of duty than it ought to have paid. I am not disposed to deny, that such a combination may, in some cases, have been entered into, and that in some instances frauds may have been practised; but I very greatly doubt, whether they have been practised to any such extent or with any such effect as is generally supposed. It is generally supposed, that the returns for London unduly influence the averages; and that in Leeds, Wakefield, and other great towns in Yorkshire, there have been great and successful combinations for the purpose of unduly influencing the averages. As I said before, I am inclined to think that the impression on this subject may not be altogether without foundation but still the apprehensions entertained have been greatly exaggerated. Taking the aggregate averages of the kingdom for the six weeks in 1841, ending August the 6th, 13th, 20th, 27th, September 3rd and 7th, the price of wheat was 73s. 1d.; and if I exclude the London market from the averages altogether, the general average would be 72s. 8d. in place of 73s. 1d. If I exclude the Yorkshire markets, the average would be 71s. 10d. It is possible that by raising the price in London, or some of the great corn markets, you create an influence which will raise the price in the other markets of the kingdom; but, so far as you can judge from figures and returns, I think the apprehension that there have been extensive frauds with respect to the averages is, as I said before, if not altogether unfounded, at least very greatly exaggerated. The difference in the aggregate averages, excluding London, amounts in these six weeks to only 5d; excluding Wakefield and the other Yorkshire markets, the difference in the average is only 1s. 3d; and if London, Leeds, and Wakefield be excluded, the difference is 1s. 1d.

Lord J. Russell: These differences would make a material alteration in the rate of duty to be paid.

Sir R. Peel. Undoubtedly, the difference, although so very slight, would affect the amount of duty; but the price of corn in London is much higher than in the country; and therefore I maintain that it is not necessarily to be taken as a ground for the imputation of fraud that the London average exceeds the country average. I will now take the average in 1838; from the 13th of August to the 7th of September the weekly aggregate average of the kingdom was 73s. The exclusion of the London market would have made no difference. In 1840, the aggregate average from July 24th to August 28th was 72s. 1d.; the average, exclusive of the London market, was 70s. 11d.; but that difference greatly affected the amount of duty, because when the price is 72s. and under 73s., the duty per quarter is only 2s. 8d., while the exclusion of the London market would have raised the duty to 10s. 8d., the price being above 70s. and under 71s. At the same time, as I said before, we cannot, I think, fairly infer fraud from the higher average of the London market. Now various proposals have been made with respect to the amendment of the law of averages—proposals which have received the utmost consideration from her Majesty's government. I think there will be a general agreement in this, that whatever system be devised, fraud should as far as possible be excluded, and that all should be fair and legitimate. It is advised by some that returns should be made by the growers only. That proposal has been made by many. I think it impossible to adopt such a suggestion. At present Irish and Scotch corn are admitted into the averages of this country; it would be impossible, therefore, to have in these cases a certificate from the grower, and the exclusion of Irish and Scotch corn from the averages would have a material effect in raising the price of corn. I must also state that I think we ought to guard as far as we can against fraud, but I do not think we ought to attempt to increase protection by any indirect operation. If a certain amount of protection be requisite, and if the legislature will consent to give it, let it be given directly and openly. It would not be fair to procure an indirect protection and encouragement for domestic agriculture by any suggestion with respect to the averages which had not immediately in view the prevention of fraud and collusion. Various alterations in the law of averages might be made which would have that effect, and which, if they are necessary for the purpose of guarding against fraud, ought, in my opinion, to be introduced, but for the purpose of getting an indirect protection for agriculture, I would not be a party to the proposal of any. It has been suggested by some that the seller should be required, under a penalty, to make a return of the corn sold. It is difficult to foresee what might be the effect of an enactment of that kind, requiring under a penalty every party who might sell a certain proportion of corn to make a return of the quantity sold. The great and only effectual security against fraud in the averages is to take away the temptation to commit it. If you deprive the parties of any motive of self-interest to combine, you take the best and most effective security against the commission of fraud. The proposal of her Majesty's government with respect to the taking of the averages will be this:—They will propose to take the average in the present mode from the factor, miller, and purchaser of corn—the party who, under the existing law, makes a return at the close of each market day of the whole of the purchases he has made during the preceding week. Upon the whole, we can see no advantage in departing from that principle in taking the averages—making the buyer of corn return the amount of sales of the preceding week, and trusting to the alterations we may make in the levying of the duty for the purpose of most effectually preventing fraud. We shall propose that the duty of collecting the returns shall be devolved upon the excise. The excise is perfectly competent to undertake it. That department has an officer employed in each market town—an officer qualified for the discharge of the duty—an officer who has other important cognate functions to perform, and who will be enabled at a very small comparative increase of expense to undertake this additional duty; while his general ability, his habits of business, and the responsibility he incurs from being a public officer, afford a greater security against fraud than could be taken by intrusting the duty to private individuals. We propose, therefore, that the averages should be taken as at present; that they shall be returned to an excise officer acting under the authority of the Board of Excise. Another security we propose to take is to widen the range from which the returns shall be received. At present there are 150 towns named in the Corn-act from which returns are received. From that number of 150 many considerable towns are excluded, in which, since the passing of the present Corn-law, markets have grown up, where considerable quantities of grain are disposed of. We propose, therefore, not to give a discretionary power to any executive officer for the purpose of adding towns from which the averages should be collected; but in the bill which we shall introduce, we propose to name specifically the towns having corn markets to be admitted within the range, but which are now excluded from the list of 150.

It appears to me that the more you widen the range from which you collect the corn return, the greater security you take against the averages being influenced by combination and fraud. The best means of determining what is the real average of corn, is by ascertaining its price in a greater number of markets. At present the towns selected are towns in England and Wales, and although I propose to add to their number, I should still restrict them to towns in England and Wales.

Sir R. Peel—At present there are 150. I propose to enlarge the range by adding others where corn markets have grown up, and the towns to be so admitted shall be specifically named in the act. The precautions we propose, appear to us most effectual against combination for the commission of fraud. Our first proposal is to widen the range from which the averages shall be taken; the second is to employ a responsible officer, acting under the authority of a public department, for the purpose of collecting the returns; but the main security we rely on as a prevention of fraud, is such an alteration of the duty as shall diminish the temptation to commit fraud. I trust I have made sufficiently clear to the House the nature of the alterations we shall propose with respect to the taking of the averages. I now approach that more important—by far the most important part of the subject—viz., what is the amount of protection we propose to give to corn the produce of this country, and the manner in which we propose to levy the duty upon foreign corn. At present the House is aware, that the duty payable upon corn is levied in this manner. At 59s. and under 60s., the duty is 27s., diminishing 1s., with 1s. increase of price, until the corn arrives at the price of between 66s. and 67s., when the duty is 20s. 8d. The duty then falls 2s. when corn is between 68s. and 69s. At 69s. the duty is 16s. 8d.

Lord J. Russell—Not exactly so. Between 69s. and 70s. the duty is 13s. 8d.

Sir Robert Peel—I am reading from a printed statement, and I believe it to be correct. Between 70s. and 71s. the duty per quarter is 10s. 8d. It then falls 4s., when the price is between 71s. and 72s. It falls 4s. more between 72s. and 73s.; and when the price of wheat reaches 73s., or upwards, the duty is 1s. only. The objection to that mode of levying the duty, which has been urged in various quarters, is this—that the reduction of duty is so rapid that it holds out the temptation to fraud; for instance, at 60s. the duty is 26s. 8d.; at 73s. the duty is 1s. only; therefore between 60s. and 73s. there is an increase of 13s., and a decrease in duty of 25s. 8d., operating as an inducement to retain corn, or combine, for the purpose of influencing the averages, if parties are inclined to combine, amounting on a single quarter of corn to 38s. 8d. So far as pecuniary inducements can go, it is impossible to be placed higher, either to retain corn, or practise on the averages. Take again prices which are nearer to each other. At 66s. the duty is 20s. 8d.; between 66s. and 73s. the inducement to retain corn is 7s. rise in price, and 19s. 8d.

in duty, being a total amount of pecuniary inducement to retain corn to 26s. 8d. Take prices still nearer, between 66s. and 70s. At 66s. the inducement to retain corn in the hope of its rising to 70s. is 4s., and 10s. in duty, forming a total pecuniary inducement of 14s. Again, between 70s. and 73s. there is, besides the difference of 3s. in price, 9s. in respect of duty, forming an inducement of 12s. to retain corn at 70s., in the hope of its reaching the price of 73s. Now it has been argued that the consequence of that very rapid decline of the duty is injurious to the consumer, to the producer, to the revenue, and to the commerce of the country. It is injurious to the consumer, because when corn is at a high price (between 66s. and 70s.) and when there would be public advantage in the liberation of that corn for the purpose of consumption, the joint operation of increased price and diminished duty induces the holders to keep it back, notwithstanding the already high price and pressure in the market, in the hope of realizing the price of upwards of 73s., and paying a duty of only 1s. It operates injuriously to the agricultural interests, because it is a temptation to keep back corn until it can be suddenly poured in at the lowest amount of duty, and when agriculture loses the protection which the law intended it should possess. It is said to be injurious to the revenue, because, instead of corn coming in when it must, under a fixed duty, or other modifications, have been entered for home consumption, it was retained until it could be introduced at 1s., the revenue losing the difference between 1s., and the amount of duty which would otherwise have been levied. It is also said to be injurious to commerce, because where the corn is grown at a distance, in America for instance, the grower is subject to this disadvantage, that before his cargo arrives in this country, the sudden pouring in of wheat at 1s. duty from the countries near England, may have so diminished the price, and increased the duty, that his speculation may have turned out, not only a failure, but ruinous. These objections have been urged against the rapid transition and decline in the duty inversely with the price of wheat. Now, our object will be, in applying the scale of duty to corn, as far as it may be possible, consistently with the principle for which we contend, to diminish the temptations to fraud, or undue holding back of corn. And the agricultural interest ought to observe what has been the effect of the law permitting the importation of corn at certain prices, at a duty of 1s. the quarter. In 1838, the total amount of wheat taken for home consumption was 1,728,000 quarters in the course of the year. Of that amount 1,261,000 quarters were entered at a duty of 1s. In 1840, the total amount of wheat entered for home consumption was 2,020,000 quarters, of which 1,217,000 quarters were taken at a duty of 2s. the quarter. But it is important that we should observe, not only the amount of corn taken in these years at the low duties of 1s. and 2s. the quarter, but also the period of the year at which this took place. In 1838, the corn so taken at that duty of 1s. was taken out one week following the 13th of September. In 1840, the corn taken out at 2s. 8d. the quarter was taken out on the 3rd of September. In each of those two years by far the greater portion of the wheat taken out was at the low rates of 1s. and 2s. 8d.; but it was also at that critical period of the year, just when the farmer in the greater part of the counties of England had thrashed his corn; it was for the purpose of meeting the British farmer in the market when he was thrashing, or had thrashed his corn, for the purpose of producing his rent.

And this tells unfavourably, more especially to the farmer in Yorkshire, who, while compelled to defer the sale of his corn to a later period, is exposed to the disadvantage of the sudden influx of corn whenever the price shall be such as to admit it at the lowest rate of duty. This consideration alone ought to prevail with those most determined in favour of the protection to agriculture to listen with favour to any proposal that has for its object the modification of the existing laws; for it appears to me that some modification of those laws in this respect would be equally as advantageous to the agricultural interest as to any other class. I will now, with the permission of the House, proceed in the course of a few moments to read the scale of duties which I propose should be applied to corn. That scale, Sir, has been devised with a sincere desire to afford to agriculture and the agricultural interest every protection which they can legitimately expect. It has, at the same time, been devised for the purpose, when foreign corn shall be required, of facilitating, as far as possible, commercial intercourse with respect to corn, and subjecting the dealing in corn, as far as possible, consistently with the principle on which the duties are to be levied, to the laws which regulate ordinary commerce. Nothing can be more difficult than to attempt to determine the amount of protection required for the home producer. I am almost afraid even to mention the term "remunerating price," because I know how necessarily vague must be the idea which is attached to it. The price requisite in order to remunerate the home-grower must necessarily vary; a thousand circumstances must be taken into account before you can determine whether a certain price will be a sufficient remuneration or not; and the same difficulty occurs when we attempt to determine on adjusting the scale of duties. The two great points to determine, if we wish to give a just and sufficient protection to domestic agriculture, are, first, what is the price which, on the whole, taking a comprehensive view of the circumstances attending the growth of corn, and viewing the general production of the country, may be supposed to constitute a sufficient encouragement to the growth of wheat or any other kind of agricultural produce. Another element of that consideration and of that determination must necessarily be the price of foreign corn brought into the country, under competition with domestic produce. To attempt to draw any accurate conclusion on both of these two elements of the question must be difficult, from the various opinions that prevail, and the conflicting nature of the details. I have drawn a conclusion as well as I could, without being able to say that I feel it to be completely accurate. But with regard to the price of wheat in this country, there are some elements, at least, towards determining what may be considered a fair average, speaking of the country at large. Now, if we take the average of prices of wheat which determine the commutation of tithes, the principle on which the Tithe Bill passed, taking the average of seven years, we find the price of wheat during those seven years to have been 56s. 8d.

If we take the average of wheat for the last ten years, we shall find that the price has been about 56s. 11d. But in that average is included the average of the last three years, when corn has been higher certainly than any one would wish to see it continue. Allowing for that excess of price, however, 56s. 11d. was the average price for the last ten years. Now, with reference to the probable remunerating price, I should say, that for the protection of the agricultural interest, as far as I can possibly form a judgment, if the price of wheat in this country, allowing for its natural oscillations, could be limited to some such amount as between 54s. and 58s., I do not believe that it is for the interest of the agriculturist that it should be higher. Take the average of the last ten years, excluding from some portion of the average the extreme prices of the last three years, and 56s. would be found to be the average; and, so far as I can form an idea of what would constitute a fair remunerating price, I, for one, should never wish to see it vary more than I have said. I cannot say, on the other hand, that I am able to see any great or permanent advantage to be derived from the diminution of the price of corn beyond the lowest amount I have named, if I look at the subject in connection with the general position of the country, the existing relations of landlord and tenant, the burdens upon land, and the habits of the country. When I name this sum, however, I must beg altogether to disclaim mentioning it as a pivot or remunerating price, or any inference that the legislature can guarantee the continuance of that price; for I know it to be impossible to effect any such object by a legislative enactment. It is utterly beyond your power, and a mere delusion, to say, that by any duty, fixed or otherwise, you can guarantee a certain price to the producer. It is beyond the reach of the legislature. In 1835, when you had what some thought was a nominal protection to the amount of 64s., the average price of wheat did not exceed 39s. 8d., and I again repeat, that it is only encouraging delusion to hold out the hope that this species of protection can be afforded to the agriculturist. To return, however, to the subject; I again say, that nothing can be more vague than to attempt to define a remunerating price. The different qualities of land, and a thousand other considerations enter into the question; and I must say, that the same difficulty exists to a much greater extent as to determining exactly the rate at which foreign corn can be brought into this country. Here, again, you must first ascertain the quality of the corn, the cost of freight, the distance of the country the corn is brought from; all these considerations ought to enter into the calculation; and, therefore, it is almost impossible to determine what should be the exact price at which foreign corn shall be admitted into the market. With these observations I will now at once proceed to read the scale of duties which her Majesty's government propose as a substitute for the existing scale. We propose that when corn is at 50s. and under 51s. in price, a duty of 20s. shall be taken, but that in no case shall that duty be exceeded. We propose that when the price is 51s. and under 52s., the duty shall be 19s.; and after this we propose that there should be what I should call a rest in the scale. That at the three next items of price the duty should be uniform. Thus it would be:—When the price is 52s. and under 53s. the duty should be 18s.; when 53s. and under 54s., 18s., and when 54s. and under 55s., still 18s. When the price is 55s. and under 56s., we propose that the duty shall be 17s.; when 56s. and under 57s. that it shall be 16s.; when 57s. and under 58s. that it shall be 15s.; when 58s. and under 59s., that it shall be 14s.; when 59s. and under 60s., that it shall be 13s.; when 60s. and under 61s., that it shall be 12s.; when 61s. and under 62s., that it shall be 11s.; when 62s. and under 63s., that it shall be 10s.; when 63s. and under 64s., that it shall be 9s.; when 64s. and under 65s., that it shall be 8s.; and when 65s. and under 66s., that it shall be 7s. At the three next items of price I propose another rest in the scale similar to the former. I should propose upon the next three a duty of 6s., that is to say, when the price is 66s. and under 67s., when it is 67s. and under 68s., and when it is 68s. and under 69s.: in each of those cases the duty would be 6s. When the price is 69s. and under 70s., I propose a duty of 5s.; when 70s. and under 71s., a duty of 4s.; when 71s. and under 72s., a duty of 3s.; when 72s. and under 73s., a duty of 2s.; and when 73s. and upwards, a duty of 1s. the quarter. When that price is arrived at, I propose that the duty should altogether cease. The sum of the proposition then, is this, that when corn in the British market is under the price of 51s. the quarter, a duty of 20s. shall be levied, which duty shall never be exceeded, for I am quite satisfied that it is useless to take any greater amount of duty. [“Hear, hear,” from the Opposition benches.] I mean when British corn is under 51s. the quarter, that duty of 20s. the quarter shall be an effectual protection to the home grower; not, of course, excluding the taking for home consumption some small portion of foreign corn, but taking care that the protection shall be a valid one. Thus, when the price is 56s. and under 57s., the duty will be 16s., and when 60s. and under 61s., the duty will be 12s. Now, it is apparent that this scale will have the effect of diminishing the temptations to practising on the averages, and producing a fall of the duty, as its operation will be gradual: and when corn shall have arrived at 60s. or 61s., there will be no inducement to the holding back of corn for the purpose of getting higher prices. It is when markets are rising, and when under the present system there is a prospect of being able to force corn up to a price of 73s., that alone the inducement exists to keep corn back in order to obtain additional prices. I have attempted to remove altogether that inducement to fraud by rendering it useless; and the scale is so regulated that there shall be no inducement to parties to combine to hold back corn and defraud the revenue for the sake of being able to produce a sudden reduction of the duty. I will now call the attention of the House to what has been the effect, with regard to the articles of oats and barley, of having applied the principle of more gradually reducing the duty as the price rises. In the case of wheat, where the fall of the duty was so rapid, the temptation to hold back until the lowest amount of duty shall have been realised has been very effectual, and by far the greater part of the wheat has been taken out at the least amount of duty.

In the case of barley and oats, where the fall in the amount of duty was more gradual, the same results have not occurred. In the case of oats, of 3,513,000 quarters, 248,000 quarters were taken at a duty of 1s. 9d., 695,000 at a duty of 3s. 3d., 243,000 at a duty of 4s. 9d., and 940,000 at a duty of 6s. 3d. That was the effect of a gradual fall of 1s. 6d. in the scale of duties, the same principle which I propose to apply to wheat, with the exception that in no case will the fall in the duty on wheat exceed 1s. I consider that there is a fair ground to entitle me to assume, that, by applying that principle of the gradual fall of duty to wheat, there is a fair prospect that wheat, like oats, will be taken out at a higher rate, that the revenue will profit proportionably and that the consumer and the agriculturist will be equally benefited by corn being taken out when the legitimate demands of the market may require it, and not to answer the objects of speculators. With respect to the other articles of grain, I propose to adopt the proportion of value and duty which I find in the present law. Valuing wheat in the proportion of 100, barley in that of 53, oats in that of 40, and rye, pease, and beans in that of 58; if it be assumed that at the price of 56s. for wheat the duty would be 16s., then the duty on barley, when at 29s. would be 9s.; on oats, at the price of 22s., there would be a duty of 6s. 3d.; and on rye, pease, and beans, at 32s., there ought to be a duty of 10s. 3½d. These are the proportions under the existing law, and I am not aware of any reason for altering them with respect to the other kinds of grain. For this reason, in adjusting the scale of duties applicable to these other kinds of grain, the proportions under the existing Corn-law will be adopted, and the scale itself will correspond with that in the relation of price. In the case of foreign oats, I should propose a maximum duty of 8s. (I do not need to enter into all the details)—that it should fall with the increase in price to 7s., and then continue at 6s. for three items of price, that is to say, 22s., 23s., and 24s. When the average price reaches 25s. it will be reduced, as the price increases, by 1s. The extremes of duty would be 8s. on the one hand, and 1s. on the other, the duty of 1s. being the minimum, and continuing so long as the price of oats exceeds 28s. In the case of barley, when the price is under 26s., the duty I propose is 11s. per quarter, that being the maximum price. When the price is 26s. and under 27s., I propose that there shall be a duty of 10s.; that when the price is 29s. and under 30s., the duty shall continue at 9s.; that when the price is 30s. and under 31s., the duty shall be 8s., and so on till the price is 37s. and upwards, the duty decreasing 1s. for each gradation in price of the same amount. With regard to rye, the same proportion will be observed.

And now I must enter into a short explanation respecting colonial wheat. The law with respect to it is to this effect—that British colonial wheat and flour shall be imported into this country at a duty of 5s. whenever the price of British wheat is below 67s.; that when the price of British wheat exceeds 67s., it shall then be admissible at a duty of 6d. I propose to give the same advantage to colonial wheat respecting the reduction of prices at which it shall be admissible, as is given to other descriptions of wheat. But, considering that the sudden drop in the prices from 5s. to 6d., on account of the difference of 1s. in the price, is at variance with the principle of the law, which seeks to establish as equable and uniform a reduction of duty as possible, we propose to make this arrangement respecting colonial wheat—that when the price of British wheat is under 55s., the duty upon every quarter of British colonial wheat shall be 5s.; that when at 55s., and under 56s., it shall be 4s.; when at 56s. and under 57s., it shall be 3s.; when at 57s. and under 58s., 2s.; and when at 58s. and upwards, it shall be 1s., thus taking away that sudden fall in the amount of duty levied upon colonial wheat which takes place under the existing law, but giving to the colonial wheat that advantage in the reduction of the price which is given to other descriptions of wheat. With respect to flour, I propose to maintain the same calculations as exists with respect to wheat, so as to allow it to be admitted upon the same relative terms. I believe the House is now in full possession of the nature of the proposal which it is the intention of her Majesty's government to submit. If you compare the reduction in the amount of duty with the existing duty you will find that it is very considerable. To those who have appeared to think that the modification which I propose to make in the existing law is of no importance, I shall only say, compare my scale of duties on the admission of foreign corn with the existing scale of duties. When corn is at 59s. and under 60s., the duty at present is 27s. 8d. When corn is between those prices, the duty I propose is 13s. When the price of corn is at 50s., the existing duty is 36s. 8d., increasing as the price falls; instead of which I propose, when corn is at 50s., that the duty shall be only 20s., and that that duty shall in no case be exceeded. At 56s. the existing duty is 30s. 8d.; the duty I propose at that price is 16s. At 60s. the existing duty is 26s. 8d.; the duty I propose at that price is 12s. At 63s. the existing duty is 23s. 8d.; the duty I propose is 9s. At 64s. the existing duty is 22s. 8d.; the duty I propose is 8s. At 70s. the existing duty is 10s. 8d.; the duty I propose is 5s. Therefore it is impossible to deny on comparing the duty which I propose, with that which exists at present, that it will cause a very considerable decrease of the protection which the present duty affords to the home-grower, a decrease, however, which in my opinion, can be made consistently with justice to all the interests concerned. If the agriculturist fairly compares the nominal amount of duty which exists at present with that which I propose, he must perceive, that he will still be adequately protected, notwithstanding that the reduction which I propose is considerable. I certainly feel bound to say, that I think the agricultural interest of the country can afford to part with a portion of the protection they now receive, and that it is only just that that protection should be diminished. Whatever arrangement can be made, tending to facilitate the introduction of corn when corn is required, consistently with the ordinary principles of commercial intercourse, it ought, in my opinion, to be made. The protection which I propose to retain, I do not retain for the especial protection of any particular class. Protection cannot be vindicated on that principle. The only protection which can be vindicated, is that protection which is consistent with the general welfare of all classes in the country. I should not consider myself a friend to the agriculturist if I asked for a protection with a view of propping up rents, or for the purpose of defending his interest or the interests of any particular class, and in the proposition I now submit to the House I totally disclaim any such intention. My belief, and the belief of my colleagues is, that it is important for this country, that it is of the highest importance to the welfare of all classes in this country, that you should take care that the main sources of your supply of corn should be derived from domestic agriculture; while we also feel that any additional price which you may pay in effecting that object is an additional price which cannot be vindicated as a bonus or premium to agriculture, but only on the ground of its being advantageous to the country at large. You are entitled to place such a price on foreign corn as is equivalent to the special burdens borne by the agriculturist, and any additional protection you give to them I am willing to admit can only be vindicated on the ground that it is for the interest of the country generally. I, however, certainly do consider that it is for the interest of all classes that we should be paying occasionally a small additional sum upon our own domestic produce, in order that we might thereby establish a security and insurance against those calamities that would ensue, if we became altogether or in a great part dependent upon foreign countries for our supply. My belief is, that those alternations of seasons will continue to take place, that whatever laws you may pass you will still occasionally have to encounter deficient crops, that the harvests of other countries will also at times be deficient, and that if you found yourselves dependent upon foreign countries, for so important an amount of corn as 4,000,000 or 5,000,000 of quarters, under these circumstances, and at a time when the calamity of a deficient harvest happened to be general, my belief is, that the principle of self-preservation would prevail in each country, that an impediment would be placed upon the exportation of their corn, and that it would be applied to their own sustenance. While, therefore, I am opposed to a system of protection on the ground merely of defending the interests of a particular class, I, on the other hand, would certainly not be a party to any measure, the effect of which would be to make this country permanently dependent upon foreign countries for any very considerable portion of its supply of corn. That it might be for a series of years dependent on foreign countries for a portion of its supply—that in many years of scarcity a considerable portion of its supply must be derived from foreign countries—I do not deny; but I nevertheless do not abandon the hope that this country, in the average of years, may produce a sufficiency for its own necessities. If that hope be disappointed—if you must resort to other countries, in ordinary seasons, for periodical additions to your own supplies, then do I draw a material distinction between the supply which is limited, the supply which is brought in for the purpose of repairing our accidental and comparatively slight deficiency, and the supply which is of a more permanent and extensive character.

This is the proposal I am authorised, on the part of her Majesty's government, to submit to the house. This is the proposal which, taking a review of the whole question, looking to the extent of the protection which, for a long series of years past, the laws of this country have afforded to agriculture—adverting to those acts of parliament which have assumed a given price of wheat as the basis of rent, and the foundation of great legislative propositions—considering also the importance of deriving your supply, as far as you can, from domestic sources—this, I say, is the proposal which her Majesty's government, prompted by no other interest but that of the country at large—driven by no other pressure than that of their own judgment, consider it most for the advantage and welfare of the people should meet with the sanction of the legislature. Sir, this is not altogether an unfortunate period, in my opinion, for the adjustment of the question. In the first place, there is no such amount of foreign corn available to the supply of this country as need excite the alarm of those who dread an excess; and, in the next, there has been, during the period which has elapsed since the separation of Parliament, concurrently with great commercial distress, as much of moderation, of calm, and of disposition to view with moderation and calmness a proposal for the adjustment of this question, as could possibly have been anticipated. There may have been excitement—there may have been attempts to inflame the minds of the people—but this I must say, that the general demeanour and conduct of the great body of the people of this country, and of that portion of them who have been most exposed to sufferings on account of commercial distress, have been such as to entitle them to the utmost sympathy and respect. There is no difficulty, then, in the shape of violence, interposed to the settlement of this question; and it appears to me to be perfectly open for legislation at the present moment. I earnestly trust that the result of the proposal which I now submit to the house, whether it be acceded to or not, will, at all events, be to lead to some satisfactory adjustment of the question. The adjustment we propose, we propose under the impression and belief that it is the best which, upon the whole, and looking to the complicated state of the various relations and interests in the country, we could submit for the consideration of the house, consistently with justice to all classes of her Majesty's subjects. If it is the pleasure of parliament to affirm that proposal, it will, of course, pass into a law. If it be the pleasure of parliament to reject it, I still hope that the question may be adjusted. Whatever may be the determination of parliament with respect to it, I shall conclude by expressing my most earnest and solemn hope that the arrangement, whatever it may be, may be one most in concurrence with the permanent welfare of all classes, manufacturing, commercial, and agricultural, in the country.

After a few remarks from Lord John Russell and Mr. Cobden, the House adjourned.

FEBRUARY 14, 1842.

On the motion of Sir Robert Peel, the Order of the Day for the House to resolve itself into a Committee of the whole House on the duties affecting the Importation of Foreign Corn was read. On the question that the Speaker do now leave the Chair,—

Lord John Russell rose, and at the conclusion of a long and powerful speech, proposed the following motion:—"That this House, considering the evils which have been caused by the present Corn-laws, and especially by the fluctuations of the graduated or sliding scale, is not prepared to adopt the measure of her Majesty's government, which is founded upon the same principles, and is likely to be attended by similar results."

A long debate ensued, extending over three nights, when, at the close of the discussion Sir Robert Peel again spoke as follows:—

Mr. Speaker, after the demand which I was obliged to make on the attention of hon. members in bringing forward the measure now under discussion, I shall certainly feel it incumbent upon me to limit myself as strictly as possible within the bounds which the nature of the motion prescribes, and confine myself altogether to the issue which is proposed by the noble lord. I am a little surprised at the nature of the issue raised by the noble lord. I am quite aware that I have to contend against two classes of antagonists, entertaining entirely opposite opinions, the one led by the noble lord—the advocate of a fixed duty; the other coincident with the hon. and learned gentleman (Mr. Roebuck)—a decided enemy to all duty whatever. And I was a little curious to know by what process these two classes of antagonists could be brought to range under the same banner. The noble lord I expected to affirm that a fixed duty ought to be preferred to a sliding scale. I heard much when the noble lord was in the government—much from him in condemnation of those who, opposing his measures, did not clearly announce their own plans. “Concert, if you please” (the noble lord used to say), “the rejection of the measure we propose, but if, giving your assent to abstract propositions, you resolve to combine against the measures of her Majesty’s government, in that case it becomes the character of a great opposition, to leave on record the principles on which they have acted.” The noble lord used to say, “It is very well for you to act in opposition to our measures; you are not charged with the duties and responsibility of government; but you have had a long public life; you enjoy the confidence of a great party; these measures have undergone frequent discussion, and the country really wants to know what are the principles on which you oppose them.” Such being the language which the noble lord used to hold when in the government, I certainly did expect to find the noble lord meeting us fairly on the grounds on which, in his opinion, the measure which we propose cannot be entertained; I did expect from him, after all the eloquence which I have heard from him against ambiguous abstract resolutions, a full and complete exposition of his own principles. How they who are the advocates for a total repeal of all duties on foreign corn can vote for the resolution of the noble lord, I confess I cannot understand. It is a matter of wonder to me how any advocate of a fixed duty can be found to concur with the noble lord in his proposition. The noble lord merely affirms, “That this House, considering the evils which have been caused by the present Corn-laws, and especially by the fluctuations of the graduated or sliding scale, is not prepared to adopt the measure of her Majesty’s government, which is founded upon the same principles, and is likely to be attended with the same results.”

Why, Sir, fixed duty lurks under this ambiguous phraseology. He who moves the resolution is in favour of a fixed duty. How it can find approval with you, who are opposed to all duties whatever—how it can be worth your while to vote for this motion, which you know perfectly well involves in it, ambiguous though the words may be, the principle of a fixed duty and nothing else, I confess I am at a loss to imagine. The motion which the noble lord ought to have made—I mean, if he intended to maintain his own declared principles—would have stated distinctly and clearly what were the principles which he was prepared to recommend the House to adopt in preference to the principles of our measure. I thought the noble lord would have presented us with some such motion as would have brought fully and fairly to issue the question whether a fixed duty is preferable to a sliding scale; and if the noble lord had acted on former precedents, his motion would have been this—“Resolved, that no settlement of the question of the Corn-laws can be permanent or satisfactory which does not include within itself the principle of a fixed duty.”

Acting on the precedent of the year 1835, when it was difficult to bring men of conflicting opinions to join in a common course and unite in a common vote, that would have been the resolution which the noble lord would have brought forward. But in this case opinions are even more discordant than they were in 1835, and the noble lord has not had the benefit of a compact alliance; if on this occasion the noble lord had fairly announced in his resolution the principles on which he was prepared to act, and, consequently, it was necessary for the noble lord, and the advocates of total repeal, to concert what might be the best mode of covering the grounds on which they are severally prepared to support the same proposition, and how they might best hope to conceal from that enlightened public who, we are told, have their scrutinizing eyes upon us and our proceedings, what are the real differences between the noble lord and the parties whom he expects to support him to-night. But in fact any conflict to-night is not a conflict with a fixed duty, and I must say that, in respect of the general principles which have been laid down by the noble lord as those on which he should have legislated on this question, there is no material discordance between us. I also fully agree with the right hon. gentleman, that the great object which we ought always to maintain in view in legislating on the corn duties is the welfare and benefit of the great body of the people; and I think that man not a true friend to the agricultural interest who for the purpose of conferring any temporary benefit on that interest, tries to effect his object by calling on the great body of the public to sacrifice real advantages. Then, with respect to the opinions of the noble lord, he said, that he would submit to any odium rather than agree to do what he considered to be injustice to the agricultural interest; he said that the agricultural interest would be entitled to protection on two grounds—first, if they were subject to any peculiar and special burdens; secondly, if in consequence of the long endurance of laws originally, perhaps, defective in their principle, the agricultural body had been led, under the sanction of the legislature, to embark their capital, and had entered into engagements on the faith of what the legislature had done,—then, that though in principle it might be competent for you to retrace your steps, yet, nevertheless, the considerations of sound justice and equity forbade you to return; but, on the contrary, imperatively demanded that you should continue to foster the interests which had grown up under your management. I say, then, that if these be the sentiments of the noble lord, with respect to the agricultural interest, I don't know, as I said before, that I materially differ from the noble lord, and whatever difference there is between us is not a difference of principles, but a difference only as to the mere nature of the measure which is fit to be adopted in order to carry out those principles, and it is because we are of opinion that we shall so best carry out those principles, that we propose a graduated scale on the footing of a duty, varying inversely as the price, and diminishing as the price rises, but guarding the agricultural interest against competition when the price is low, as far as is consistent with the interests of the consumer, and abandoning the duty when the interests of the consumer requires its abandonment. I consider that a better principle than the principle of a fixed duty, and therefore it is that I propose it for the adoption of the House. A fixed duty, indeed, the noble lord now seems inclined to abandon. “We will have no sliding scale,” says the noble lord, but still the noble lord in one case adopts a sliding scale. The difference between the noble lord and me is that he slides on one leg. The noble lord is prepared to maintain the system of averages to determine when the duty at certain prices shall cease altogether. Well, I think that my plan is the better of the two, because, as was justly observed in his able speech by my right hon. friend the vice-president of the Board of Trade (Mr. Gladstone), because the noble lord keeps on the fixed duty of 8s., when the price is at 72s., but at 73s. or 74s., determining the price by the averages, the noble lord proposes that the duty shall altogether cease. Now, if combinations can exist under the present system for the purpose of raising the averages, and if there is now, when corn is at 70s., inducement to hold till it reaches 73s., what an immense inducement to hold back will there be when the difference of 2s. in the price makes a difference of 8s. in the duty. And then with respect to America, the merchant there, finding the duty here remitted, when the price is at 73s., ships his corn; but the holders here have poured in corn upon the market in the meantime. It is then said to be their interest to combine to raise the duty. They do combine, and the price falls in consequence to 72s., and the duty rises to 8s., and the American merchant is left to put up with the failure of his speculation. The noble lord must, therefore, confess that after six months' time for deliberation, the only amendment which he proposes leaves unremedied almost all the defects of the present system. Sir, an attention to the debate that has occurred during these three evenings, the conflicting opinions expressed by many hon. members, and the different apprehensions entertained, must have convinced any gentleman, however wedded he may be to his own opinion, that to endeavour to effect a settlement of so complicated a question as the Corn-laws, is a task of no ordinary difficulty. Contrast the speech of the noble lord the member for Lincolnshire to-night with that of the right hon. gentleman, the president of the Board of Trade last night. [An hon. member.—The late president of the Board of Trade.] The ex-president of the Board of Trade, I mean. He spoke with such authority that I thought he was still in office. But contrast those two speeches. The right hon. gentleman told us last night that my mode of taking the averages would diminish the price, and raise the duty to the amount of 5s.; but what does the noble lord tell us to-night? He tells us that the greatest alarm had been excited in the county of Lincoln on account of the mode in which I propose to take the averages, for that, in point of fact, it would prejudice the farmer to a most material extent. At the views of the right hon. gentleman I confess I am surprised. I am surprised that he should have given utterance to an apprehension so unfounded. All I can say is, that I utterly disclaim

the idea of affording any additional protection to agriculture by the altered mode of taking the averages; and if on a consideration of the working of that system, I should be convinced that it will have any effect which I had not anticipated, I shall be prepared to consider the effect of so taking them. I hold it quite to be legitimate to correct any frauds that may now exist; but as to attempting to afford any additional protection to agriculture by an altered mode of taking the averages, that is false in principle, and I have no intention of effecting it. Whatever protection for agriculture I take, I will take openly. But then the noble lord the member for Lincolnshire tells us to-night, that there are scarcely two persons in that county who are satisfied with the scale as fixed with regard to wheat, but that as regards oats and barley, the scale fixed upon had met with unanimous and universal condemnation. Why, Sir, those different opinions, urged as fair objections to my measure, I look upon as conclusive proofs of the policy of our modifying our opinions. To effect any satisfactory settlement that shall carry with it that degree of assent and goodwill which all great public undertakings of the kind ought to carry with them, we ought to look to the opinions of extreme thinkers on the one hand, and on the other. We must look to the views of the advocates of free trade, and the advocates of continued protection, each differing to some extent and degree from each other, and from the proposition before the House. But while we observe the manner in which the proposal is dissented from by these two extremes, we must look to that intermediate class of persons which I am confident exists, which will deliberately consider the proposal, and examine the evidence in its favour and against it. And though they may not be entirely contented with the details, they will admit, that, on the whole, it is just and reasonable, and that being a good measure, it ought to be adopted as speedily as possible. Seeing the violence of the opposition with which I have been assailed for proposing this measure, and the disappointment and dissatisfaction that have been expressed in some of the manufacturing districts, and again, on quite opposite grounds, in some of the agricultural districts,—all which opposition I must have naturally expected,—I am supported through all this opposition by the consciousness that my colleagues and myself have attempted to suggest that which we believe to be wholesome at the time, and likely to obtain that practical good which ought to be the object in touching a great question of this sort; and that, on the whole, looking at the artificial state of the system affected by it, and the complicated and important interests that are involved, I declare again that our object has not been to conciliate the favour of any party; that we have not proposed the measure to secure the interest of any particular class; but looking at the whole complicated interests of this country, we have offered this, under circumstances of great difficulty, as a great improvement on the existing law, and as itself an advantageous measure, which will meet the wishes of the moderate thinkers on all sides, and one which ought, if agreed to, to be adopted as speedily as possible. And here let me refer to something which fell from the hon. and learned gentleman opposite (Mr. Roebuck), who, in a speech characterised by his usual ability, advised me to discard all class prejudices, to show, not perhaps that I am in advance, but at all events, that I do not lag behind the intelligence of the age, and to bring forward some grand and comprehensive scheme that would stamp me at once with the character of a great statesman. I will tell the hon. and learned gentleman what I think belongs more to the true character of the minister of such a country as this. I think it is more in keeping with that true character for me to aspire to none of those magnificent characteristics which he has described, and that the wisest and safest course for me to adopt is to effect as much practical good as I can, and not by pronouncing panegyrics upon general principles, which might obtain temporary popularity and praise, delay even a partial remedy for evils the existence of which all acknowledge. Now, considering the great difficulties attending this question, and forgetting, as I must forget, if I hope for any satisfactory termination of them, the minor interests of party, and those party differences which have caused so much asperity in former debates, and remembering that I am in a very different position as minister of the Crown from the hon. and learned gentleman, and also now from the noble lord the member for the City of London, —situated as I am, I must try to effect a practical adjustment of this question as much to the satisfaction of the general classes of the community as I can. The hon.

and learned gentleman would find it easy, it seems, to apply the great principle of free trade to this question, but I am compelled to look to the mighty interests that have grown up under the system of restriction. You, the hon. and learned member, give me an estimate of the corn grown in this country—you tell me of 22,000,000 quarters of wheat, and in all 45,000,000 quarters of grain; now, think of the amount of capital engaged in the production of that enormous quantity of 45,000,000 quarters of grain. Think what pecuniary interests must be involved in the production of such an amount of grain. Think, too, of the amount of social interests connected with those pecuniary interests which are also involved—how many families are depending for their subsistence, and their comforts, upon the means of giving employment to thousands, before you hastily disturb the laws which determine the application of capital. All these considerations you may disregard, or overlook, in your haste to apply the principles of free trade; but let me tell you, if you do so, you are the real enemies of the application of those principles. If you disregard those pecuniary and social interests which have grown up under that protection, which has long been continued by law, then a sense of injustice will have been aroused, which will revolt at your scheme of improvement, however conformable it may be to rigid principle. How many leases have been formed under the existing system—under the faith of these laws? Take the case even of the tenant-at-will, and how can you instil into him the idea that it is a landlord's question, and not a tenant's question? His capital is embarked in agriculture. Do you think it possible not strongly to affect that capital by pouring in millions of quarters of corn duty free, diminishing his means in the same degree that you diminish the price of corn in the home market? Do you think you can safely disregard the position in which the tenant-at-will even would be placed by the adoption of your free-trade principles? But in the case of the farmer who is under a lease on the faith of the endurance of your acts of parliament, what would you do? If the laws have been defective, that is not his fault. If for 140 years you have continued the protection to agriculture, is it possible lightly to regard the interests which have grown up under it? 140 years of protection are no proof that that protection has been in itself wise; but if you have continued the protection for 140 years, that is a decisive reason why you should touch most lightly and carefully the interests which have been established under that protection. Take the case of your own acts of parliament—take the case of the Tithe Commutation Act, which you passed some seven or eight years ago. You assume in that act that a certain price of corn shall determine the amount of rent charge for which hereafter each tithe-payer shall become responsible. You vary the price, it is true, year by year, and the amount of rent will vary with the price, but the original quantity will remain, the number of bushels, whatever may be the price which shall hereafter continue to be paid, and that appears to me a conclusive reason why, in approaching this subject, you should make with the greatest caution any change in the laws for the protection of corn. Take the case of Ireland. The noble lord proposes to admit at once oats there at a duty of 3*s.* 2*d.*, or 3*s.* 4*d.*, I forget which. The right hon. gentleman proposes to admit oats from all parts of the continent duty free. Does any one think that this would be either wise or just? Ireland having been in the habit of sending 3,000,000 quarters of grain annually to this country, would it be either politic or just at once, and without notice, that corn having been ground and sent here upon the faith of your own legislation, either to admit oats, barley, or wheat, the growth of the continent, into your markets, perfectly free, or at such a duty as 3*s.* 2*d.*? If at the same time that you alter the Corn-laws, and attempt to make an arrangement respecting corn, you should deem it desirable to inquire into the laws which affect the importation of other commodities, I must say that I should wish to substitute for a system of prohibition a system of protection, at such duties as would ensure ample security to him who had hitherto flourished while relying on the system of prohibition, that his interests would not be lightly interfered with. Again, I find that in Ireland there is a positive prohibition to the importation of flour. I cannot maintain the continuance of that prohibition, if about to make a settlement of the Corn-laws. There again important interests are involved; and when I look to the vast and complicated interests generally, which are involved in this question of the provision laws, I say, in the first instance, it is absolutely necessary, if you wish to act consistently, that you should adopt any measure you may take with the greatest circumspection and caution; and secondly, that I am convinced, whatever may be the clamour of those who sincerely believe that there should be no import duties upon provisions, that he who does act with circumspection and caution, will, in the end, be more likely to succeed than he who inflicts great injustice by hasty and precipitate legislation. It is upon these principles that the government have considered this question of the Corn-laws, and it is in pursuance of these principles that I have submitted to the house a measure, which is denounced by the eager advocates for free trade, as a perfect mockery and delusion, and by some even as an insult to the sufferings of the people, but which I, notwithstanding those condemnations, do believe to be a great improvement in the existing law, which I do believe to be a concession of protection which the agricultural interest can make without danger, and which I do believe to be a measure which will at the same time permit corn to be imported into this country on a better principle than that which, under the existing law, has hitherto regulated its importation. Let me, for a moment, examine the scale, or at least the leading principles of the scale, which I propose. It certainly does at the price of 50s. fix a duty of 20s.; but then that duty is, under no circumstances, to be increased. The noble lord says that it is a prohibitory duty. The noble lord, however, will find it very difficult to apply a duty which will not, under certain circumstances, amount to a prohibitory duty. The noble lord spoke much of the advantage of putting the United States of America on the same footing as the Baltic. He said that the United States was a power with which we ought to endeavour to carry on an extensive commercial intercourse; that it contained immense plains, bordered by rivers, which would afford a ready means for the conveyance of exports and imports; and that it would be of the greatest advantage to us to be able at all times to carry on a trade with that country. But the noble lord also said that the cost of a quarter of American wheat, when brought into Liverpool, would be 47s. Now, considering the disadvantages under which the United States stands, with reference to corn, I should have thought that at that price no duty ought to apply; but the noble lord fixes a duty of 8s. upon corn from America at the price of 47s.; and that being so, I would ask, whether, when the price of English corn is at 50s., the noble lord's fixed duty of 8s. would not, according to his own showing, amount to a prohibitory duty? It may be less a prohibitory duty than that which I propose. Yes; but that is not the question we are now examining. The noble lord laid down the principle that there should be no prohibition, in order that there might be a constant importation from the United States; and I am endeavouring to prove, from the noble lord's own showing—although in a degree my proposal may be more objectionable than his, in the particular point in question—that when the price of corn was at 50s., his duty of 8s. would operate as a prohibitory duty upon American corn. I do propose a duty of 20s. when the price is under 51s.—a proposal I am aware, to which objection exists on the other side. But in making it, I stated, what I now repeat, that I did think when the price of grain was under 51s. in this country, that there could be no public evil in prohibiting the importation of foreign corn! that 20s. would be sufficiently effectual for that purpose; and I also said, what I now say again, that I thought a superfluous protection involved nothing but positive obloquy and mischief. I vindicate that amount of duty, not for the purpose of protecting the special interests of particular classes, but because I think it important to give to the farmer that encouragement which shall induce him to continue a system of improvement, by preventing a sudden import of corn, when that corn is not required for home consumption. I think it is for the public advantage, as well as for the farmer's own peculiar interest, that I should tell him upon whose labours we are now depending for 45,000,000 quarters of grain—knowing the effect that a sudden influx of corn must have when corn is sufficiently abundant at home for all the purposes of the consumer—I do say it is for the public advantage that I should say to him, "Continue your improvements; I cannot undertake to guarantee to you by legislation a particular price, for this I will say, that as long as corn is under 51s. you shall not be exposed to the importation of foreign corn." And now let us take the intermediate part of the scale—let us take it at 56s. or 57s. Here the argument is, that according to Mr. Meek's papers, it is impossible that foreign corn could come into competition with home produce. Now, a greater fallacy I never heard in my life than that which has been made use of to prove that proposition, and to justify those who used it in saying, that my scale is as defective as the existing one—that it stripped the present scale of some of its evident deformities, but yet that it gave the same degree of protection, or rather that it as effectually excluded foreign corn when foreign corn could be of any advantage. Gentlemen placing those papers before them argue in this way—they say that it appears from the consuls' returns that the price of foreign wheat would be on the average 40s. 6d.; that the charge for conveyance would be 5s.; and that consequently foreign corn could not be introduced into the English market at a less price than 45s. 6d., which a duty of 16s., supposing the price of home corn to be 56s., would raise to a prohibitory price. Now, that is one of the greatest fallacies I ever heard. They add up together the entire prices given by the consuls at all the different places, including Antwerp, where the price is 55s. 6d., and Rotterdam, where it is 55s., places where the price is entirely governed by the English market. The fair way to determine the question, when the price at home is 58s., 59s., or 60s., is to take those places from which foreign corn may be imported at the lowest price. By that means I will prove to you the utter absurdity of your mode of taking the averages. Supposing there are only two places from which corn can be brought—supposing that at Odessa wheat is 26s., and at Antwerp 56s. 5d., united these two prices make 82s. 5d.; divide them, and you have an average of 41s. 2½d. Now would it not be absurd for any man to argue that we are safe from the corn at Odessa because the average price of it, when united with that of Antwerp, was 41s. 2½d., at which price foreign corn could not be introduced? In what a miserable plight would that corn merchant be who founded his speculations upon such a principle as that? The question then is, not what Odessa wheat may average in price when united to that of Antwerp, but what is the price of wheat at Odessa, what the charge for freight from Odessa, and what the price at which wheat can be brought into the English market from Odessa? I will take the case of Danish wheat. I think in determining whether foreign wheat can come in at a given price, it is important to consider the questions—first, as to the port from which that wheat is sent; and secondly, as to the quantity that can be exported from that port. Now what does Mr. Meek say with regard to Denmark? He says, “The prices of corn in Denmark have, during the last twenty-five years, averaged—for wheat, 28s. 10d. per quarter; rye, 19s. 9d. per quarter; barley, 14s. per quarter; oats, 10s. 6d. per quarter. Considering the depression of the corn market during the greater part of that period, and that the prospect of a permanent sale of corn in England will be likely to render the continental markets more steady and more firm than they have hitherto been, it is probable that the prices, free on board, would not be much below the following quotations:—wheat, from 30s. to 31s. per imperial quarter; rye, from 22s. to 25s. per imperial quarter; barley from 16s. to 20s. per imperial quarter; oats from 12s. to 15s.”

And he adds that—“In case of a regular and steady demand in England for foreign corn, the quantity produced in Denmark and Sleswick Holstein, might, without much difficulty, be considerably increased.”

And in passing a law regulating the importation of foreign corn, is it not wise to deliberate upon what may be the possible supply in future years? Is it not a wise principle of legislation not to take wholly the prices of corn now, but to consider what may be the increased improvements by railways or otherwise, what may be the effect of a regular demand, and what may be the diminished freights? Ought we not to take all those things into account when we propose to legislate, without ever having the opportunity of retracing our steps, at least so far as the agriculturists are concerned? Mr. Meek says further, that “The freight of wheat to the east coast of England, in ordinary times, varies from 3s. to 3s. 6d. per quarter in summer, and from 4s. 6d. to 5s. per quarter in autumn, and for the other sorts in proportion.”

And that “The prices of corn per quarter paid in the interior are scarcely to be ascertained with any degree of accuracy. They vary considerably, almost each province, and even each town, delivering a different quality of grain. The prices that have been paid in the provinces during these latter years, so far as the same can be ascertained, appear not to have exceeded the following:—For wheat 23s. 6d. to 29s. per quarter; for rye 17s. to 20s. per quarter; for barley 10s. 9d. to 15s. 6d. per quarter; for oats 8s. 6d. to 10s. 6d. And in 1841—For wheat 35s.; rye 23s.; barley 16s. 6d.; oats 11s.”

And he adds that “The freight of grain by water from the provincial ports to Copenhagen, Kiel, or Elsinore, may be computed at from 1s. 4d. to 1s. 8d. per quarter, adding to the cost of conveyance the expense of removing, warehousing, and turning the grain, putting it into condition, loss in measure, and shipping charges. The total expense at the port of shipment would amount to from 2s. to 2s. 6d. per quarter greater, on an average, for the several descriptions of grain.”

And thus many experienced persons in Denmark, “are of opinion that if the trade in corn were made constantly open at a moderate duty, wheat and corn generally would be grown in Denmark to a much greater extent than it is at present.”

I think, then, that if I show that the price at Elsinore is 28s. 10d., and that the freight from Denmark does not exceed 4s. per quarter, I prove that, at least from Denmark, corn would be introduced into this country when the price is less than 61s. per quarter. But you will say the quantity grown in Denmark is insufficient to supply the wants of our population. Now, what does Mr. Meek say on this point? He tells us that the average export of wheat from Denmark is from 150,000 quarters to 200,000, in addition to 250,000 quarters of other grain; and Mr. Meek adds, that that quantity, great as it is, might be exceeded if corn were shipped from thence to any considerable extent—that is to say, 700,000 quarters of corn might be brought here in years of moderate growth. Then, I say, if prices are below 50s. in England, and there is a great quantity of surplus wheat in Denmark, do not discourage home production, do not chill the expectations and blight the hopes of your own farmers by permitting the Danish agriculturist to throw a quantity of his corn at a low rate of duty into your market, and so damage the prices of your own produce. It is on that principle of protection to your own growers that I found my measure. I cannot hope that this country will ever be entirely exempt from dependence to a certain extent on foreign supply. I do not doubt but that some corn must be imported, but what I say is, do not import corn to the injury of your own producers, but import it as a supplemental supply to fill up any deficiency in the products of your own soil. When you tell me that the habits of the people are formed in correspondence with their consumption of food—when you tell me that the comforts of the people are dependent to a great extent upon that supply, you only convince me that my proposition is a just one—that you ought to draw your supply mainly from your own soil, and not expose yourselves to the hostilities, to the caprice, or to the failure of the crops, of foreign countries. I tell you, if you do so, the time will come when you will repent it. When your wheat harvest is deficient, and you are suddenly obliged to place your reliance upon a foreign supply, you may find that that reliance is not a safe one, and that it would have been better to have promoted the growth of your own corn. I know that you think such a doctrine as that opposed to your principles of free trade; but in discussing a question like this—in considering that prices are more peculiarly affected by influences which fluctuate, and must of necessity be uncertain—I own it appears to me that the strict principles of free trade cannot be applied without danger to the interests of the community. But my main object is to show, that with respect to some countries, the scale of duty, as I have fixed it, between 54s. and 60s., will admit of the import of foreign corn, and of the application of your general principle. That application may not be to so great a degree as you desire, but it is infinitely greater than you believe. Now let us take the upper parts of the scale. I want to show you, by a comparison with any other hitherto proposed, that my scale is infinitely more beneficial to the consumer. Take the duty I propose to levy when wheat is between 64s. and 72s., a period which certainly indicates severe pressure upon the people. Let us compare my scale at these prices with other scales that have been submitted, remembering that my principle is, that above 60s. the interest of the consumer ought to be considered. Of course, the interest of the consumer ought to be considered at all times; but when prices are at that amount, what I contend for is, that then they ought to be specially considered, and that the interest of the farmer should be, in comparison, overlooked. Now, look at the scale of duties I propose to levy at these critical periods. And here I cannot help saying—I really must say—that I cannot understand how sensible and enlightened men, like some of the hon. gentlemen opposite, can for a moment conceive that my scale is no improvement. How can they hold that I offer no benefits to the consumer? Why, just look at the scale I propose, and compare it with that at present existing. According to my proposition, when wheat is at 64s. the duty will be 8s.; the present duty is 22s. 8d. Can any one say that I do not relieve the consumer? When wheat is at 65s., I propose that the duty shall be 7s.; the present duty is 21s. 8d. I propose a 6s. duty on wheat at 66s.; the present duty is 20s. 8d. I propose that the 6s. duty shall continue until the price is at 68s., and then it diminishes 1s. upon every shilling the price rises. But you say that this scale offers no security that the holders of corn will not continue to hold. Can you deny that the inducement to hold is rendered infinitely less? Will there not be an inducement in the natural operation of commercial enterprise to bring the corn into the market, and sell it even when the duty is 6s. a quarter? Now, suppose the price of wheat to be 66s., at which price a duty of 6s. would be levied, that duty continuing until the price reaches 68s. Now, what would be the natural feeling of the holder of corn under such circumstances as these? Would he not say, it is better to realise at once than to wait until the price reaches 68s.? Would he not argue that it might be dangerous to take the chance of a rise in the price, accompanied by a corresponding fall in the duty? He would naturally be disposed to think, that others might be importing, and that the consequence might be a diminution in the price, which would prevent him from throwing his wheat into the market with advantage. These calculations, I say, would no doubt enter into the importer's consideration, and influence his conduct; and, under such circumstances, it is my firm conviction, that corn would be brought in at the 6s. duty in such quantities as would afford a very great relief to the consumer, and a protection to the agriculturist from all the disarrangements which follow upon the sudden influx at a duty of 1s. But now, having compared the probable operation of my scale with that at present existing, let us compare it with that proposed by Mr. Canning. What was Mr. Canning's scale? He proposed, that when wheat was 64s. the duty should be 12s.; I fix the duty at 8s. I propose, that when wheat is 65s. the duty should be 7s.; Mr. Canning fixed it at 10s. When wheat is 66s., I propose a duty of 6s.; Mr. Canning proposed to impose a duty of 8s. Now, take the noble lord's scheme. Compare the high prices under his proposal with the high prices under my scale of duties, and I am sure all reasonable persons will form the conclusion, that my proposal is much more advantageous for the consumer. From 64s. to 72s., the noble lord proposes to levy a duty of 8s. According to my scale the duty at 70s. will be only 4s., whilst at 73s. it will be merely the nominal sum of 1s., the noble lord's duty being 8s., unless he reduces his scale by the sudden diminution he spoke of the other night. Why, it is impossible not to come to the conclusion, that of the two propositions mine is infinitely the more advantageous to the consumer. It is impossible to draw any other inference, and I beg to say, that that inference is drawn by those who are better judges upon this subject than we ourselves. I ask you to judge, not by the apprehensions of the agriculturists, or the denunciations of the free-trader, but to examine the reports of those who are most conversant with the corn trade. Why should there be a universal combination on their part to speak favourably of this scale? The hon. member for Coventry, by whose speech of last night I was much amused, represented all those dealers in corn as innocent doves, whom it is very easy to deceive. The hon. gentleman predicted, that under my scale there would be at first a great relief; he admitted, that if it should pass into a law, great many holders of foreign grain would not keep up their corn in the hopes of pouring it in at a duty of 8s., 7s., or 6s., and that the pressure on the consumer would be diminished. If the hon. gentleman, then, will only let my bill pass into a law, I have his admission, that there would be a great relief to the trade. But then the hon. gentleman saw great danger of having his argument refuted by this admission, and he said, "These corn-dealers will be deluded at first; they will not understand the operation of the new law; but the time will very shortly come when they will be aware of the advantages they may gain by operating so as to lower the duties, and then do not calculate that you will not again have the same frauds repeated."

Why, was there ever any thing so absurd as to suppose that a corn dealer will not have a pretty good notion of what is for his own advantage? Every speech I hear in which a gentleman is betrayed into a fit of candour, contains some sentence from which I can perceive, that amid all the loud denunciations which are indulged in, there is a confident assurance on the part of the speaker that my scale is an immense improvement. And those attempts which are made to deprive me and my plan of the credit of the advantage which will result from it, if in two months after the passing of the law great relief will ensue to the consumer, by showing that I am hoodwinking and deceiving the dealer in foreign corn, only show to what shifts intelligent gentlemen are reduced in order to find in it matter of censure. I received this morning from Liverpool the circular of one of those unfortunate gentlemen who are so easily deceived, dated Corn-Exchange, Tuesday, February 15, in which it is said, "The new scale must be considered a very important change."

Compare the rates at which corn can be imported into Liverpool under the present scale, and under that which is proposed. "The present price of wheat on an average of six weeks is stated in the circular at 61*s.* 10*d.* a quarter. The duty which the holder of foreign corn would have to pay at present is 2*s.* 8*d.*; under the new scale it would be 11*s.* On barley the present duty is 1*s.*; by the new bill it would be 9*s.* On oats the duty is now 16*s.* 9*d.*; by the new bill it would be 6*s.* On rye it is 9*s.* 6*d.*; by the new bill it would be 2*s.* 6*d.* On beans it is 18*s.* 3*d.*; by the new bill it would be 8*s.* 6*d.* On pease it is 16*s.* 9*d.*; by the new bill it would be 7*s.* 6*d.*"

This is the scale which is said to be a miserable delusion and deception on the public when prices are high, and to offer no advantage to the commercial interests. Then as to flour, the article in which the Americans are so much interested, this circular states, that at the present moment the import duty on American flour is 15*s.* 5½*d.* per barrel, whereas under the new scale it would be 6*s.* 6*d.* But then it is said there will be no real advantage in this, for I take no precautions against the practice of frauds on the averages. I say it is impossible that gentlemen can seriously entertain this opinion if they will examine the figures. I should ask any rational man who examines my scale to say whether it is consistent with truth and sound argument to assert that I am practising a miserable delusion upon the public, and that I give no advantage to regularity in the trade. Nothing can be so various as the opinions by which I am assailed one after the other. Some disinterested persons tell me to abandon the scheme and retain the present law. No doubt, it would be better to have such a great grievance to complain of. That is what some wiseacres advise, in the hope that public indignation will be directed against me. I think I take a better part in attempting an improvement. Then the noble lord (J. Russell) advises me to propose an 8*s.* duty, in the hope of allaying all opposition from every quarter. Do not disturb, says the noble lord, unless you settle. The retention of old customs is, according to Lord Bacon, very unwise; but the disturbance of old customs, unless you settle and arrange peaceably and amicably, is more unwise still! The noble lord tried an 8*s.* duty last year. If he had proposed that duty now, does he hope he could carry it with satisfaction and contentment to all parties? Let the noble lord sound to the detachment of allies who hang upon his left flank, and who, although they may vote with him, have not, I think, aided him very materially in the discussion. They seem to me to have shown more innocence during its progress, because they feel that those high and enlarged principles of which they think themselves to be advocates, are not at stake. But supposing the noble lord sure of a majority for his duty of 8*s.*, does he think that would be a permanent and satisfactory settlement of the question? If the noble lord had carried it last year, this year as a minister he would have come forward to amend it. Light has broken in upon him now which he then did not perceive; I speak it not to his dispraise. I ventured to warn him last year, not to be too confident of maintaining an 8*s.* duty when prices rise high, and that he might be certain that a pressure would be made upon him to induce him to abandon it. He and others then thought an 8*s.* duty could be rigidly maintained, but this year, in order to calm apprehension, he is willing to provide the means of dispensing with the duty when prices rise. Now, I must say, that the Corn-law which involves in itself a self-executory principle, and is enabled to work without calling in the intervention of parliament or the privy council, has a great advantage over one which requires the interference of the executive for the purpose of regulating commercial duties. Therefore, if the noble lord tells me, that many on his side are dissatisfied with my plan, and that the disturbance of old customs is, according to the sage advice of Lord Bacon, an unwise thing, unless you make a permanent and satisfactory settlement, he must, I think, abandon the hope of acting in strict conformity with the advice of that philosopher, if he supposes that an 8s. duty will secure him from hearing again on the subject of the Corn-laws. The House will perhaps agree with me, that it was necessary for me to vindicate my scale from some of the imputations which have unjustly, as I think, been cast upon it. I know well the difficulties which attend all arguments and statements on this subject; and when I try to answer unreasonable objections, by showing that foreign corn may be imported under my scale, I am perfectly conscious that I fortify the objections of those who are adverse to any change. I know I cannot stir one step in a matter on which opinions are so divided without exposing myself to this. If I try to calm an apprehension here, I see a note taken on the other side; if I try to answer an unreasonable objection there, I am met, not by obstacles, but by the intimation of alarm on this side; and it is whispered from one to the other, that I am conceding too much. This is inseparable from the task I have undertaken. I do believe, that in a mere party sense it would have been wiser for me to say—I will stand by the Corn-laws, and resist all change. Some tell me, that all the change required is an amendment of the averages. But other considerations, other responsibilities, press upon those who are charged with the administration of affairs. I stated before, and I repeat, that in considering this question, the arrangements which ought to be made, consistently with enlarged and comprehensive views—avoiding disturbance of capital embarked in agriculture, and the clouding of the prospects of worldly prosperity and social happiness of those who derive their subsistence from land—looking, again, to the state of commerce, to the advantage, when there is to be a supply of corn, of so introducing that corn that there may be the least disturbance of the monetary system of the country, the greatest approach to regular commercial dealings, the greatest encouragement consistent with due protection to agriculture, to manufacturing and commercial industry—having to consider all these questions—having to weigh their relative and comparative importance, the measure upon which we have determined is that which we conscientiously believe to be, upon the whole, the most consistent with the general interests of the country. We did not confer with agricultural supporters, for the purpose of ensuring their concurrence—we did not permit the abatement of it in this particular or in that, in order to ensure its success. I gave a proof, I think, that I was ready to incur some risk to the government, by persisting in advising that which I believe to be for the best. Upon these principles we shall continue to act. We shall expect, no doubt, from some, violent opposition; we shall fear from others extravagant apprehensions; our reward will be the consciousness that we have acted on the principles which we believe to be right; our hope and confidence in success will be, that when the first storm of passion may have passed away, and when clear judgment and reason and the examination of the documents which we have presented, shall mitigate unjust apprehensions on the part of the agricultural body, then, though extremes may not be reconciled, and may continue irreconcilable, yet, after the old practice in this country, reason and moderation will gravitate towards that which is just; and, supported by that reason, supported by those who may differ as to degree, but who agree in thinking this a positive, substantial improvement, we entertain a confident hope that we shall triumph over all obstacles, and have the satisfaction, without injuring the agricultural, and with benefit to the commercial and manufacturing interests, of amending the laws which regulate the import of provisions into this country.

Lord John Russell's motion was negatived, and the question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair," carried by 349 to 226; majority, 123. The House resolved itself into committee and resumed—committee to sit again.

CORN-LAWS.—MR. VILLIERS'S MOTION.

FEBRUARY 23, 1842.

In the fifth night's debate, on Mr. Villiers's motion for a total repeal of the Corn-laws,—

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, Sir, when I took the opportunity of submitting to the House of Commons the proposal of her Majesty's government on the subject of the Corn-laws, I felt it my duty to state to the House, that I thought the extent to which the existing Corn-laws had operated to cause or to increase that distress, the existence of which was not denied, had been considerably exaggerated. I thought that other causes had been in operation which might be referred to, as accounting in a considerable degree for that distress. One of those causes I then stated to be, that there had been an undue stimulus given to commercial and manufacturing enterprise, in consequence of the aid afforded by the joint-stock banks to merchants and others acting in conjunction with those joint-stock banks. For these statements I have been called to account by several hon. members. I have been told, that this doctrine of over-production and undue speculation was perfectly ridiculous, and it consequently is with some satisfaction that I hear from the hon. gentleman, whose attention has been especially called to this part of the subject, and who represents the borough of Manchester—the great seat of the cotton manufacture—statements confirming, in the fullest extent, the statements I then made, and admitting that by means of that undue and unnatural excitement which was given in the way I described to commercial speculation, a great portion of that distress had been brought about. In this the hon. gentleman implicates his constituents. It may be also that there was an over issue of bank notes, and other causes of distress, in operation; but I only referred to these causes in order to justify myself in not holding the sentiments of those who were looking despondingly at a situation of the country which I considered to be peculiar, and partly to be attributed to other causes, by taking proper precautions against which such causes might be prevented from occurring again. In that, I am altogether confirmed by the experience and practical knowledge of the hon. gentleman. I said also that, with respect to the diminution in amount of our exports to the United States of North America, the derangement which had taken place in the monetary system of the United States might have had some operation. There also I have the hon. gentleman's sanction. He most justly said that, however our own monetary system had been deranged, the same cause had operated to a greater extent in the United States, and that such monetary derangement in the United States must necessarily have operated injuriously to our own manufacturing interests. In 1839, the declared value—not the official value—of our exports to the United States of the chief articles of manufacture, such as woollen, linen, cotton, and silk goods, hardware, and other British and Irish goods, amounted to £7,585,000; in 1840, they were £8,839,000; and in 1841, they fell to £5,200,000. That has no doubt been compensated by an increase in other articles; but still those houses which are concerned in the American trade, must have suffered by this sudden and extraordinary depression, and it must be difficult, although the whole amount of exports may not be diminished, to prevent great, partial, and individual distress on account of the interruption of such a market. I stated also in that speech, that the disturbance of our amicable relations with China might be considered as another cause of the distress. The hon. gentleman, the member for Paisley, differed from me on that point. He said, that the total amount of our exports to China had increased, although the amount of our direct exports had considerably decreased. The hon. member said, that that diminution in our direct exports to China, had possibly led to my overrating the effect of the disturbance of our relations with that country on our trade. It is my anxious wish not to overrate it. Our direct exports to China during the three years already referred to, exhibit a considerable diminution. In the year 1839, our direct exports to China amounted to £1,204,000; in 1840, they fell to £851,000; and in 1841, they still further fell to £524,000, that is to say, at the same time that the great diminution took place in our exports to the United States. But the hon. gentleman, the member for Paisley, said, that although the document to which I referred showed a great diminution in the direct exports, yet there was still a considerable indirect export into China, and by that means an increase upon our whole exports. I think he mentioned particularly our exports to Singapore. The hon. member I understood to say, that our exports to the East Indies had generally increased, but he particularly referred to those to Singapore. Now, I will take the exports to Singapore and China together. In 1839, the amount of our exports to Singapore and China together was £1,582,000. In 1841, they were £1,311,000. Then, even taking the exports of the two together, there appears a considerable decrease. Our direct exports have considerably decreased, and although the exports to Singapore present a considerable increase, and granting that a considerable portion of those increased exports found their way into China, still, although I may rather have overstated the diminution in our exports to China, I think the hon. member is hardly correct in saying that, coupling the indirect with the direct exports, there had been a considerable increase. I speak with great respect for the authority of the hon. member, and if I have overstated the diminution in the exports to China, I can only assure him that that overstatement has been unintentional. I at the same time professed an opinion which I know was unpalatable to those who heard it, but which a sense of duty compelled me to offer. I stated, that I thought the prejudicial effect of the Corn-laws upon the manufactures of this country had been considerably overrated. Sir, finding that this question has been spoken to by hon. gentlemen, speaking with very high authority upon the subject, I have reconsidered that opinion. I can assure the House, that no man entertains a higher sense than I do of the value of manufactures. It would be ungrateful in me, and most unwise, were I to undervalue the importance of the cotton manufactures to the best interests of the country. When I sat on the other side of the House, I often stated an opinion to the same effect. I always expressed my sense of the importance of manufactures to agricultural prosperity. I have always maintained the opinion, and I repeat it now, that the prosperity of manufactures in this country is of more importance to the interests of agriculture than any system of Corn-laws whatever; and therefore, in proposing, as a minister of the Crown, an alteration in the Corn-laws, when I stated that opinion, I did not do so for the first time. But I look to documents furnished by eminent and enlightened men as to the progress of the cotton manufacture, and I see in those documents, from which others draw conclusions opposed to mine, a strong confirmation of my opinion, that the prejudicial effect of the operation of the Corn-laws upon cotton manufactures has been very much overrated. Sir, we certainly used to be told, that the effect of the Corn-laws, by raising the price of food in this country, was to disabuse us from entering into competition with other manufacturing countries. Surely, the argument when exports were diminished was, "See the prejudicial effect of the Corn-laws! The exports of manufactured goods have considerably diminished, and the cause of it is the greater cheapness of food in the competing countries, and our inability to enter into competition with our rivals." That surely used to be the argument in former times; but now that the hon. gentleman who represents that great manufacturing interest, finds the exports have increased, he turns round with a philosophy which, I confess, somewhat surprised me, and says, his opinion has undergone a complete change, for that he now finds the increased exports of cotton manufactured goods have only led to greater failure and distress. [Mr. M. Phillips: Within the last two years.] But although the profits of the manufacturers may have diminished—[Mr. M. Phillips: There have been none at all.] But how does that show the danger of foreign competition from the lower price of food in the competing countries? You say, "True, we can now manufacture goods so cheaply, that we are enabled to export larger quantities, but you must not consider that as an indication of manufacturing prosperity." Granted: that increased export may not necessarily be a test of corresponding prosperity; but it is at least a decisive proof that the price of food in this country has not prevented you from overpowering the competition of other countries; because, notwithstanding the price of corn in this country, you have been enabled to undersell all your foreign competitors. ["No, no!"] But you have been enabled to increase your exports. I have been present at debates in this House during the last thirty years, and I have never heard but one story—"True, the exports have increased, but no one has gained any thing by it." It is in vain to adduce proof that within the last two years ninety fresh mills have been set in operation. I will concede that if they were old mills you might reply that you kept them in work because it was better to continue than to discontinue the machinery; but how do you reconcile this declared loss to the manufacturer with the singular fact that in one district alone there have been within the last two years ninety new mills in operation? "In my particular district," says Mr. Horner, "there have been ninety-one new mills brought into work within the last two years." But you will answer that they were built before—that they were begun before the present state of things commenced; yet if no profit was likely to be made, if they could only be worked at a loss, surely it would have been better to let them remain unoccupied than to have set them working in every direction, with the evidence before your eyes that they could only be worked at a loss? The words of Mr. Horner are,—“Finding that there was this great increase in the consumption of cotton, I was led to the inquiry, what had been the increase of mills in my district; and it will be seen by the list in the appendix marked No. 2, that of new mills and others in existence, but newly set to work, the number since the 1st of January 1839, was ninety-one, having the power of 3350 horses. It must be remembered, too, that I am speaking of them in my own district only.”

But then you say, “It is true our exports have increased, but that is in consequence of the falling-off in the home consumption.” If I have not mistaken the argument of the hon. gentleman, the member for Manchester, he says, that although it is true that our exports have increased, yet that there has been such a falling-off in the home consumption on account of the dearness of provisions, that the goods having been manufactured and the demand at home having decreased, it became necessary to dispose of them in some way or other, and therefore they have been sent abroad. Now, just let us look at the history of the progress of the cotton trade. It is impossible for me to dispute the evidence of the existence of severe distress, and I think I am right in stating, that of all the manufacturing trades that of cotton has suffered most. I may also observe that in those districts in which cotton was the chief manufacture, there did the greatest distress prevail. I wish to justify my own position, and to show that the prejudicial effect attributed to the operation of the Corn-laws has been exaggerated. I cannot, I confess, entertain the confident expectation that a change in the Corn-laws will be found to afford any sudden, immediate, or extensive relief to that distress which I so much lament. And now I turn to the question of home consumption. Here is a pamphlet, which I believe to be a high authority—it is the pamphlet of Mr. Greg. He gives a statement of the quantity of cotton manufactured in this country in each year since 1824—first, an account of cotton exported in goods and yarn, and then the amount of cotton consumed by the home market. Now, during by far the greater period of time which he takes, the Corn-laws have been in operation. I think it will be admitted that to select a particular year would hardly be fair, and that in making a comparison you had much better take three or four consecutive years upon which to form a judgment, than to argue for a solitary or particular case. For instance, I am sure it would be thought unfair if I said I would show you that the price of provisions had nothing to do with the home consumption of manufactures, and then took the year 1840, when the price of corn was very high, to bear me out in saying so. For if I take that year, I find that there was a greater consumption of manufactured cotton than in any one preceding year. You say to me that the price of provisions prevents the consumption of the home-manufactured article; that the people must buy corn, but that having done so they have nothing left to expend in clothing; and that that accounts for the depression of manufactures. But what is the fact? In the year 1824, you consumed 64,000,000lbs. of cotton to supply the home demand; in 1827, you consumed 78,000,000lbs. You then went on advancing until 1840, when the amount consumed reached 175,000,000lbs.; and in the last year you consumed 103,000,000lbs. But let us now take the average of four years, when you say trade was most prosperous, for I recollect that the Manchester Chamber of Commerce stated, in a document which they presented to the committee on Banks of Issue, that during the four years up to the end of 1836, commerce and manufactures were in a most prosperous state. Speaking of the manufacture of cotton at Manchester, the Chamber of Commerce said, that they considered there never was a period of four consecutive years, when the manufacture of cotton had been greater than during those four years when there was no importation of foreign corn. Is it not, then, remarkable that if the importation of foreign corn, or the exchange of foreign corn for your manufactured goods, was essential for your prosperity—is it not remarkable that during the four years which were distinguished above all others for the prosperity of the cotton manufacture, there was a less amount of imported corn than in any other? From 1833 to 1836 inclusive, the whole amount of foreign wheat imported into this country did not exceed 130,000 quarters on the average. I know perfectly well what the answer is. I know you may say—"True, manufactures were prospering during that period when the importation of foreign corn was very slight, but you nevertheless prove the advantage to manufactures of cheap provisions, by selecting a period at which the average price of wheat did not exceed 47s." Yes, but then in saying that, you abandon the argument that the importation of foreign corn in exchange for your manufactures is essential for your prosperity. I am showing you that the four years which the Manchester Chamber of Commerce selected as years of the greatest prosperity were the years during which there was the least importation of foreign corn. But then you say to me—"True, we did not want the importation of foreign corn then, because in 1835, the price of our own corn was only 39s. 2d., and although there might have been great agricultural distress at that period, still the cheapness of corn supplied the necessity of imported corn." Your argument is, that according as corn is cheap so will manufactures flourish. I will take Mr. Greg's account for the years 1833, 1834, 1835, and 1836, and compare those four years of cheapness with the four last years, when corn was extraordinarily high. There has been no such great increase of population during that period as to call for any particular notice, but making what allowance you please on that account, I take the four years of cheap provision, and I find that on the average of those four years there were manufactured 279,000,000lbs. of cotton; that during the same period there was exported in goods and yarn 160,000,000lbs., and that there was reserved for home consumption in those years of cheap provision 119,000,000lbs. In the last four years, when the price of provisions was high, there was manufactured on the average, instead of 279,000,000lbs., 369,000,000lbs. There was exported, instead of 163,000,000lbs. 227,000,000lbs., and coming to the important question of home consumption, I find that while in the cheap year there was reserved for home consumption 119,000,000lbs. of cotton wool, during the last four years, being the dear years, the quantity so reserved was 142,000,000lbs. According to Mr. Greg, the quantity reserved for home consumption in 1833, was 116,000,000lbs.; in 1834, 108,500,000lbs.; in 1835, 121,100,000lbs.; and in 1836, 131,300,000lbs. The quantity reserved for home consumption during the last four years was, in 1838, 173,600,000lbs.; in 1839, 117,000,000lbs.; in 1840, 175,400,000lbs.; and in 1841, 103,500,000lbs.; making, as I said before, an annual home consumption of 142,000,000lbs., as compared to 119,000,000lbs. for the four preceding years. Mr. Greg says, that the internal consumption does not continue to bear the same proportion to the exports. But is that a fair test? Is it fair to argue by saying, "I will show you that the exports bear a greater proportion one year to the consumption than another?" I think not. I think the question should be, what is the amount of progressive increase? And I ask you, whether you don't find that, notwithstanding the increase of population, which accounts certainly, as it ought to do, for some increase in the home consumption—whether you don't find that the consumption of cotton goods, if you will take it upon the average of two, three, or four years, that the internal consumption has greatly exceeded the increase of population? The diminution during the last year, as compared with the previous year, does certainly fortify the argument that the increase in the price of provisions may have led to a diminished consumption. But you should always bear in mind that the consumption of the year before was extraordinary and unusually great, the quantity of cotton consumed by the home demand in 1840 being 175,000,000lbs. The years 1838 and 1840 were the two years of the greatest consumption of cotton goods ever known. In 1838 it was 173,000,000lbs., but it fell next year to 117,000,000lbs. In 1840 it rose again to 175,000,000lbs., and I doubt whether the natural effects of that sudden increase would not, under any circumstances be some considerable diminution in the following year. All I can say is, admitting as I do, and deeply deploring, the distress which at present exists in the country, on account above all, of the condition of the labouring classes, that although they may treat me as they please—although they may burn me in effigy—yet all the manifestations of displeasure they can make, will not in the slightest degree abate my sympathy for their sufferings, or lessen my sincere desire to relieve them. It is on their account that I chiefly deplore the distresses which I admit to exist. It is because of their sufferings that I principally lament these disastrous occurrences. I know the manufacturers are entitled to some share of our sympathies. They have no doubt sustained great losses. It may not be easy to calculate their extent, but we may form some rough estimate of it. I will just refer to a document emanating from the Manchester chamber of commerce. What says the president of that chamber? Speaking of over speculation, he says, that he estimates the loss of capital arising from the undue excitements in trade, and from the rash speculations unfortunately entered on, at no less a sum than £40,000,000 sterling. Are we sure that we have survived the effects proceeding from that cause? Looking at the number of railway speculations, at the speculations in joint-stock banks, at the application of capital to every variety of speculative enterprise, can we be sure that this £40,000,000, asserted to have been sunk, is the ultimate extent of the national loss?

Mr. Cobden said, that the calculations made by the president of the chamber did not refer to losses by railway or joint-stock bank speculations alone, but comprehended every species of loss sustained in manufacturing enterprise.

Sir R. Peel—I quoted from the document itself, and I understood the application to be general, but the point is not of much importance. Sir, I now come to that part of the subject which is by far the most painful. I am called upon to speak of the distress existing in the country, and of the means to be taken for its relief. And here I am bound to state, that I still adhere to the opinion I have expressed, that in an artificial state of society—in a manufacturing country like England—you must expect that concurrently with a great demand for employment there may be extreme though partial suffering. An hon. gentleman who has spoken in the course of the present debate has referred to the condition of the hand-loom weavers. Now, let us take the condition of those artisans in 1836—let us consider their state at that period. 1836, it will be remembered, was a year of great prosperity. It was announced in the speech from the Throne, at the opening of the parliamentary session for that year, “That the state of the commerce and manufactures of the United Kingdom is highly satisfactory.”

The address in reply to the speech of that year was moved by Sir John Wrottesley and was seconded by the hon. gentleman the member for Sheffield (Mr Parker.) The former hon. baronet, in the course of his speech said, “Never was there a more prosperous moment in all the branches of trade. * * There is no speculation, but our prosperity arises from a steady and increasing demand, and orders from houses of undoubted credit, more numerous than even our extensive manufacturers can furnish. The labourers of England are fully employed, at adequate wages, and a bountiful Providence, during three successive years, has provided them with an ample supply of food.”

Mr. Parker said, “I turn to the state of trade, and certainly never were there such cheering prospects announced by any sovereign to any people. The business is sound, and not on speculation. Consignments follow and do not precede orders. Payments are made in cash beyond all former precedent, and activity is regulated by prudence.”

He then went on to give a statement showing the vast increase in our cotton exports, and said that he believed,—“That in two years steam power would be wanted in Lancashire to the amount of 70,000 horses, and 70,000 or 80,000 people to supply that power.”

That was in 1836. Now, my proposition is this—that concurrently with very considerable national prosperity there may be very severe partial distress. As I said before, I know not by what legislation we can meet that distress. Of course any absurd attempt to interfere with the direction of the industry of the nation would be ridiculous. I am not one of those who attribute to the increase of machinery any falling-off in demand. I believe that the greater the skill and the greater the improvements in machinery, we shall find upon the whole the more permanent and comprehensive results, and the greater demand for manual labour. Taking into account the number of persons employed in making that machinery, taking into account the persons engaged about it, and those to whom it gives indirect occupation, I think it is impossible to arrive at any other conclusion. Consider the state of the labour of this country now and twenty years ago. Compare the demand for labour at the present time and the demand for it a quarter of a century back, and you will find that the total aggregate of labour employed is very much greater now than it was then. But that is no answer to my proposition that there may be partial suffering—a suffering involving innocent persons—a suffering which legislation can scarcely reach, and which it is impossible to impeach any particular system, by attributing it to its operation. Now, taking this year, 1836, what do we find to have been the condition of the handloom weavers at that time? The commissioners had stated, with regard to the condition of the weavers at that period, that the total number of the handloom weavers amounted to not less than 840,000—that a very great proportion of that number were unable to obtain a sufficiency of food of the plainest and cheapest description—that they were clothed in rags, and were in consequence prevented from attending divine worship, and unable to send their children to the parish schools—that few of them had any furniture in their houses—that many families, having no bedding, were obliged to sleep on straw; but yet that most of them had full occupation—that their labour was excessive—that they worked sometimes not less than sixteen hours a day, and that to support them under these fatigues, and to carry off the effects of their sorrows and distresses, they very generally had recourse to ardent spirits, in the purchase of which they expended a considerable proportion of their small earnings. Now, I would have the House remember that that distress occurred among a very numerous class at a period when corn was cheaper than it had been for many years previously; and bearing that circumstance in mind, I would ask whether I am advancing any thing very unreasonable when I express my belief that even when the price of corn may be very considerably reduced, yet that there may exist among a larger proportion of the population a very severe, though happily a partial distress? I say then, Sir, that I cannot indulge in the delusive hope—I cannot hold out to the public any thing like the confident expectation—that by any kind of legislation we shall be enabled to render the people of this country entirely exempt from occasional severe suffering. I do not know that there is any nation in the world which is exempt from such unhappy visitings. Take the case of the United States. Even in that country, where the demand for labour is so great, and where the wages of labour are generally so high, you will find that there is occasionally very severe distress. I turn to the account given by Mr. Buckingham, in his work upon America—a work which has been frequently quoted in the course of the debate. Mr. Buckingham has lately visited the United States, and he gives us the results of recent observation. He cannot be taken to be especially favourable to my view of the case, for he is, as is well known, a decided friend to the repeal of the Corn-law. Now, then, let us see what Mr. Buckingham says with regard to destitution in America. I recollect that in one passage of his work he says, that in the state of New York he was surprised to find many more cases of destitution and loss of life from starvation than he could possibly have expected to have met with. He alludes also in the strongest terms to the destitution in that state, and to its numerous charitable establishments. And therefore, Sir, I must still retain the opinion I expressed on a former evening, that I think the Corn-laws have been made to bear an undue share in the sufferings and the distress which have existed in this country; and that I am not so confident as some hon. gentlemen that an extensive modification or a repeal of those laws will produce the effects anticipated from them. My hon. friend has just found the passage in Mr. Buckingham's work, which I will now read, with the permission of the House. Mr. Buckingham says:—"The instances of death from destitution and want are much more numerous than I had thought possible. This indigence in a country where food can be raised so cheap, where labour is in such demand, and always paid so well, would seem unaccountable, but for the fact, that in the late mania for speculation the cultivators of the soil, instead of following up their agricultural pursuits, had left off farming to become speculators in stocks, buyers in railroads never begun, and canals never opened, as well as purchasers of lots of land on which towns were intended to be built, in which extravagant schemes they spent all their time and money, so that agriculture, the great basis of the national wealth, and the surest and steadiest security of individual prosperity in these fertile states, was so neglected, that the country was obliged to import grain for its own consumption, instead of supplying, as it ought to do, from its own surplus, the older countries of Europe."

Thus, Mr. Buckingham, to account for the extent of destitution he found in the United States, a country abounding in food, where the demand for labour is exceedingly great, and which has fertile land in abundance, attributes it to a cause which, if the matter be well considered, I believe will appear to be the true one—namely, the too great diversion of capital from land, in order, that it might be employed in unprofitable speculations. Sir, I have been charged with denying, that any good was to result from the measure I propose. I hold no such opinion; I deprecate any extravagant expectations that great and immediate benefit will result from the plan. I deprecate the same expectations from any sudden and total repeal of the Corn-laws; but I distinctly said I expected these benefits to result from this plan—first, that agriculture would be exempted from the risk of having an enormous quantity of corn suddenly poured in at a low duty; and next, that the Bank of England, I thought also, would be less exposed to sudden drains of bullion, because the demand for corn, when it is required, will be gradual, and the intercourse with the countries which supply our demand will be more regular, and conducted in a manner more agreeable to the true principles of commerce, under my plan than upon the present system. To these advantages I distinctly laid claim; and therefore, it is not just to charge me with having predicted that my bill would do no good whatever. But I am told, that it will do no good, and particularly in reference to our trade with America. It is said, that on account of the distance of the United States from this country, while we keep up a sliding-scale, it is impossible for them to compete with continental Europe in the corn-trade to England. America is stated thus to be subjected to peculiar and great disadvantages, and one hon. gentleman has proposed to remedy the evil by taking the averages for twelve weeks. The same proposal has been made to me by the greatest Liverpool merchant trading with the United States. The statement he made was this:—"Let twelve weeks' averages determine the duty, instead of six weeks, and then I shall be enabled to bring corn from the United States with a knowledge of the first six weeks' average. I shall wait till I ascertain the average of the first six weeks; I shall then take my measures. There will be no material change in the next six weeks, and in the course of that period I shall bring corn from the United States." This was the representation he made to me; but here is a statement of actual import from the United States. An order was sent to the United States by the steamer from Liverpool for 1,000 barrels of flour on the 1st of August. It was put on board the ship Siddons on the 23d of August, and arrived in Liverpool on the 13th of September. This was an actual transaction; the order was sent by the steamer, and the cargo was brought in the ordinary way. An order was at the same time sent out to Stettin for wheat on the 25th of July; it was shipped on the 13th of August, and arrived in Liverpool not till the 24th of September. Now Hull, and the eastern ports have a great advantage over Liverpool in the importation of corn from Dantzic, but I very much doubt whether the import from New York would not be effected in less time than the import from Dantzic. This transaction, which could not be got up with a view to promoting the success of this bill, in which an order for 1,000 barrels of flour was given on the 1st of August, and the cargo arrived in Liverpool on the 13th of September, I regard as a conclusive proof of the statement of the gentleman who spoke to me, that it will be possible in six weeks to bring flour from the United States; and my firm belief is, that this will frequently take place. The order will be sent by the steamer, and no such long interval as has been spoken of will occur before the shipment of the goods. The cargo may probably be on board at the time of the arrival of the order, and in the short space of six weeks in all the transaction will be completed. The right hon. gentleman, the member for Edinburgh, whose absence surprises me, made a speech which was confined to an attack upon myself for some statements I had made on bringing in the bill. He commenced by stating that he represented a peculiar constituency, and that it was absolutely incumbent on him, as representing men who were swayed by no personal interest, and liberated from all prejudiced views, as being the concentrated essence of the intelligence of Edinburgh, to state his views on this question to the House of Commons. Why,

Sir, it is most unfortunate, that in this period of great difficulty, when no man denies, that he who attempts to make any adjustment of the Corn-laws has a difficult task to execute, the right hon. gentleman, although placed in the peculiar position of representing a constituency whose opinions are entitled to greater weight than others, should have quietly retired to his repose, when we are approaching a division, and refused us any reflection of that light he so concentrates. What aid has the right hon. gentleman given us to the settlement of this question? All he has yet done is to vote a negative; he voted with the noble lord, that he could not assent to my plan. The hon. member for Wolverhampton brings forward a counter-plan, that the Corn-laws should be at once repealed, and the right hon. gentleman has decamped from it altogether. He says that he cannot vote for an immediate repeal; he objects to the word "now," and yet he, the representative of this enlightened constituency, has not the manliness to say "No" to a proposition from which he dissents. The word "now" is an insuperable obstacle to him; but he says, "If I give a vote in conformity with my opinion, I shall be liable to misconstruction, and, therefore, the safer plan is to absent myself altogether." Why, what is speech given to us for but to relieve ourselves from misconstruction? And what could have been an easier task for the right hon. gentleman than to say, "This measure I consider to be precipitate, and therefore I am prepared to vote against it," accompanying this declaration of opinion with any explanation he might think necessary? But he relieves himself from any possibility of misconstruction, and leaves to others, I will not say the odium, but leaves to others the far more distinct and manly part of voting against a proposition which in their consciences they disapprove. The right hon. gentleman said, I maintained that cheap food was no advantage. I maintained no such thing, and he proved to a demonstration that I must be wrong by his supposition of a man with £40 a year, and then his question if to relieve this man from a supererogatory charge of £8 on account of provisions would not be an advantage to him. He proved that with a degree of irresistible force. Now, I beg to say, I maintain no such proposition. What I said was, that I thought it unwise and unjust to sow discontent and disaffection among the people of this country, by telling them, that there were other nations who had their provisions at a much lower price. I said I thought the relative amount of the cost of food was not the real test of enjoyment, but the command which the public of different countries had of the necessaries and luxuries of life. I did also say, but not abstractly, as the right hon. gentleman represented I did say, that I thought, by a sudden disturbance of the relations between landlord and tenant, you might produce cheapness of provisions; but I did not believe you would remedy the ills under which the country is labouring by adding fresh causes of disturbance of those relations, by bringing distress on the great body of the agriculturists. I maintain that opinion still. And it was with these qualifications that I said, I thought you were bound in attempting to introduce cheapness of food to guard the interests which had grown up under a system of protection, and under which so much capital had been applied to agriculture. I also made use of an argument, the force of which you deny, but which I maintain, that it is not wise that the substantial supply of this country in all seasons should be derived from foreign states. These were the qualifications with which I accompanied my opinion, that it could not follow from cheapness of food, that there must necessarily be relief from the evils under which we are now suffering. One word now, and one word only, on the nature of the motion on which I trust we are about to divide. It is an absolute declaration of opinion, that the Corn-laws ought to be instantly repealed. The hon. member for Wolverhampton, so deeply is he impressed with the policy of immediate repeal, has not moved that any prospective measures should be taken with a view to repeal. The resolution he submits to us for the vote is, that the Corn-laws be at once repealed. [Mr. M. Phillips, "hear."] The hon. gentleman opposite says, he can acquiesce in that motion; he thinks if they could be repealed to-night, they ought to be so. But those who think with the noble lord (Lord J. Russell), that agriculture has a claim for protection on account of the special burdens it sustains—those who agree with the noble lord that, even if these laws are unwise, there should not be a sudden and rapid disturbance of the interests which have grown up under them, cannot vote with the hon. gentleman. All those who agree with the noble lord, the late Secretary for foreign affairs, that there ought to be a fixed duty on the import of foreign corn, but that it should be for the purposes of revenue—a doctrine not quite consistent with the flourishing peroration on the absolute advantage of man depending upon man—cannot vote with the hon. gentleman. The noble lord had come forward and stated distinctly that native agriculture, in his opinion, had no claim to protection, but that it was politic for mere revenue to lay a duty on the import of foreign corn; but I very much doubt whether an excise duty on corn would not answer his purpose better. He proposed a fixed duty of 8s. per quarter on the import of foreign corn; but would it not be better, with his views, to propose a duty of 4s. per quarter, to be equally applied to corn, the produce of our own soil, and that of foreign countries; and for this reason, because the produce of this country having no claim to protection, it clearly would carry out his views as to the advantage of man being dependent on man, if he imposed his duty equally upon all corn? Does the noble lord dispute that doctrine? It is utterly impossible for him to deny it. If a tax on corn be legitimate merely for the purpose of revenue, excluding altogether the idea of protection, depend upon it it is equally legitimate to tax domestic and foreign corn; and it would be more in correspondence with the noble lord's own argument to equalise the duty rather than lay it on foreign corn exclusively. Those who concur with the noble lord in that opinion, cannot vote with the hon. gentleman. All those again, who dread the consequences of disturbing the relations of Ireland to this country, in respect of agriculture, who think there might be some risk, who are alarmed now at my reduction in the duty on oats—all those who dread the consequences to Ireland of a sudden, unlimited, and immediate importation of foreign oats into this country—even those who hesitate on this subject, cannot vote with the hon. gentleman. Those again who think there should be any interval of time between the present and the total abrogation of duty, cannot vote with the hon. gentleman. The hon. gentleman has given a vague intimation that he might possibly consent to something, if he were certain of carrying his motion; but as the motion stands, the question on which we must vote is this—that the Corn-laws shall be at once repealed. Those who are unwilling to incur that risk cannot vote with the hon. gentleman. It is needless for me to say, that with my views on this subject, it is impossible for me to assent to the proposition of the hon. gentleman. Looking to the proposal I have made, and having heard the speech of the hon. and learned member for Liskeard (Mr. C. Buller), who told us that he thought vested interests ought to be cautiously dealt with—that he thought we ought not to excite undue apprehensions and alarm on the part of the agricultural interest; that he thought the consequences might be, even if those alarms were unfounded, of the most injurious character to the best interests of the country, by leading to the diminished production of wheat—when I look at the proposal I have made, and the consequences of the course the hon. and learned gentleman describes, I cannot imagine why he can refuse to vote with me against the hon. member for Wolverhampton. This I know, although of all gentlemen who have spoken on that (the opposition) side of the House, the hon. and learned gentleman wishes to lead the way to ultimate repeal. [Mr. Buller.—No.] Well, at least to a material diminution of the duty; yet he spoke with so much just, wise caution, and circumspection as to the necessity of not exciting alarm and apprehension in the agricultural body (to which I, perhaps, am particularly sensitive), that I think if I could impress him with the extent of excitement of which I have received accounts, arising even from the modified proposition I have submitted, the hon. and learned gentleman would see I have advanced as far as I can, without inflicting that injury upon existing interests which he so earnestly deprecates; and therefore, upon mature reflection, I hope he will vote with me against the proposition of his hon. friend, the member for Wolverhampton. When I recollect what were the views of Mr. Ricardo—no particular friend to the agricultural interest—who thought that the present system of Corn-laws were altogether defective—who thought you ought to pave the way for a better system, but who yet thought it of the utmost importance to deal tenderly with land, and proposed that a fixed duty of 20s. should be imposed on foreign corn for the first year, and gradually diminishing each year by 1s., until it reached 10s., where it was to remain stationary. [An hon. member.—That was fifteen years ago.] Well, but the landed interest requires pretty nearly the same protection now as then. When I compare the scale I have proposed with that laid down by Mr.

Ricardo—so steady a friend to free trade and the principles of liberal policy—when I compare my scale with that proposed by Mr. Whitmore in 1825, it is impossible to deny that, as compared with these scales, my plan is a material relaxation. Let me now, in conclusion, express an earnest hope, that if the decision of the House shall be taken by a decisive majority against the proposition of the hon. member for Wolverhampton—coupling such decision with that given against the motion of the noble lord the member for London, and in favour of my plan—bearing in mind that as the commercial and manufacturing interests of this country are in a state of depression, nothing can tend so much to aggravate the distress as any sudden or violent change in the Corn-laws, in ignorance, too, of the other proposals which the Government have to make—I trust the proposition of the hon. member for Wolverhampton having been negatived, the House, in deference to public feeling, and in compliance with the public wishes, will proceed with as much expedition as possible, consistently with due deliberation, to pass this bill, not in aggravation of the duty, but as a material remission and relaxation of duty into the law of the land.

The House again adjourned, and on the following night divided on Mr. Villiers's motion, "That all duties payable on the importation of corn, grain, meat, or flour, do now cease and determine."—Ayes, 90; Noes, 393; majority against the motion, 303.

CORN LAWS—FIRST READING.

MARCH 4, 1842.

Lord John Russell stated that he understood there were places in some particular counties where there was a regular corn trade excluded, and some, where little corn was sold, left in the list; he wished to know whether at any time there would be a statement of the reasons for deciding on the particular towns which had been selected.

SIR ROBERT PEEL: Let me bring up the bill, and I will answer the question. The bill was brought in and read a first time, and on the motion for fixing the second reading—

Sir R. Peel said, he would take that opportunity of answering the question which the noble lord had just put. This bill had been drawn up in conformity with the resolutions which had passed through committee, and assented to by the House. It had been drawn up in general conformity with the explanation which he had made on the part of her Majesty's government on moving for leave to bring it in. There were one or two points which it might be convenient now to state with respect to it. In the first place, with respect to the present inspectors, he had received a great many communications, representing the hardship of immediately removing them, and that removal would give ground for claims for compensation, which he was certainly very anxious to avoid, when it could be done consistently with the due performance of the public service. The arrangement which he proposed to make with respect to inspectors was this—in all new towns to place the averages under the Excise-officers, acting under the authority of the Board of Excise. In existing towns to continue in office those inspectors who might be perfectly efficient for the performance of their duties, and to place them under the control of the Board of Excise. Power was to be given to the Treasury, acting in concurrence with the Board of Trade, if they deemed it advisable, to grant superannuation allowances to inspectors removed from office, where, from length of service and good conduct, they might be entitled to retiring allowance. The whole duty would be performed by the Excise without expense, or at a very small additional expense to that attending their other functions. There would, therefore, be a saving of the chief part of the present expense of taking the averages. With regard to the period at which he proposed, that his bill should come into operation—a point on which a question was put to him the other night—as the bill was, in every instance, a relaxation or remission of existing duties, it appeared to him desirable (and he trusted all would concur in this) that when the bill received the assent of the legislature it should come into operation as speedily as possible. Its practical operation might be postponed until the new system of averages could be applied to the regulation of the duties, or the new duties might be regulated for a short period by the present system of averages. He thought upon the whole, that it was for the public interest that the bill should come into operation as soon as possible, and therefore he did not propose that it should wait for the new system of averages. The bill, therefore, upon passing into a law, would come immediately into effect. The new duties would be regulated by the old averages at first, and, at the termination of the first six weeks, the new averages would take effect. With respect to the noble lord's question, the reversion in the list of towns which had been promised had taken place. He had stated from the first, that in extending the area from which the returns were collected, his object was to have more accurate means of judging of the quantity of corn sold, and of the price of that corn, and also to take additional precaution against fraudulent combinations for the purpose of affecting the averages. He had uniformly stated, at the same time, that in adding to the list of towns, he had no design to affect indirectly the amount of protection to domestic produce. He did not wish to diminish the average price, or raise the duty by increasing the number of towns. The noble lord asked on what principle the towns had been selected. It was exceedingly difficult to act on any very satisfactory principles in the selection. It was not very easy in towns in which there were no inspectors to ascertain their relative importance, or the quantity of corn sold. It was evidently very difficult to determine the importance of the markets in towns so circumstanced. But in the revision of the list of towns, they had acted on this principle, which appeared to him a fair one. At present, there were 150, or perhaps 151 towns, in which averages were collected by means of inspectors, and of these a certain number were in the midst of agricultural districts, and a certain number were chiefly of a manufacturing and commercial character. They took first the manufacturing and commercial towns which were not now included in the list, and added them to the existing number. They then made a selection of towns in agricultural districts, and attempted to maintain the same ratio between them and the manufacturing towns added, which existed between the agricultural and manufacturing towns of the existing list. That was the principle on which they attempted to proceed. The noble lord would have an opportunity of seeing the list, and of course of showing omissions in it if there should be any. Some gentlemen might have local information, which he (Sir R. Peel) had not the means of procuring. There might be errors in the list of towns, and some which were omitted might be of greater importance than some which were selected. He could only say, that he had taken all the means in his power to collect the most important towns, and if any one could point out an error, it would be a subject for discussion when the bill was in committee. It was his wish—subject of course to the pleasure of the House—that as the sense of the House had been marked with respect to the resolutions, the measure should be framed as rapidly as it could, consistently with that degree of deliberation which the House might think fit to give to its details. He would, therefore, propose to fix the second reading for Monday next. If it should be desired again to debate the measure upon the principle, and if other business should prevent there being time for considering it—of course, he would not bring it forward at an hour unsuitable for that discussion. If the sense of the House was in favour of the bill, as an improvement of the existing law, he would do all in his power to bring it into speedy operation—not pressing it on unduly against the wish of those who might be inclined to take part in the discussion of it. He believed the bill would be printed to-morrow. He should fix Monday for the second reading, with the understanding that, if the business of supply should occupy the attention of the House until a late period on that evening, the second reading should be fixed for a future day.

Bill to be read a second time on Monday. It was ultimately fixed for Wednesday.

FINANCIAL STATEMENT.

MARCH 4, 1842.

SIR ROBERT PEEL, in answer to the question put to him by the noble lord (Lord John Russell,) wished to state that his motive for naming Monday for the second reading of the Corn-law bill was solely in reference to the public interest and the general convenience. He wished it should be known that what he was about to say, in answer to the noble lord, was as to the course that he was desirous to pursue, and then he must depend entirely on what might be the pleasure of the House. He received daily communications which urged upon him the advantage of taking the earliest opportunity of stating what were the views of her Majesty's government with respect to financial matters, and the commercial affairs of this country. He felt that there was much justice and force in these representations, and therefore it was, that he had given notice for voting the estimates that night for the navy and army in a committee of supply. Wednesday being the 23rd of March, they were to recollect that the following Friday was a day on which they could not meet. On the 24th, Thursday, there would then be a necessary interruption to their attention to parliamentary business. He proposed, then, that the estimates for the army and navy should make such progress in committee of supply as would justify him in explaining the intentions of her Majesty's government, both as to their financial and commercial affairs. Under all the circumstances in which they were placed, he was most anxious not to postpone his statement beyond that day week. Because, if he did, there might be a difficulty in the House coming to a definite judgment, with regard to his statement, before its separation. With reference to himself, he had no personal convenience to consult; but seeing the interruption that necessarily took place in commercial transactions, and that it must continue until all doubts were solved with respect to the intentions of government, he should be most anxious for the public convenience, and the public convenience alone, to make his statement that day week. He should not insist that the whole of the army and navy estimates should be voted before he made his statement. We wished to avail himself of no pretext for postponing it; but he thought it was of great importance that the House should pronounce an opinion on the main branches of the naval and military service, and whether the general views of the country coincided with what the government deemed to be the necessary demand to be made upon it. It was of importance that the House should declare its opinion as the amount of force to be kept up both in the navy and army. When the House had determined what they considered would be necessary for the maintenance of the navy, the number of its seamen, and for the upholding the military force—when votes for these purposes were reported, he should feel himself justified in proposing that the House resolve itself into a committee of Ways and Means, and on the foundation of the votes then passed, explain the views and intentions of her Majesty's government. As he had said before, it was his own impression that the public convenience should be consulted by adopting the plan that he proposed. He earnestly hoped, then, that the House would affirm the proposal of the government with regard to the amount of force necessary for the purposes of the country, and that he thus might be in a condition on Friday next of explaining the views of the government, both as to their finances and commerce. If it were intended, however, to take a discussion on the principle of the bill, he could hardly hope the matter would be disposed of on Monday. It was, however, he deemed, better for him not to relinquish the hope of disposing of it on Monday, but if he were not able to bring on the bill early on Monday, and he would not propose it unless he could do so at an early hour, then he should name Wednesday next for the second reading. He did not mean, he repeated it, to propose the second reading on Monday, unless he could bring it forward at such an early hour that it could be fully discussed.

The subject then dropped.

CORN LAWS—SECOND READING.

MARCH 9, 1842.

In the debate on the second reading of this bill—

SIR ROBERT PEEL said—Sir, I must in the first place, offer my acknowledgments to the noble lord (Lord J. Russell), for the liberal offer which he has been good enough to make to me of the 8s. duty. The noble lord says I should be perfectly welcome to take possession of the 8s. duty, and propose it as the measure of government, and that he thinks my friends and supporters would be compelled to sanction that measure or any other which I may propose, and that I should hear no taunt from him if I adopted that measure. Now, I do not adopt the measure of the noble lord, because I disapprove of it; I disapproved of it when in opposition, and stated the grounds on which I was led to form that opinion. The noble lord, it appears from what he said to-night, was aware, during last session, that I should probably propose some alteration in the Corn-laws. He cannot, therefore, taunt me with any inconsistency in bringing forward a measure for the amendment of the Corn-laws. The noble lord, wishing to secure two members for Lincolnshire, intimated his opinion to the constituency that they had better support Mr. Handley and the noble lord the present member for that county, as they might be quite sure that the noble lord and the hon. gentleman would give their cordial support to the existing system of Corn-laws, whereas it was perfectly clear that I intended to propose an alteration, and that those who would succeed the noble lord and the hon. gentleman would probably support such a scheme. The noble lord, therefore, must have been prepared for such a measure as the one I now propose. If I were to propose an 8s. duty, I could not defend it on the principles of the noble lord. He tells us that he does not wish that corn should be at a higher price than is consistent with justice to the agricultural interest. It is incumbent on him, therefore, to tell us what justice to the agriculturist is. I apprehend that he will labour under the same difficulty as he thinks I do. I am not exactly aware of the distinction in principle here between the noble lord and myself. I have been excessively blamed for intimating an opinion that corn might probably be hereafter at a price from 54s. to 58s., and the noble lord distinctly says to-night—that is the consolation he gives the agriculturists—that with an 8s. duty he does not apprehend there will be any material difference in the price. Why, if the noble lord means the present price of corn, I cannot agree with him. My opinion is, that under my law, the price of corn, taking the average of the last four years, at 62s. to 64s., will be less than in those years. If you adopt the scale of duties which I propose, I must own I think there will be a reduction in the price of corn from any such general averages as 62s. or 64s. I should not have thought it necessary to refer to the speech made on bringing forward the bill, and should have submitted to all the misconstructions and misrepresentations of what I said, if the noble lord had not again repeated them. I have been told that I said on that occasion that I did not contemplate that any relief whatever would be afforded by it to the commercial distress, and therefore half the gentlemen who have spoken on the other side have said to my hon. friends, “Why do you support this measure, from which the author of it himself declares there will be no mitigation of the existing commercial distress?” I beg to refer now to what I did say on that subject. Here is a report of what I said, which I did not correct in any way. I am always surprised at the general fidelity with which the reports of what passes here are given, and I take it as being an ordinary report, uncorrected by myself. I found, on bringing forward the scheme, a general attempt to create excitement and agitation throughout the country, by declaring that the whole of the existing commercial distress might be attributed to the Corn-laws. I found that many persons were suffering great privations, and I found strenuous and combined efforts made to inflame their passions by representing the Corn-laws as the cause of the manufacturing distress, and the great agricultural interest of this country as solely actuated in their maintenance of the Corn-laws by pecuniary and corrupt motives. The language I made use of with reference to this point was as follows:—“I feel bound to declare, that I cannot attribute the distress, to the extent in which it was by some supposed imputable, to the operation of the Corn-laws. I do not view with those feelings of despondency with which some are inclined to regard them, the commercial prospects of this country.”

Those were the words I made use of, and the noble lord, the member for Sunderland, to whose speech I listened with the greatest attention, and I may add also, from the moderation of its tone, as well as from its ability, with great satisfaction, states, that in that respect, he takes a view not materially different from mine. I do think I should be practising a delusion if I said, that the alteration of the Corn-laws would produce material and immediate mitigation of the commercial distress. That was the qualified way in which I stated this opinion. I added, that “While I admit the existence of commercial distress, while I deplore the sufferings which it has occasioned, and sympathise with those who have unfortunately been exposed to privations, I feel it my duty, in the first place, to declare that, after having given to this subject the fullest consideration in my power, I cannot recommend the proposal which I have to make by exciting a hope, that it will tend materially and immediately to the mitigation of that commercial distress."

That was the language I adopted, and I do believe that the effect of the Corn-laws has been greatly exaggerated. I said, I thought there were other causes which had done much more to produce distress; and I declared, that I did not despond, nor did I believe that the resources of the country were exhausted, and our manufacturing prosperity ruined. I said, I thought there were other causes in operation which would account, not altogether, but in a material degree, for the present distress. This is one of the misrepresentations to which, in the course of ten nights' debate, I have been constantly subjected. I have been subjected to the imputation of having brought forward this measure, without the slightest hope that it would contribute in the least to restore commercial prosperity. It has been said, that I declared that the object of the law was to fix the price of corn at 54s. or 56s., or at least to ensure its never verging more than from 54s. to 58s. I beg again to refer to what I really did say:—"Nothing can be more difficult, than to attempt to determine the amount of protection required for the home producer. I am almost afraid even to mention the term 'remunerating price,' because I know how necessarily vague must be the idea which is attached to it. The price requisite in order to remunerate the home grower must necessarily vary; a thousand circumstances must be taken into account before you can determine whether a certain price will be a sufficient remuneration or not; and the same difficulty occurs when we attempt to determine on adjusting the scale of duties. . . I cannot say, on the other hand, that I am able to see any great or permanent advantage to be derived from the diminution of the price of corn beyond the lowest amount I have named, if I look at the subject in connection with the general position of the country, the existing relations of landlord and tenant, the burdens upon land, and the habits of the country. When I name this sum, however, I must beg altogether to disclaim mentioning it as a pivot or remunerating price, or any inference that the legislature can guarantee the continuance of that price; for I know it to be impossible to effect any such object by a legislative enactment. It is utterly beyond your power, and a mere delusion to say that, by any duty, fixed or otherwise, you can guarantee a certain price to the producer. It is beyond the reach of the legislature."

I said, that all you could do was, to determine the price at which you would permit competition with the foreign grower, but you could not guarantee the producer a fixed price, or answer for its maintenance at between 54s. and 58s. For this report, as I said before, I am not in the slightest degree responsible; but, as far as my recollection serves me, it is exactly in correspondence with what I did say. The noble lord selected a particular instance with respect to imports from the United States. I certainly did mention a particular instance in which an import had taken place from the United States in a very short period. An hon. and gallant officer opposite (Sir C. Napier) said, I ought not to rely on that case as an indication of the length of voyage under all circumstance, and desired that there might be produced an account of the length of the voyage by ships importing corn from the United States. I have it now before me, with respect to New York, the chief port from which corn is brought into England, giving the length of voyage of all ships from New York to Liverpool in 1841. The number of ships was thirty, and the average duration of the voyage was twenty-three days; and that being the case, if you do permit, by an alteration of the law, a more regular trade in corn than you have had under the existing law, it does appear to me clear from this paper, that the United States are not, in comparison with Dantzic and other ports in the Baltic, placed at such disadvantage with respect to the import of corn into this country as some people have imagined. Having already had frequent occasion to address the House upon the subject, I have always wished, as far as possible, to confine my observations to the particular subject immediately under discussion. I thought we had already discussed the merits of the fixed duty, and also of the sliding-scale. But the noble lord has revived both. And yet he is not now at liberty to propose the scheme of a fixed duty. This advocate for great principles will negative my bill. He who talks so much of conciliating political support, dare not maintain his own principle and resolution in order that he may collect a few stray votes from those around him. If the noble lord had been consistent, and had wished to enlighten us, he ought distinctly to have explained what he means by justice to agriculture. On what principle was his 8*s.* duty to be maintained? He admits the 8*s.* duty would not diminish the price of corn; if that be so, and if the manufacturer be of opinion that the high price of corn is the cause, of all others, favourable to foreign competition, how does the noble lord think that the 8*s.* duty would be a settlement of the corn question? This is the case of the free traders, the constant and decided advocates of a repeal of the Corn-laws. They say that a bread tax is odious and unjust, they say that the existence of a tax upon corn subjects you to an unfair and discouraging competition with foreigners, but the noble lord tells them, "Take the 8*s.* fixed duty on corn," although he does not think the result will be any diminution of the cost of corn in this country—he does not expect prices will be reduced. How, then, can he expect that his project would be a permanent settlement of the question? and how can he expect to unite in permanent union with him those whose support he could conciliate only when he ventured to move a negative? Why, the first moment he brought forward any distinct substantive proposition, as has been my duty, his present supporters would at once abandon the noble lord. The noble viscount, the member for Sunderland, who spoke early in the debate, not only admitted that this was a substantial and material improvement of the existing law—he not only admitted with the hon. and learned member for Liskeard, that it would have this advantage, that it would occasion an increase of revenue; but he also drew a favourable contrast between the proceeding of the present and the late government with respect to the manner in which they brought forward this question. Having determined on an alteration in the Corn-laws, we placed the announcement of it in the Queen's speech, and on the earliest day on which it was possible to discuss the question, we brought it forward, on the authority and responsibility of the government. The noble lord, on the contrary, maintained an entire silence on the subject in her Majesty's speech, and intimated to the House his intentions with reference to the Corn-laws only at an advanced period of the session. As a question affecting great and complicated interests, and in respect to which the minds of men were much divided, I had to deal with the Corn-laws; and I felt this, that if the question was to be touched, it was desirable to bring it to a practical conclusion. I did not want to bring forward a measure enunciating some general principles, and after spending the session in discussion, find myself in August practically where I was in January previous. I wished to propose a measure which there would be a prospect of passing into a law—not giving universal satisfaction, for that I despaired of—but having the concurrence of the well-thinking, rational, intelligent portions of the community. Yes, and I have had it. And what makes your debates so flat and dull? What, but that the country has decided in favour of my measure? I am not speaking of the Anti-Corn-law league; it is quite impossible that they should so soon forget their vocation as to permit their acquiescence in this law. I am not speaking of the agricultural community, but I do believe that among the trading, manufacturing, commercial classes, there is a strong conviction that the measure I have proposed, looking at the existing state of the country, is a fair and just arrangement. Yes, and if it were otherwise, I should find the debates in this House carried on with much more spirit and vigour. Well, now, this is the second reading of the bill; and the proposal of the noble lord is, that it be rejected. But the decision to-night will be no indication whatever of the opinion on the subject of the Corn-laws, because it will be my misfortune to find myself opposed by those who, with the noble lord (J. Russell), were in favour of a fixed duty. And, by the by, when the noble lord offered me the fixed duty scheme, I should like to know whether he meant the fixed duty of the last session or that of the present. Allow me to tell the noble lord, when he says I scare my agricultural friends by threatening them with the ghost of the late government in Palace-yard, that if that ghost were an indication that the late government were really defunct, the apparition would not be an unwelcome one. [Cheers.] I am sorry the right hon. gentleman opposite does not understand me. But will the noble lord tell me, when he makes the offer of the fixed duty, whether he is bequeathing to me one of those legacies which the late government on their death-bed left to an admiring country—the 8s. fixed duty, which was to be maintained by a resolute government, whatever the price of corn might be, in order to ensure permanence in the commercial arrangements of the country, or that modification of a fixed duty which, to the surprise of the noble lord, he proposed in the course of this session—which adopted the averages, for they were necessary to the system, and provided that when corn should arrive at 73s. there should be a sudden drop in the scale from 8s. to a nominal duty? I shall be opposed by those advocates of a fixed duty on corn who think there should be a fixed duty as countervailing the burdens on land; and by those other advocates of a fixed duty who agree with the noble lord, the member for Tiverton, that a tax should be imposed on foreign corn imported into this country, not by way of protection, but specially for the purposes of revenue. I shall also be opposed by the advocates of the 5s. duty. I shall be opposed, I fear, by those gentlemen who are opposed to any duty whatever. I am afraid I shall be opposed by some, I trust a very few, who, differing totally from the great body of my opponents, think my proposal endangers the prosperity of agriculture. [Lord Worsley: “Hear.”] The noble lord is one of them. Then I am afraid I shall also be opposed by some gentlemen from the sister kingdom—the loudest advocates for free trade, who, when the proposal was in the distance, or brought forward by a government who could not carry it, gave their political support to an administration which was the very ghost of free trade in Palace-yard. Now, I earnestly ask those hon. gentlemen well to consider what would be the consequence of rejecting this measure: 3s. 4d. on oats is the highest duty which the noble lord gives them; and any protection so inadequate, so pregnant with danger as they say it is to the interests of the agriculturists, being at any rate a higher protection than that which the noble lord offers, will, I should think, be preferable in their eyes. My hon. friend the member for Wallingford expressed his astonishment that I should propose so sweeping a measure as this; he differs from me, and thinks it will cause the introduction of a great quantity of foreign corn. I shall therefore, I fear, encounter his opposition, on the ground that the measure is injurious to the agricultural interests. But I ask those hon. gentlemen to consider, if they reject this measure, what prospect of success there would be of carrying any other measure? I do not agree with the noble lord that success is indifferent. I think hon. gentlemen ought to feel that confidence in the strength of their own arguments as to consider it a misfortune for them to be rejected; but I must say, that I do not think there would be any advantage from an increased protection upon oats in Ireland, or wheat in England. They may not think I go far enough; but, upon the whole, considering the present state of parties, and of the public mind, it is not probable that any law will be proposed which will be more generally satisfactory, or which, at any rate, will give increased protection; and if they come to that conclusion, and find among the most intelligent of the agriculturists who wish, perhaps, for increased protection, yet at least, admit that there are considerable difficulties in the subject—an opinion that this is a better measure than they anticipated—I trust that this feeling, which I believe to predominate among the most intelligent agriculturists of this country, will have its due influence in this House, and that my hon. friends, if they will not agree with me in all its details, will feel themselves enabled to give me their support. The noble lord has ridiculed the prejudices and fears of the agriculturists. Now, the noble lord should be sparing upon that point. He has a perfect right, and I do not complain of it—on the contrary, I think it manly and courageous—to change opinions when upon more extended views you believe them to be wrong; but he ought to have had mercy on the farmers who entertained fears respecting agriculture; for, if ever there were a public man who wrote in a manner to excite those fears, and confirm the prejudices of the agriculturists, that man was the noble lord. There sit the noble lord the member for London and the hon. member the late vice-president of the board of trade (Mr. Sheil); and if ever any men did any thing to excite apprehension, the one for Irish oats, the other for English wheat, they were the noble lord and the right hon. gentleman. The noble lord was all for English wheat; the right hon. gentleman was all for Irish oats; but their agricultural partialities have in some degree vanished. Surely I might say,— in respect to those unfortunate farmers whose apprehensions you have done as much as any man to excite. But what, I again ask, will be the consequence of rejecting this measure? In proposing it I offer a great mitigation of the evils complained of in the present system. Reject it, and what other arrangement can be made? Is the noble lord strong enough to carry his 8s. duty? Is any other party strong enough to maintain the existing system, or to give a Corn-law more favourable to the agriculturists? The only alternative is, leaving this question the subject of prolonged agitation and discussion, interrupting all commercial intercourse, disturbing the relations between landlord and tenant, and making it impossible for any man to know upon what terms he holds his land. I believe that as large a portion of the community as any man could anticipate, when a change in the Corn-laws was proposed, have decided that this is a just protection, and I believe that they are anxious for the passing of the bill. I cannot anticipate the support of those who are in favour of repeal or a fixed duty; but I earnestly hope that the great body of those hon. gentlemen who have for many years given me their confidence, and such marked proofs of it in the present session, will feel it their duty upon this occasion, and upon every other future discussion upon this subject, to support the bill which I have had the honour of submitting to the House.

The bill was read a second time, and the House adjourned.

FINANCIAL STATEMENT—WAYS AND MEANS.

MARCH 11, 1842.

Sir G. Clerk moved the Order of the Day for the House to go into committee of Ways and Means, and the Speaker having left the Chair,

SIR ROBERT PEEL rose and spoke as follows:—Sir, as the House has now sanctioned the vote that her Majesty's government considered it their duty to propose for the maintenance of the chief military establishments of the country, I rise to redeem the pledge I gave some time back, that I would avail myself of the earliest opportunity, consistent with parliamentary usage and the public interest, to develop the views of the government with reference to the financial and commercial policy of the country. No one can feel more than I do the importance and the extent of the duty that devolves on me. No one can be more conscious than I am how disproportionate are my intellectual powers to the proper performance of my task; but, Sir, I should be unworthy of the trust committed to me—I should be unfit to stand here in my place as the minister of the British Crown—if I could feel disheartened or discouraged—if I could entertain any thing but composure and contentedness of mind—any thing, I may say, but that buoyancy and alacrity of spirit which ought to sustain every public man when entering upon the discharge of a great public duty; conscious that he is actuated by no motives that are not honourable and just, and feeling a deep and an intimate conviction, that according to the best conclusion of his imperfect and fallible judgment, that which he intends to propose will be conducive to the welfare, I may say, essential to the prosperity, of the country. Sir, from some of the embarrassments which often accompany a financial statement of this kind, I am free. It is sometimes necessary, on such occasions, to maintain great reserve, and to speak with great caution. A due regard for the public interest may impose on a minister the duty of only partially disclosing matters of importance. But I am hampered by no fetters of official duty. I mean to lay before you the truth—the unexaggerated truth, but to conceal nothing. I do this first, because in great financial difficulties the first step towards improvement is to look those difficulties boldly in the face. This is true of individuals—it is true also of nations. There can be no hope of improvement or of recovery, if you consent to conceal from yourselves the real difficulties with which you have to contend. I have another motive also, for making a full and unreserved disclosure. It is my intention, on the part of the government, to undertake the responsibility of proposing that which we believe essential to the public interests. With you will rest the responsibility of adopting or rejecting the measures which I propose, and it is therefore fitting, in order that you may be enabled properly to perform the duty which you owe to the country, that you should have before you every information—every element which is necessary for the formation of a full and impartial judgment. Sir, I have but two requests to offer to the House before I enter on my statement. The first is, that they will bear in mind that, from the period when I bring forward my financial statement, I am labouring under some special disadvantages. I speak particularly with reference to the estimates which I may form of the probable revenue of the country. I have considered it to be my duty, not to wait until the supplies have been voted—until the financial accounts of the year have been closed. If, hereafter, in my estimates, formed as they shall be with every desire that they should be just and accurate, I should have been found to have been mistaken, I trust the House will bear in mind that I am labouring under disadvantages to which others have not been exposed. Another request which I shall make is, that the House will have the goodness to postpone its judgment until I shall have laid before it the whole plan of the government—that they will not judge hastily on a partial development of my views—that they will not hastily pronounce that what I may propose is an insult to the country—or, if I affect any particular interest, that I shall not therefore be given out as proposing something that is perfectly unreasonable and unjust. I earnestly hope that every man, bringing to the consideration of this subject a full sense of our real, but not insuperable difficulties, will postpone his judgment until he has before him the whole of the plan which I shall propose. I shall now proceed, Sir, in the ordinary manner to state the facts with reference to the finances and expenditure of the country; and, in the first instance, I have to refer to the estimate which was formed by the right hon. gentleman, the late Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. F. T. Baring), with respect to the probable revenue and expenditure of the country in the year ending the 5th of April, 1842. Sir, events have proved that that right hon. gentleman's estimate was as nearly correct as it is possible for an estimate to be. I think the right hon. gentleman calculated that the income of the country might be expected to realise the sum of £48,310,000. He calculated the expenditure for the same period, that is, for the year ending April 5, 1842, at £50,731,000. There were some slight variations afterwards made in the votes, which, of course, the right hon. gentleman could not foresee at the time when he was speaking. There was a supplementary vote taken for, I think, the Ordnance estimates, in the first session of the present parliament. I think there was also a vote omitted, that, namely, for the Caledonian canal; but the amount of the difference made by these changes was so small, as to be hardly worth referring to. Of course, it is impossible to say, at this moment, whether the right hon. gentleman's estimate is perfectly correct or not, because a portion of one quarter of the year is not yet closed. The actual produce of the revenue from April 5, 1841, to February 26, 1842, was £43,730,000. If you estimate that the receipts for the current quarter of the present year will be equal to the receipts of the current quarter of last year, you must add to the actual receipt the sum of £4,323,000. Consequently, the revenue will amount on the 5th of April, to £48,053,000, being less than the amount estimated by the right hon. gentleman by 160,000. On the other hand, the actual expenditure was not quite so great as that which he estimated, or rather will probably not be so great, and consequently his estimate, which took the expected deficit at £2,421,000, will probably, on the whole, I think, exceed the actual amount of the deficit. The actual amount of the deficit for a year will, I think, be £2,334,000, speaking, as I said before, from estimate only with respect to the last quarter, but giving the best estimate I can form of the probable amount of the deficiency for the present year. The deficiency, therefore, for the current year we may assume to be about £2,350,000. I now proceed to estimate the income for this year, which will end on the 5th of April, 1843. I take the Customs for the ensuing year at £22,500,000. The Excise, on account of the unfavourable season for malting, I am afraid we cannot take at a higher sum than £13,450,000. Supposing there is a favourable harvest, that will have a tendency to increase the Excise revenue, but it has also a tendency to diminish the amount of the revenue you derive from the importation of foreign corn. With an unfavourable harvest, if your Excise is diminished in amount, then there will be some compensation to be expected from the import duty on foreign corn. I will take the Customs, then, for the year ending April 5, 1843, at £22,500,000; the Excise at £13,450,000; the Stamps at £7,100,000; from the Taxes I expect to obtain £4,400,000; the Post-office, I think, may probably yield £500,000; the produce of the Crown lands I take at £150,000, and the other miscellaneous items of revenue at £250,000, making a total of estimated revenue for the year ending the 5th of April, 1843, of £48,350,000. The expenditure, now that the House has sanctioned the votes for the army and navy, can be estimated with greater accuracy. The interest on the debt will be £24,627,000, terminable annuities, £4,076,000; the interest on Exchequer-bills, £722,000, making the whole charge on account of debt, £29,427,000. The other charges on the consolidated fund I will take, including the civil list £390,000, at £2,368,000. The field I have to travel over is so extensive, that perhaps it will be better that I should omit mentioning the various items. The total charges on the consolidated fund, therefore, will be £31,795,000. The vote for the army, if ultimately sanctioned by the House, will be £6,617,000; that for the navy will be £6,739,000; that for the Ordnance, £2,084,000; the miscellaneous charges on the annual grants by parliament will be £2,800,000; the vote on account of Canada, which is to be expended on the clothing of the volunteers, will be £108,000. I think it was understood that, when that charge should cease, a corresponding sum should be expended on fortifications. I therefore take it at £108,000. I will take the charge for the expedition to China, upon the whole, at £675,000 for the present year. That vote consists of two parts, which I will state to the House. £175,000 will be required to defray the arrears of expenditure for the current year, and a sum of £500,000 to meet the charge which it will be necessary to provide for by actual vote during the year ending April 5, 1843. The total amount, therefore, of the estimated expenditure of the country will be £50,819,000. The general result then is, that the expenditure for the year ending April 5, 1843, will be £50,819,000, and the estimated income will be £48,350,000, making a probable deficiency of £2,469,000. But that deficiency is upon the votes of the year—upon the expenditure which it will be necessary to provide within the year. To that deficiency ought to be added the actual charge which may be incurred on account of the hostilities carried on with China. I do not contemplate that it will be necessary to provide within the year more than £500,000, but he would form a very inadequate estimate of the probable cost of that expedition, who should think that the total expense will be limited to that sum of £500,000. Sir, the expense of our expedition to China stands thus:—The arrears of the sums that were due to the East India Company on the 30th of April, 1841, were £708,000. A grant was made in the session of 1840, of £173,000. That left the arrears of former years to be provided in 1841, at £535,000. The estimate of the expenditure to the 1st of April, 1842, was £658,000, making the total charge of April, 1842, £1,192,000. There have been applied to that charge the grant of parliament which was made for the session of 1841, and which amounted to £400,000; and there has also been applied in India money derived from the ransom paid for Canton to the amount of £618,000. I have, therefore, to set off for the whole of 1841, against the charge of £1,192,000, actual payments to the amount of £1,018,000, leaving the arrears to be provided for at present £175,000. Looking to the extent of the preparations which have been made for the continuance, and I trust the completion, of the hostilities with China, I do not think I can safely estimate the cost for the year ending the 5th of April, 1843, at much less than £1,400,000, or £1,500,000, for £500,000 of which we make provision in the present year. But let us take the whole cost at £1,300,000, that is the lowest sum we can fairly take, there will then be a deficiency, some time or other to be provided for, of not less than £800,000. Therefore, to my estimated deficiency of £2,470,000, in the sum to be provided for the general service of the year, you must add the probable demands which may be made upon you to the extent of £700,000 or £800,000. In addition to this, there may be demands for Australia and other colonies, that may possibly amount to the sum of £100,000. I do not take into account the charge which will probably be necessary on account of Canada—it is not a charge exactly, but I think there was an engagement that we should give the aid of our credit to Canada for a loan of £1,500,000. But that, I apprehend, is altogether independent of actual charge; and I think that, under the circumstances, we should not be disinclined to support the credit of Canada by that of this House. At the same time it is right, that the whole extent of our engagements should be placed fairly before the country. In addition to all this, those events of which we have had recent cognizance, as having occurred in Afghanistan, may, and so far as I can form a judgment will, impose upon her Majesty's government the necessity of calling on parliament to sanction, perhaps, a considerable increase in the army estimates. I think it not fitting that we should come to any hasty decision in the absence of official information; but I have already received a decisive proof that the members of this House, the representatives of a great people, will be determined to make every effort which may be necessary for the purpose of repairing occasional or partial disasters, and vindicating the authority of her Majesty's name in India. Bear in mind, then, that to my estimate of the actual deficiency of £2,470,000 for the general service of the year, and of the deficiency which must at some time or other be provided for on account of the expenditure in China, you must add the probable demand I may have to make for the increase of the military or naval establishments of this country, having regard to the position of affairs in the East. Sir, for the purpose of bringing before the House a full and complete view of our financial position, as I promised to do, I feel it to be my duty to refer to a subject which has of late occupied little attention in the House, but which I think might, with advantage to the public, have attracted more of their regard—I refer to the state of Indian finance, a subject which formerly used to be thought not unworthy of the consideration of this House. I am quite aware that there may appear to be no direct and immediate connection between the finances of India and those of this country, but that would be a superficial view of our relations with India which should omit the consideration of this subject. Depend upon it, if the credit of India should become disordered, if some great exertion should become necessary, then the credit of England must be brought forward to its support, and the collateral and indirect effect of disorders in Indian finances would be felt extensively in this country. Sir, I am sorry to say, that Indian finance offers no consolation for the state of finance in this country. I hold in my hand an account of the finances of India, which I have every reason to believe is a correct one; it is made up one month later than our own accounts—to the 5th of May. Some question may arise on the papers presented to parliament with respect to the commercial assets of the company, but I have every reason to believe this to be a true account of the position of Indian finances. It states the gross revenue of India, with the charges on it; the interest of the debt; the surplus revenue, and the charges paid on it in England; and there are two columns which contain the net surplus and the net deficit. In the year ending May, 1836, there was a surplus of £1,520,000 from the Indian revenue. In the year ending the 5th of May, 1837, there was a surplus of £1,100,000 which was reduced rapidly, in the year ending May, 1838, to one of £620,000. In the year ending the 5th of May, 1839, the surplus fell to £29,000; in the year ending the 5th of May, 1840, the balance of the account changed, and so far from there being any surplus, the deficit on the Indian revenue was £2,414,000. I am afraid I cannot calculate the deficit for the year ending May 1841, though it depends at present partly on estimate at much less than £2,334,000. The House, then, will bear in mind, that in fulfilment of the duty I have undertaken, I present to them the deficit in this country for the current year to the amount of £2,350,000, with a certain prospect of a deficit for next year to the amount of at least £2,470,000, independently of the increase to be expected on account of China and Afghanistan, and that in India, that great portion of our empire, I show a deficit on the two last years which will probably not be less than £4,700,000. Sir, this is the amount of deficiency we have to meet (I mean, of course, only the part I have stated affecting this country); how shall that deficiency be supplied? We cannot escape the consideration of that question; and it is our duty, no doubt, before any proposition be made, to exhaust in consideration the modes by which that deficiency can be supplied. Shall we persevere in the system on which we have been acting for the last five years? Shall we, in time of peace, have resort to the miserable expedient of continued loans? Shall we try issues of exchequer-bills? Shall we resort to savings-banks? Shall we have recourse to any of those expedients which, call them by what name you please, are neither more nor less than a permanent addition to the public debt? We have a deficiency of nearly £5,000,000 in two years; is there a prospect of reduced expenditure? Without entering into details, but looking at your extended empire, at the demands that are made for the protection of your commerce, and the general state of the world, and calling to mind the intelligence that has lately reached us, can you anticipate, for the year after the next, the possibility, consistent with the honour and safety of this country, of greatly reducing the public expenses? I am bound to say I cannot calculate upon that. Is this a casual deficiency for which you have to provide a remedy? Is it a deficiency for the present year on account of extraordinary circumstances? Is it a deficiency for the last two years? Sir, it is not. This deficiency has existed for the last seven or eight years. It is not a casual deficiency. In the year ending the 5th of April, 1838, the deficiency was £1,428,000. In the year ending the 5th April, 1839, the deficiency was £430,000. In 1840, it was £1,457,000. In 1841, the deficiency was £1,851,000; in 1842, I estimate the deficiency will be £2,334,030. The deficiency in these five amounts to £7,502,000; and to that actual deficiency I must add the estimated deficiency for the year ending the 5th of April, 1843, £2,570,000; making an aggregate deficiency in six years of £10,072,000. I am sure I shall not be blamed for adhering to my resolution, in making a full and unreserved disclosure of our financial situation. I do it, as I said before, because I am deeply impressed with the conviction that a full knowledge of the truth is the first step to improvement; and because I have that confidence in the resources, in the energy, and the wisdom of parliament, that I cannot consent to avail myself of that miserable subterfuge of withholding any knowledge I may be able to communicate with respect to the financial difficulties of the country. Well then, Sir, with this proof that it is not with an occasional or casual deficiency that we have to deal, will you, I ask, have recourse to the wretched expedient of continued loans? Sir, I cannot recommend such a step. It is impossible that I could be a party to a proceeding which I should think might, perhaps, have been justifiable at first, before you knew exactly the nature of your revenue and expenditure; but, with these facts before me, I should think I was disgracing the situation I hold, if I could consent to such a paltry expedient as this. I can hardly think that parliament will adopt a different view. I can hardly think that you, who inherit the debt that was contracted by your predecessors, when, having a revenue, they reduced the charges of the Post-office, and inserted in the preamble of the bill a declaration that the reduction of the revenue should be made good by increased taxation, will now refuse to make it good. The effort having been made, but the effort having failed, that pledge is still unredeemed. I advised you not to give that pledge; but, if you regard the pledges of your predecessors, it is for you now to redeem them. If, however, you are not bound by the pledges of your predecessors, you are bound, I apprehend, by the engagement which you yourselves have contracted. Almost the first vote you gave after the election of the present parliament, was the adoption of a resolution, that it was impossible to permit that state of things to continue which presented constant deficits of revenue. Parliament assured the Crown that they would without delay apply themselves to the consideration of finance, and would adopt some measures for the purpose of equalizing revenue and expenditure. I apprehend, therefore, that with almost universal acquiescence I may abandon the thought of supplying the deficiency by the miserable device of fresh loans, or an issue of Exchequer-bills. Shall I, then, if I must resort to taxation, levy that taxation upon the articles of consumption, upon those articles which may appear to some superfluities, but which are known to constitute almost the necessities of life. I cannot consent to any proposal for increasing taxation on the great articles of consumption by the labouring classes of society. I say, moreover, I can give you conclusive proof that you have arrived at the limits of taxation on articles of consumption. I am speaking now of articles of luxury which might be supposed not to constitute the consumption of the laborious classes; and I advise you not to attempt taxation, even upon those articles, for you will be defeated in your expectations of revenue. The right hon. gentleman opposite (Mr. F. Baring), attempting to redeem the pledge which had been given by parliament, to repair the deficiency which was caused by the defalcation of the Post-office revenue, proposed, in 1840, that 5 per cent. additional duty should be laid on the articles of customs and excise, and 10 per cent. additional on the assessed taxes. (Noise.) I am much obliged to the House for the patience with which they listen to me, and feel sorry to trouble them with these details, but I do think them necessary parts of the statement I have to make. The net produce of the Customs and Excise, in the year ending the 5th January, 1840, after deducting drawbacks and repayments, was £37,911,000. And here I must observe, that I am now merely exhausting the different means by which men might contemplate the supplying of the deficiency, and trying to show that increased taxation upon any articles of consumption will not afford relief. I wish to carry your judgment along with me. I said that the net produce of the Customs and Excise in the year ending the 5th January, 1840, was £37,911,000, and the estimated increase in the Customs and Excise, by the additional 5 per cent., was £1,895,000. Comparing, therefore, the income from Customs and Excise in 1840 with that in 1842—and I take 1842 in preference to 1841, because you can thus more fairly estimate the effect of the increased duty—I find, while the estimated produce of the Customs and Excise was £39,807,000, the actual produce was only £38,118,000, the actual increase being, instead of £1,895,000, only £206,000; not 5 per cent. increase in the amount of revenue, but little more than one half per cent. realised in the attempt to impose 5 per cent. additional duty. In the depression of trade there may, undoubtedly, be circumstances sufficient to account for the expectations of the right hon. gentleman not having been realised; but still, making every abatement for these causes of decrease, I think it impossible not to admit that 5 per cent. increase of duty on articles of consumption would not produce 5 per cent. in net amount to the revenue. At the same time, the right hon. gentleman's estimate with respect to the produce of the assessed taxes was fully realised. I know it may be said that full time has not been given for notifying the intention to discontinue some articles partaking of the nature of assessed taxes; but, on the whole, I think we may disregard that circumstance, for although the notice of such discontinuance may not have taken full effect, yet the inference, I think, may be fairly drawn, that the right hon. gentleman did not overdraw his estimate. The net produce of assessed taxes in 1840, was £2,758,000; the 10 per cent. additional being £275,000, the estimated produce was £3,034,000; but the actual produce of the assessed taxes, including the additional 10 per cent. for the year ending the 5th of January, 1842, very far exceeded the right hon. gentleman's estimate; for instead of realising only £3,034,000, as he calculated, £3,500,000 was realised. From this perhaps I should make an abatement on account of the survey of windows. That new survey of windows produced an increase in the revenue of £430,000, consequently the increase in assessed taxes alone ought perhaps to be diminished to something like that amount; but still, if you make that abatement, you will find that the right hon. gentleman's estimate was verified—there was an increase in the assessed taxes to the full amount he calculated, the increase being £311,000, or 11½ per cent. was produced by the nominal imposition of 10 per cent. additional duty. I compare these two results—I compare the complete failure of the taxes on consumption, and the complete justification of the taxes upon something analogous to property. I find in the one case the estimate was verified, I find in the other it was disappointed. These are the results I feel it my duty to bring before the committee; but my immediate object was to adduce a proof that you had arrived, for purposes of revenue, at the limits of taxation upon articles of consumption. Then I say, making abatements on account of the depression of trade, I do not think any man can resist the conclusion which I draw, that to lay 10 per cent. additional on Customs and Excise will end in nothing but failure and disappointment. I have now discarded the notions of supplying the deficiency by incurring fresh debt. I have attempted to carry your conviction with me, while I have endeavoured to show that I cannot look to taxation on articles of consumption. Now, it is possible to resort to other expedients. Shall I revive old taxes that have been abolished, or impose new ones? Shall I restore the old postage duties? I do feel it to be necessary that you should adhere, not to the contract you have entered into, but to observe the request I made at the commencement of my address—that you should suspend your judgment until you have heard the entire of my plan. I must deal with each of these questions step by step. What I ask is, that you should not condemn any individual proposition until you can judge of it in relation to the whole. Never doubting the social advantages of the reduction of the duty in postage, thinking that the duty as it existed was too high, and might fairly admit of reconsideration and reduction, I did nevertheless deprecate, in the then state of the finances, the reduction which took place to 1*l.* upon all letters. I do believe, if it were necessary, I could show to you that from the post-office you do not receive one farthing of revenue. If you will add the charge of the packets to the other expenses of the post-office, the account which will be presented to you will show a deficit in the revenue of the post-office. But when I state that, I do not undervalue the importance of the reduction in a moral and social point of view. I will not say, speaking with that caution with which I am sometimes taunted, but which I find a great convenience—I will not say that the post-office ought not to be a source of revenue. I will not say that it may not fairly become the subject of discussion; but I will say this, that I do not think the recent measure has had a complete and full trial; and I am so sensible of the many advantages which result from it, that I cannot recommend that in the present year we should attempt to alter it. I say again, notwithstanding all the taunts to which I have been exposed during the last month, in consequence of my proposal in respect to the Corn-laws, that no man can feel a more intimate conviction than I do, that whatever be your financial difficulties and necessities, you must so adapt and adjust your measures as not to bear on the comforts of the labouring classes of society. My conviction further is, that it would not be expedient, with reference to the narrow interests of property, that that should be done. Well then, Sir, I must, with my sense of public duty, abandon the hope of realising in the present year any revenue from the post-office. Shall I revive the taxes which were laid upon great articles of consumption, and which were very productive? Shall I revive the taxes upon salt, upon leather, and upon beer? With respect to leather, for instance, I do not know that the reduction took place with perfect wisdom; I am very much afraid that the full amount of the reduction was not carried to the account of the consumer. I believe you omitted to take a step which you ought to have adopted concurrently with the reduction of the duty on leather—namely, to reduce the duty on the import of foreign hides. I am afraid you reduced the duty on leather in favour of a monopoly, and without benefit to the consumer. But the question is not now whether we shall reduce an existing duty; the question is whether we shall revive a duty that has been abolished, and on the faith of the abolition of which various contracts, numerous commercial and manufacturing arrangements, have been made. If I take the case of salt, for instance, I find that, since the reduction of duty, salt has been consumed in a variety of ways in which its use was never before contemplated. On account of chemical discoveries and improvements, in consequence of the application of science to manufactures, salt now enters into a variety of products. The ground upon which the abolition of the duty was strongly urged, was the importance of facilitating the supply of salt to the working classes; but, independently of their consumption, in my opinion it would be unwise to revive the duty on this article, on account of its extensive use in manufactures. There might be a danger of interfering with manufacturing industry, which would greatly check its prosperity—there would be a necessary system of drawback on account of the salt consumed, which would lead to opportunities of evasion and fraud, and increase the necessity for larger excise establishments. I don't think I need argue, therefore, against the revival of the duties on salt, leather, or beer. Shall I then resort to locomotion for the purpose of finding a substitute? Shall I increase the taxes on railways? I confess nothing but a hard necessity would induce me to derive revenue from locomotion. In the present state of this country, when it is a great object to facilitate the transfer of labour, and to enable those to whom labour is capital to bring it to the best market—seeing the immense social advantages which result from the freedom of communication, not perhaps immediately visible, but still not the less real, I should contemplate with great reluctance and regret the necessity of increased taxation upon railroads. Again, gas has been suggested as a proper object of taxation. I must say I should be also unwilling to add to the taxes on gas. I range the taxes on locomotion and the taxes on gas-lights on the same category with the taxes on salt—not that the same principle is exactly applicable: but I freely own, seeing the deficiency I have to supply, I should be unwilling to look for revenue either from locomotion or gas-lights. Shall I, then, look for any portion of this deficiency to any of those miserable dribblets of taxation which occupy the attention of provincial Chancellors of the Exchequer? There are those who seem to have nothing else to do but to suggest modes of taxation to men in office, and as I tried to discourage the applications to me for foreign consulships, and had thought of advertising with reference to Downing-street, I had no connection with the next door; I shall take this opportunity, with reference to these subjects of favourite occupation and amusement to those who, in small communities, turn their attention to financial affairs, and who fancy they have made some discovery that pretty nearly puts them on a level with Archimedes—when finding that pianofortes, umbrellas, or such articles, are not subject of taxation, they immediately suggest them to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, accompanied with a claim for a very large per centage on the ground of the novelty of their discovery, and the certain success of its application. I shall take this opportunity of discouraging all such suggestions, by assuring these volunteer financiers, that men who are spending eight or ten hours a day in consideration of matters of finance, are at least as likely to form an accurate judgment on such matters as those who suggest such pitiful propositions. There is another source, which, adopting this process of exhaustion, I must not forget, which was brought forward and urged upon the House by the late government, and to which I feel it to be my duty to refer. Shall I then hope for the increase of revenue from diminished taxation? Before I apply myself to this point, let me remind you of the extent of your deficit, the amount of the sum to be provided for, and the proof I have offered you, that it is not an occasional or casual deficiency you have to make good. No one has greater confidence than I have in the ultimate tendency of reduction in taxation on the great articles of consumption, if wisely managed; but, after giving to this subject the fullest consideration, I have come to the complete conviction, that it would be mere delusion to hope for supplying the deficiency by diminished taxation on articles of consumption. I have a firm confidence that such is the buoyancy of the consumptive powers of this country, that we may hope ultimately to realise increased revenue from diminished taxation; but a long period must elapse before this end is attained; and I feel confident that the adoption of any plan like that proposed by the late government, or the adopting of any other plan for raising revenue by means of diminished taxation, would not afford any immediate relief, or provide any resources on which we might rely for supplying the deficiency of the revenue. I have looked with considerable attention to the effect produced by a reduction of taxation upon articles of considerable consumption, and I do perceive that in many cases that elasticity which gives, after the lapse of time, increased revenue, but in almost every instance—in all, I believe, without exception—the length of time which elapses, after reduction of taxation, before the same amount of revenue is realised, is very considerable. Let us take the case of wine. In 1825, the revenue derived from wine was £2,153,000. The duty was reduced from 9s. 1½d. to 4s. 2¾d. the gallon; and in the next year after the reduction of the duty there was a falling-off of the duty from £2,100,000 to £1,400,000. In the next year, the duty amounted to £1,600,000; in the subsequent years to £1,700,000, £1,400,000, £1,500,000, and the duty has never since realised its former amount. Upon tobacco, the duty was reduced from 4s. per lb. to 3s. per lb. Previous to the reduction of the duty, the revenue derived from tobacco amounted to £3,378,000; and immediately after the reduction there was a falling-off. It fell from £3,300,000 to £2,600,000, then it rose to £2,800,000, and in the following years realised £2,700,000, £2,800,000, £2,900,000, and again, £2,900,000; but the duty on tobacco has never recovered its former amount. The case generally relied on, as showing the advantage of a reduction of duty on articles of consumption, is that of coffee. The duty on coffee was diminished from 1s. per lb. to 6d. per lb. This was in 1824, when the revenue received from coffee amounted to £420,000. In the next year after the reduction, the amount of duty fell to £336,000, then to £399,000, and in the third year the duty recovered itself, and has gone on advancing. Still, even in this instance of coffee, which is by far the most favourable case, a period of three years elapsed before the full amount of duty was realised. The duty on hemp was reduced from 9s. 2d. per cwt. to 4s. 8d. At the time of the reduction, the revenue derived from hemp was £236,000, and since then hemp has never yet paid but half that amount of duty. In the case of rum, there was an increase of revenue after the reduction of duty from 12s. 7d. per gallon to 8s. 6d. The duty on sugar was reduced from 27s. per cwt. to 24s. At the time of the reduction, the revenue derived from sugar amounted to £4,896,000; it then fell to £4,600,000, to £4,300,000, and then rose to £4,500,000, and it has never since paid the same amount of duty. I do not think I need go through the whole of the articles in detail in which a reduction of duty has taken place. In addition to tobacco, hemp, sugar, and the articles I have mentioned, the duty was also reduced on glass, beer, soap, paper, on newspapers and advertisements; but I think I need not refer to all these articles in detail. In many of these cases, there has been no considerable reduction of the amount of duty, but, with the exception of coffee, which realised the full amount of duty in the third year after the reduction, and rum, there is not a single article, the duty on which has recovered itself within a period of five or six years after a considerable reduction. Therefore, on this ground, I am led to believe, that with respect to the present deficiency of the revenue, which it is necessary to supply, you cannot look to that supply from a mere reduction of duty upon articles of consumption; and, if you resort to that as the only means of supplying the deficiency, you must make up your mind to continue the system, which I thought you were ready to abjure, of having recourse to loans and those other devices I have before alluded to, for the purpose of making up the deficiency. I trust that I have—I will not say, convinced you, that one of those measures ought to be adopted, but that, at any rate, I have clearly explained the grounds on which I cannot be a party to their adoption. I will now state what is the measure which I propose, under a sense of public duty, and a deep conviction that it is necessary for the public interest; and impressed, at the same time, with an equal conviction that the present sacrifices which I call on you, to make will be amply compensated ultimately in a pecuniary point of view, and much more than compensated by the effect they will have in maintaining public credit, and the ancient character of this country. Instead of looking to taxation on consumption—instead of reviving the taxes on salt or on sugar—it is my duty to make an earnest appeal to the possessors of property, for the purpose of repairing this mighty evil. I propose, for a time at least, (and I never had occasion to make a proposition with a more thorough conviction of its being one which the public interest of the country required)—I propose that, for a time to be limited, the income of this country should be called on to contribute a certain sum, for the purpose of remedying this mighty and growing evil. I propose, that the income of this country should bear a charge not exceeding 7*d.* in the pound, which will not amount to 3 per cent., but, speaking accurately, £2:18:4*d.* per cent.—for the purpose of not only supplying the deficiency in the revenue, but of enabling me with confidence and satisfaction to propose great commercial reforms, which will afford a hope of reviving commerce, and such an improvement in the manufacturing interests as will re-act on every other interest in the country; and, by diminishing the prices of the articles of consumption, and the cost of living, will, in a pecuniary point of view, compensate you for your present sacrifices; whilst you will be, at the same time, relieved from the contemplation of a great public evil. [Interruption, and cries of "Order!"] I hope hon. gentlemen will allow me to make the statement I have yet to lay before the House uninterruptedly. In 1798, when the prospects of this country were gloomy, the minister had the courage to propose, and the people had the fortitude to adopt, an income-tax of 10 per cent. The income-tax continued to the close of the war in 1802; and in 1803, after the rupture of the peace of Amiens, a duty of 5 per cent. was placed upon property. It was raised in 1805 to 6½ per cent., and in 1806 again to 10 per cent.; and so it continued to the end of the war. I propose that the duty to be laid on property shall not exceed 3 per cent., or, as I said before, exactly £2:18:4*d.*, being 7*d.* in the pound. Under the former tax, all incomes below £60 were exempt from taxation, and on incomes between £60 and £150, the tax was on a reduced rate. I shall propose, that from the income-tax I now recommend all incomes under £150 shall be exempt. Under the former income-tax, the amount at which the occupying tenants were charged, was estimated at three-fourths of the rent. It is admitted, I believe, that to calculate the profits of the tenants at three-fourths of the rent was too high an estimate. I propose, therefore, that in respect of the occupying tenant, the occupation of land shall be charged at one-half, instead of three-fourths of the rent. I believe this to be a perfectly fair reduction; and it was contemplated in 1816, when Lord Bexley proposed the renewal of the income-tax. I believe it to be a perfectly fair reduction, inasmuch as rents have increased in reference to the value of land in a proportion to justify it. I propose—for I see no ground for exemption—that all funded property, whether held by natives of this country or foreigners, should be subject to the same charge as unfunded property. This is the nature of the proposition which it is my intention, with the full and unanimous concurrence of my colleagues, and with the deepest conviction on our parts that it is wise and necessary, to submit to the House. Of course, the House will call on me for some estimate—the best I can form—of the probable produce of this tax. I am sure that every gentleman will admit that the means of forming an estimate are imperfect; but I will give the best I can make, and state as clearly as I can the grounds on which it is based. In 1814, which is the last year in respect to which we have returns, the income in Great Britain, assessed to the property-tax, was £170,000,000. The property on which the income-tax was assessed, was comprised in five different divisions or schedules. The schedule distinguished by the letter A contained the property which was derived from land. It was divided into three classes:—the rent of land, the rent of houses, and the rent derived from tithes, quarries, mines, canals, and other similar descriptions of property. The property classed under the rent of land, in respect of which a duty was imposed, amounted to £39,400,000. The rent of houses equalled £16,260,000; the profits from tithes, &c., £4,470,000; making a total value of the property derivable from lands of £60,130,000. Schedule B contained the rent of land in respect of occupation by occupying tenants; and the amount of income on which the duty was imposed equalled £38,396,000. Schedule C contained the income from public funds and similar securities, amounting to £30,000,000. Schedule D contained the profits of trades and professions, amounting to £38,310,000; and schedule E the income of public officers, amounting to £11,744,000. Now, I will in the first place deal with schedule A. As I said before, the rent of land is there stated at £39,400,000. Now, I cannot doubt that the return of peace and the cessation of war prices must have had a considerable effect in reducing the rental of land; and taking into consideration the effect of the restoration of the currency, the rental of land may probably at first have fallen far below that amount; but still, when I look at the improvement which agriculture has received from mechanism, and the effect of the application of science to land, I cannot but entertain a conviction that the present rental of land must be equal to the rental in the year 1814. I will, therefore, assume that the rental of land is at present equal to what it was in 1814; and put it down at £39,400,000. The rent of houses in 1814, equalled £16,260,000. I presume I am acting in accordance with the general opinion of this House in entering into these details. In 1814 the number of houses was 2,231,000; in the present year the number has increased to 3,460,000. If the increase of rent be proportioned to the increased number of houses, I shall be justified in estimating the amount of income derived from the rental of houses at £25,000,000. There is another principle on which I can form my calculation. I can take a proportion of rental which was valued to the house-tax, and compare it with the valuation for the purpose of the property-tax in 1814, and I find very nearly the same result. A calculation founded on the relation which the charge to the house-tax bore to the charge to the property-tax will give a present income of £25,000,000. Forming an estimate, therefore, in either way, I calculate the present rental of houses at £25,000,000. With respect to tithe, little doubt comparatively exists. As far as I can learn, from the information of the tithe commissioners, the amount of tithe is £3,500,000. I find that the dividends, as far as I have been able to ascertain the fact, of railway companies, canals, and other property of a similar nature, amount to £3,429,000. I do not think that the annual profits derived from mines and iron-works are more than £1,500,000. Adding these three last mentioned sums together, the result is a total of £8,400,000. I will now recapitulate the estimate of property in schedule A. I calculate the rent derivable from land at £39,400,000, the rent of houses at £25,000,000, tithe, railway shares, and mines, and other property of the same description, at £8,400,000, which gives a total income in respect to which a tax is proposed to be imposed (subject to a limitation I shall presently mention) of £72,800,000. I propose, however, that all incomes under £150 shall be exempted from the tax. This is an immense deduction, being not less than one-fourth of the total of the accessible property. Deducting that one-fourth, the produce of the tax on the species of property included in schedule A will be £1,600,000. Schedule B is the rent of lands in respect of occupancy. The sum assessed in 1814 was £38,396,000, but in that year the value of tenants' occupancy was assumed to be three-fourths of the rent; whereas I take it at one-half of the rent. I assume, then, the rent of land which I can touch by my assessment, in the first instance, to be reduced to £26,000,000, on account of that reduction from three-fourths to one-half. Then I must apply another exemption, namely, all tenants who derive profits less than £150 a-year. On that account I must make a further reduction; so that, upon the whole, I cannot calculate upon a greater amount of duty than £150,000 from occupying tenants. The effect of this will be, as I calculate the profits at one-half, that a tenant who pays a rent of less than £300 a-year will be exempt from this tax, unless indeed he has other sources of income. I now come to schedule C. Schedule C comprises income from public funds and securities. The capital assessed under this head in 1814 was £30,000,000. The payments in the year 1814 for dividends and interest of public funds and securities amounted to £29,400,000. I think there cannot be a question that I ought to deduct the whole amount of payments on account of savings-banks. I must, therefore, on that account, make a deduction of £1,000,000, which will give me a net income assessable to the property-tax from the public funds of £28,400,000. To that I must add for the dividends on Bank-stock, India-stock, and Foreign-stock, the dividends of which are payable in this country, an amount of £1,500,000, making a total amount of very nearly £30,000,000 for the amount of payments in the year 1841. But again I must apply a deduction on account of all exempted incomes of less than £150 a-year. I deduct one-fourth on that account, and the estimated produce of the property-tax, arising from public funds and securities, is £646,000. Schedule D, in 1814, contains income derived from the profits of trades and professions. Here it is exceedingly difficult to form an estimate which shall approach the truth. I find that the total exports and imports in 1814, compared with the total exports and imports in 1841, were in the ratio of 86 to 138; but the declared value of those exports bears only a ratio of 45 to 51. The quantity of British shipping, however, employed in commerce in the year 1814 was 1,990,000 tons, and in 1841 it was 3,292,000 tons. From this I cannot form an estimate upon very satisfactory grounds; but I think that the income derived from trades and professions in the present year cannot be far short of £56,000,000. I deduct one-fourth on account of exempted income, and the produce of the tax upon the whole I calculate at £1,220,000. Schedule E contains the income of all public officers. In 1814 the income of all public officers amounted to £11,744,000. On account of the great reductions in our establishments which have taken place, a very great deduction must be made from the income of public officers. I do not think it could be safely estimated at more than £7,000,000 instead, of £11,744,000. I again must deduct one-fourth for exemption; that leaves as assessable a sum of £5,250,000, and the produce of the tax £155,000. I will recapitulate the total estimated amount of duty from the application of a tax which I will take at 3 per cent. for the purpose of keeping the subject clear. Under

Schedule A I calculate upon deriving .....	£1,600,000
Schedule B .....	150,000
Schedule C .....	646,000
Schedule D .....	1,220,000
Schedule E .....	155,000

I will now state what are the views of her Majesty's government with respect to the duration of this duty, if it shall meet with the sanction of the House. I trust that parliament will confirm the duration I am about to propose; and I trust that parliament would not be unwilling, in case of necessity, to continue the duration of this tax for a period of five years. But still there may be, as there have been before, and of which I do not despair, those revivals of commercial prosperity, coupled with the measures which I am about to propose, that may make parliament naturally anxious to have an opportunity of reconsidering the subject at an earlier period than that which I name; they may wish to have the opportunity of considering the operation of this tax at an earlier period than five years; and although I must contemplate the possibility, for public interests, of that duration, and although I trust that, in case the experiment should not be complete, parliament would not hesitate to prolong it, yet I think, upon the whole, it is only just, in the first instance, to limit the experiment to a period of three years, in order to give parliament an opportunity of continuing it at the end of that time, if necessary. I propose that it shall commence so that the 10th of October next shall be the first half year. I come now to consider a matter intimately connected with this, and of great importance just now, namely, the relation of Ireland to this country, with reference to this finance. In my opinion, if war should arise—I speak, of course, of some great European contest, calling upon this country to put forth all its energies—I will not hesitate to express my opinion, that in such a case Ireland ought to contribute, and I believe she would be desirous to contribute, her full share of the national expenditure. But when I am proposing a tax limited in duration in the first instance to a period of three years, and when the amount of that tax does not exceed 3 per cent., I must, of course, consider, with reference to public interests, whether it be desirable to apply that tax to Ireland. I must bear in mind that it is a tax to which Ireland was not subject during the period of the war; that it is a tax for the levy of which no machinery exists in Ireland. One advantage of the tax here is, that I can raise the amount at less charge than any other kind of tax. The machinery is complete; but Ireland has no assessed taxes; the machinery there is wanting, and I should have to devise new machinery for a country to which the tax has never been applied; and although I claim for parliament the entire right to apply to Ireland this tax, if such necessities as we have seen should require it, yet in the state of society in Ireland there is something peculiar, which makes the devising of machinery for its collection matter of grave consideration. At the same time, as no part of the empire will be more benefited by the reductions which I am about to propose than Ireland, and as Ireland is united with this country, I think Ireland ought to bear a fair proportion of the public charges, and of that increased revenue which I am about to raise. If I find the means of raising from Ireland any thing which might be considered of about an equivalent amount to that which she would contribute under an Income-tax, I should not be reluctant to raise that amount by other means. I think I can suggest two modes. [Slight interruption.] I have a very extensive theme to travel over, but I will not detain the House long, if you will favour me with as little interruption as possible. I can, I think, raise an amount very nearly equivalent to that, or perhaps quite, which Ireland would have to contribute by an Income-tax, perfectly consistent with the terms of the Act of Union, and without imposing any serious burden upon that country. I propose, in the first place, to levy a duty of 1s. a gallon upon spirits manufactured in Ireland, and I firmly believe that, by this means, a considerable revenue may be derived, not only without injury to the Irish distillers, and to Ireland itself, but with much positive advantage to them and to the country. I must shortly call the attention of the House to the state of the spirit duties. In England the duty upon spirits is 7s. 10d. a gallon; in Scotland the duty is 3s. 8d.; and in Ireland it is 2s. 8d. a gallon. If it were possible to equalize the spirit duties in the three countries, great advantage would result from it. It would be of the utmost advantage to place all articles of produce of the three countries—the three constituent branches of this great empire—upon precisely the same footing, and do away with all this system of duty and drawback on the intercourse of the three countries, which leads to great frauds, and operates most prejudicially; and I think I can say conclusively, that so far from Ireland deriving any advantage from the diminished rate of duty, it has had a very prejudicial effect upon her commerce. As I said before, the duty on spirits in Ireland is 2s. 8d. a gallon, and 3s. 8d. in Scotland. What is the consequence? The Scotch distiller exports his spirits in bond, and on landing it in Ireland pays the Irish duty of 2s. 8d. a gallon; but the Irish distiller has no corresponding advantage in exporting his spirits to Scotland; and he pays upon its arrival there 1s. duty on account of the increased duty in that country. The consequence is, that Ireland receives a large supply of spirits from Scotland, but sends no corresponding supply of spirits to Scotland. I cannot give a stronger proof of the evil that arises from different rates of duty applicable to different parts of the empire. Again, Ireland appears to have another nominal advantage on account of the drawback upon malt, but that, in fact, operates to the prejudice of Ireland. The Scotch distiller sends his spirits to England, but he has no drawback on account of malt, because the English distiller has none; but the Scotch distiller, in sending spirits to Ireland, has a drawback of 8*d.*, because the Irish distiller, is entitled to a corresponding drawback. That again tells injuriously to the Irish distiller; and Ireland would itself derive a positive advantage, although paying a higher duty than at present, from equalizing the duty upon spirits between Ireland and Scotland. Of course it is desirable to consider what would be the probable amount of duty which I should derive from this change of the duty on spirits in Ireland. I believe that no one will deny that spirits are a fit subject for taxation, and that the limit to a tax on spirits is that rate at which it will yield the greatest revenue to the State. At any rate, it is no objection to a duty on spirits that it may encourage the consumption of other excisable articles of a less exciting and injurious nature. The consumption of spirits in Ireland in the last year was 6,500,000 gallons. It increased very rapidly from the 5th of January, 1839, to the 5th of July, 1841, and with a surprising and most landable constancy the people of that country, in the fulfilment of the engagement they have entered into, abstained from the consumption of that article. I am sorry, however, to say, that the force of the temperance obligation appears to be relaxing in that country. It may have arisen from some other causes; but there has been an increase in the consumption of spirits from the 5th of July, 1841, to the present time. I have inquired most minutely into the probable effect which the increased duty of 1*s.* might have in encouraging the great evil—illicit distillation; but from the opinion of competent authorities upon this subject, whom I have consulted, I think that spirits in Ireland will bear a corresponding rise to the amount of duty on spirits in Scotland without any risk of diminishing consumption, or giving encouragement to illicit distillation. If that be so, if an additional duty of 1*s.* a gallon be paid, taking the annual consumption of spirits at what it is now, namely, 6,500,000 gallons, after deducting for some decrease in consumption and for an increased expense of supervision, I should hope to realise from spirits in Ireland an income of £250,000. The other source from which I contemplate deriving an additional income from Ireland is making with the tax on spirits an equivalent for that which I should have hoped to derive from a property-tax, is a source perfectly legitimate, and in its effect will, to a certain extent, fall upon property. I propose, in respect to the great mass of articles, particularly with respect to all those which are connected with property, to equalize the stamp duties in Ireland with those in this country. At the present time the duties are the same upon newspapers, marine insurance, policies, protests, and foreign bills of exchange. I propose not to increase the stamp duties in Ireland in all cases, for I propose no addition to the rate of duty upon advertisements, or upon leases just fallen in. In each country, both in great Britain and Ireland, I propose to make some reductions in the stamp duty. On charter parties in every part of the United Kingdom I propose a reduction from 3*s.* to 5*s.* I propose also to reduce the stamp duty on bills of lading in Great Britain and Ireland from 3*s.*, the present amount, to 6*d.* But I propose to raise Ireland to the English level, with respect to those stamp duties which affect property, and to make the contributions from Ireland equivalent to a contribution from a property-tax. I estimate that the equalization of stamp duties in Ireland to those of England, with the exception I have mentioned—namely, advertisements, which I do not propose to raise, is likely to produce £160,000; add that amount from the stamp duties to the £250,000 from the spirit duties and the increased duty from Ireland will amount to £410,000, and I have the most perfect conviction that that is wiser and better, and more just under present circumstances, than to devise new machinery, and impose a property-tax in that country. At the same time, with respect to absentees from Ireland, I propose that they shall be subject to the income-tax as if their estate were in England. If they find the burden onerous they can throw it off by returning to their own country; and, by spending their income on their estates, they may escape the levy I propose. But speaking of regular professed absentees, living and spending their incomes in this country, without any call of public duty, I think the income they derive from Ireland ought to be subjected to the same impost as incomes derived from England. Sir, there is one other duty I mean to propose. At present there is a duty imposed by law upon the export of coals in foreign ships of 4s. per ton. When that duty was imposed, it was the policy of the legislature to encourage the employment of British vessels, and no duty was imposed on coal exported in British ships. Now, the operation of the reciprocity treaties, as no duty is levied on coals exported in British ships, has been to exempt foreign ships from the duty which it was originally intended to levy on the export of coals. Sir, I must say I cannot conceive any more legitimate object of duty than coal exported to foreign countries. I speak of a reasonable and just duty, and I say that a tax levied on an article produced in this country—an element of manufactures—necessary to manufactures—contributing by its export to increase the competition with our own manufactures—I think that a tax on such an article is a perfectly legitimate source of revenue. Sir, it is important to consider the rapid increase in the quantity of coal exported; in 1831, the quantity was 356,000 tons, the duty received being £50,000; in 1833, the quantity was 448,000 tons, the duty being £64,710; in 1839, the quantity was 1,192,000 tons; in 1840, 1,307,000 tons; but the realised income, instead of being, as in 1833, £64,000, was only, in 1840, £6,900! Now, I do not intend to increase the duty. I wish not at all to prohibit the export of coals; but I propose that the duty at first intended to be levied on coals exported in foreign ships should be paid; and with this view I propose that the duty of 4s. per ton shall be levied on coal exported in British, as well as in foreign, ships, thus removing the exemption which, under the reciprocity system, the foreign ships claim, and also removing all grounds of complaint. If the duty of 4s. shall be paid on the same number of tons as are now exported, I shall then derive an annual amount from this source of revenue of £200,000, not an inconsiderable increase of revenue, and operating, as few taxes do, to the encouragement of native industry. Now, Sir, having stated to the House all the new taxes I mean to propose, perhaps it may be convenient to the House that I should briefly review the total amount. Of course I am speaking of the year ending the 5th of April, 1843; as it is from the 5th of April, 1842, that I propose these taxes to commence, with the exception of that on spirits, which (in order to avoid evasion) I must propose for adoption at the earliest possible period. Then, Sir, calculating with respect to the property-tax a receipt of £3,700,000 (dealing only, now, in round numbers), from the stamp duties' equalization £160,000, from the increase of spirit duties £250,000, and from the duty on the export of coal £200,000, I make the total £4,310,000, as the amount of annual estimated income derivable from the new imposts I propose. [Mr. Labouchere intimated across the table that Sir Robert Peel had omitted an item of £70,000, to which the right hon. baronet assenting, stated the amount would then be £4,380,000.] Now, Sir, I must deduct from this amount the estimated deficiency on actual votes, for which, of course, I must provide—that I take to be £2,570,000, leaving a surplus of £1,800,000. But then the House will bear in mind, that this deficiency arises on votes for the current year, and that there must be added the excess of expenditure on the China expedition, &c., which I cannot estimate at less than £800,000. Whatever measures, also, it will be necessary for us to adopt in respect to India must be deducted from the estimate; but for the present, with these reserves, and subject to such additional deductions, I calculate on a surplus of £1,800,000, after providing for the excess of expenditure on actual votes. Having that surplus, then, Sir, in what way shall we apply it? I propose to apply it, namely, in a manner which I think will be most conducive to the public interests, and most consonant with public feeling and opinion—by making great improvements in the commercial tariff of England, and, in addition to these improvements, to abate the duties on some great articles of consumption. Sir, I look to the tariff, and find that it comprises not less than 1200 articles subject to various rates of duty. During the interval which I have been blamed for taking to consider the subject, I can only say, that each individual item in that tariff has been subjected to the most careful consideration of myself and colleagues. In the case of each article we have endeavoured to determine, as well as we can, the proportion borne by the duty to the average price of the article, for the purpose of ascertaining to what extent it may be desirable to make reductions of the several duties; and the measure which I shall propose will contain a complete review, on general principles, of all the articles of the tariff, with a very great alteration of many of the duties. We have proceeded, Sir, on these principles (observe, that I am speaking of general views; there may be individual articles which should form exceptions, but I wish a general result); first, we desire to remove all prohibition, and the relaxation of duties of a prohibitory character; next, we wish to reduce the duties on raw materials for manufactures to a considerable extent—in some cases the duty we propose being merely nominal, for the purpose more of statistical than revenue objects; in no case, or scarcely any, exceeding, in the case of raw materials, 5 per cent. I speak, of course, in a general way. Then we propose that the duties on articles partly manufactured shall be materially reduced, never exceeding 12 per cent. Again, I say, I speak only as to general principles, and without reference to particular cases that may be excepted; while as to duties on articles wholly manufactured, we propose that they shall never exceed 20 per cent. These are the general views of the government as to the maximum duties to be imposed, not referring to certain commodities which I will mention subsequently. The course we have pursued, Sir, is this:—We have arranged the whole tariff under twenty heads. Under the first head, for instance, including live animals and provisions of all kinds; under the second, articles considered as spices; under the third, seeds; under the fourth, wood for furniture; under the fifth, ores, and other materials for manufactures; and without, Sir, going through all the immense mass of detail, I propose forthwith to lay before the House the amended tariff scheme. It is all prepared; it is arranged as clearly as possible under the twenty different heads, classing, as nearly as practicable, articles of a similar nature, each schedule arranged under five columns—the first giving the names of the articles, the second the present rate of duty, the third the amount of duty actually received during the year 1840, taken from the import duties' committee report, the fourth the proposed rate of duty to be levied on articles imported from foreign countries, fifthly, the proposed rates of duty on the imports from British colonial possessions. Now, Sir, it appears that I could not lay before the House my project in any clearer way than in the one I intend. To attempt to go through all the provisions of my plan, at present, would increase my labour too much, and too greatly fatigue the House. Here, Sir, is the new tariff, arranged under the twenty different heads I mentioned; and on Monday morning all those engaged in commerce and manufactures throughout the country will have the opportunity of seeing what are the duties which the government intend to propose. [The right hon. baronet laid the paper on the table.] Now, Sir, speaking generally, as I said before, I think that out of the 1200 articles in the tariff, it is proposed to reduce the duty on 750—on all those articles which enter into manufactures as chief constituent materials. There remain about 450 articles on which it does not appear necessary for the interests of commerce, and for the interests of consumers, to make any deduction of duty. But on 750 duties, out of 1200, I do propose reductions, some of them most material. Now, there are some very important articles on which we do not propose any reductions; partly from considerations of revenue exclusively; partly on this account, that we found, on entering office, there were negotiations pending with many states, in respect to proposed commercial treaties; and we have done all we could to continue those negotiations, commencing, also, with some other states. We have at this moment a treaty pending, commenced under the auspices of the noble lord opposite, with Portugal; and I firmly believe, that had it not been for recent events disturbing the peace of that country, this treaty would ere this have been completed. We have opened communications with Spain, for the purpose of forming a commercial treaty with that country, strongly urging on that country the policy of encouraging international commerce. As to this treaty, I can say nothing more at present than that the proposition was favourably received by the Spanish government. We have, further, negotiations pending with Sardinia and with Naples; we have commercial treaties arranging with some of the South American states; we have, moreover, intimated to France our earnest desire to resume negotiations for the completion of a commercial treaty, founded on principles, as I believe, of reciprocal benefit, and having a tendency to strengthen the ties of amity and friendly feeling between the countries. This treaty, which was nearly completed by the noble lord, I must wish had been carried into effect by him, believing most sincerely, that France and England would, morally as well as commercially, have derived the greatest benefit from it. I know not which country would have benefited most. There is the opportunity of materially benefiting the trade and industry of both countries, by the relaxation of present duties. Would the prejudices of the French people admit of it, the benefit resulting to one country would re-act beneficially on the other, to an extent not to be estimated. I think it, however, right, adhering to strict truth, to add, that I can offer no prospect as to the probable period at which this treaty may be ratified; but with my conviction of the reciprocal benefits certain to result from it, I sincerely hope that the public mind in France will support the government of that country in carrying it out. Now, while these treaties are pending, there are several articles, wine and brandy for instance, which would enter into discussions with these states, and in respect to the duties on which, therefore, I shall humbly advise the House not at present to make any material relaxation. I will not now enter upon the question, as to whether it be or be not wise to make reductions of duty on imports without obtaining an assurance of corresponding relaxations from the countries benefited by our reduction of duty; but I must say, that when we make such reductions on articles imported, we ought to do our utmost to procure from foreign countries benefited thereby corresponding advantages for England. Nor can I deem it wise to diminish the hope of satisfactorily arranging these relaxations with foreign nations, by rashly reducing the amount of duties on articles which must form the bases of negotiation. I do not, therefore, propose any reduction in the amount of duties on brandy, wines, &c., though I hope that they may be reduced when corresponding relaxations are made by other countries benefited by our reductions. These observations are applicable to various kinds of fruits on which I should be desirous of remitting duties, but on which, as they form the subject of negotiations with some foreign powers, I propose to retain the present rates of duty, in order to facilitate our negotiations for the remission of duties on British manufactures and commerce. I do not think it necessary to enumerate other articles with respect to which no alteration will be made. The tariff will soon be in the hands of hon. members, and will furnish them with the requisite information. Now, Sir, these various reductions, or removals of prohibitions, or relaxations of duties, on articles such as oils, ores, &c.,—these reductions having a tendency to remove the burdens upon commerce, and increase its buoyancy, and producing as they will, I firmly believe, advantages to commerce and manufactures far exceeding in proportion the loss to the revenue, will consume about £270,000 of the surplus I have mentioned. Sir, I have been speaking of reductions of duty on articles entering into manufactures; I now address myself to the consideration of reductions in duties on great articles of consumption. Sir, the chief articles of consumption to which duties refer are (independently of wines, &c.) sugar, coffee, and tea. I wish I had it in my power to state to the House, that her Majesty's government could propose to parliament such an alteration in the duties on sugar as would be likely to afford a large measure of advantage to the consumer. I do not deny, that if we were wholly unembarrassed by the question of the slave-trade, that I should have felt it my duty to propose a considerable alteration on this subject; but, looking at our position with reference to our own West India colonies, and having due regard to our relations with foreign states, and bearing in mind the treaties into which we have entered, I confess I do not see how it would be possible for me, with justice or with safety, to propose any modification of the duties now collected from sugar; at the same time I am quite prepared to admit that this is a department susceptible of some change. The proposition which I shall have to make will be, not like the measure proposed in the last session of Parliament, which would have had the effect of exposing sugar, the produce of British possessions, to foreign competition; but, on the contrary, one which will protect the British producer, while, as I hope, it will do no injury to the consumer. If I did reduce the duties on sugar, I trust that the reduction would be such as to ensure an increased consumption at a diminished charge. I need scarcely remind hon. members, that it is of the utmost importance so to limit these changes as that the profit shall fall, not into the hands of the retail dealer, or rather, I should say, that the whole advantage of the remission of duties should accrue to the consumer alone. I cannot consent, neither can those with whom I have the honour to act, acquiesce in any arrangement the effect of which would be to permit the accession or the import of sugar into this country, the produce of Brazil or of Cuba, without making some effort for the purpose of restraining that trade which this country has so long and so vigorously resisted. I retain the opinion which I formerly expressed upon this subject—that I do not believe it would be consistent with the honour and character of this country to take any course, however strong the motive for its adoption, the tendency of which would be to give the remotest sanction or encouragement to that traffic; but, on the contrary, to spare no pains and evade no sacrifice which could with safety and justice be made for the purpose of effecting its abolition, or, as far as our power extended, of mitigating its severity. Considering then the peculiar circumstances of our position with respect to the slave-trade, I cannot think it would be for the honour, the character, or the advantage of this country that we permit a competition between sugar the produce of British possessions, and the sugar of foreign colonies produced by slave-labour. Is it politic to adhere to the principle of reducing the duty on sugar the produce of British possessions alone? I greatly doubt the policy of any such reduction. If there could be a free competition, then I should say, that the case would be most materially altered. Nothing can be more evident than that it would be greatly to the advantage of the West India proprietors, that her Majesty's government should encourage the growth of their sugar by a considerable remission of duties; but while sugar received only that support which was at present conceded to it, it should not be forgotten that the trade in sugar partook in some degree of the nature of a monopoly, and therefore I am afraid to reduce the duty; I am afraid, as the supply is limited, that the cost price to the consumer would not be reduced. I am afraid, that such reduction would operate, not as a relief to the consumer, but a bonus to the West India proprietor; and though I do not disguise from myself the advantage of reducing the duty on sugar, yet, after every consideration which I have been able to give the subject, I am not able to communicate views differing from those which I expressed last year. There are, I confess, some circumstances from which I derive consolation in adhering to these views; I find that in the year 1841, there has been a very material increase in the consumption of sugar the produce of British possessions. I shall now proceed to lay before the House a short statement, showing the recent consumption of sugar, and the amount of duty collected from the importation of that commodity. In the year 1840, that is, the year ending the 5th of January, 1841, the quantity of sugar imported from British possessions was 4,035,000 cwt. In 1841, viz., the year ending on the 5th of January, 1842, the importation of sugar amounted to 4,880,000 cwt. The quantity of sugar imported for home consumption in the year 1840 was 3,594,000 cwt. In 1841 it was 4,058,000 cwt. The gross amount of duty collected in the year 1840 was £4,465,000. In 1841 the duty collected amounted to £5,120,000. Thus it will be seen that the duties, without the addition of the foreign sugars, correspond as nearly as possible with the calculation made last year by the right hon. gentleman opposite; but the House would, of course, see that the consumption of the present exceeded the consumption of last year, and the total amount imported from British possessions in the East Indies in the current year exceeded the importations of the preceding season. It is almost needless to observe that the imports afford the best data which we can possess for the purpose of forming an estimate of the probable supply for the ensuing year. There is at present, or I should say there was on the 5th of the present month, in London, of British plantation, Mauritius, and East Indian sugar 410,000 cwt., while in the outports the quantity was 180,000 cwt. The total quantity then in warehouse in this country was 590,000 cwt. On the expected imports of sugar during the year 1843 I have sought the best information, and consulted those on whose judgment I have good reason to rely. The result of the communications which I have held upon the subject lead me to the conclusion that as nearly as possible the imports of sugar in the next year may be estimated at 2,400,000 cwt. from the West Indies, 800,000 cwt. from the Mauritius, and 1,700,000 cwt. from the East Indies, making a total of 4,900,000 cwt. Now, if we add to this the quantity at present in warehouse in England, namely 590,000 cwt., we have for the consumption of the year 1843, a quantity of sugar which might fairly be estimated at 5,490,000 cwt. The amount of sugar taken out for home consumption in the present year was 4,040,000 cwt.; now that would leave a surplus over the largest quantity ever derived from British colonies of not less than 122,000 cwt. The statements which I have made are founded upon the best and the most accurate information which it was in my power to obtain, but I do not mean to say that it warrants a conclusive argument against the principle of permitting foreign competition in the article of sugar, supposing always that we were not embarrassed by the question of slavery; but I am happy to say that the opinion expressed by government as to the anticipated reduction in the price of sugar, and the increase to the revenue without resorting to foreign supplies, has been fully realised. I am quite aware that other questions have arisen with respect to the application of our efforts towards laying a foundation for the gradual abolition of slavery, in the success of which the country is much interested, and the success of which is of the highest importance to the honour, the good faith, and the prosperity of Great Britain. Imputations on the honour and good faith of the country have been thrown out in reference to the efforts which we have made to accomplish the total abolition of slavery. One of the fairest and most obvious modes by which charges of that nature may be answered is, to avoid any thing which could be construed into an encouragement, direct or indirect, of the slave trade; therefore am I disinclined to incur the risk of doing any thing that could tend to increase the horrors of slavery. On those grounds, then, I adhere to the opinion which I expressed in the course of last year, and which I repeat on the present occasion, that I am opposed to the reduction of the duty on sugar while it partakes of the character of a monopoly. I now come to two articles of very general consumption—coffee and timber. With respect to both of these, I trust that the propositions that I shall have to make will be more generally acceptable. I am sorry to say, that though there has been an increase in the consumption of sugar, there has been a decrease in the consumption of coffee. In the year 1840 the home consumption of coffee was 2,870,000lb. In 1841 it was 2,844,100lb. The gross amount of duty received in the former year was £922,000, and in the latter £880,000. The duty on foreign coffee is 1s. 3d., while on coffee produced in British possessions the duty is only 6d., and the duty on coffee produced in territories comprehended within the limits of the East India Company's Charter is 9d. Will the House do me the favour to look for a moment at the effect of this condition of our fiscal regulations? Coffee the produce of Brazil and Hayti is conveyed to the Cape of Good Hope, and thence transmitted to England, in order that it may come in at a duty of 9d. This, with 1d. for the charges of freight, places foreign coffee under a burden of 10d., when coffee the produce of British possessions pays 6d. Now, it appears to me in this case the wisest, the fairest, and the best policy to make a reduction on great articles of consumption, instead of several of smaller amount on articles of minor importance. I desire to make the reduction considerable, and I desire at the same time to make it effectual, and the mode in which I propose to accomplish this is, by imposing two simple duties, and to get rid of the absurdity of sending coffee from Brazil and Hayti to take a voyage to the Cape of Good Hope before it comes to England. I thus appear to myself to get rid of the charges of freight, and to place the provisions respecting the importation of coffee upon a simple and intelligible basis. I intend that coffee, the produce of British possessions, shall come in at a duty of 4d., and that foreign coffee shall pay 8d. I shall now proceed to calculate the probable loss to the revenue from this arrangement. In the year 1841 the quantity of coffee imported from our own possessions was 17,571,884lb. The supply of foreign coffee during the same period was 10,849,000lb. Now, with the altered duty, I find, upon the most accurate estimate which can be made of the probable loss, that it will not exceed £171,000. The whole of the calculation into which I have entered stands thus:—

		Revenue.
From British possessions, 17,571,884lb. at 6d.	.	£463,699
„ Foreign countries, 10,849,096lb. at 9d. 1s. and 1s. 3d.	.	427,947
Revenue received in 1841	.	£891,646

	Revenue.
Assuming no increased consumption, the Revenue at the two duties of 4 d. and 8 d. would be—
From British possessions, 17,571,884lb. at 4 d.	£292,864
„ Foreign countries, 10,849,096lb. at 8 d.	361,636
Revenue for 1842 and 1843	654,500
Revenue for 1841	891,646
Loss, assuming no increase of consumption	237,146
Assuming that the increase of consumption will be 10 per cent., viz. producing	65,450
Probable loss of revenue	£171,696

Adding this loss to that which I have already estimated will be incurred by the reduction of the duty on articles consumed in manufactures—namely, the sum of £270,000, it will show a total decrease of £441,000, in the revenue now obtained from the necessaries of life. The other great article to which it is necessary that I should now direct the attention of the House, is the article of timber. I am anxious to begin by applying as much as possible of the surplus revenue to the reduction of the duty on timber, but here again I find myself considerably embarrassed by our relations with Canada. The present rate of duty on foreign timber is 5*s.* a load, but the duty on timber is now levied in a complicated and unfair way. And in taking the average amount of duty on foreign timber, including the duty on deals, staves, and laths, taking the whole together, the aggregate amount will not exceed 4*s.* a load. The duty on colonial timber is 10*s.* a load, and here also the average duty may be taken at 8*s.* or 9*s.* a load. It appears to me, that it would be of the utmost advantage, if you make a reduction in the duty on timber, to let it be such a reduction that the consumer should be certain of deriving some benefit from it, and then to make the reduction in such a way that, in the peculiar position of the Canadas, and knowing the importance attached by them to the timber trade, we should not suddenly, or indeed not at all, affect the interests of those colonies; and I think there can be a mode suggested if the House will consent to a considerable loss of present revenue, by which the object to which I have alluded may be attained. If I am correct in supposing that the amount of duty upon foreign timber does not exceed 4*s.* per load, the scope within which I can act is somewhat limited. There have been various measures proposed upon this subject. That measure which I must confess appeared to me to offer the greatest objection, was that proposed last year by government, and which offered the slightest possible relief to the public. By the measure of last year, it was proposed to reduce the duty on foreign timber, but to increase that on Canadian timber. I am going to act on a totally different view. I wish to put all political considerations on one side. I am anxious to avoid, as far as possible, those paltry objects which sink into nothing when I consider the immense interests which are at stake. The measure of last year proposed no relief to the consumer, and no addition to the revenue. My object, having a surplus to deal with, is to consider how I can deal with it to the greatest advantage to the consumer—how, without inflicting any injury on Canada, I can secure the most substantial benefit to this country, to the manufacturing, to the commercial, and to the agricultural interests. It appears to me, that if there is one article more than any other, on which a great reduction of duty is likely to prove beneficial to the public, it is this. It may not offer such plausible promises as some other reductions that might be proposed. It may, for instance, be represented to the working classes that this is a reduction of duty from which they will derive no benefit. But that would be a very false and superficial view of the subject. The real way in which we can benefit the working and manufacturing classes is, unquestionably, by removing the burden that presses on the springs of manufactures and commerce. I should propose—as I believe the aggregate average duty upon foreign timber does not exceed 4*s.*, I should propose, in order that the reduction may be carried out to a sufficient extent to benefit the consumer, that, for the present, the duty on foreign timber, as distinguished from deals, should be reduced to 3*s.* I should propose, that for the present year, that is to say, the year ending 5th April, 1843, the duties on deals should be reduced to 35s. But I propose to make a total change in the mode of collecting the duties, and to place all the ports of the Baltic on the same footing. I propose, that in future the duty shall be estimated by cubical measurement, instead of the cumbrous, injurious, and unfair mode by which the tax is at present levied. In the year after next I propose—for I am anxious to prevent the possibility of inflicting any injury on Canada; in the committee which sat in 1835, Lord Sydenham held out a distinct prospect to the Canadians, that no sudden measure should be adopted calculated to injure the timber trade of that country;—it is therefore the intention of her Majesty's ministers to evince no disposition in the reduction which they should feel it their duty to make, to impose any disadvantage on the inhabitants of Canada. I stated last year, on the subject of the timber duties, that I should reserve my opinion with regard to them, until I should see how an alteration of them would affect our colonies, and particularly until I should consider its effect on our political relation with the important province of Canada. I still maintain, that the utmost caution should be exhibited in our relations with Canada, and that nothing should be rashly done that may be likely to affect injuriously the interests of its inhabitants. With this feeling I propose an alteration in the timber duties, and shall be anxious to benefit the Canadian as well as the British consumer. On these grounds I propose, that after the 5th of April, 1843, the duty on foreign timber should be reduced to 25s. a load; that the duty on deals should, at the same time, be reduced to 30s., and that the duty on lath wood should be reduced to 20s. If the House will consent to make this reduction in the duty on foreign timber—and there is none more likely to encourage the commercial interests of the country—it will be necessary to consider how our relations with Canada stand with respect to the timber trade. With respect to those possessions, with which I trust this country will ever maintain the most friendly relations, I think it desirable that we should act on the principle of treating Canada as if it were an integral part of the empire. The distance of Canada from this country, and the cost of bringing timber to this country, must in itself necessarily place Canada under a great disadvantage in her commerce in that article with this country; and, therefore, I think if the duty on timber be reduced to 25s., and the duty on foreign deals to 30s., it appears to me if that reduction be made, that we have no alternative but to admit Canadian timber into this country at an almost nominal duty. Sir, I propose that the duty upon colonial timber be reduced to 1s. a load, that the duty upon deals be reduced to 2s. a load, and that the duty on lath-wood shall be reduced to 3s. a load. Now, I shall say at once that the adoption of this measure cannot fail to produce a great loss of revenue, but having made a reduction in the duty on articles that enter into the elements of manufactures, I cannot see any more beneficial reduction than a reduction of the duty levied upon timber. The total loss, in consequence of this reduction in the duty on timber, will, I estimate, amount to £600,000. If the House wish it, I will go through the details of the calculations by which I arrive at this conclusion. I am ready to go into these details, but I own I should be glad to be spared them, as I shall be glad to spare the House the trouble of listening to them. There are two, and only two, other great reductions of duty to which I wish to call the attention of the House, and I cannot help thinking that on these I shall carry the unanimous opinion of the House with me. Sir, there are at present levied certain duties on the export of British manufactures—duties, Sir, which I think are contrary to a sound principle of legislation; and these duties I find amount to the sum of £108,000 a-year. Part of these duties arise from the export of woollens and of yarns which are exported to countries with which we have no reciprocity treaties.

That on linen yarns to	4,000
On silks to	4,800
On manufactured iron to	24,000
On some other articles to	9,000
On earthenware to	8,000
On provisions to	5,200
Making altogether	£52,000

To these may be added for some minor articles about £20,000, giving a total of upwards of £100,000 a-year. Now, Sir, I propose to remit altogether the export duties on British manufactures, and thus there will be incurred a loss of revenue at £103,000 a-year. There is another and a different class of duties that I think unjust, and towards the removal of which I think a part of the surplus should be applied. In the first place, I will call your attention to the duty upon stage-coaches: and in dealing with this question you must consider the amount of competition which the proprietors of these coaches have to contend against, especially on those lines of road where railways have been established. To make that competition more difficult, you subject them to unjust taxation. As I said before, I am unwilling to place any new tax on locomotion; but I am anxious to propose the remission of existing encumbrances. At present, railways pay to the State only one-eighth of a penny a mile for every passenger, and, speaking of the present year, I do not propose any augmentation to this tax. I do not mean to say that these duties are too low; but, when the duty on stage-coaches is considered, I say stage-coaches pay a great deal too much. The rate of mileage imposed on stage-coaches, if licensed to carry not more than six persons, is one penny a mile; if licensed to carry not more than ten persons, three halfpence a mile; if not more than thirteen, twopence, and if not more than sixteen, threepence. Then, in addition to this, there is a license duty of 5s., besides the assessed taxes on coachmen and guards. On railroads, no corresponding taxes are imposed. I shall propose, that stage coaches be subjected to a uniform mileage of  $1\frac{1}{2}d.$ , that the license be reduced to 3s., and that the assessed taxes on coachmen and guards be taken off altogether. This proposition, if assented to by parliament, will lead to a loss of revenue amounting to £61,000; but it is a loss which, I feel persuaded, can be vindicated on principles of strict and impartial justice. I also propose to take off the duty imposed upon persons who are in the habit of letting job carriages, and this will lead to a loss in the revenue of £9,000, making a total loss in the revenue of £70,000 on account of stage coaches. I will now shortly review the whole of the financial arrangements which I have detailed.

The estimated deficiency of this Year is . . . . .	£2,570,000
The reduction in the various articles of the tariff, to the number of 750, will not be more than . . . . .	270,000
The loss on coffee I estimate at . . . . .	170,000
That on timber at . . . . .	600,000
The repeal of the export duty on British manufactures will occasion a loss of . . . . .	100,000
And the reduction of the duties on stage coaches will lessen the revenue by . . . . .	70,000
Making a total deficiency in the public income, in consequence of the proposed reductions of . . . . .	£3,780,000

The loss of £3,780,000, deducted from the estimated revenue to be derived from the new taxes, and which is calculated at £4,300,000, will leave a surplus of £520,000 to meet the increased estimate which I may have to propose on account of India; to meet the increased charge which may be necessary to prosecute the war with China; to meet any increased reduction of duty which it may be necessary to propose on account of the completion of commercial treaties with other countries. I believe I have now concluded the task I have undertaken. If I have been enabled clearly (which is all I have aimed at)—clearly and fully to develop the views of her Majesty's government, I am greatly indebted for that success to the very kind and patient attention with which the House has listened to the exceedingly long, and, I am afraid, in some respects, tedious details with which I have been compelled to enter. I have laid before you, without reserve, the whole plan of the government. I have given you a full, an explicit, an unreserved, but I hope, an unexaggerated statement of the financial embarrassments in which we are placed. There are occasions when a minister of the Crown may, consistently with honour and with good policy, pause before he presses upon the legislature the adoption of measures which he believes to be abstractedly right; he may have to encounter differences of opinion amongst colleagues whom he esteems and respects; he may sincerely believe it to be for the public interest that the government of which he is a member should retain power, and that, therefore, he should not hazard its existence, by proposing a measure which might not ultimately succeed, and thereby endanger the safety and security of his government; he may, on comparing the consequence of exciting and agitating the country by discussion upon a measure in which he may not ultimately succeed, think it possible that there is a disadvantage in proposing that which he believes to be abstractedly right, for the evil of fruitless agitation may possibly countervail the enunciation of a right principle. But there are occasions, and this is one of them, upon which a government can make no compromise—there are occasions, and, this is one of them, upon which it is the bounden duty of a government to give that counsel to the legislature which it believes to be right—to undertake the responsibility of proposing those measures which it believes to be for the public advantage, and to devolve upon the legislature the responsibility of adopting or rejecting those measures. I have performed on the part of her Majesty's government my duty. I have proposed with the full weight and authority of the government, that which I believe to be conducive to the public welfare. I now devolve upon you the duty, which properly belongs to you, of maturely considering and finally deciding on the adoption or rejection of the measures I propose. We live in an important era of human affairs. There may be a natural tendency to overrate the magnitude of the crisis in which we live, or those particular events with which we are ourselves conversant; but I think it is impossible to deny that the period in which our lot and the lot of our fathers has been cast—the period which has elapsed since the first outbreak of the first French revolution—has been one of the most memorable periods that the history of the world will afford. The course which England has pursued during that period will attract for ages to come the contemplation and, I trust, the admiration of posterity. That period may be divided into two parts, of almost equal duration; a period of twenty-five years of continued conflict—the most momentous which ever engaged the energies of a nation—and twenty-five years, in which most of us have lived, of profound European peace, produced by the sacrifices made during the years of war. There will be a time when those countless millions that are sprung from our loins, occupying many parts of the globe, living under institutions derived from ours, speaking the same language in which we convey our thoughts and feelings—for such will be the ultimate results of our wide-spread colonisation—the time will come when those countless millions will view with pride and admiration the example of constancy and fortitude which our fathers set during the momentous period of war. They will view with admiration our previous achievements by land and sea, our determination to uphold the public credit, and all those qualities by the expedition of which we were enabled ultimately, by the example we set to foreign nations, to ensure the deliverance of Europe. In the review of the period, the conduct of our fathers during the years of war will be brought into close contrast with the conduct of those of us who have lived only during the years of peace. I am now addressing you after the duration of peace for twenty-five years. I am now exhibiting to you the financial difficulties and embarrassments in which you are placed; and my confident hope and belief is, that, following the example of those who preceded you, you will look these difficulties in the face, and not refuse to make similar sacrifices to those which your fathers made for the purpose of upholding the public credit. You will bear in mind that this is no casual and occasional difficulty. You will bear in mind that there are indications amongst all the upper classes of society of increased comfort and enjoyment—of increased prosperity and wealth, and that concurrently with these indications there exists a mighty evil which has been growing up for the last seven years, and which you now are called upon to meet. If you have, as I believe you have, the fortitude and constancy of which you have been set the example, you will not consent with folded arms to view the annual growth of this mighty evil. You will not reconcile it to your consciences to hope for relief from diminished taxation. You will not adopt the miserable expedient of adding, during peace, and in the midst of these indications of wealth and of increasing prosperity, to the burdens which posterity will be called upon to bear. You will not permit this evil to gain such gigantic growth as ultimately to place it far beyond your power to check or control. If you do permit this evil to continue, you must expect the severe but just judgment of a reflecting and retrospective posterity. Your conduct will be contrasted with the conduct of your fathers, under difficulties infinitely less pressing than theirs. Your conduct will be contrasted with that of your fathers, who, with a mutiny at the Nore, a rebellion in Ireland, and disaster abroad, yet submitted with buoyant vigour and universal applause (with the funds as low as 52) to a property-tax of 10 per cent. I believe that you will not subject yourselves to an injurious or an unworthy contract. It is my firm belief that you will feel the necessity of preserving inviolate the public credit—that you will not throw away the means of maintaining the public credit by reducing in the most legitimate manner the burden of the public debt. My confident hope and belief is, that now, when I devolve the responsibility upon you, you will prove yourselves worthy of your mission—of your mission as the representatives of a mighty people; and that you will not tarnish the fame which it is your duty to cherish as the most glorious inheritance—that you will not impair the character for fortitude, for good faith, which, in proportion as the empire of opinion supersedes and predominates over the empire of physical force, constitutes for every people, but above all for the people of England—I speak of reputation and character—the main instrument by which a powerful people can repel hostile aggressions and maintain extended empire.

The right hon. baronet concluded by moving the following resolution:—"That, towards raising the supply granted to her Majesty, there should be charged, levied, collected, and paid upon every gallon of spirits of the strength of hydrometer proof, which shall, on or after the eleventh day of March one thousand eight hundred and forty-two, be distilled in Ireland, or be in the stock, custody, or possession of any distiller in Ireland, or which having been distilled in Ireland or Scotland, shall on or after that day be in warehouse in Ireland, and be taken out of warehouse for consumption in Ireland, or which having been taken out of warehouse in Scotland for removal to Ireland, shall on or after that day be brought into Ireland, an additional duty of one shilling."

A short discussion ensued, in which Lord John Russell, Mr. O'Connell, Viscount Howick, and Mr. T. F. Baring took part: the resolution was then put and agreed to, the report ordered to be received, and the House went into committee on the West India Clergy bill.
